School of Theology at Claremont
1001 1388259

The Library

SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY
AT CLAREMONT

WEST FOOTHILL AT COLLEGE AVENUE
CLAREMONT, CALIFORNIA

BX
1765
E4
1877

DELINEATION OF ROMAN CATHOLICISM,

DRAWN FROM

THE AUTHENTIC AND ACKNOWLEDGED STANDARDS

OF

THE CHURCH OF ROME;

NAMELY,

HER CREEDS, CATECHISMS, DECISIONS OF COUNCILS, PAPAL BULLS, ROMAN CATHOLIC WRITERS,
THE RECORDS OF HISTORY, ETC.:

IN WHICH

THE PECULIAR DOCTRINES, MORALS, GOVERNMENT, AND USAGES OF THE CHURCH OF ROME, ARE STATED, TREATED AT LARGE, AND CONFUTED.

BY THE REV. CHARLES ELLIOTT, D.D.

CORRECTED AND REVISED THROUGHOUT, WITH NUMEROUS IMPORTANT ADDITIONS.

FIFTH EDITION:

WITH A RECOMMENDATORY PREFACE

BY THE REV. JOHN HANNAH, D.D.

LONDON:

WESLEYAN CONFERENCE OFFICE,

2, CASTLE-ST., CITY-ROAD;

SOLD AT 66, PATERNOSTER-ROW.

Theology Library
SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY
AT CLAREMONT
California

London:
Watson and Hazell, Printers, 28, Charles Street, Hatton Garden, and at Aylesbury.

RECOMMENDATORY PREFACE.

At a time when Romanism is making new efforts in this country, and advancing claims of which neither we nor our fathers have heard for the space of nearly three hundred years, it seems more than usually desirable that British Protestant Christians should investigate the true nature and tendencies of that system with thoughtful and serious care. "Believe not every spirit," writes St. John, "but try the spirits whether they are of God." Nor ought the weighty admonition of St. Paul ever to be forgotten: "Prove all things;" but prove them with a design to "hold fast that," and that only, "which is good."

Persons who would examine Romanism in that spirit of impartiality which truth requires, can scarcely fail to see that three things are particularly necessary to the successful prosecution of their object:—First, To ascertain what Romanism really is; not from the reports of its alleged adversaries, or even from the sentiments and practices of private individuals who may be found within its pale; but from its own highest, most official, and most approved documents, to obtain a portraiture of Romanism; in other words, sketched, or drawn out more at length, by the prime authorities of Romanism itself. Secondly, To form an estimate of the whole by a diligent inspection of its several parts, by a comparison of these with each other, and by a subjection of all to the standard of holy Scripture, either in its direct and most explicit testimonies, or in the collections which may be fairly gathered out of it by the soundest rules of interpretation. And, Thirdly, To disallow and firmly reject every thing in Romanism that is opposed to Scripture, or that is not in harmony with the principles and character of its inspired teaching.

But to explore the original sources whence a full knowledge of Romanism may be derived, is beyond the time and ability of ordinary readers. Nor is it easy to search through all the volumes which the learning and piety of former ages have bequeathed to our favoured land, and of which the invaluable collection of Tracts by Bishop Gibson, entitled, "A Preservative against Popery," and Dr. Barrow's Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy, deserve especial mention. Something else is necessary,—something in the way of judicious summaries. Yet these summaries ought not to be too brief, lest they should not convey the information which would satisfy, or support that information by proper citations and references; nor ought they to be too copious, lest the reader should be bewildered and lost in a multitude of extracts and authorities, and should be unable to make a right selection from things so plentifully spread before him. They should be sufficiently large to comprise all that is wanted to give a competent delineation of the subject, with ample vouchers; and, at the same time, sufficiently concise to fall within the range and compass of popular use, while a reader may also be farther assisted by them in the more minute scrutiny of any single topic to which the references shall guide his attention. It is expedient, in fine, that summaries should be provided which may be regarded as magazines or repositories of all that relates to Romanism, fairly explained, and faithfully tested.

The work of the Rev. Dr. Elliott, now again submitted to the public, and comprising the large insertions which were made in the former English edition, correctly answers to the description which has just been given. It is very copious, fraught with matter from undeniable sources, and presenting an amount of information which may well excite surprise; and it is also sufficiently brief to meet the convenience of general readers who may wish to form an exact acquaintance with the subject. The price, too, at which it is offered, with its proposed issue in weekly Numbers, will bring it within the reach of many who cannot afford to purchase more expensive publications. Its Tables of Contents, also,—such especially as are prefixed to the several successive chapters,—and its Indexes, but above all its General Index, are exceedingly valuable; and will serve, among other things, to point the reader at once to any particular topic on which he may have occasion to bestow his attention. Every thing likewise is examined with scrupulous fidelity, and brought to the great touchstone of truth. The errors, superstitions, and unwarrantable assumptions of the system are exposed; and while its several parts are strongly delineated, they are also plainly refuted.

Christians, whether in a private or public capacity, are imperatively called, in these days, to profess "the truth of the Gospel," and to prepare themselves for its right defence. None ought to be neutral or indifferent; and the things which especially require to be maintained, in the presence of all opposition, are,—the standard, the spirit, and the practice of evangelical truth.

Holy Scripture, in its own sufficiency and supreme authority, is the standard of evangelical truth. "To the law and to the testimony." But Scripture is to be received in its own simplicity and integrity, without man's additions, man's retrenchments, or man's perversions. "Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish aught from it." "Turn not from it to the right hand or to the left." "Add thou not unto His words," it is particularly and emphatically said, "lest He reprove thee, and thou be found a liar." Protestants admit that Scripture is the only rule of faith; they plead for this as a great primary principle: but do they always duly apply it? If they will more devoutly "search the Scriptures,"—if in humble and faithful hearts they will learn the hallowing lessons which the Scriptures teach,—if with child-like docility they will follow the guidance which the Holy Spirit waits to administer in agreement with the rule of His own inspired word, they will find effectual security against the danger of being "tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive." Let not tradition, let not philosophy, let not anything else which may interpose its unseasonable claims, divert our minds from the living word of the living God. "For ever, O Lord, Thy word is settled in heaven." Darkness may accompany the dispensations of Providence, and overspread the path of man. But, in the midst of all that may occur, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." And to gain from Scripture the assistances which it so abundantly affords, let increased attention be paid to the study and interpretation of its own language; for "the words of the Lord are pure words: as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times." His "thoughts," which those words convey, "are very deep."

The spirit of wisdom, holiness, and peace, which the Scriptures continually breathe, and which so richly pervades the New Testament, is the spirit of evangelical truth. Happy they whose hearts are deeply imbued with it! They prize the letter, but they aim at that which the letter, in its clearest and ablest exposition, always represents and serves. From the fountain of Divine grace freely opened to mankind, through faith in the "one Mediator between God and men," they receive the heavenly blessing which testifies their acceptance, and renews their nature; and their fervent desire is, that "this mind may be in them, which was also in Christ Jesus." The spirit of evangelical truth will not give entertainment to falsehood in any of its shapes or disguises, and it is equally opposed to malignity in its covert and its manifest agencies. There is a power in that spirit which error and evil find it hard to resist. Who can tell what authority exists in "the meekness of wisdom?" Let Protestants cultivate this spirit in their opposition to the claims of Rome, in the controversies which may arise among themselves, and in the whole progress of their journey through life. Let them remember that true Christianity recovers the fugitive, and transforms the sinful; that it goes far beyond all externalism, all observances, all merely speculative notions; that it makes men new, and prepares them for the gift of eternal life with God.

As the spirit of Christianity spreads and prevails, "Zion" will "awake," and "put on her strength;" "Jerusalem, the holy city," will "put on her beautiful garments."

When the standard of evangelical truth is faithfully maintained and followed, and when its own spirit is largely imbibed, its practice, the practice of "walking in newness of life," will not be neglected. "As obedient children," Christians will rejoice to submit to the will of their Father: as willing subjects, they will feel how good it is to resign themselves to the authority of their Lord; to shun what He forbids, to do what He enjoins, to bear what He appoints. Their lives will proclaim His grace and power, and will supply evidences of the truth which its enemies shall not be able to gainsay. "For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love," inseparable from that "new creature" of which the Apostle elsewhere speaks, and discovering itself, in its practical application and issue, by "the keeping of the commandments of God," which "are not grievous." "And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God."

JOHN HANNAH.

PREFACE TO THE AMERICAN EDITION.

During the last twenty-two years, the writer of these pages has employed much attention, reading, and time, in the study of the controversy between Roman Catholics and Protestants. His early associations and circumstances in life, were also favourable to an intimate acquaintance with the subject. The whole controversy was briefly gone through, and committed to writing, in the years 1819 and 1820.

This was followed by the collection and arrangement of materials in the course of his reading. The whole, in an improved and enlarged edition, was transcribed and finished in 1830, and laid aside for his own use. Thus far he had no intention of giving his views to the public in a printed book. Still the work of collecting authorities and additional matter was continued.

At the earnest request of the late Dr. Ruter and other friends, he resolved, about seven years ago, to attempt the recomposition of the whole, for the purpose of publication. The leading reasons for such an attempt were the following:—

1. He believes firmly, that the system of Popery, as taught in the standards of the Church of Rome, enforced by the Clergy, and believed and practised by the great body of Romanists, Clergy and laity, is at variance with the pure religion taught in the Bible, and is injurious to the public and private morals of this whole nation, and of the world; so that, if unchecked, it will retard or destroy true religion, and overturn the civil and religious liberties of the United States. Such, he believes, is its tendency, whether it be the design of its leaders or not.

2. Another reason which induced him to publish these volumes is, to disabuse the public mind respecting the deceitful character of Popery. Romanists misrepresent their own creed, their Church, and her institutions.* The most forbidding features

[* "The plan of adapting the creed of the modern Church of Rome to existing circumstances, has been long practised; and in Great Britain, perhaps, more than in other countries, where the 'sweeteners' (to use Mr. Hawkins's admirable phrase) have been long and constantly employed in exhibiting their 'Protean views of Rome.'

["'You wish me,' says he, 'to confine my remarks to England, and the manner in which Catholicity is practised here. If I could persuade myself that your plan of reformation would have any lasting establishment, it were well indeed to shut our eyes to the follies of times that are past, or those of other countries. But as this is greatly to be questioned, and even in England many of your own party are determined, so long as they are Catholics at all, to remain Catholics of the old Church, your scheme will never be attended with any permanent success. The English, as well as other nations, are likely to drop back into the old beaten track; and will assuredly prefer the ideas and discipline of the major part of times and peoples, to the more enlarged views of a few sweeteners, who are nearly the same amongst Catholics, as were, according to your favourite historian, (Natalis Alexander, tom. v., dissert. 6,) cavillatores, semipagani, and philosophatres amongst the Pagans. From hence arises the difficulty, when writing against your system, to know which way to point the attack, or with what arms to combat. Proteus-like, it is for ever varying. What is demonstrated against an Italian Catholic, does not affect an Englishman; what is objected against a Catholic of the tenth or fourteenth age, is said not to touch the discipline or doctrines of the eighteenth. And yet all these ages and principles and practices will certainly come round again, and the controversy may be carried on in omne volubilis ævum, without drawing a single line nearer to a conclusion. Remember what Dr. Wake asserted and proved against the Bishop of Meaux, with respect to the variations of his Church, (Hawkins's Appeal, p. 195, Mosheim, cent. xvii.,) and you will, perhaps, begin to apprehend lest your own reflections should stand in need of some similar artifice, to render them more palatable to Rome. However, it is a real compliment to our religion, that the more learned and liberal your writers are, the nearer are their approaches towards the tenets of the Reformed Church; and the more they value themselves upon being able to represent their own doctrines as much like ours as the times will bear. Nor should it be forgotten that, at the beginning of the Reformation, we only rejected the far greater number of your tenets and observances, in that very sense in which you are so solicitous to excuse of this professedly immutable system, are kept out of sight by its Jesuitical teachers, while a Protestant sense is attached to most of their doctrines and peculiarities. By this means, they designedly misrepresent themselves, and impose on the public. One object, then, of this work is, to spread before the people true Popery, and to strip it of its Protestant garb, which it has, for the time being, assumed.

Popery is truly irreformable, and it cannot change essentially without destruction. Hence it professes to be unchangeable. Pope Pius's Creed affirms, that the Church hath held her doctrines, as she now holds them. Infallibility and unchangeableness are their boast. Pope Gregory XVI., in his encyclical letter of August 15th, 1832, says, "Ever bearing in mind, that 'the universal church suffers from every novelty,' as well as the admonition of the Pope, St. Agatho, that 'from what has been regularly defined, nothing can be taken away, no innovation introduced there, no addition made; but that it must be preserved untouched as to words and meaning.'" Again, he declares, concerning the Church of Rome, "It is no less absurd than injurious to her, that anything by way of restoration, or regeneration, should be forced upon her as necessary for her soundness or increase, as if she could be thought obnoxious to decay, to obscurities, or to any other such inconveniences." And Charles Butler, Esq., in his Book of the Roman Catholic Church, affirms, "It is most true, that the Roman Catholics believe the doctrines of their Church to be unchangeable; and that it is a tenet of their creed, that what their faith ever has been, such it now is, and such it ever will be." And as Roman Catholics profess this immutability, Protestants cannot be charged with uncharitableness, in ascribing great unfairness to them, when they vary so glaringly from the accredited standards of their Church.

3. An additional reason for writing these pages is, to inform Protestants concerning the true nature, tendency, and design of Popery. On account of the sound scriptural truths in which the great body of American Protestants have been educated, they think it impossible that any men called Christian, can seriously hold to the principles charged on Roman Catholics as parts of their creed and religion. They have taken advantage of this, and profess to the former an adherence to many of the leading truths of our religion. Hence many think Roman Catholics are misrepresented, when their real system is delineated. Nor is it marvellous that Protestants should be generally unacquainted with Popery. Its true system is comprehended in the huge Latin and Greek tomes of the Councils, the Bulls of Popes, the writings of the Fathers, and the ponderous volumes of theologians, all of which require much time and research in order to ascertain their contents. Besides, the Protestant world has been asleep with regard to Popery for nearly two hundred years; while the Papacy has been wakefully using every stratagem and means of preservation and extension. A careful examination of that system will terminate in the conviction, that though it has varied its methods of attack and defence, it has changed none of its essential principles.

them, and against which only our chief objections lie. To insist upon the distinction between the old and new tenets of your religion, would lead me into a discussion which I mean not to pursue; but enough may be seen upon this subject in Bishop Gibson's Collection of Tracts, to satisfy the most sceptical inquirer, to justify whatever I have said upon this subject, and to expose the vain subterfuges, by which Dr. Wake's observations are endeavoured to be eluded. (Appeal, pp. 87, 94, 114.) There are many in your own Church at this very time, as I have elsewhere hinted, who bitterly complain, that good old Popery is so run down by reason of the delicate scruples of this accommodating age; and who lament that so many irrefragable, angelical, seraphical, Marian, invincible, subtile Doctors, who had so long been considered as the main channels through which their several traditions flowed, should now be treated with as much neglect and contumely, as if they had been mere children, and were totally unacquainted with the tenets of their Church.'—Hawkins's General Defence of the Reformation; in a Letter to the Rev. Joseph Berington, Worcester, 1788, pp. 85—87. See also Dr. Sall's Catholic Faith maintained in the Church of England. London, 1840, pp. 321, 322."]

4. The infidel and profligate portion of the community, are easily misled by Popery. It lays no restraints on their lusts; its faith for them is comprehended in this short creed, "One religion or superstition is as good as another." These persons find in the Popish scheme a sympathizing irreligion, so that they easily fall in with its superstitions and claims. Such are also at variance with the self-denying religion of Christ, as taught and practised by evangelical Protestants. Hence they are easily ensnared with the delusions of Popery. To convince and reform such as these, is of vast importance, both to them and the public.

5. It is believed also by some, that young Ministers may find this work convenient, not only for the sake of reference, but also as a source from which to collect authentic documents and proofs, by which they may be aided in meeting the arguments of their opponents. The constant reference to writers of eminence, and the quotations from the standards of Romanism, it is thought, will be acceptable and useful at this time, to discover the Jesuitical shape into which Popery is now moulded.

The system of Romanists is here delineated as found in their Creeds, Catechisms, Councils, Papal Bulls, their acknowledged theologians, the records of history, &c. Besides these, the author has employed the best aids within his reach. They were limited. He has availed himself largely of Barrow in preparing the chapters on the supremacy. He is constantly referred to, and particularly credited where it could be done.

During the whole time in which the writer was engaged in preparing this work, he had his full share of other duties to perform, either as Pastor of a flock, as Professor in a college, or as Editor of a weekly paper. For the most part, only small fragments of time, at any one period, could be devoted to accomplish this undertaking; and, of course, it must be imperfect. He would be glad to spend ten whole years more of his undivided time and attention in finishing this attempt, did Providence permit, or did other pursuits allow of it.

The conviction that such a work as this is designed to be, is now needed by the American public, induces its author to present the following chapters to their candid examination. He has nothing to say by way of apology, and but little in prefatory remarks. His performance alone must be both his apology and explanation, and as such he presents it to his fellow-citizens of every name and grade. The second volume, God permitting, will be ready two or three months after the first.

Although he is fully convinced, from the most careful examination which he can make, that Roman Catholicism is corrupt in its doctrines, morals, institutions, and practice, as a whole; yet he believes there is a remnant of truly pious persons among both the Clergy and laity, who have not defiled their robes. The pious few, whether lay or clerical, are guided by the remains of truth buried in their system, and the portions of it which are forced on them through the influence of Protestantism. By these means, the effect of error and of bad example is counteracted. These persons are good Christians, not in consequence of Popery, but in spite of it.

This work is dedicated to the benefit of man, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the glory of God the Father, in reliance on the influences of the divine Spirit.

CHARLES ELLIOTT.

Cincinnati, Ohio,
February 22d, 1841.

INTRODUCTION TO THE ENGLISH EDITION.

In presenting to the public this revised and corrected edition of Dr. Charles Elliott's Delineation of Romanism, the Editor has endeavoured to maintain, as well as to act upon, those sound and important principles which are not only expressed in the preceding Preface, but which formed the rule by which the author was governed when conducting the work through the press; by exhibiting, with an unflinching hand, the true state of the Papacy, both at home and abroad, with regard to its doctrines and practice, in order that, if possible, all may be preserved from a contamination which, if the Scriptures be correct, will prove as destructive to the spiritual and eternal interests of the soul, as it has been dishonourable and degrading to the character and office of the Redeemer of the world.

The attempts which are now being made to effect this, as well as a wide and sweeping estrangement from the faith "delivered to the saints," are numerous, artful, and incessant. A material change, however, has taken place within the last half century as it regards the manner of accomplishing the project. Formerly the hierarchy of Rome prosecuted their enterprises against Protestantism in a way which was covert and dark, and which harmonized exactly with the system they professed to advocate. Affairs are changed, inasmuch as their assaults against the Reformed faith are conducted with a presumptuous audacity that has become more deeply and extensively daring, by reason of the criminal apathy and indifference of the nominal, lukewarm, and unprincipled Protestant. Allusion is made to the proceedings of the British Legislature, which have given a legal and national sanction to that which they knew and swore to be superstitious and idolatrous, by paying money out of a Protestant treasury to train up men to teach superstition and idolatry, in an annual grant to the College of Maynooth; and also by the endowment of Popish Priests and Bishops in our colonies for similar purposes: reference is also had to the portion of the press termed liberal, which generally speaks in the most favourable terms of Romanism, classifying it among the other forms of Christianity, and defending it the more energetically, because a few individuals have endeavoured, in a most decided manner, to oppose its principles, and to arrest their progress. The Romanizing members of our national seats of learning must also be included, who, by the doctrines which they have inculcated, and the general tendency of the movement they have made, have not only advocated and promoted every distinguishing dogma of the Papacy, but also attempted to render abortive the distinctive principles of the Reformation, and to conduct the Church and country again to the paternal embraces of the Pope of Rome.

In our childhood we were taught, and our riper years have tended to impress more permanently upon our minds the lessons then given, that the religion of the Papacy is so essentially opposed to that which was inculcated by Jesus Christ, and proclaimed by his Apostles, as to hazard the eternal well-being of all who continue to hold it; while, on the other hand, the Church of Rome, without any hesitation, declares, that no Protestant "can enter the kingdom of heaven." On this momentous point the two communions are at fearful issue. In the opinion of every member of the Reformed Church who is true to the principles which he professes, although his disagreement with the Romanist is so great, and the perils to be encountered are so serious, there is in existence an authoritative standard of truth, that may with facility be consulted, and to which if both parties submit, not only would hostilities cease, but a peace, as durable as extensive, would be established between them. The test to which we would refer is of undoubted authority, not derived from sources which are uncertain and fickle, or the result of a train of suspicious reasoning, founded on premisses which are apocryphal and unsound: it is the infallible record of Heaven, the volume of divine inspiration, even the "more sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts." The Romish hierarchy rejects the Scripture as an infallible guide in faith and practice, and refuses to submit her tenets to the judgment of this tribunal; consequently, if no standard of appeal can be mutually established, the controversy will unavoidably be endless.

"Advocates for the religion of the Church of Rome," observes an anonymous writer, "have not been wanting who have attempted to show, and that with much subtlety, that Scripture and reason are both on her side. They will not consent that she should be judged by either, but will attempt to press both into her service. Before the holy Scriptures were so well understood, and so generally diffused, as they have been since the Reformation, and before the use of reason in the investigation of matters of religion was so well defined, and so ably asserted, as it has been since that time, the principles of the Roman Church used to appear in their proper form, and to be supported by such sort of evidence as could be found for them. But, in the present diffusion of scriptural knowledge, the contrast of those principles with the doctrines of Christianity, is too strong to allow any expectation of promoting the cause of the hierarchy, while they appear in their proper character. The advocates of the Church of Rome have therefore found it necessary to disguise and conceal her principles as far as possible, in order to diminish the effect of the contrast. This measure was found to be necessary, as soon as ever the light of the Reformation had begun to dawn upon Christendom. The Council of Trent, in defining the doctrines of the Church of Rome, receded very far from the violence of former times; the essence, indeed, of the corruption was retained, but it was embodied in a less repulsive form, and shown through a medium which diminished its magnitude.

"The decrees of that Council have ever since been held forth and regarded as the authentic exhibition of the principles of the Roman hierarchy; but the same mitigating process has been practised upon the doctrines of that Church as exhibited in the decrees of the Council of Trent. They passed through the alembic under the hand of the famous Bossuet, and came out refined as far as possible, so as to retain their identity. Nothing can exceed the subtlety with which that artful theologian has embodied the essential corruption of the Roman Church, in his representation of the sense of the decrees of the Council of Trent. The refining process can hardly be carried further than he has carried it. But succeeding writers, in this country especially, have attempted to make Romanism still more specious, by keeping entirely out of sight some of its doctrines and practices, which could not be so disguised as to be exposed with safety to the radiancy of Scripture and reason.

"Since the Reformation, therefore, the Church of Rome has had, like the ancient Academy, her esoteric and exoteric doctrines; the former adapted to the penetralia of ignorance and superstition, into which the light has not yet shined; the latter disguised and refined for the purpose of exhibition. These latter are put forth to the world with this inference, that the Fathers of the Protestant Churches effected what they called a Reformation by calumny and lies; making a strife about corruptions, which were nowhere to be found, but in their own slanderous representations; and which the Church of Rome detested as much as themselves. The character of the Proto-Reformer Luther has been held up to contempt and hatred, as one of the vilest which has ever disgraced human nature. He has been represented as a man so utterly devoid of all good principle, as to attach suspicion to any cause of which he was the promoter. The venerable Reformers of the Church of England have been treated with little less injustice. Their secession from the Church of Rome is represented as an unjustifiable schism. The merits of the Reformation of the Church in this country are constantly confounded with those of the dispute, in which originated the inquiry that ultimately led to that Reformation. The 'unjustifiable schism,' as it is called, which was then made, we are accused of wantonly perpetuating. Those who would stand forth to assert the principles of Protestantism among us, are charged with bigotry; and those who represent the doctrines of the Church of Rome according to her most accredited writers, and even according to infallible Councils, are charged with calumny or ignorance. These are the means by which the Church of Rome has long been striving to re-possess herself of the influence which she has lost, and to regain the height from which she has fallen."

The idea, that Popery is a system that belonged only to the dark ages, is fallacious. We cannot entertain the opinion, that Romanism offered her portion of "the noble army of martyrs," on her sanguinary altars, merely because the times were rude and barbarous; and that whatever the power she may ultimately possess, on account of the advancement of knowledge, and the spread of liberal opinions, similar scenes of cruelty and of blood will not be repeated. In the following pages it is demonstrated, that the Church was governed by, and acted in strict accordance with, her recognised tenets; tenets which up to this moment have never been abjured or condemned, but, on the contrary, are held with obstinate tenacity, and when opportunity offers, are enforced with vigour. Never can we forget the fires which were kindled in England, when courageous worthies suffered at the stake; the remembrance of which is constantly refreshed by occurrences of recent date, that prove, that the Church of Rome yet retains the will, and the principles of persecution. If we would still enjoy freedom of inquiry, liberty of conscience, and Gospel truth unadulterated, we must systematically and boldly withstand the inroads of Popery, and steadily resist every effort to uproot the vine and the fig-tree under which our fathers, our children, and ourselves, have sat. Hence the object of this volume: to present to our readers such a Delineation of Romanism as will exhibit its true nature and character, and to shed upon them the light of divine revelation, by which alone they ought to be examined and proved, and thus to prevent others from being led astray by this manifest "deceivableness of unrighteousness."

In this publication of Dr. Elliott's work, the text has undergone almost universally a strict revision; much additional matter being introduced to illustrate more efficiently the arguments which are brought forward, and the statements which are made. The additions which the Editor has thought proper to introduce, will be found inclosed in brackets ([ ]), in the text and also in the notes.

Being ignorant of the edition of those patristic and other ecclesiastical authorities to which the industrious author of the Delineation has referred his readers, the Editor has judged it fit, in most cases, to adhere to those translations which Dr. Elliott has himself given, being satisfied with introducing in copious and extensive notes, extracted from the best and most approved copies of those ancient writers, the original passages, that the learned reader might ascertain, as far as possible, the meaning which was primarily intended to be conveyed. A list of these authorities, including other works on the Popish controversy, that have been largely consulted, will be found at the conclusion of the volume.

In preparing this work for the press, the Editor has had to acknowledge with gratitude the great assistance which he has derived from that national emporium of literature, the Library of the British Museum; and also, from that valuable collection of the writings of the Fathers, and of Protestant and Roman Catholic Divines of by-gone days, which are contained in the Library of Sion College: to the PRESIDENT and FELLOWS of that Society his expressions of thankfulness are equally due. In no ordinary degree does the Editor feel himself under powerful obligations to that veteran polemic in the cause of Protestantism, who, in exposing the flagrant errors of Romanism, has, by his numerous and lucid publications, done more than any other individual now living,—the Rev. JOSEPH MENDHAM, M.A., of Sutton Coldfield, near Birmingham, who, with his gifted son, ROBERT R. MENDHAM, Esq., has encouraged and assisted him by many important suggestions, as well as by numerous and highly valuable communications with which the present volume is enriched, so far as the Editor could avail himself of them; while those of which, at present, no use has been made, will serve to render future editions of this work, should they be called for, still more worthy the attention of a Protestant community. With the Rev. THOMAS HARTWELL HORNE, B.D., Rector of the united parishes of Saint Edmund the King and Martyr, and St. Nicholas Acons, Lombard-street, London, author of the "Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures," &c., &c., the Editor has been in constant intercourse; from whom, by his knowledge of the controversy, and extensive acquaintance with ancient ecclesiastical literature, he has derived most important aid. To the Rev. JOHN EVANS, M.A., Incumbent of Whixall, Salop, and author of "The Statutes of the Fourth General Council of Lateran, recognised and established by subsequent Councils and Synods down to the Council of Trent,"—and to the Rev. JOSIAH ALLPORT, Minister of St. James, Birmingham, whose name is well known in the History of the controversy with Rome, as the indefatigable Editor of the Protestant Journal, and other equally useful and popular publications,—who have assisted him with kindly suggestions and advice, he also presents his thanks. In recognition of the cordial, disinterested, timely, and valuable help which has been so cheerfully given by these gentlemen, to all of whom, with the exception of the amiable Rector of Saint Edmund the King and Martyr, &c., he is personally unknown, the Editor cannot refrain from applying the words of the old proverb, Bis dat qui citò dat.

LONDON,
May 11th, 1844.

CONTENTS.

BOOK I.

ON THE RULE OF FAITH.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—STANDARDS OF ROMAN CATHOLIC FAITH.

Page.

Introductory Remarks—Creed and Oath of Pius IV.—Episcopal Oath of Allegiance to the Pope—Catechism of the Council of Trent—General Councils—Papal Bulls—Liturgical Books—the Scriptures—Traditions—the Church—ancient Fathers—Roman Catholic Writers—general Remarks on their Standards 1

CHAPTER II.

SCRIPTURE.

Statement of their Doctrine on the Authority, Reading, Use, Interpretation, &c., of Scripture—Sufficiency or Perfection of Scripture—the Scriptures are plain or clear—the Scripture the Rule and only Rule of Faith and Practice—how the Scriptures are the Rule of Faith—all are to read the Scriptures—their Objections to Scripture reading, stated and answered—the Canon of Scripture—Genuineness, Authenticity, and Inspiration of Scripture—English Translation—Retort on the Church of Rome, both in regard to Translations and the Original—greater Difficulties in consulting the Records of the Church of Rome than of Scripture..... 7

CHAPTER III.

TRADITION.

The Doctrine defined—Tradition explained—Traditions of the Church of Rome examined—Arguments against oral Tradition—whether Protestants receive some Things on the Authority of Tradition, and therefore they ought to receive others—of written Traditions—Testimony of the ancient Fathers..... 35

CHAPTER IV.

INFALLIBILITY.

Statement of the Doctrine—the Proof examined—Opinions of Roman Catholics on the Seat and Extent of Infallibility—Infallibility of the Pope—Infallibility of a General Council—Infallibility of a Pope and Council—Infallibility of the Church of Rome, or the universal Church—Arguments against Infallibility 53

CHAPTER V.

THE ANCIENT FATHERS—THEIR AUTHORITY IN THE CHURCH OF ROME.

Page.

Some of them have been corrupted by the Intermixtures of Heretics—Words and Phrases have been altered—the Church of Rome, by her Expurgatory Indices, has corrupted them—some of the Fathers have taught false Doctrines—the Council of Trent decreed many Things contrary to the Decisions of the Fathers—they contradict each other in many Things—their Character as Interpreters—Opinions of Roman Catholics respecting the Authority of the Fathers—their unanimous Consent considered—Uses of their Testimony 75

CHAPTER VI.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT RULES COMPARED.

The two Rules defined—the Roman Catholic Rule is the Source of Uncertainty—their Rule is impracticable in its Application—their unwarrantable Liberties with their Rule prove its Deficiency—the Means resorted to for its Support show its Deficiency—their Mode of determining Controversies is contrary to Scripture—their Rule requires Faith in the Doctrines of Men—it is ever varying—it requires every Man to be infallible—Christ never established it—Comparison of both Rules 88

BOOK II.

ON THE SEVEN SACRAMENTS OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

CHAPTER I.

THE SACRAMENTS IN GENERAL.

Doctrine of the Sacraments, as held by the Papists, stated—the Name, Nature, and Definition of a Sacrament—the Necessity of their Institution—the Matter and Form of the Sacraments—Number and Order of the Sacraments—the Author of them—their Administration—the Receiver of Sacraments—the Effects of the Sacraments—Ceremonies and Sacramentals—Arguments against their Views of Sacraments 91

CHAPTER II.

BAPTISM.

The Doctrine stated—the Matter of Baptism—the Form of Baptism—the Minister of Baptism—the Subject of Baptism—the Necessity of Baptism—the Effects of Baptism—the Ceremonies of Baptism 111

CHAPTER III.

CONFIRMATION.

Statement of the Doctrine—Nature and Institution of Confirmation—its Matter—its Form—the Minister—its Subject—its Effects—its Ceremonies—Confutation of Confirmation as a Sacrament..... 128

CHAPTER IV.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

Page.

Statement of the Doctrine—Confutation of the Doctrine—their Arguments for Transubstantiation stated and answered—the Testimony of the Fathers—Rise, Progress, and Establishment of the Doctrine 132

CHAPTER V.

SACRIFICE OF THE MASS.

Their Doctrine defined—Use of the Word "Sacrifice"—the Sacrifice of the Mass not authorized by our Lord's Institution, or any other passage of Scripture—it is contrary to Scripture—it is injurious to the Sacrifice of Christ—it is barbarous and inhuman—its Celebration in Latin is unscriptural—the Church of Rome makes the Mass a Matter of Gain—Extracts from the Missal 172

CHAPTER VI.

HALF-COMMUNION.

The Doctrine stated—the Church of Rome, by her Doctrine, has mutilated the Sacrament—Half-Communion is contrary to the Institution of Christ—the very Nature of the Eucharist requires both Kinds—without the Cup there is no Sacrament—the primitive Church administered in both Kinds—Strictures on the Reasons which the Church of Rome gives for this Practice 182

CHAPTER VII.

WORSHIP OF THE HOST.

The Doctrine stated—the primitive Church had no such Worship—it is Idolatry to worship that for God which is not God—all the Marks and Reproaches of Idolatry apply to the Adoration of the Host—the Adoration of the Host is peculiarly absurd—their eating their supposed God in the Wafer is notably so too—their Plea, that they worship only Christ, is not valid—they say their good Intention screens them from Idolatry—their Practice in this Adoration—the feast of Corpus Christi 186

CHAPTER VIII.

PENANCE—ABSOLUTION.

Popery invests the Priest with the Power of forgiving Sins—Examination of the Passages of Scripture which are quoted to establish it—the first Preachers never exercised such Power—no Man can be qualified for exercising such an Act as Absolution, especially immoral Priests—God only can forgive Sins—the primitive Church never believed in the Possession of such Power—in the Exercise of which there is no proper Distinction between the Righteous and Wicked—the Scripture Way of obtaining Pardon is different from the Popish Mode 193

CHAPTER IX.

CONFESSION.

Doctrine of Protestants concerning Confession—auricular Confession of the Church of Rome—Proofs for it considered—Scripture against it—the Argument from Antiquity—it perplexes the Consciences of the Pious—the Secrecy of Confession—it gives Men Licence to commit Sin—it corrupts the Clergy—the Arguments in favour of it considered 198

CHAPTER X.

CONTRITION AND ATTRITION.

Page.

The Doctrine stated—the Doctrine contradicts Scripture—it produces Immorality—Attrition considered—Objections against Attrition—it is grossly absurd to substitute this for Reformation of Life—one Error is, that Men are not bound to repent presently—they err concerning the Kind of Sins which call for Repentance—true Repentance is of itself sufficient in order to obtain Pardon 214

CHAPTER XI.

SATISFACTION.

Theological Meaning of the Term—the Doctrine stated—Meaning of the Word "Penance" or "Repentance"—the Doctrine is without Foundation in Scripture—it is contrary to Scripture—Satisfaction for Sin by Man involves numerous Absurdities—the Distinction between mortal and venial Sin tends to Immorality, and leads to an unholy Heart, and a wicked Life—is absurd—leads to endless Uncertainties in determining Cases of Conscience—is worse when applied to Practice—removes the great Evil of Sin—makes Repentance and Amendment of Life imperfect and false—fosters a Disposition to commit one peculiar Kind of Sin—Popery teaches that "one Man may satisfy for another"—the Notion that the Opinion of one Doctor can make an Opinion probable—Penances form no adequate Restraints or Checks on Sin—Testimony of the Fathers on this Subject 223

CHAPTER XII.

PURGATORY.

This Doctrine stated—Purgatory is without Foundation in Scripture—the Arguments brought to prove it considered—Scripture is against the Doctrine—Testimony of the Fathers—Praying for the Dead as connected with Purgatory—its Origin, Progress, and Establishment—its Absurdities and bad Consequences 240

CHAPTER XIII.

INDULGENCES.

Statement of the Doctrine—the Authority by which the Doctrine is supported—Specimens of Indulgences—how Indulgences apply to the Dead—the Jubilee—evil Consequences of Indulgences 308

CHAPTER XIV.

EXTREME UNCTION.

Statement of the Doctrine—Institution of the Sacrament—the Matter of it—the Form of it—its Subjects—Effects of Extreme Unction—Objections against Extreme Unction as a Sacrament.. 372

CHAPTER XV.

ORDERS.

Nature and Institution of Orders—the Number of Orders—whether all the Orders are Sacraments—the minor Orders—the greater or holy Orders—the Episcopate—not seven Orders of Clergy—Orders no Sacrament—the Matter and Form—the Minister of Ordination—the Effects of Orders—the Ceremonies of Orders 392

CHAPTER XVI.

MATRIMONY.

Page.

The Doctrine stated—its sacramental Character considered—Impediments dissolving Marriage—of the Validity and Invalidity of Marriage..... 423

BOOK III.

GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

CHAPTER I.

THE CHURCH.

Name and Definition—Scripture Character of the true Church—Members of the Church—of the Church, as visible or invisible—Unity of the Church 442

CHAPTER II.

THE CHURCH—SUBJECT CONTINUED.

Sanctity of the Church—Catholic or universal—Note of Apostolicity or Succession — Antiquity a Note of the true Church—perpetual or uninterrupted Duration—Note of Amplitude—Agreement with the ancient Church—Efficacy of Doctrine—Miracles—other Notes of the Church considered—of the Authority of the Church—Infallibility, &c..... 479

CHAPTER III.

GENERAL COUNCILS.

A Council defined—Members of Councils—who may convene a Council—Presidents of Councils—the Number and Requisites of General Councils—of the Authority and Infallibility of a General Council—their Origin and Use 549

CHAPTER IV.

SUPREMACY OF THE POPE—STATEMENT OF THE DOCTRINE.

Difficulty of ascertaining the Sentiments of the Romanists—some teach that the Pope has absolute Power, by divine Right, over all Persons, in all Matters, both spiritual and temporal—this universal and absolute Power has been claimed by several Popes successively for many Ages—some Roman Catholics ascribe to the Pope very limited Powers, especially in temporal or civil Affairs—absolute Power may be considered as having been the Doctrine of all Popes for more than eight hundred Years—Romanists are, consistently with their true Principles, bound to hold the absolute Power of the Popes in Spirituals and Temporals—Diversity of Sentiment among them on this Point—the Doctrine discussed will be that in which the Sons of the Romish Church are agreed—the absolute Power of the Pope forms the true Doctrine of the Church of Rome, as far as it can be defined 595

CHAPTER V.

SUPREMACY—SUBJECT CONTINUED.

Peter had not, by our Lord's Appointment, Supremacy over the rest of the Apostles—of different Kinds of Precedence or Excellence—the Arguments adduced to prove it are insufficient—the Titles given to him by the Fathers considered—Arguments against the Supremacy of Peter. 608

CHAPTER VI.

SUPREMACY—CONTINUED.

Page.

The Primacy of Peter not transmissible—it was personal—and grounded on personal Qualities—the apostolic Office not successive—Absurdity of such Transmission—Objection answered—all true Pastors the Successors of the Apostles—Popes not so 626

CHAPTER VII.

SUPREMACY—CONTINUED.

Peter was not Bishop of Rome—whether he ever was at Rome—known only by Tradition—the Fathers imposed on by false Testimony—Incredibility of his Statements—the Time of Peter being at Rome cannot be made out, and is contrary to the authentic Accounts of him in the New Testament—it is inconsistent with itself—Scripture does not assert it—nor did he found the Church at Rome—Irenæus contradicts it—not Bishop of Rome twenty-five Years, and of Antioch seven Years—the Patrons of this Opinion confute themselves—the Offices of Bishop and Apostle incompatible—what meant by apostolic Throne, Chair, &c.—how or by whom was Peter made Bishop—it was needless he should be Bishop—his being such would be a bad Example of Non-residence—the same Authority which makes Peter Bishop of Rome, makes Paul Bishop also—Statement of ecclesiastical Writers on this Point—no Apostle was Bishop of Rome except in a very extensive Sense—any Apostle could preside at Rome—was James Bishop of Rome?—the Popes call themselves Successors of Peter and Paul 636

CHAPTER VIII.

SUPREMACY—CONTINUED.

Roman Pontiffs do not possess Supremacy by God's Appointment—their Arguments do not support it—their Claim is uncertain and false—the Supremacy is destitute of Warrant from Scripture—it is destitute of the Support of History—the Supremacy is contrary to Scripture—such an Authority cannot be exercised without Injury to Religion and the Welfare of Mankind—it is at variance with the Character ascribed to Bishops or chief Pastors, in the primitive Church—the Supremacy is overturned on the very Ground on which it is assumed 638

CHAPTER IX.

SUPREMACY—CONTINUED.

Observations on the Origin, Growth, and Establishment of metropolitical, primatical, and patriarchal Jurisdictions—Statement of the Question—at the first each Church was settled under its own Bishop or Pastor, and Presbyters—each Church was independent of the others—afterward several Churches combined together in ecclesiastical Confederacies—in dividing Provinces and Dioceses, they followed the civil Divisions—for the Sake of Order one was called upon to preside, who was termed "Metropolitan," "Archbishop," "Patriarch," or "Pope"—each Province, before the time of Constantine, was independent, as each Parish or Bishop's Charge was previous to the Existence of provincial Synods—new Arrangement under Constantine—

Page.

Origin of Dioceses, and of Exarch, or Patriarch —some Churches continued independent of the Patriarchs for a long Period—Steps by which the Bishops of Rome arrived at the Supremacy —Conclusions from the foregoing..... 653

CHAPTER X.

SUPREMACY—CONTINUED.

Its Origin, Progress, and Establishment—the Deference which is paid to Eminence of any Kind —the natural Tendency of Power to grow and establish itself—spiritual Domination especially —Dissensions among Christians furnish an Occasion—by those who received Privileges from its Extension—the Attempts even of good Men to increase their Power—the Commendations of Inferiors—the feeble Counteraction which a few good Men can offer—the ambiguity of Words; as in those of Bishop, Head, Successor, Authority, Judge, Catholic, &c.—by Appeals —Favour of Princes—Influence of Bishops with Emperors—Residence of the Pope near the Imperial Throne—favourable Opportunities for its Growth—Ignorance of the Times—supporting the factious Clergy against the Throne—his Headship—the Monks—Wealth of the Pope —by interested and mercenary Writers—by the Employment of temporal and spiritual Power—the Forgery of decretal Epistles—by subservient Synods—the Episcopal Oath—by Concordats—revoking pragmatic Sanctions—by absolving from Oaths—Origin of its formal Establishment—Objection, "When, where, and by whom, was the Supremacy established," answered 661

CHAPTER XI.

SUPREMACY CONTINUED—PREROGATIVES OF THE POPE.

A Survey of the different Branches of the Supremacy —Convocation of Councils—Presidency of the Pope—Confirmation of a Council—his Power of Dispensation, of making Laws, &c.—the Pope not the Fountain of Jurisdiction—the Pope has not universal Jurisdiction over the Clergy 667

CHAPTER XII.

SUPREMACY CONTINUED—PREROGATIVES OF THE POPE.

The Roman Pontiff did not originally possess the Choice, Ordination, and Confirmation of Bishops —it does not belong to the Pope to censure, suspend, or depose Bishops or Pastors—the Pontiff cannot restore censured, suspended, or deposed Bishops—of Appeals to the Pope—whether the Pope can be called to Account, judged, or deposed—whether he can decide Controversies 679

CHAPTER XIII.

SUPREMACY CONTINUED—PREROGATIVES OF THE POPE.

Page.

Whether the Pope is above a Council—the Infallibility of the Pope 694

CHAPTER XIV.

SUPREMACY CONTINUED—PREROGATIVES OF THE POPE.

Power of the Pope over the civil Magistrate, Kingdoms, or States—the Pope as a temporal Prince 706

BOOK IV.

MISCELLANEOUS DOCTRINES, USAGES, &c., OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

CHAPTER I.

CELIBACY.

The Doctrine stated—of Chastity in general—of Virginity, as connected with Celibacy—of the Vow of Virginity or Celibacy—clerical Celibacy —their Arguments for it considered—Arguments against the Celibacy of the Clergy..... 715

CHAPTER II.

CELIBACY—CONTINUED.

The Celibacy of the Clergy has produced Licentiousness in Morals from its Commencement to the present Time—its Corruption subsequent to the Reformation—Questions connected with the Marriage of the Clergy—Origin, Progress, and Establishment of clerical Celibacy 730

CHAPTER III.

CELIBACY—CONCLUDED.

Of Monks and Nuns—the Tyranny of the Church of Rome over the Monks and Nuns—their Vow of Celibacy has produced Licentiousness among Monks and Nuns from its Origin till now—general Survey 744

CHAPTER IV.

WORSHIP OF SAINTS.

Preliminary Remark—Statement of the Doctrine—of Saints to be worshipped, and what Worship is due to them—the Manner in which their Prayers are quoted at large 753

CHAPTER V.

WORSHIP OF SAINTS—CONCLUDED.

Arguments of the Romanists answered—Arguments against it—Conclusion 760

DELINEATION OF ROMAN CATHOLICISM.

BOOK I.

ON THE RULE OF FAITH.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—STANDARDS OF ROMAN CATHOLIC FAITH.

I. Introductory Remarks. 1. Immutability in doctrine the boast of the Church of Rome. Butler quoted: 2. Every body of men should be heard respecting their own creed; but they should not be permitted to misrepresent themselves: 3. Many things are vaguely expressed in the standards of the Church of Rome: 4. Enumeration of their standards.—II. Creed and Oath of Pius IV. 1. This is an acknowledged standard: 2. Testimonies of this from Romanists. Dr. Milner, Charles Butler, and Dr. Doyle, cited: 3. It is both a Creed and Oath: 4. The Creed quoted: 5. Remarks on the Creed.—III. Episcopal Oath of Allegiance to the Pope. 1. Brief account of the oath: 2. A literal translation of the oath: 3. Remarks on the oath.—IV. Catechism of the Council of Trent.—V. General Councils.—VI. Papal Bulls. 1. This is resolved into the infallibility of the Pope: 2. Views of their Doctors on this point. Bellarmine cited: 3. Indices of prohibited books: 4. Collections of the Bulls incomplete.—VII. Liturgical Books. 1. Enumeration of them: 2. The Breviary: 3. The Missal: 4. The Roman Pontifical: 5. The Roman Ritual: 6. Devotional Books.—VIII. The Scriptures.—IX. Traditions—The Church.—X. Ancient Fathers.—XI. Roman Catholic Writers. 1. Uncertainty of their authority: 2. Are of great weight in matters of practice: 3. And even of doctrine: 4. Various classes of Divines among them.—XII. General Remarks on their Standards. 1. Survey of the foregoing heads: 2. Evasions of their writers. Positive air with which they instruct their own people. Uncertainty attached to their Doctors when contending with Protestants: 3. Their unrepealed standards are still in force: 4. Object of the present work.

I. INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

1. Mr. Butler, the author of the "Book of the Roman Catholic Church," declares, "It is most true that the Roman Catholics believe the doctrines of their Church to be unchangeable; and that it is a tenet of their Creed, that what their faith ever has been, such it was from the beginning, such it now is, and such it ever will be." Immutability in doctrine is the boast of the Church of Rome. If this high claim could be maintained, all men ought to bow to her decisions. But it can be shown that no claim can be worse founded; for it can be proved that she has varied from herself, from the primitive church, and from holy Scripture. An examination of her pretensions is the design of the following pages.

2. It is the privilege of every man to be heard respecting his creed or principles. The same may be affirmed of every body of men. This is certainly the most correct way of treating our fellows. Indeed every Protestant will readily agree with Mr Butler, "that no doctrine should be ascribed to the Roman Catholics as a body, except such as is an article of their faith." In representing, therefore, the doctrines of the Church of Rome, let us hear their own standards of faith, and let us hear them as they stand in their acknowledged and authenticated formulas, as exhibited by the authorities of their Church. But while Protestants do not desire to misrepresent the Church of Rome, she should not be allowed to misrepresent herself. We cannot take the glosses and interpretations of individual Clergymen, or even of whole provinces, as the standards of her Creed. We will have recourse, then, not to the misrepresentations of Protestants, (as Romanists are pleased sometimes to call sound argument,) nor to their own concealed or misrepresented expositions, designed to blind Protestants and Romanists; we will adduce the standards which are acknowledged by them. The Articles of Faith of the Roman Catholic Church are to be found in its accredited Creeds, Catechisms, Formularies, and Decrees. These received the finishing touch by the Council of Trent, whose decisions respecting doctrines, morals, and discipline, are held sacred by every Roman Catholic in every country.

3. It should, however, be observed, that in the Decrees of the Council of Trent, as well as in numerous others of their standards, many things are expressed in a vague manner, and that designedly. Besides, in these Decrees, and in their Catechism, several doctrines and rules of worship are inculcated in a much more rational and decent manner, than that in which they appear in the service of the Church, and in the public practice of its members. This is true, especially in reference to the doctrine of purgatory, the invocation of saints, and the worship of images and relics.

4. The following standards no Roman Catholic can, with any consistency, deny or evade; although most of them will explain them away in any manner, whenever this can be done to their advantage. They are the Creed and Oath of Pius IV.; the Episcopal oath of feudal allegiance to the Pope; the Tridentine Catechism; the Councils, particularly that of Trent; Papal Bulls and Breves; liturgical books, such as the Breviary, Missal, Pontificals, Rituals, and devotional books, &c.

II. THE CREED AND OATH OF POPE PIUS IV.

1. Perhaps in no other document do we find the Roman Catholic Creed in a less exceptionable form than in the Creed of Pope Pius IV., bearing date November, 1564. It was immediately received throughout their Church, and since that time has ever been considered as an accurate summary of their faith. It is binding upon all Clergymen, Doctors, Teachers, heads of universities and of monastic institutions and military orders, with all reconciled converts.

2. We have the testimony of Romanists themselves, that the profession of this Creed, under the solemn sanction of an oath, is obligatory on the whole body of the Roman Church. Dr. Milner says: "The same Creeds, namely, the Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed, the Athanasian Creed, and the Creed of Pope Pius IV., drawn up in conformity with the definitions of the Council of Trent, are every where recited and professed to the strict letter."* Charles Butler, speaking of the Creed of Pius IV., says: "It was immediately received throughout the universal church, and since that time has ever been considered, in every part of the world, as an accurate and explicit summary of the Roman Catholic faith. Non-Catholics, on their admission into the Catholic Church, publicly repeat and testify their assent to it, without restriction or qualification."† The Rev. Dr. Doyle, in his examination before the Lords Commissioners on the state of Ireland, March 21st, 1825, p. 394, declares, on oath, that "the most approved and authentic summary of the Creed of the Roman Catholic Church will be found in the decrees of the Council of Trent, and in the profession of faith by Pope Pius IV., and in what we call the Roman Catechism, or Catechism of the Council of Trent. The latter work, particularly, is perhaps the most authentic summary, because in the Council of Trent many things are mixed up with the declarations of faith; whereas the Catechism of the Council is confined, I believe, exclusively to matters of faith and morals."‡ We are thus particular in giving testimony on this point, lest we should be told, this Creed has no authority in the Roman Catholic Church.

3. This authoritative Bull or document is called a Creed and Oath. In most of the editions of the Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent it is called juramentum, an oath, as well as professio fidei, a profession of faith. But the instrument will speak for itself, for it concludes with the words, Spondeo, voveo, ac JURO, I promise, vow, and SWEAR; which places this point beyond the reach of controversy.

4. The following is the Creed as translated by Mr. Butler, with the exception that we have inserted in Italics those words and sentences which he has seen fit to omit. Dr. Challoner has also omitted a considerable part of the concluding paragraph in his English Translation. We will now wave any remark on the motive for omitting parts of an authentic authoritative Creed; and will give Butler's Translation, as mentioned above, accompanied with the original Latin.

"I, N., believe and profess, with a firm faith, all and every one of the things which are contained in the symbol of faith which is used in the holy Roman Church; namely,—

"1. I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible; and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of God, born of the Father before all worlds; God of God; Light of light; true God of true God; begotten, not made; consubstantial to the Father, by whom all things were made; who, for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man; was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate, suffered and was buried, and rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures, and ascended into heaven; sits at the right hand of the Father, and will come again with glory to judge the living and the dead, of whose kingdom there will be no end; and in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Lifegiver, who proceeds from the Father and the Son; who, together with the Father and the Son, is adored and glorified, who spoke by the Prophets; and one holy Catholic and apostolic Church. I confess one baptism for the remission of sins, and I expect the resurrection of the body, [of the dead—mortuorum,] and the life of the world to come. Amen.

"2. I most firmly admit and embrace apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions, and all other constitutions and observances of the same Church.

"3. I also admit the sacred Scriptures, according to the sense which the holy Mother Church has held, and does hold, to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the holy Scriptures; nor will I ever take or interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers.

"4. I profess, also, that there are truly and properly seven sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and for the salvation of mankind, though all are not necessary for every one; namely, baptism, confirmation, eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony; and that they confer grace; and of these, baptism, confirmation, and orders cannot be reiterated without sacrilege.

"5. I also receive and admit the ceremonies of the Catholic Church, received and approved in the solemn administration of all the above-said sacraments.

"6. I receive and embrace all and every one of the things which have been defined and declared in the holy Council of Trent, concerning original sin and justification.

"7. I profess, likewise, that in the mass is offered to God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead; and that in the most holy sacrifice of the eucharist there is truly, really, and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there is made a conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood, which conversion the Catholic Church calls transubstantiation.

"8. I confess, also, that under either kind alone, whole and entire, Christ and a true sacrament are received.

"9. I constantly hold that there is a purgatory, and that the souls detained therein are helped by the suffrages of the faithful.

"10. Likewise, that the saints reigning together with Christ are to be honoured and invocated; that they offer prayers to God for us; and that their relics are to be venerated.

"11. I most firmly assert that the images of Christ, and of the mother of God, ever virgin, and also of the other saints, are to be had and retained, and that due honour and veneration are to be given them.

"12. I also affirm that the power of indulgences was left by Christ in the church, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people.

"13. I acknowledge the holy Catholic and apostolica'

* End of Controversy, Letter xix., p. 129.
† Book of the Roman Catholic Church, p. 5.
‡ See Protestant Journal, vol. i., p. 72.

Roman Church, THE MOTHER AND MISTRESS OF ALL CHURCHES; AND I PROMISE AND SWEAR TRUE OBEDIENCE TO THE ROMAN BISHOP, the successor of St. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, and Vicar of Jesus Christ.

"14. I also profess and undoubtedly receive all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred Canons, and general Councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent; and likewise I also condemn, reject, and anathematize all things contrary thereto, and all heresies whatsoever, condemned, rejected, and anathematized by the Church.

"15. This true Catholic faith, OUT OF WHICH NONE CAN BE SAVED, which I now freely profess, and truly hold, I, N., promise, vow, and swear most constantly to hold and profess the same whole and entire, with God's assistance, to the end of my life: and to procure, as far as lies in my power, that the same shall be held, taught, and preached by all who are under me, or are intrusted to my care, by virtue of my office. So help me God, and these holy Gospels of God." *

5. Such is the famous Creed of Pope Pius IV., which comprises the whole faith of a Romanist, in addition to the twelve articles of the Apostles' Creed. It is made the basis of several Catechisms. On its contents we will now remark,—(1.) It includes unequivocally the intolerant principles of the Church of Rome; namely, that of excluding all from salvation, except the members of their Church. (2.) It binds every Roman Priest to believe both parts of a contradiction. He swears to believe all that has been delivered by General Councils, many of whose Decrees, Canons, and definitions are contradictory. How then can a man receive and obey them all without surrendering his reason? (3.) The Romanist professes never to receive or interpret the holy Scriptures otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers. Such a consent never existed; and when a Priest swears that he will never receive them otherwise, it is the same as to swear he will never receive them at all.

III. EPISCOPAL OATH OF ALLEGIANCE TO THE POPE.

1. This second juramentary obligation, entered into by the hierarchy, or whole ruling order of the Italian Church, is, in its form and origin, far more ancient than the Creed and Oath of Pius, by which also the same order are required to bind themselves. This oath, in its contents and object, is both temporal and spiritual, doctrinal and practical; it is the ecclesiastico-political acknowledgment of sovereignty and supremacy in the person of the successor of St. Peter, the wielder of the two swords. The Decree of Boniface VIII., that it is necessary to salvation that every creature be subject to the Roman Pontiff, is recognised and adopted by this oath. The feudal character of it has been denied, but to no purpose. It is impossible for any one acquainted with feudal instruments not to be convinced of their virtual identity with the Episcopal oath given below. It is the obligation of a vassal to his supreme Lord. The annotator on this oath, in the Pontifical, the learned Catalani, calls it, "not only a profession of canonical obedience, but an oath of fealty, not unlike that which vassals took to their direct Lord." This oath, in its original form, when it was first imposed in the eleventh century by Gregory VII., was about one fourth its present extent. It is to be found in Decret. Greg. IX., lib. ii., tit. 24, in any edition. It will be sufficient to transcribe it as it now stands, and we affix the original, as it is not of easy access to all. The oath is imposed not only on Archbishops and Bishops, but on all who receive any dignity from the Pope.

* "Ego, N., firma fide, credo et profiteor omnia et singula, quæ continentur in symbolo fidei, quo S. Romana ecclesia utitur; viz.,—

"1. Credo in unum Deum Patrem omnipotentem, factorem cœli et terræ, visibilium omnium, et invisibilium; et in unum Dominum Jesum Christum, Filium Dei unigenitum, et ex Patre natum ante omnia sæcula; Deum de Deo; Lumen de lumine; Deum verum de Deo vero; genitum, non factum; consubstantialem Patri, per quem omnia facta sunt; qui propter nos homines, et propter nostram salutem, descendit de cœlis, et incarnatus est de Spiritu Sancto ex Maria Virgine, et homo factus est; crucifixus etiam pro nobis sub Pontio Pilato, passus, et sepultus est, et resurrexit tertia die secundum Scripturas; et ascendit in cœlum, sedet ad dexteram Patris; et iterum venturus est cum gloria judicare vivos et mortuos; cujus regni non erit finis; et in Spiritum Sanctum Dominum, et vivificantem, qui ex Patre Filioque procedit, qui cum Patre et Filio simul adoratur, et conglorificatur, qui locutus est per Prophetas; et unam sanctam Catholicam et apostolicam ecclesiam. Confiteor unum baptisma in remissionem peccatorum, et expecto resurrectionem mortuorum, et vitam venturi sæculi. Amen.

"2. Apostolicas et ecclesiasticas traditiones, reliquasque ejusdem ecclesiæ observationes et constitutiones firmissime admitto, et amplector.

"3. Item sacram Scripturam juxta eum sensum, quem tenuit et tenet sancta mater ecclesia, cujus est judicare de vero sensu et interpretatione sacrarum Scripturarum, admitto; nec eam unquam, nisi juxta unanimem consensum Patrum accipiam, et interpretabor.

"4. Profiteor quoque septem esse vere et proprie sacramenta novæ legis, a Jesu Christo Domino nostro instituta, atque ad salutem humani generis, licet non omnia singulis necessaria, scilicet baptismum, confirmationem, eucharistiam, pœnitentiam, extremam unctionem, ordinem, et matrimonium; illaque gratiam conferre; et ex his baptismum, confirmationem et ordinem, sine sacrilegio reiterari non posse.

"5. Receptos quoque et approbatos Ecclesiæ Catholicæ ritus, in supradictorum omnium sacramentorum solemni administratione recipio, et admitto.

"6. Omnia et singula, quæ de peccato originali, et de justificatione in sacro-sancta Tridentina Synodo definita et declarata fuerunt, amplector et recipio.

"7. Profiteor pariter in missa offerri Deo verum, proprium, et propitiatorium sacrificium pro vivis, et defunctis; atque in sanctissimo eucharistiæ sacramento esse vere, realiter, et substantialiter corpus et sanguinem, una cum anima et divinitate Domini nostri Jesu Christi; fierique conversionem totius substantiæ panis in corpus, et totius substantiæ vini in sanguinem: quam conversionem Catholica Ecclesia transubstantiationem appellat.

"8. Fateor etiam sub altera tantum specie totum atque integrum Christum, verumque sacramentum, sumi.

"9. Constanter teneo purgatorium esse, animasque ibi detentas fidelium suffragiis juvari.

"10. Similiter et sanctos una cum Christo regnantes, venerandos atque invocandos esse, eosque orationes Deo pro nobis offerre, atque eorum reliquias esse venerandas.

"11. Firmissime assero, imagines Christi, ac Deiparæ semper virginis, necnon aliorum sanctorum, habendas et retinendas esse, atque eis debitum honorem ac venerationem impertiendam.

"12. Indulgentiarum etiam potestatem a Christo in ecclesia relictam fuisse; illarumque usum Christiano populo maxime salutarem esse affirmo.

"13. Sanctam Catholicam et apostolicam Romanam Ecclesiam, omnium ecclesiarum matrem et magistram agnosco; Romanoque Pontifici, beati Petri, Apostolorum Principis, successori, ac Jesu Christi Vicario, veram obedientiam spondeo ac juro.

"14. Cætera item omnia a sacris Canonibus, et œcumenicis Conciliis, ac præcipue a sacro-sancta Tridentina Synodo tradita, definita, et declarata, indubitanter recipio atque profiteor; simulque contraria omnia, atque hæreses quascumque ab ecclesia damnatas, rejectas, et anathematizatas, ego pariter damno, rejicio, et anathematizo.

"15. Hanc veram Catholicam fidem, extra quam nemo salvus esse potest, quam in præsenti sponte profiteor, et veraciter teneo, eandem integram et inviolatam, usque ad extremum vitæ spiritum constantissime (Deo adjuvante) retinere et confiteri, atque a meis subditis, vel illis quorum cura ad me in munere meo spectabit, teneri, doceri, et prædicari, quantum in me erit, curaturum, ego idem N. spondeo, voveo, ac juro. Sic me Deus adjuvet, et hæc sancta Dei evangelia."—Concil. Trid. apud Bullas, p. 311. Romæ, 1564.

2. The following is a literal translation of this oath :—

"I, N., elect of the church of N., from henceforward will be faithful and obedient to St. Peter the Apostle, and to the holy Roman Church, and to our Lord, the Lord N., Pope N., and to his successors canonically entering. I will neither advise, consent, nor do any thing that they may lose life or member, or that their persons may be seized, or hands any wise laid upon them, or any injuries offered to them under any pretence whatsoever. The counsel with which they shall intrust me by themselves, their messengers, or letters, I will not knowingly reveal to any to their prejudice. I will help them to keep and defend the Roman Papacy, and the regalities of St. Peter, saving my Order, against all men. The Legate of the apostolic see, going and coming, I will honourably treat and help in his necessities. The rights, honours, privileges, and authority of the holy Roman Church, of our Lord the Pope, and his aforesaid successors, I will endeavour to preserve, defend, increase, and advance. I will not be in any counsel, action, or treaty, in which shall be plotted against our said Lord, and the said Roman Church, any thing to the hurt or prejudice of their persons, right, honour, state, or power; and if I shall know any such thing to be treated or agitated by any whatsoever, I will hinder it to my power, and, as soon as I can, will signify it to our said Lord, or to some other by whom it may come to his knowledge. The rules of the holy Fathers, the apostolic decrees, ordinances or disposals, reservations, provisions, and mandates, I will observe with all my might, and cause to be observed by others. Heretics, schismatics, and rebels to our said Lord, or his foresaid successors, I will, to my power, ersecute and oppose. I will come to a Council when I am called, unless I be hindered by a canonical impediment. I will by myself in person visit the threshold of the Apostles every three years; and give an account to our Lord and his foresaid successors of all my pastoral office, and of all things any wise belonging to the state of my Church, to the discipline of my Clergy and people; and, lastly, to the salvation of souls committed to my trust; and I will in like manner humbly receive and diligently execute the apostolic commands. And if I be detained by a lawful impediment, I will perform all the things aforesaid by a certain messenger hereto especially empowered, a member of my Chapter, or some other in ecclesiastical dignity, or else having a parsonage, or, in default of these, by a Priest of the diocess, or, in default of one of the Clergy [of the diocess], by some other secular or regular Priest of approved integrity and religion, fully instructed in all things above mentioned. And such impediments I will make out by lawful proofs, to be transmitted by the aforesaid messengers to the Cardinal proponent of the holy Roman Church in the congregation of the sacred Council. The possessions belonging to my table I will neither sell, nor give away, nor mortgage, nor grant anew in fee, nor any wise alienate, no, not even with the consent of the Chapter of my church, without consulting the Roman Pontiff; and if I shall make any alienation, I will thereby incur the penalties contained in a certain constitution put forth about this matter. So help me God, and these holy Gospels of God." *

* "Ego, N., electus ecclesiæ N., ab hac hora in antea fidelis et obediens ero B Petro Apostolo, sanctæque Romanæ Ecclesiæ, et Domino nostro, Domino N., Papæ N., suisque successoribus canonice intrantibus. Non ero in consilio, aut consensu, vel facto, ut vitam perdant, aut membrum; seu capiantur mala captione; aut in eos violenter manus quomodolibet ingerantur; vel injuriæ aliquæ inferantur, quovis quæsito colore. Consilium vero quod mihi crediturі sunt, per se, aut nuncios suos, seu literas, ad eorum damnum, me sciente, nemini pandam. Papatum Romanum et regalia Sancti Petri adjutor eis ero ad retinendum et defendendum, salvo meo ordine, contra omnem hominem. Legatum apostolicæ sedis in eundo et redeundo honorifice tractabo, et in suis necessitatibus adjuvabo. Jura, honores, privilegia, et auctoritatem sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ, domini nostri Papæ et successorum prædictorum, conservare, defendere, augere, et promovere curabo. Neque ero in consilio, vel facto, seu tractatu in quibus contra ipsum dominum nostrum, vel eandem Romanam Ecclesiam aliqua sinistra vel præjudicialia personarum, juris, honoris, status et potestatis eorum machinentur. Et si talia a quibuscunque tractari vel procurari novero, impediam hoc pro posse, et quanto citius potero significabo eidem domino nostro, vel alteri per quem possit ad ipsius notitiam pervenire. Regulas sanctorum Patrum, Decreta, ordinationes, seu dispositiones, reservationes, provisiones, et mandata apostolica totis viribus observabo, et faciam ab aliis observari. Hæreticos, schismaticos, et rebelles eidem domino nostro vel successoribus prædictis pro posse persequar et impugnabo. Vocatus ad Synodum veniam, nisi præpeditus fuero canonica præpeditione. Apostolorum limina singulis trienniis personaliter per me ipsum visitabo, et domino nostro ac successoribus præfatis rationem reddam de toto meo pastorali officio et de rebus omnibus ad meæ Ecclesiæ statum, ad cleri, et populi disciplinam, animarum denique quæ meæ fidei traditæ sunt, salutem quovis modo pertinentibus, et vicissim mandata apostolica humiliter recipiam et quam diligentissime exequar. Quod si legitimo impedimento detentus fuero præfata omnia adimplebo per certum nuncium ad hoc speciale mandatum habentem de gremio mei capituli, aut alium in dignitate ecclesiastica constitutum, seu alias personatum habentem; aut, his mihi deficientibus, per diœcesanum Sacerdotem; et clero deficiente omnino per aliquem alium Presbyterum secularem vel regularem spectatæ probitatis et religionis de supradictis omnibus plene instructum. De hujusmodi autem impedimento docebo per legitimas probationes ad sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ Cardinalem proponentem in congregatione sacri concilii per supradictum nuncium transmittendas. Possessiones vero ad mensam meam pertinentes non vendam, nec donabo, neque impignorabo, nec de novo infeudabo vel aliquo modo alienabo, etiam cum consensu capituli Ecclesiæ meæ, inconsulto Romano Pontifice. Et si ad aliquam alienationem devenero, pœnas in quadam super hoc edita constitutione contentas eo ipso incurrere volo. Sic me Deus adjuvet, et hæc sancta Dei evangelia." Decretum Greg. IX., lib. ii., tit. 24. Those who may not have other books at hand can find the original in Barrow on Supremacy. See Works, vol. vii., p. 46, et seq. 8vo. edit. London Protestant Journal, for 1831, p. 140.

3. This instrument we produce as one of the criteria by which we may form a fair and impartial judgment of the principles of Roman Catholics, being a document of their own, and expressed in their own words. The regalities of St. Peter may be made to contract or dilate to any dimensions which circumstances and policy may command. There is an addition made to the end of this oath, in reference to the subjects of the British Government, which is as follows: "I will observe the foregoing oath in proportion to my conviction that it contains nothing adverse to my fidelity to the King of Great Britain and his successors." The above is the oath taken by the Roman Catholic Bishops of America. Indeed, this oath of temporal and spiritual vassalage is binding upon the whole ruling order in the ecclesiastical monarchy of Rome.

IV. CATECHISM OF THE COUNCIL OF TRENT.

This was published in 1566, by Pope Pius V. The following is the Decree of the Council of Trent respecting it: "That the faithful may approach the sacraments with greater reverence and devotion, the holy Synod commands all Bishops not only to explain, in a manner accommodated to the capacity of the receivers, the nature and use of the sacraments, when they are to be administered by themselves; but also to see that every Pastor piously and prudently do the same, in the vernacular language, should it be necessary and convenient. This exposition is to accord with a form to be prescribed by the holy Synod for the administration of the sacraments, in a Catechism, which Bishops will take care to have faithfully translated into the vernacular language, and expounded to the people by all Pastors." * The translation in our possession, and from which we quote, is that by the Rev. J. Donovan, Professor, &c., Royal College, Maynooth, 1829. Although termed a Catechism, it is not written in the usual form of question and answer; but is a regular system of religious instruction, chiefly, though not wholly, intended for the use of the Priests. It contains five hundred and eighty-one octavo pages. It is a work of considerable labour and research, and written in a good style. The doctrines laid down in the Decrees of the Council are here elaborately discussed and defended; much additional information is supplied; and great skill is employed in endeavouring to make the sentiments of the Church of Rome appear consistent with reason and Scripture. It is an authentic summary, or Confession of faith of the Church of Rome, and is one of her standards which she can never deny, as containing her doctrines, authoritatively defined. It is a didactic performance, possessing the exact character of a system of doctrinal theology, and designed for the instruction of those who are to learn from it how to instruct others. The doctrines of the Church of Rome are here cautiously and artfully discussed. The Tridentine Catechism, or Catechismus ad Parochos, therefore, exhibits an authentic exposition of the Church of Rome, and is binding upon all the Pastors of their Church, and consequently upon their flocks, which are taught from its pages.

V. GENERAL COUNCILS.

The Church of Rome, according to the Creed of Pius, receives the decisions of General Councils, particularly of the Council of Trent; and then condemns, rejects, and anathematizes all things contrary to their decisions. The following is the article of the Creed on this head:—"I also profess and undoubtedly receive all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons and General Councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent; and, likewise, I also condemn, reject, and anathematize all things contrary thereto, and all heresies whatsoever, condemned, rejected, and anathematized by the Church." This extends to an almost unlimited variety of subjects and obligations. She does this by virtue of a claimed infallibility which must exist, possibly in a Council separately; but, indubitably, in a General Council with the reigning Pope at its head, thus awarding inerrancy to the creed of Rome. The decrees of Councils are binding on the whole body of the Roman Church, and those without her pale, of whatever rank or degree, are passively subject to the decisions and authority of Rome. Eighteen General Councils are enumerated by Bellarmine, from the first Nicene to the Tridentine, rejecting, however, that of Constance, and partially that of Basil.

VI. PAPAL BULLS.

1. This is another bond or obligation of the Church of Rome, which evidently resolves itself into the personal authority of the Bishop of Rome. We find, in the Episcopal oath of the highest Clergy, that every Archbishop, Bishop, and dignitary elect, swears that, from henceforth he will be faithful and obedient to his lord the Pope; will defend the regalities of St. Peter against all men; will endeavour to preserve, defend, increase, and advance his rights, honours, privileges, and authority, and to his power hinder the contrary. In the Creed of Pius IV. all the Clergy, Doctors, teachers, reconciled heretics, schismatics, &c., profess, and those with the care of souls additionally swear, I promise true obedience to the Bishop of Rome, successor to St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles and Vicar of Jesus Christ.

2. Some Romanists ascribe infallibility to a Council, others to the Pope; a large number of them assign it to the Pope personally, both independently of a Council and above it. This seems to be a logical consequence of the Pope's supremacy. There are three respects in which he is said to be infallible, by those who ascribe this attribute to him. Some ascribe infallibility to him when he decides on faith and morals. Others say, he is infallible when he decides ex cathedra, or officially. While a third class think, he cannot err in any of his decisions. Bellarmine says, "The Pontiff cannot err in any case, when he teaches the whole Church in those things which belong to faith." Pontifex, cum totam ecclesiam docet in his quæ ad fidem pertinent, nullo casu errare potest.* In the next chapter he says, Pontifex non potest errare errori juridicali; id est, dum judicat, et definit quæstionem fidei. "The Pontiff cannot err by a judicial error; that is, when he judges and defines a question of faith." He adds, in chap. v., In decretis morum, in decrees pertaining to morals. Thus we have the doctrine that the Pope is inerrable, when he decides respecting faith or morals. Others suppose that he is infallible when he decides ex cathedra, or officially. But then it is very difficult to ascertain what is meant by such a decision. Indeed, the expression is often made use of to throw dust in the eyes of inquirers, and it has no uniformity of meaning. Many Romanists maintain, that if a decree of the Pope is received even tacitly, or if it is not objected to by the Bishops, it becomes an article of faith or a rule of morals, and is considered as infallibly true.

3. One of the principal exercises of pontifical authority is the condemnation and proscription of certain books offensive to the Roman see, under the title of Indices of prohibited Books. The first regular one was constructed after a decree of the Council of Trent, delegating that undertaking to the Pontiff. Pius IV. lost no time in preparing such a list, with certain rules prefixed, all of which he sanctioned by the authority of a bull. The manufacture of new Indices, adapted to new emergencies, has proceeded regularly from that to the present time. These documents are highly valuable, as they form a permanent, repeated, and present monument of the doctrinal depravity and practical dishonesty of the Papal system.

4. No complete collection of the Papal bulls can be found in any of the compilations professing themselves such. There are many reasons why some should not be published in editions issuing from a Papal press. Two of the earliest bulls, in Cœna Domini, do not appear in the Bullarium Magnum of Luxemburg. That of Innocent VIII. against the Waldenses, in 1487, the original of which was deposited in the public library in Cambridge, and stolen from thence about fifty years ago, but printed, and, therefore, safe in Morland's and Leger's Histories, is to be found in no Papal collection. The same may be said of the bull and Index Librorum Prohibitorum of Sixtus V. There is nothing Rome is so much afraid of as her own acts and monuments, unless she can get them into the dark, that is, into her own keeping. When Rome has fairly spoken by the bulls of her Popes, her children have nothing to do but obey.

* Canon. et Decreta Conc. Trid. Sess. 24, de Reform. c. 7. fol. Romæ, 1564.

* De Pontifice, iv. 3.

VII. LITURGICAL BOOKS.

1. By these we mean those authorized standards used in the public worship of the Church of Rome. These are the Breviary, Missal, Pontifical, Ritual, and devotional books.

2. The BREVIARY contains the daily service of the Church of Rome.

3. The MISSAL embraces the service connected with the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's supper; and as such contains matter of considerable importance in the controversy on transubstantiation,—a doctrine successfully upset by the very form of the Canon Missæ.

4. The ROMAN PONTIFICAL is full of important matter, and is particularly remarkable for the form of election, coronation, and adoration of the Pope; and for being the legitimate place in which the Episcopal oath of allegiance to the Pope is found. It also contains the form of reconciling apostates, heretics, and schismatics,—a remarkable ceremony.

5. The Roman RITUAL was fixed in its present state by the authority of Paul V., by a bull of 1614. There are gleanings in it of some importance to the elucidation of extreme unction. Connected with these are Names of the Blessed Virgin, Graduals, Antiphoners, Processioners, Sacred Ceremonies, &c.

6. The DEVOTIONAL BOOKS of the Roman Church, issuing from her members, tacitly or openly approved, and uncondemned in her Prohibitory Indexes, furnish another bond which binds every Romanist. To this class belong the Office of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and Mary; the Garden of the Soul; the little Office of the Immaculate Conception, &c.; all with approbations of apostolical Vicars, &c. These liturgical books extend to and comprehend all that relates to divine worship, and are binding on every member of the Church of Rome.

VIII. SCRIPTURES.

The Scripture in the Latin Vulgate is a part, according to the Romanists, of the revealed will of God, and forms a portion of their authentic standard of faith. So the Creed of Pius: "I also admit the sacred Scriptures, according to the sense which the holy mother Church has held and does hold, to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures: nor will I ever take or interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers." To the Scriptures, as received by Protestants, they add the Apocrypha, and receive them equally as the canonical Scripture. When the Scriptures are translated by them, notes are always added to the text as the explanation of the Church. The Scripture too is to be received in that sense in which the Church receives it; and by this means Scripture is resolved into the authority of the Church. Such a reception of Scripture leads to their great general maxim: "I believe whatsoever the Church teaches," which is called, in their technical phraseology, AN ACT OF FAITH.

IX. TRADITIONS—THE CHURCH.

The Creed of Pius says, "I most firmly admit and embrace apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions, and all other constitutions and observances of the same Church." Thus, whatever the present Church teaches now, or whatever the former Church of Rome ever taught, is an article of faith to which every Roman Catholic is bound to submit. Hence the celebrated act of faith: "O my God! I firmly believe all the sacred truths which thy holy Catholic Church believes and teaches, because thou hast revealed them, who neither canst deceive nor be deceived."

X. ANCIENT FATHERS.

The authority of these extends to the interpretation of Scripture, which is to be interpreted according to their unanimous consent; embracing a great variety of writers for more than seven hundred years after Christ. According to the determination of all parties, much deference is to be paid to the Fathers; yet they were uninspired men, and, therefore, liable to error. On many principal and important matters, they maintained very little agreement among themselves. Great uncertainty must therefore arise, when their unanimous consent is claimed. But the uncertainty here is heightened, when we consider that Roman Catholics have corrupted the writings of the Fathers. They have made out a list of passages which are to be expunged as erroneous, which they call the Index Expurgatorius. They prohibit the publication of these passages; and when they get genuine copies of the Fathers, they correct them according to the Index; as they have done to Jerome's Works, edited by Erasmus, in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin. They even call Erasmus, auctor damnatus, a damned author, for publishing the genuine works of Jerome.

XI. ROMAN CATHOLIC WRITERS.

1. It is difficult to say what authority is to be ascribed to these; inasmuch as they themselves are not agreed as to the peculiar rank in which they are to be placed. But as we have abundance of sources on which to draw, we will leave these in that contested department where they are sometimes placed by their friends; calling forth, however, their sayings when we shall find it convenient.

2. It is, however, an evasive statement for Romanists to say, that such or such opinions are nothing more than the private sentiments of Divines. For though, in matters of faith, the sentiments of their theologians merely would not be sufficient to ascribe a doctrine to a whole Church; yet in a matter of practice, as far as that practice extends, it is enough to allege the sayings of their theologians and official interpreters; therefore, these sayings are their rule of life. And because their rules of conscience are not decreed by Councils, but by their casuists, it is to the latter we must look principally for their sentiments on this matter. We do not say this is an article of faith; it is only a rule of conduct. It is not ordained by a public decree, nor is it condemned by any Council. Their casuists determine all cases, with severity or indulgence, so as to suit the wicked and the righteous.

3. And even in doctrines too, if the expositions and defences of their best and most approved Divines, historians, and Bishops, and Clergy may not be entitled to some consideration as their acknowledged and official tenets, what will the consequence be? Assuredly this: that her best expositors are entitled to no credit; which alone is sufficient to overturn their system. For if their wisest and best men cannot be trusted as adequate interpreters and expounders of their own principles, then the system itself must be inexplicable, absurd, and indefensible.

4. It is true there are several classes of Divines among them. Some are the devoted vassals of the Popes; others are much less submissive. The writings of some have been censured; of others, condemned. Those of some have been received for a time, and, subsequently, have been censured. Amid this endless confusion it is difficult to know sometimes whose sayings are most to be respected. Their acknowledged standards, however, will be our principal guide; while we will avail ourselves also of the declarations and explanations of their Divines of every class, as opportunity serves. We know it is the practice of the warm defenders of the Popish system to reject the sentiments of their best Divines when pressed in argument by Protestants. When they teach their own people, then every thing called Roman Catholic is harmonious and one. But when heretics or Protestants are to be met, then uncertainty reigns in every sentiment uttered by every one of their Divines. In the latter case Du Pin becomes traitor to Rome; the French were never true Catholics; Baronius was no Pope; Bellarmine drew on himself, in some respects, the censure of the apostolic see; Dens's theology, though the principal text-book of their modern schools, contains many things for which modern Catholics are not accountable. Or at any rate, as Dr. Milner teaches, "Protestants have no right to read or expound Scripture, and, therefore, they must be wrong." This is a decisive argument indeed!

XII. GENERAL REMARKS ON THEIR STANDARDS.

1. These, then, are the witnesses to which Protestants appeal for testimony relative to those doctrines and obligations of the Church of Rome which they reject. Romanists cannot affirm that these are Protestant or heretical witnesses. They cannot deny that they are their own standard authorities. For what can the Church of Rome's own representation of herself be, if it be not found in her Creed of Pius IV., her Oath of Allegiance exacted from her Bishops, her authentic Catechism, her General Councils, the Bulls of her Popes, her Liturgical books, their own traditions, and Scripture as explained by them, and books of devotion? We cannot allow that every private Priest or member of the Church of Rome should give his own opinions merely as the standard of doctrine. We will have recourse to the oracular response of the Church, and insist that they be represented by themselves; not, however, by private individuals, but by their legal representatives. But, then, there is nothing which they dread so much as the testimony of their own Church. It is like the conscience of the wicked, which is their worst enemy.

2. It is a principal aim of all their controvertists to employ every mode of evasion in order to disconcert their opposers. There is even a marked difference between the tone of these Romish Divines who speak dogmatically for the instruction of their own members, and that of those who attempt to answer the objections of their antagonists. With the former, all is matter of downright certainty; with the latter, all is doubt, difficulty, subterfuge, and evasion. When the faithful are to be instructed, every Priest becomes the sure depositary of the infallible decisions of an infallible Church; but when Protestants are to be confuted, the declarations of their most illustrious men are of no authority. Councils are discovered to have been but partly approved; Popes did not speak ex cathedra; Cardinals and Bishops are but private Doctors; and who cares for the opinion of an obscure Priest or Friar? Thus nothing is so difficult as to know what the belief of Roman Catholics really is; and when a Protestant adduces their own writers as witnesses, he is frequently told that he is a misrepresenter of their Church.

3. The legal enactments of ecclesiastical Rome are, however, still unrepealed, and still in force; and they must remain in force, unless the same authority which enacted should repeal them. A repeal seems to be impossible, as it is impracticable to re-assemble another General Council. Still provincial Councils might be convened and disavow their erroneous principles. This would be showing a good-will. Or the living Pope might issue his Decree to the same purpose. This would be doing something in favour of truth. But until this is attempted, nothing is done.

4. As the object of the present undertaking is to furnish a correct view of the peculiar tenets of the Church of Rome, it is not necessary to offer any observations on those doctrines which she holds in common with other churches; such as the Trinity; the divinity, incarnation, and atonement of Christ; the divinity of the Spirit, &c. How far these truths are held in righteousness, and whether their glory is not obscured, and their influence much perverted, by the errors and corruptions which are connected with their system, are inquiries which will occur towards the conclusion of this discussion.

CHAPTER II.

SCRIPTURE.

I. STATEMENT OF THEIR DOCTRINE ON THE AUTHORITY, READING, USE, INTERPRETATION, &C., OF SCRIPTURE. 1. Scripture and the word of God distinguished. Roman Catechism quoted. Roman Catholic version cited. Dr. Milner: 2. Council of Trent quoted. Decree on the canonical Scriptures. Decree on their edition and use: 3. The fourth rule of the Index: 4. The principles deduced from the foregoing.—II. SUFFICIENCY OR PERFECTION OF SCRIPTURE. Proofs of this: 1. The direct testimony of Scripture itself. Many passages cited: 2. The absence of every other rule on which we can depend: 3. The Scripture the best testimony of its own sufficiency: 4. It is possible Scripture should contain all things necessary: 5. The completeness of its contents: 6. Nothing material is preserved elsewhere: 7. The contrary doctrine is the source of numerous and great errors, such as Shakerism, Mormonism, &c.—III. THE SCRIPTURES ARE PLAIN OR CLEAR. 1. Romanists say they are obscure: 2. The writers of them must, at least, be as competent as other writers: 3. The Old Testament was given to the Jews: 4. The New was addressed to all the saints: 5. They are represented as a light to instruct and guide: 6. Examination of 2 Peter iii. 16: 7. Protestants provide against the obscurity of Scripture: 8. Ability to understand it thoroughly, not the rule of permission to possess and read it. Deficiency of the Church of Rome, both in explaining and promoting a knowledge of Scripture: 9. Mankind liable to fall into error.—IV. THE SCRIPTURE THE RULE AND ONLY RULE OF FAITH AND PRACTICE. 1. The Protestant and Roman Catholic rules defined: 2. The Scripture points out no other rule than itself: 3. The primitive church acknowledged no other: 4. Private judgment not the Protestant rule. Protestant rule explained. Insulated private judgment considered: 5. Uncertainty of the Roman Catholic rule. They are obliged to adopt sometimes the Protestant rule. Dr. Wiseman cited. An ACT OF FAITH. Implicit faith a substitute for faith. The absurdity of it. The collier's faith. Their curious distinctions and definitions. Doubts of Roman Catholics and Protestants compared. Dr. Milner's objection, that Protestants depend on their own talents, answered. Death-bed conversions: 6. Arrogant assertion of Milner, namely, that their church has an exclusive claim to the Scripture: 7. Their objections against the Protestant rule, considered; Objection, "The Church had not the Scripture always." "Many books of the Old Testament are lost." They deem the Bible unnecessary. They have no certain rule: 8. There is no new revelation in the church to constitute a new rule; not the church; nor the Fathers; nor Councils; nor Decrees of Popes; nor tradition.—V. HOW THE SCRIPTURES ARE THE RULE OF FAITH. 1. First, Scripture is the rule to form a perfect faith, as far as man is capable: 2. Secondly, It is the rule to form it in a degree of sufficiency for salvation: 3. For this purpose a man need not study the question of the canon of Scripture: 4. Nor know the original languages: 5. Nor consult interpreters: 6. Four things only are required to form a true faith, which may be obtained by all: First, To know what is sufficient for salvation: 7. Secondly, Adapted to the capacity of all: 8.

Thirdly, Forms a true persuasion in the mind: 9. Fourthly, Free from injurious error.—VI. ALL ARE TO READ THE SCRIPTURES. 1. Doctrines of the Church of Rome on this point. Fourth rule of the Index. Pius VII. Bull of June 29, 1816. The Pope's Bull of September 18, 1819. Bull of Leo X., dated May 3, 1826. Bull Unigenitus in 1713. Discordant opinions of Romanists on this. Priest Maguire cited. Sentiments of the Irish Clergy. Some, however, affect to approve of circulating the Scripture. Bishop Purcel's opinion. Mr. Henni's sentiment. Some really favour their circulation, but they are generally opposed to it. The Scripture in South America, and at Rome: 2. All should read the Bible in their vernacular tongue: (1.) The Jews read them; (2.) The New Testament enjoins it; (3.) The primitive Christians read them: 3. Arguments against the Roman Catholic restriction on Scripture reading; (1.) Their permission is arrogant and absurd; (2.) Their restriction amounts to a prohibition; (3.) They are opposed to the word of God. They have barely permitted, not provided for, their circulation. They refused to permit the British Bible Society to circulate the Douay Bible. They are against its circulation, which is proved by facts. No analogy between the proceedings of the Bible Society and the Church of Rome; (4.) Their people not allowed to exercise their judgment in reading Scripture. Creed of Pius IV. cited. Dr. Milner quoted; and Gother; (5.) They do not instruct their people to read. Milner quoted.—VII. THEIR OBJECTIONS TO SCRIPTURE READING, STATED AND ANSWERED. 1. Obj., "The Scripture is wrested by some to their destruction:" 2. Obj., "Fanaticism results from promiscuous reading:" 3. Obj., "It produces heresies." Features of resemblance between Romanism and Socinianism; First, The Socinian does not adopt the Protestant rule, nor is he a Protestant; Secondly, The divinity of Christ can be proved from Scripture; Thirdly, There are strong features of resemblance between Romanism and Socinianism; 1st. In doctrine; 2d. In the liberties taken with Scripture; 3d. In the rules of interpretation; 4th. Yet Socinians and Romanists are to be distinguished: 4. Obj., "Scripture reading produces schism:" 5. Obj, "It produces disloyalty, insubordination, and rebellion:" 6. Obj., "It does more harm than good:" 7. Obj., "Christ and his Apostles did not propagate the Gospel by writing, but by teaching."—VIII. THE CANON OF SCRIPTURE. 1. The Protestants have the same canon of the Old Testament with the Jews: 2. The Apocrypha was not added to the Christian canon during the four first centuries of Christianity: 3. Five reasons against the canonicity of the Apocrypha: 4. Their introduction into the canon of modern date.—IX. GENUINENESS, AUTHENTICITY, AND INSPIRATION OF SCRIPTURE. 1. Remarks on tradition and church authority: 2. The genuineness of Scripture: 3. Its authenticity: 4. Its inspiration.—X. ENGLISH TRANSLATION. The best scholars extol it. The Douay Bible founded upon it. The Scriptures were translated among the primitive Christians.—XI. RETORT ON THE CHURCH OF ROME, BOTH IN REGARD TO TRANSLATIONS AND THE ORIGINAL. 1. They treat with disrespect the original, by preferring the Vulgate: 2. The Vulgate examined: 3. The Douay Bible: 4. Their notes on it: 5. They have not issued the original Scriptures.—XII. GREATER DIFFICULTIES IN CONSULTING THE RECORDS OF THE CHURCH OF ROME THAN OF SCRIPTURE. Difficulties of their plan. Facilities of the Protestant way.

I. DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH OF ROME STATED, RESPECTING THE READING, AUTHORITY, &C., OF SCRIPTURE.

1. WHEN the Roman Catholic speaks of Scripture, he does not mean thereby the Hebrew and Greek of the Old and New Testaments, but the Vulgate Latin edition, or the Douay and Rhemish translations, embracing also the Apocrypha. This is his Bible; and this, together with tradition, constitutes his rule of faith, or what he calls the revealed or inspired word of God. Thus the writers of the Trent Catechism say:—"All the doctrines of Christianity are derived from the word of God, which includes Scripture and tradition." Again: "If we would have the whole rule of Christian faith and practice, we must not be content with those Scriptures which Timothy knew from his infancy, that is, with the Old Testament alone; nor yet with the New Testament, without taking along with it the traditions of the Apostles, and the interpretation of the Church, to which the Apostles delivered both the book and the true meaning of it." * "The Catholic rule of faith is not merely the written word of God, but the whole word of God, both written and unwritten; in other words, Scripture and tradition, and these propounded and explained by the Catholic Church. This implies that we have a twofold rule or law, and that we have an interpreter or judge to explain it, and to decide upon it in all doubtful points." † Thus Scripture, the Apocrypha, tradition, written and unwritten, and all as interpreted by the Church or Clergy, form the word of God, or the rule of faith, according to the Church of Rome.

2. The doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church on the canon, authority, publication, and use of the Scriptures, is embraced in the Decrees of the Council of Trent, in its fourth session, held April 8th, 1546. The Decree concerning the canonical Scriptures (Decretum de Canonicis Scripturis) is as follows:—"This sacred, holy, œcumenical, and General Council of Trent, lawfully assembled in the Holy Spirit, the three Legates of the apostolical see presiding therein; having constantly in view the removal of error, and the preservation of the purity of the Gospel in the Church, which Gospel, promised before by the Prophets in the sacred Scriptures, was first orally published by our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who afterward commanded it to be preached by his Apostles to every creature, as the source of all saving truth and discipline; and, perceiving that this truth and discipline are contained both in written books, and in unwritten traditions, which have come down to us, either received by the Apostles from the lip of Christ himself, or transmitted by the hands of the same Apostles, under the dictation of the Holy Spirit, following the example of the orthodox Fathers, doth receive and reverence, with equal piety and veneration, all the books as well of the Old as of the New Testament, the same God being the author of both,—and also the aforesaid traditions, pertaining both to faith and manners, whether received from Christ himself, or dictated by the Holy Spirit, and preserved in the Catholic Church by continual succession. Moreover, lest any doubt should arise respecting the sacred books which are received by the Council, it has been judged proper to insert a list of them in the present Decree." ‡ Here follows a list of the books of the Apo-

* Note of the Roman Catholic version on 2 Tim. iii. 16.

† End of Controversy, Letter x., p. 53.

‡ "Sacro-sancta, œcumenica et generalis Tridentina Synodus, in Spiritu sancto legitime congregata, præsidentibus in ea eisdem tribus Apostolicæ Sedis Legatis, hoc sibi perpetuo ante oculos proponens, ut sublatis erroribus, puritas ipsa Evangelii in Ecclesia conservetur: quod promissum ante per Prophetas in Scripturis sanctis, Dominus noster Jesus Christus Dei Filius, proprio ore primum promulgavit; deinde per suos Apostolos, tamquam fontem omnis et salutaris veritatis, et morum disciplinæ, omni creaturæ prædicari jussit; perspiciensque hanc veritatem et disciplinam contineri in libris scriptis, et sine scripto traditionibus, quæ ab ipsius Christi ore ab Apostolis acceptæ, aut ab ipsis Apostolis, Spiritu sancto dictante, quasi per manus traditæ, ad nos usque pervenerunt; orthodoxorum Patrum exempla secuta, omnes libros tam veteris quam novi Testamenti, cum utriusque unus Deus sit auctor, necnon traditiones ipsas, tum ad fidem, tum ad mores pertinentes, tamquam vel oretenus a Christo, vel a Spiritu sancto dictatas, et continua successione in Ecclesia Catholica conservatas, pari pietatis affectu ac reverentia suscipit et veneratur. Sacrorum vero librorum indicem huic decreto adscribendum censuit; ne cui dubitatio suboriri possit, quinam sint, qui ab ipsa Synodo suscipiuntur. Sunt vero infra scripti. * * * Si quis autem libros ipsos integros cum omnibus suis partibus, prout in Ecclesia Catholica legi consueverunt, et in veteri Vulgata Latina editione habentur, pro sacris et canonicis non susceperit; et traditiones prædictas sciens et prudens contempserit; anathema sit. Omnes itaque intelligant, quo ordine et via ipsa Synodus, post jactum fidei confessionis fundamentum, sit progressura, et quibus potissimum testimoniis ac præsidiis in confirmandis dogmatibus, et instau-crypha, and the Old and New Testaments. For the sake of brevity we omit the list. The Decree concludes as follows:—"Whosoever shall not receive, as sacred and canonical, all these books, and every part of them, as they are commonly read in the Catholic Church, and are contained in the old Vulgate Latin edition, or shall knowingly and deliberately despise the aforesaid traditions, let him be accursed. The foundation being thus laid in the confession of faith, all may understand the manner in which the Council intends to proceed, and what proofs and authorities will be principally used in establishing doctrine and restoring order in the Church."

The Decree concerning the edition and use of the sacred books (Decretum de editione et usu sacrorum librorum) is as follows:—"Moreover, the same most holy Council, considering that no small advantage will accrue to the church of God, if, of all the Latin editions of the sacred books which are in circulation, some one shall be distinguished as that which ought to be regarded as authentic,—doth ordain and declare, that the same old and Vulgate edition, which has been approved of by its use in the Church for many ages, shall be held as authentic, in all public lectures, disputations, sermons, and expositions; and that no one shall dare or presume to reject it, under any pretence whatever."

"In order to restrain petulant minds, the Council farther decrees, that in matters of faith and morals, and whatever relates to the maintenance of Christian doctrine, no one, confiding in his own judgment, shall dare to wrest the sacred Scriptures to his own sense of them, contrary to that which hath been held and still is held by holy mother Church, whose right it is to judge of the true meaning and interpretation of sacred writ, or contrary to the unanimous consent of the Fathers, even though such interpretation should never be published. If any disobey, let them be denounced by the Ordinaries, and punished according to law." *

3. I give the fourth rule of the Index, for the purpose of showing the restrictions which the Church of Rome lays on the indiscriminate reading of the Scriptures, and the injury they attribute to such reading. "Inasmuch as it is manifest from experience, that if the Holy Bible, translated into the vulgar tongue, be indiscriminately allowed to every one, the temerity of men will cause more evil than good to arise from it, it is, on this point, referred to the judgment of the Bishops or Inquisitors, who may, by the advice of the Priest or Confessor, permit the reading of the Bible translated into the vulgar tongue by Catholic authors to those persons whose faith and piety they apprehend will be augmented, and not injured, by it; and this permission they must have in writing. But if any shall have the presumption to read or possess it without any such written permission, he shall not receive absolution until he have first delivered up such Bible to the Ordinary. Booksellers, however, who shall sell, or otherwise dispose of Bibles in the vulgar tongue, to any person not having such permission, shall forfeit the value of the books, to be applied by the Bishop to some pious use; and be subjected by the Bishop to such other penalties as the Bishop shall judge proper, according to the quality of the offence. But regulars shall neither read nor purchase such Bibles without a special license from their superiors."*

4. From the above the following particulars are derived, which we will make the topics of discussion in this chapter:—

(1.) The original Scriptures, Hebrew and Greek, are of no authority in the Church of Rome; for they are omitted in the decree, and a translation is substituted.

(2.) All Protestant translations, such as our English Bible, Luther's translation, &c., are prohibited.

(3.) The Latin Vulgate is put in the place of the originals, and is to be considered as authentic in all public lectures, disputations, &c.

(4.) They make the Apocrypha a part of Holy Scripture.

(5.) Tradition, both written and unwritten, is added to Scripture, and made of equal authority with Scripture.

(6.) The Church, that is, the Clergy, are the only interpreters of Scripture.

(7.) Every person who is permitted to read the Scripture is bound not to exercise his own judgment in matters of faith and morals, but to understand them as the Clergy understand them, and according to the assumed unanimous consent of the ancient Fathers.

(8.) The promiscuous reading of Scripture is prohibited to most, permitted to a few, and restrained in its exercise to all.

Now we Protestants believe that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a full, plain, and safe rule of faith and practice. The Church of Rome will add traditions and the authority of the Church to Scripture, giving them an authority equal to the written word. In favour of the Protestant rule, and in opposition to the Roman Catholic rule, we offer the following arguments:—

II. We assert that Scripture is a sufficient or full account of all truth necessary or useful to salvation, or to the perfection of a Christian. In favour of this, the following arguments are offered, which, we think, fully establish the position.

1. Our first proof of this is the direct testimony of Scrip- randis in Ecclesia moribus, sit usura."—Con. Trid. sess. iv., Decretum de canonicis scripturis.

* Insuper eadem sacro-sancta Synodus considerans non parum utilitatis accedere posse Ecclesiæ Dei, si ex omnibus Latinis editionibus, quæ circumferuntur, sacrorum librorum, quænam pro authentica habenda sit, innotescat, statuit, et declarat, ut hæc ipsa vetus et vulgata editio, quæ longo tot seculorum usu in ipsa Ecclesia probata est, in publicis lectionibus, disputationibus, prædicationibus, et expositionibus, pro authentica habeatur; et ut nemo illam rejicere quovis prætextu audeat vel præsumat.

Præterea, ad coërcenda petulantia ingenia, decernit, ut nemo, suæ prudentiæ innixus, in rebus fidei, et morum, ad ædificationem doctrinæ Christianæ pertinentium, sacram scripturam ad suos sensus contorquens, contra eum sensum, quem tenuit et tenet sancta mater Ecclesia, cujus est judicare de vero sensu et interpretatione Scripturarum sanctarum, aut etiam contra unanimem consensum Patrum, ipsam Scripturam sacram interpretari audeat; etiam si hujusmodi interpretationes nullo unquam tempore in lucem edendæ forent. Qui contravenerint, per Ordinarios declarentur, et pœnis a jure statutis puniantur.—Idem, Decretum de editione et usu sacror. libr.

* "Cum experimento manifestum sit, si sacra Biblia vulgari lingua passim sine discrimine permittantur, plus inde, ob hominum temeritatem, detrimenti, quam utilitatis oriri, hac in parte judicio Episcopi, aut Inquisitoris stetur: ut cum consilio Parochi vel Confessarii, Bibliorum a Catholicis auctoribus versorum lectionem in vulgari lingua eis concedere possint, quos intellexerint ex hujusmodi lectione, non damnum, sed fidei atque pietatis augmentum capere posse; quam facultatem in scriptis habeant. Qui autem absque tali facultate ea legere seu habere præsumpserit, nisi prius Bibliis Ordinario redditis, peccatorum absolutionem percipere non possit. Bibliopolæ vero, qui prædictam facultatem non habenti Biblia idiomate vulgari conscripta vendiderint, vel alio quovis modo concesserint, librorum pretium, in usus pios ab Episcopo convertendum, amittant, aliisque pœnis pro delicti qualitate ejusdem Episcopi arbitrio subjaceant. Regulares vero non nisi facultate a Prælatis suis habita, ea legere, aut emere possint."—De Libris prohib., reg. 4.

ture itself. As our blessed Saviour is the sole author of our faith, those things, and those only, which he taught himself, and commissioned his disciples to teach, are objects of faith. What his doctrines were, we find in no less than four accounts of his life and preaching given in the Gospels. To what belief his disciples converted men, we find in the Acts. What they taught men after their conversion, we read in the Epistles. That the inspired writers intended to give a full account, or at least sufficiently so, we have abundant proofs.

When St. Paul sets forth the advantages that Timothy had by a religious education, he says, "That from a child he had known the Holy Scriptures, which were able to make him wise unto salvation, through faith which was in Christ Jesus." (2 Tim. iii. 15.) He also says, in reference to the Old Testament, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works." (2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.) St. Luke, in the beginning of his Gospel, tells us, that having a perfect knowledge of those things that were believed among Christians, he had undertaken to set forth a declaration of them, that they might know the certainty of those things in which they had been instructed. (Luke i. 3, 4.) St. John informs us, in the conclusion of his Gospel, "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, ye might have life through his name." (John xx. 30, 31.) From the passage in Luke it appears, that what was written by Luke alone was sufficient to afford certainty in those things in which Christians had been instructed. From the passage in John it is clear that what was then written was sufficient to enable people to believe, and to lead them to life eternal. Besides, the Old Testament was able, or sufficient, to make Timothy wise unto salvation, through faith in Christ; and also that a Christian might be perfect, or completely taught, so as to be throughly furnished toward the pursuit of every good word and work.

Now as it appears to have been the intention of the Evangelists to relate every thing necessary and useful for salvation, although they did not write every thing that Christ said and did, for then the world could not contain the things that would be written; we cannot suppose that they failed in accomplishing what they had undertaken; especially since Christ had promised them that the Spirit would "bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever he had said unto them." (John xiv. 26.) Could they, after all, forget any part that was material or necessary? That any of them should do so, is strange; but much more so that they all should. That Luke, the writer of the Acts, should omit any thing of importance, still adds to the wonder; and that not one of the many Epistles written to instruct the churches in their faith and duty, should supply this defect, is beyond all belief. Nor do the Apostles give us any hint of their leaving any thing with the church, to be conveyed down by oral tradition, which they themselves had not put in writing. They sometimes, it is true, refer to such things as they had delivered to particular churches; but by tradition in the Apostles' days, and for some ages after, nothing more was meant than the conveyance of the faith, and not any unwritten doctrines.

2. That the Scripture is a full and sufficient rule of faith and morals, is certain because we have no other. For if we consider the grounds upon which all Christians believe the Scriptures to be the word of God, the same grounds prove that nothing else can be his word. The Apostles at first owned these writings; the churches received them; they transmitted them to their posterity; they grounded their faith upon them; they proved their propositions by them; by them they confuted heretics; they made them the measures of right and wrong; all the doctrines which Christians professed, and on which all their hopes relied, were contained in them; and they agreed on no point of faith which is not plainly contained in Scripture. Now we are ready to believe any other article which can be proved as Scripture is proved. For we know a doctrine is neither more nor less the word of God for being written or unwritten. To be written is but accidental and extrinsic; for it was first unwritten, and then the same thing was written; only when it was written it was better preserved, more certainly transmitted, not easily altered, and more fit to be a rule. Not but that every word of God is as much a rule as any word of God: but we are sure that what is so written and so transmitted is God's word; whereas other things not thus written are not properly proved; and, therefore, not capable of being owned as the rule of faith and life, because we do not know them to be the word of God. If any doctrine proposed by the Church of Rome, which is not in Scripture, be proved as Scripture is, we receive it equally. The truth of the Protestant assumption is established from this, that there is no doctrine of faith or life that can pretend to a clear, universal tradition and testimony of the first and of all ages and churches, but only the doctrines contained in the undoubted books of the Old and New Testaments.

Nor do we doubt but there were many things spoken by Christ and his Apostles which were never written; and yet these few things only that were written are preserved to us and made our rule. It is not disputed that the words and miracles of Christ which are not written are as true as those which are written; but they are not our rule, because they are unknown. So there needs be no dispute whether they are to be preferred or relied on, as the written or unwritten word of God; for both are to be relied on, and both equally, provided they be both equally well authenticated and known. But there are many things called traditions which are not the unwritten word of God, at least not known so to be; and thus the commandments of men are obtruded on us as the doctrines of God. And hence the testimonies of a few men are put on a level with universal testimony; particular traditions are equalled to universal; the uncertain to the certain; and traditions are said to be apostolical if they be but ancient.

3. The Scripture itself is the best testimony of its own fulness and sufficiency. It is not to be replied here, that no man's testimony concerning himself is to be relied on. If a man has always told the truth, his testimony concerning himself is to be received; especially if all men always had told truth. Now this is precisely the case in reference to Scripture. Its truth is already established. And Roman Catholics take the side of infidels when they argue on the uncertainty of Scripture. For if the Scripture be allowed to be infallible, it can give testimony concerning itself; and so can any man if you allow him to be infallible, and all that he says to be true. And if Scripture be not allowed to give testimony to itself, who shall be a competent witness? Shall the Church or the Pope? But if they be not credible themselves, we are nothing nearer for their giving testimony to Scripture.

4. It is possible that the Scriptures should contain all things necessary to salvation.

God could cause such a book to be written; and he did so to the Jews, and commanded the authentic copy to be kept in the ark. Tradition was not relied on for the preservation of any law of faith or practice. Now since this was so in reference to the Jewish religion, there is much more reason that it is true in respect to Christianity; because,

(1.) There could be no other design in writing the books of the New Testament than to preserve the memory of Christ's history and doctrines.

(2.) Many things not absolutely necessary to salvation were written, and, therefore, to omit any thing truly necessary would be absurd.

(3.) The ancient Fathers make no mention of any defects in the records of Scripture in regard to any thing necessary to salvation, but they unanimously taught the contrary.

(4.) The enemies of Christianity always opposed the doctrines contained in Scripture, and supposed by this means that they opposed Christianity, and they knew no other repository of it.

(5.) That the New Testament was not written during Christ's ministry, but preached only by word of mouth, is reasonable; because all was not finished or prepared for recording till after the resurrection and ascent of Christ, the descent of the Holy Spirit, and the organization and establishment of the church. But before the death of the Apostles, that is, before the spirit of infallibility was to depart, all was written that was intended; and upon no other supposition can we account for the writing of so many books as are comprised in the Gospels and the Epistles.

5. The sufficiency of Scripture is proved from the completeness of its contents.

This is evident from the compendiums, symbols, or catalogues of the things to be believed, and to which salvation is promised. Now if "God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son," (1 John v. 11,) it follows, that this being the affirmation of Scripture, and declared to be a competent foundation of faith; the Scriptures, that contain much more, cannot want any necessary thing when the absolute necessities are so narrow. As to the attributes of God and of Christ, all that can be known of them is set down in Scripture. And what moral precept is omitted in Scripture? Will the Church of Rome inform us what doctrines or duties are omitted in the sacred Volume?

6. There is no saying, miracle, or story of Christ, in any thing that is material, preserved in any indubitable record but in Scripture alone.

Some things were reported to have been said by Christ and his Apostles, some of which are not believed, and the others are unknown. The Scripture, therefore, contains all things, or else we have no Gospel at all; for, except what is in Scripture, we have not a sufficient record of any miracle or saying of Christ. St. Paul quotes one saying of Christ which is not in the Gospels, but it is in Scripture: "It is better to give than to receive." St. Jerome records another: "Be never very glad but when you see your brother live in charity." This is a good saying; but whether it was uttered by Christ or not, is very uncertain. Now how is it possible that the Scriptures should not contain all things necessary to salvation, when of all the words of Christ there is nothing of any value preserved in any indubitable record, except in Scripture?

7. That the Scriptures do not contain all things necessary to salvation is the source of many great and capital errors.

Fanatics, such as the Mormons, Southcotians, and others, add to the Scriptures their respective new revelations. They pronounce the Scriptures to be imperfect, a dead letter, obscure, unsafe, &c. The Roman Doctors say the same things, both in the same and similar words. From this principle, as adopted by the fanatics, the most monstrous errors proceed, and the greatest crimes are countenanced and perpetrated. For, supplying the insufficiency of Scripture by their inward word, or their new revelation, they can be the subjects of no discipline, are not to be met with any argument, and hence arise a number of inconsistencies. From the very same principle of supplying the defects of Scripture, the Romanists derive an imperious, interested, and tyrannical religion. For as the fanatics supply the insufficiency of Scripture by their new revelations, so do the Roman Catholics by the authority of their Church. Thus the one and the other impose on consciences their additions to God's law. For these evils there is no remedy but Scripture, which is the proper standard by which to try the pretensions of each. The one supplies the deficiency of Scripture by the inward word, or new revelation; the other, by the Pope's word, uttered ex cathedra: and the inward word and the Pope's word shall rule and determine every thing, and the Scriptures shall pass for nothing; but as, under the pretence of an additional revelation, every new thing shall pass for the word of God, so shall it also under the Roman pretence. For not he that makes the law, but he that expounds the law, gives the proper standard. It follows from hence, that nothing but the Scripture's sufficiency can form a proper limit to the flood of evils which may enter from each of these parties relying on the same false principle.

III. The Scriptures are a plain or clear account of the subjects treated in them, so far as is conducive to faith or godliness.

1. The Church of Rome, however, tells us, "that the Scriptures are not plain to us; even to the learned many things are hard to be understood, which, therefore, to the unlearned, must be impossible." Indeed, sometimes they tell us that not one sentence of Scripture has a meaning of which we can be certain by our own private judgment. Many quotations might be given from Roman Catholic authors to show that the Scriptures are, in their estimation, exceedingly obscure, mysterious, of doubtful or double meaning, and therefore no certain rule for our guidance, unless as they are explained by their Clergy. It would be a sufficient answer to all they say in favour of the obscurity of Scripture to mention that their expositions, additions, and perversions of Scripture prove that they are neither competent nor qualified to give the interpretations that will remove Scripture obscurity. But though this reply would be sufficient of itself for the satisfaction of our readers, we will give the following proofs in favour of the clearness or plainness of Scripture.

2. The inspired writers were not worse writers with divine assistance than others commonly are without it. What they spoke was plain, else they spoke to no purpose; and why should not the same things be as plain when they were written down?

3. The Old Testament was delivered to the whole nation of the Jews; Moses was read in the synagogue in the hearing of the women and children; the whole nation was to take their doctrine and rules from it; all appeals were made to the law and the Prophets; and though the prophecies of the Old Testament were in their style and contexture hard to be understood, yet the proofs of Christ's Messiahship were urged from the Old Testament. No appeal was made to tradition, or to church authority, except by the enemies of Christ. Nevertheless, both he and his disciples urge these passages in their true sense, and in the consequences which resulted from them. Thus they appealed to the rational faculties of those to whom they spoke.

4. The Christian religion was at first delivered to all classes of men. The Epistles, which are the most difficult parts of the New Testament, were addressed to all the faithful, the saints, or to all Christians. These were afterward read in their assemblies. If these writings were not clear, it is unaccountable how they were addressed to the whole body. It is the end of speech and writing to make things to be understood; and it is strange that men who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost failed to accomplish what other human beings perform without any such aid as inspiration. Besides, the new dispensation is contrasted with the old, as light with darkness, an open face with a veiled one, and as substance with shadows. Since, then, the Old Testament was so clear that David, in the nineteenth and much more fully in the one hundred and nineteenth Psalm, represents the light which the laws of God furnished as sufficient for our guidance, we have much more reason to believe that the new dispensation should be brighter. If there were no need of an infallible expounder of Scripture then, there is no need now. Nor is there any intimation given that any other exists than an enlightened and well-instructed ministry. From all which we may conclude that the books of the New Testament were clear in those days.

5. Besides, from the acknowledged characteristics of the Scriptures, darkness and obscurity do not properly belong to them. They are represented as a light, as opposed to darkness, calculated to instruct, guide, and be profitable for doctrine, reproof, instruction in righteousness.

Certain passages, indeed, might be difficult to some persons at first, and others doubtless become so by length of time. But that the principal part of the New Testament is plain enough, cannot be with any modesty denied; and as it regards the rest, what at first sight is difficult may, with due consideration of our own and the help of others, be made easy; what is obscurely expressed in one place may be clearly defined in another; and what is altogether ambiguous we may safely, for that very reason, conclude is not now necessary for us to understand. "Secret things belong to God."

6. The following passage is quoted as one which, in the view of Roman Catholics, destroys that clearness or plainness which we ascribe to Scripture: "As also in all his [St. Paul's] Epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which there are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction." (2 Peter iii. 16.) On this passage I remark,—(1.) As there were only some things that were hard to be understood, the many things contained in them were plain and easily understood. (2.) The word στρεβλουσιν, to wrest, torture, distort, supposes a violence offered to Scripture, of which none would be found guilty who were earnestly inquiring the way of salvation. (3.) Those who did wrest the Scriptures were the unlearned, οἱ αμαθεις, either the unteachable, who would not receive instruction, or rather those who were not discipled. and therefore not instructed properly in Scripture doctrines; and the αστηρικτοι, the unstable, or unsettled, who were, as St. James expresses it, διψυχοι, double-minded. St. Paul, writing to the same kind of people, namely, Christians, who were Jews by birth, gives us the reason why some things which he taught were hard to be understood. It was not because the things themselves were unintelligible, but because the people were dull in apprehension. (Heb. v. 11.) To minds thus pre-occupied, very plain things appeared very mysterious. It is so with persons of the Romish communion at this day. The most intelligent and liberal among them have their minds so prepossessed and bewildered with the ideas of a visible, universal, and infallible church, with a visible head and apostolical succession; with the merit of good works, penances, pilgrimages, purgatory, &c., that many of the plainest passages in the word of God are to them quite unintelligible. Coming to the Bible with minds thus prepossessed, they must find many things mysterious and inexplicable, because it is impossible to bend them to what they have already fixed in their minds as truth. In this unhappy condition they generally find it more comfortable to let the Bible alone, and acquiesce in the dogmas of the Church. Moreover, Roman Catholics, arguing from this passage, suppose that the bulk of Christians must be unlearned, undisciplined, and ignorant; and it will be allowed that the Church of Rome has always kept the bulk of its members in that condition. But this is not a Christian state of things. Peter speaks of being unlearned as a sinful state, the same as being unstable. Every Christian, therefore, is required to be learned in the things that relate to the salvation of his soul, that is, to be learned in the Scriptures; for the word unlearned is not used in reference to literature, but in reference to Christianity. Paul exhorts the Ephesians to "be not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is;" (Eph. v. 17;) and he speaks of Christians as "filled with a knowledge of the will of God." Every evangelical Protestant Pastor labours for this. But the nature and effect of Popish teaching appear by the following answer, which a Roman Catholic once gave to some questions of a religious nature:—"Please your honour, we leave all these things to God and the Priest." (4.) Wherefore this passage does not oppose, but rather confirms, the opinion, that the Scriptures contain clearly every truth of religion; nor does it at all go to say that they are unsafe in the hands of common people who sincerely desire to know and do the will of God. And this is confirmed the more when we consider that it is those who wilfully pervert the Scriptures that shall meet with destruction; but not those who sincerely endeavour to learn from them the truths of religion, which they can successfully do, although they might never understand those passages hard to be understood, and should even mistake the meaning of some others.

7. Besides, Protestants make ample provision against the errors to which unskilful persons are liable, by their excellent modes of communicating instruction, not merely by Catechisms, but by preaching, commentaries, works on criticism, the early and constant instruction of children and young persons in the true and literal sense of the Scriptures. Sacred geography, the manners and customs referred to in Scripture, its style, its doctrines, its morals, &c., are made the constant themes for juvenile instruction; so that among evangelical Protestants (and none else deserve the name, for Socinians, Unitarians, Universalists, Shakers, &c., are not Protestants) the rising generation are instructed in the truths of Scripture to great advantage. The Sunday-school libraries, and Sunday-school books of the present race of Protestants possess more real merit, and explain Scripture better, than all that ever was written on these subjects by the Doctors and Popes of the Church of Rome, and by all the authoritative dogmas of her Councils and Synods.

It is true Roman Catholics ask us, "If the Scriptures be plain, why do Protestants explain them, and what need have they of sermons, Creeds, Articles of Religion?" &c. To this we answer, That these means are themselves parts of the system of religion by which provision is made in order to make plain and easy what is somewhat difficult, to guard against rash inquiries into those parts of revelation which are obscure and difficult, and to preserve the plainness of what is clear in itself, so as to prevent such false glosses as are current among the members of the Church of Rome, or of errorists, such as Unitarians, Pelagians, Universalists, &c. The need of competent instructers in religion is no argument against the clearness of its most important truths; any more than the need of similar instructers in science is an argument against the plainness of the principles and truths of science.

8. Furthermore, if we make ability to understand the Scriptures the rule of permission to possess and read them, we shall arrive at the conclusion that the Clergy of the Church of Rome ought not to possess or read them; for there are parts of Scripture which some of her greatest Divines confess they do not understand. In the notes on the Douay Testament, on the twenty-second chapter of Revelation, we find expressions of this kind: "Some writers advocate this meaning, others that; one Father says it has one signification, another declares it has another; probably this is the opinion, probably it has a different sense." So that here is a virtual confession that their Clergy undertake to explain a book, some parts of which they do not understand themselves. If obscurity of the Scriptures warrants their being withheld, or rather, if ability to understand all parts of them be the test of reading and explaining them, the Church of Rome or her Clergy ought not to read them, because there are some parts which they cannot understand.

In short, their boasting about interpreting Scripture is vain; because they have done comparatively little toward removing the obscurities of the word of God. Indeed, whatever portions of Scripture were obscure to common readers, remain so to this day, as far as the lucid expositions of the Church of Rome are concerned. Their comments and expositions of any value are calculated for the learned only. Many of their interpretations are puerile or contradictory. There is no mode of scriptural instruction pursued by their Clergy calculated to lead the people to accurate or general scriptural knowledge. There appears to be no authentic commentary on the holy Scriptures in any language, published by the Church of Rome; and things are asserted in the notes on the Rhemish Testament which are omitted in the Douay. For instance, it is taught in the Notes of the Rhemish Testament, that subjects may throw off their allegiance to their sovereigns.

But why do we speak of instructing the mass of the people by the Clergy of the Church of Rome? This is altogether foreign to their course. To throw light on the Scriptures does not belong to them; seeing they are more disposed to render what is obscure more so, to make the clear parts dark and mysterious, and to utter disrespect to the word of God. They never put the Scriptures into the hands of their people as the text-book of their salvation, and of course the people are not provided with biblical instruction. This belongs to Protestants.

9. It is granted, indeed, that we may fall into mistakes as well as into sins; and into errors of ignorance as well as into sins of ignorance. God has dealt with our understandings as he has with our wills; he proposes our duty to us with strong motives of obedience; he promises us inward assistance, and accepts of our sincere endeavours; and yet this does not hinder many from perishing eternally. He deals with our understandings in the same manner; he has set his will and the knowledge of his salvation before us in documents that are written in a lucid and plain style, in a language that was then common, and which is still well understood. The Scriptures were at first designed for common use; they are soon read, and it must be confessed that a great part of them is very clear. Therefore, if any man reads them carefully, with an honest heart, praying to God for direction, and follows what he learns in faith and practice, he will be preserved from all injurious error, especially if blessed with the aid of orthodox Protestantism. That bad men should fall into grievous errors, is no more strange than that they should commit great sins. All the ill use that is made of Scripture, and all the errors that are pretended to be proved by it, do not weaken its authority or clearness. This only shows us the danger of omitting, at an early period of life, the reading of them, the great necessity of praying to God for direction, and of practising what we learn; and, instead of submitting to the dictates of incompetent teachers, to have recourse to sober Protestant illustrations; and to "mark, learn, and inwardly digest" the holy Scriptures, so that they may bring forth in us the fruits of good living.

IV. The Scriptures are the rule and only rule of faith and practice.

1. The Protestant rule is the Scripture. To the Scripture the Roman Catholic adds, (1.) The Apocrypha; (2.) Traditions; (3.) Acts and decisions of the Church, embracing numerous volumes of the Pope's Bulls; ten folio volumes of Decretals; thirty-one folio volumes of Acts of Councils; fifty-one folio volumes of the Acta Sanctorum, or the Doings and Sayings of the Saints; (4.) Add to these at least thirty-five volumes of the Greek and Latin Fathers, in which he says is to be found the unanimous consent of the Fathers; (5.) To all these one hundred and thirty-five volumes folio, add the chaos of unwritten traditions which have floated to us down from the apostolical times. But we must not stop here; for the expositions of every Priest and Bishop must be added. The truth is, such a rule is no rule; unless an endless and contradictory mass of uncertainties could be a rule. No Romanist can soberly believe, much less learn, his own rule of faith.

2. The Scripture points out no other rule than its own written declarations. Indeed, the Old Testament itself seems to be clearly a rule so far complete as to allow of no other rule. And if the Old Testament admitted no additional rule, it is doubly certain that none can be added to both Old and New Testaments. The Jewish Scriptures were able to make wise unto salvation, and to make the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished to every good word and work. But the evidence already adduced on the sufficiency of Scripture proves it to be the rule and only rule of our faith. Our principal object, therefore, in the present section, will be to show the inconsistency of the Popish rule, answer some of their objections, and guard the Protestant rule from their attacks.

3. The primitive Christians acknowledged no other rule than the Scriptures. They affirm that they are complete, that they are a perfect rule, that they contain all things necessary to salvation; and from them they confuted all heretics. The Councils always took the Scriptures for the judge and rule in all difficulties that arose concerning faith and morals. The Fathers always consulted them for their own guide, and recommended the faithful to read them.*

4. On the subject of private judgment a few remarks will be necessary. The Protestant rule is not the Bible as it is understood by every individual reader or hearer of it. No Protestant Church ever professed such a rule; yet all modern Roman Catholics take it for granted that that is our only rule. They argue from the assumption that it is so; and draw many absurd conclusions from it, which they attempt to identify with Protestantism, though they are only the produce of their own imagination.

Our rule of faith is the word of God as contained in the holy Scriptures, not as understood by every man of sound judgment, but as holy men of God wrote them, under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. This is the perfect standard to which all true Protestants appeal. It is not affected by the understanding or misunderstanding of it by any man or body of men in the world. It is immutable and infallible truth itself. No Protestant believes that the understanding of man could control or give a meaning to the word of God which it has not in itself. If the Bible cannot be a perfect standard of faith and morals, because men differ in their judgment with regard to some parts of it, there cannot be a perfect standard at all; for there never was a composition, in human language, of which men will not form different opinions. They were not private individuals, but Pastors, Bishops, and Elders of the Protestant Churches, met in Councils or Synods, who promulgated certain Canons and Confessions of Faith, which they established and confirmed by extracts from the Scriptures. And so it is now. No private interpretation of Scripture by individuals is recognised as the rule of Protestant faith. If it were true that our rule was the Bible as understood by every individual reader, it would involve the absurdity of being a rule and no rule at the same time. But while Protestants take the word of God as their guide, in the sense which God intends, and in that sense only, they maintain that every man has a right to read it for himself, and to form his own judgment on its meaning. This is a right which he has, however, merely in relation to his fellow-men. In relation to God, he has no right to form any judgment of his own. He ought to receive implicitly and with gratitude what God has revealed for the guidance of his faith and practice, without presuming to add a thought of his own to the divine communication, or to give a shade of meaning to it different from what the words of it will necessarily bear. To man he is not bound to answer, farther than the rights of other men may entitle them to put him away from their communion, if he shall persist in maintaining principles inconsistent with Christian fellowship. More than this no Church has a right to do with regard to any individual, be his errors what they may. If one is so perverse as to impute his errors to the holy and perfect word of God, it is an aggravation of his guilt; and it seems to be the design of Popish writers in general, and of Dr. Milner in particular, to urge men to be guilty of this wickedness, by their insidious misinterpretations of the Bible, as if it necessarily led men into error.

The exercise of insulated private judgment, which is the abuse of legitimate private judgment, is not a principle of sound Protestantism. The former of these may be defined, private judgment in the interpretation of litigated passages of Scripture, exercised independently, and without reference to other things, so as to pronounce dogmatically, and without control, that such interpretation MUST be the right one. Such a wanton interpretation is fundamentally the same with the positive interpretations of Roman Catholic Priests: as neither of them is supported by the evidence of sound criticism and rational interpretation.

But it is, moreover, objected, "that private interpretation is the Protestant rule." To this we answer: The Bible is our infallible rule of faith. The Bible is the rule; interpretation is the use of the rule. And although men may pervert and abuse this rule, it nevertheless remains the same. If men abuse the light of the sun to commit evil deeds, the sun remains the same; if a man takes a true rule, and gives a false measure, this is not the fault of the rule. And while the Bible, or Protestant rule, is easy of application, the case is different with the Roman Catholic rule, which includes the Bible, Apocrypha, unwritten traditions, the unanimous consent of the Fathers, the interpretations of an infallible Judge, which has not spoken for near three hundred years, and whose writings make a library in a dead language, the Missal, and Breviary, &c. For when the Priest takes his rule, comprising about one hundred and thirty-five volumes folio, in two dead languages, and interprets it privately, that is, he must do it himself; and after interpreting the Bible, he must then proceed to the other parts of his rule, and that, too, without being infallible: now who does not see that the Protestant interpreter has decidedly the advantage of the Priest; and the assumed infallibility of the Church of Rome is worth nothing, unless every Bishop and Priest were also infallible?

Roman Catholics themselves are compelled, when they would attempt sober interpretation, to have recourse to legitimate private explanation, or, in other words, to an interpretation founded on the laws which regulate language. We have an example of this in the Lectures of Dr. Wiseman on infallibility. Dr. Wiseman is a Clergyman of great eminence in England, whose Lectures receive unbounded commendation from Romanists. From the following extract on infallibility it will be seen that he endeavours to establish that doctrine precisely in the same manner in which Protestants establish their principles. He is commenting on our Lord's commission. "It is plain that there must be a certain criterion—a sure way to arrive at a correct knowledge of our Saviour's meaning; and I know not what rule can be better proposed than the obvious one on every other occasion, that is, to analyze and weigh the signification of each portion of the sentence to arrive at the meaning of the words; and thus, by reconstructing the sentence, with the intelligence of all its parts, see what is the meaning intended by him who spoke. And for this purpose we can have no better guide than the holy Scriptures themselves. For if we discover what is the meaning of any word by perusing the various passages in which it occurs, so as to be in any way applicable to the interpretation of the one under examination, every one will agree that we have chosen the most satisfactory and plainly true method of settling the sense intended by our Lord. We have a twofold investigation to make: first, with the aid of other passages to ascertain the exact meaning of the phrases in themselves; and then to see in what relation they stand together, or, in other words, what is the extent of the commission which they imply."*

* For abundant quotations on this point, see Bishop Taylor's Dissuasive, part II., book I., sect. ii., Works, vol. x., p. 383, et seq. Also our chapter on Tradition, where a full collection is given.

Here the Doctor adduces a passage of Scripture to prove the Church infallible. And he arrives at this meaning, not by church authority, but by private interpretation. He says: "It is plain that there must be a certain criterion—a sure way to arrive at a correct knowledge of our Saviour's meaning." What shall we now think of all that has been said and written against private interpretation? Dr. Wiseman asserts that it is a certain criterion, a sure way; and if it is not, he knows of no better rule. Is he infallible in his conclusion? If not, infallibility is founded on fallibility. If what he says is true, an important principle of Protestantism is established. And if he can prove the doctrine of infallibility by private interpretation, why may he not understand any other doctrine of Scripture in the same way? If he can, an infallible guide is unnecessary. It is true, Dr. Wiseman, in many of his Lectures, opposes the very rule which he here establishes, and Dr. Milner violently denounces it. But when both argue with Protestants, or when they address the common sense of mankind, they are compelled to use the very thing which they elsewhere condemn.

5. Here we may notice the boasted certainty of the Church of Rome as opposed to the doubt and uncertainty of Protestants. Dr. Milner boasts that Protestants, in consequence of their doubts, cannot make an act of faith. Indeed, most Protestants do not know what the thing is. We shall, therefore, from the Douay Catechism, quote it, which is as follows:—"AN ACT OF FAITH.—O great God! I firmly believe all those sacred truths which thy holy Catholic Church believes and teaches; because thou, who art truth itself, hast revealed them. Amen." Or take the act of faith in the American Catholic Catechism: "O my God! I firmly believe all the sacred truths the Catholic Church believes and teaches, because thou hast revealed them, who canst neither deceive nor be deceived." This is the sum total of a Roman Catholic's faith; and it is, in fact, no Christian or evangelical faith at all, but what almost every heathen believes, namely, that there is one God, and that he is truth itself.

But the Romanists have found a substitute for real belief. This substitute they have denominated implicit faith, by which they believe every thing, and know nothing, not even the terms of the propositions which they believe. When the lessons of the Gospel, by being veiled in an unknown tongue, were no longer addressed to the understandings of the people, it was necessary that something should be substituted for faith, which always presupposes knowledge. This something is what is called implicit faith. It is constituted thus: if you believe that the religious principles, whatever they be, which are believed by certain persons are true, those persons who hold these principles are explicit believers,—you are an implicit believer. Nor is your belief the less efficacious, because you are ignorant of the principles themselves; for it does not hold here, as in the faith whereof the Apostle speaks: "How shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard?" The transcendent excellence of implicit faith consists in this, that you have it in the highest perfection when, in regard to its object, you know nothing, and have heard nothing at all. In brief, it is neither more nor less than being a believer by proxy. Scripture saith, "You are saved through faith;" and, "without faith it is impossible to please God." Now implicit faith is a curious device for pleasing God, and being saved by the faith of others. It is, in fact, imputative faith.

Or it is what is called in Italy fides carbonaria, that is, the collier's faith, from the noted story which gives an account of a collier's answering questions, to one who had made inquiries of him respecting his faith,—the word carbonarius signifying collier. "QUEST. What do you believe? ANS. I believe what the Church believes. Q. What does the Church believe? A. The Church believes what I believe. Q. Well, then, what is it that both you and the Church believe? A. We both believe the very same thing." This is implicit faith in perfection; and, in the estimation of several Roman Doctors, it is the sum of all necessary and saving knowledge in a Christian.

In reference to this point, the Papists make several curious distinctions. One of these is, that a man may believe two propositions perfectly contradictory at the same time,—one explicitly, the other implicitly. Another is, that in such a case the implicit, not the explicit, is to be accounted his religious faith. By this means the knowledge of God and of Scripture is superseded, to make room for an unbounded confidence in and submission to a set of men whom the ignorant regard as the mouth of the unerring church.* By repeating the above-named act of faith, with suitable seriousness of mind, a Romanist is deceived into the confident persuasion, that he is a believer and a true Christian; while in reality he believes nothing at all upon divine authority, and is therefore as destitute of that faith which is connected with salvation as those who never heard of a Saviour, or, having heard, do reject him. This is the boasted certainty of the Church of Rome, as opposed to the doubt and uncertainty of Protestants. It is the certainty of falsehood; for there is such a thing as believing a lie with the full assurance of its truth. "Because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved; and for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie." (2 Thess. ii. 10, 11.)

It is true, they teach the principles of their religion in Catechisms, but still in such a way that the common people must receive all these things in the sense which the Church imposes, and in that sense only; so that they are not articles which are believed upon conviction of their truth; for if the people were to think and reason, they would exhibit as great a variety of opinion as the Protestants do; and this is the case among the learned of the Church of Rome. Papists have no doubt with regard to the truth of their religion, because they believe the Church or Clergy, and never reason on the evidence presented. Protestants have no doubts on the truth of their religion, because they believe the word of God; and when they give their assent to what God has revealed, they do it, not only with a certain assurance that what they believe is true, but with an absolute certainty that it cannot be false. No certainty can exceed that with which they regard the divine record, that is, every truth and fact contained in the Bible. Protestants doubt many things taught by the Church of Rome, because they are supported by mere human testimony; and they deny many others, because they are opposed to the divine testimony.

* Wiseman's "Lectures on the Doctrines and Practices of the Catholic Church," vol. i., p. 102.

* See Campbell's Lect. on Eccles. Hist., lec. xxiii., vol. ii., pp. 257, 258, where Bona and Gabriel Biel are quoted.

Dr. Milner asserts, "that the Protestant has no certain assurance and absolute security as to what is revealed in Scripture, but depends on his own talents." To this we reply, that those who receive the Gospel as a proclamation of mercy through Christ, by the communicated agency of the Holy Spirit, enjoy the benefit of it in their own personal salvation. They have the witness of God's Spirit, testifying to their hearts that they are the children of God. Their guilt is removed, and they have peace and joy in believing, and a hope of glory in their souls. Here is an evidence and an assurance which are altogether unknown to those who depend on priestly absolution. A condemned criminal might understand the terms in which a reprieve is expressed, and receive the benefit of it, though he might not be able to interpret the laws of the realm, relating to that prerogative of which he enjoyed the benefit. He who makes religion a personal thing, and who really believes the truth which brings peace and salvation to his soul, knows with infallible certainty what that truth is; and if he were asked questions about it every day of his life, he would give substantially the same answers. Christians of this description are perfectly certain and unanimous in the profession of their faith, which is not a mere system of speculative opinions, sound or unsound, or a simple agreement in the understanding of a few doubtful passages of Scripture; but an entire submission of the heart, mind, and conduct, to the will of God, as plainly made known by the general tenor of his word. All such speak of religion in the same manner; it teaches them to pray for the same thing; and in regard to the essence of Christianity, they are of the same mind. Thus they are one in Christ. This is the true religion as it exists in those who believe the Gospel, that is, who are Christians in the Bible sense. True religion, in the estimation of Roman Catholics, is a system of opinions and dogmas which a man must believe upon the authority of the Church, without presuming to think differently upon any of them from what the Church is pleased to dictate.

Roman Catholics sometimes boast of the death-bed conversions of Protestants to their faith. They glory in the conversion of the Duke of Brunswick, for whom the Priests blasphemously and wickedly proposed to suffer eternal misery in his stead, provided he should be lost by embracing Popery. Such a substitution is contrary to express Scripture, which says, "Every man shall give account of HIMSELF to God." It also proves the wickedness of their convert, and his total want of genuine religion; for were he truly pious, he would find enough in Christ's grace, without having recourse to such a refuge of lies.*

6. An exclusive right to the holy Scriptures is the bold claim of the Church of Rome. To place this in its true light, we have but to quote the following words of Bishop Milner, which assert that we Protestants have no right to read, or study, or even to possess the word of God. In his twelfth letter, of his End of Controversy, in reply to his Protestant correspondents, he utters the following arrogant sentiments:—"Before I enter on the discussion of any part of Scripture with you or your friends, I am bound, dear sir, in conformity with my rule of faith, as explained by the Fathers, and particularly by Tertullian, to protest against your and their right to argue from Scripture; and, of course, must deny that there is any necessity of my replying to any objections which you may draw from it. For I have reminded you, that no prophecy of Scripture is of any private interpretation; and I have proved to you, that the whole business of the Scripture belongs to the Church; [the Clergy;] she has preserved them; she vouches for them; and she, alone, by confronting the several passages with each other, and by the help of tradition, authoritatively explains them. Hence it is impossible that the real sense of Scripture should ever be against her and her doctrine; and hence, of course, I might quash every objection which you can draw from any passage in it by this short reply,—The Church understands the passage differently from you: therefore you mistake its meaning. Nevertheless, as charity beareth all things, and never faileth, I will, for the better satisfying of you and your friends, quit my vantage ground for the present, and answer distinctly to every text not yet answered by me."* This is telling us plainly what the claims of the Church of Rome are, and what she is ready to enforce when power or policy will furnish a proper opportunity. We have no right to dispute with her; she needs not descend to argue with us; she is the sole judge of every text in the Bible, not one of which can have a meaning different from her own! By this summary process, any Romanist, as well as Dr. Milner, may quash every argument. Truly, according to this, there is no use in reasoning with her. But the arrogant sentiment contained in the above quotation, affords its own confutation to every Protestant, and indeed to many serious Roman Catholics.

7. Against the Bible alone as the rule of faith the following objections have been urged by the members of the Church of Rome:—

It is objected, "If the Scriptures had been the rule of faith, the church would always have had them in writing; but before Moses there was no writing." To this we answer, that they had the revelations of the ancient Patriarchs, which were transmitted to them by a tradition superior to that which Rome now makes a principal part of her rule of faith. They certainly had no such rule as Romanists deem necessary.

It is also said, "that the books of the New Testament were not written till long after the establishment of Scripture, and therefore the early Christians had not the Bible for their directory and rule." But the binding obligation of the Old Testament remained till the crucifixion: and in the interval the church was favoured with the personal presence of the Apostles, whose living voice supplied a rule of faith of equal authority with that of Christ; for, according to his own declaration, they that heard them heard him. The Apostles left their writings as their only successors; and until these writings were completed some of them remained alive to give instruction, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, with regard to every doctrine and every practice respecting which a question might be agitated in any of the churches. And when they had not personal intercourse, they were consulted by writing.

"The Hebrews," it is stated, "were without the written word of God for fourteen generations. Hence the Scriptures could not have been their rule of faith." But we learn, to a certainty, that the Jews did possess the book of the law; for Ezra read it to the people, and, as a Preacher, gave the sense, and made the people to understand it. And whether all of them understood the Hebrew or not, some of them certainly did; and, for the sake of all, Ezra gave such instructions as enabled all to understand the truths of religion, whether he expounded in Hebrew, or translated and expounded in Chaldee. In his example we have a just condemnation of the custom of praying, teaching, or reading a service in an unknown tongue, which is the practice in the Romish Church.

* M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. iv., pp. 253, 377. Tenth edit.

* End of Controversy, let. xii., pp. 77, 78. Eighth edit.

It is also said, by way of objection to the Bible as the only rule, "that twenty books of the Old Testament are lost." If this be so, how did it come to pass, that the Church of Rome permitted them to be lost, when she boasts of being the preserver of the holy Scriptures? Besides, as she makes the Church, and not the Scripture, the infallible rule, the Church must have committed a mortal sin in allowing these portions of Scripture to be lost. But the allusion to these books is no evidence of their inspiration, any more than allusions to the poet Aratus, before the Athenians, (Acts xvii. 28,) and to Epimenides by Titus, (Titus i. 12,) are proofs that these authors were inspired.

The Bible, with Roman Catholics, is of no authority of itself. Their faith is derived from another source than the Bible. Dr. Milner, in his End of Controversy, says, "The Christian doctrine and discipline might have been propagated and preserved by the unwritten word, or tradition, joined with the authority of the Church, though the Scriptures had not been composed." (P. 57.) The Bishop of Meaux says, "The Catholic Christian forms not his faith by reading the Scriptures; his faith is already formed before he begins to read; reading serves only to confirm what he before believed, that is, to confirm the doctrine which the Church had delivered to him." We are here at no loss to ascertain the true reason of this disrespect shown to Scripture. It is because they have erred from its precepts and doctrines; and it is no wonder if they suppose they could do very well without the written documents which condemn them, and in which many of their doctrines cannot be found.

Indeed, the Catholics have no certain rule at all. They can turn from Scripture to tradition, and from tradition to the Fathers. When these are against them, they can fly to Councils; and when Councils condemn them, they can have recourse to the Pope; and when the Pope fails in giving relief, the Jesuits can do the work of reconciling inconsistencies of any kind, and can even dispense with loving God, provided men do not hate him. Thus the Romanist has no settled foundation on which to trust; for the Church, that is, the Priest, can teach any kind of doctrine, whether Jewish, Heathenish, Mohammedan, or infidel, except pure and undefiled religion.

8. That there is no new or immediate revelation in the Church to constitute a rule of faith other than the holy Scriptures, will appear fully, if we consider the various standards that have been erected by those who look upon Scripture as deficient. The Church, whether it includes the Court of Rome, the Prelates and other Clergy, and the people, is not the rule, because their decisions cannot be ascertained; nor do they accord in sentiment to that degree, or with such clearness, as to form a standard for our guidance.

The Fathers cannot be our rule, because they frequently differ from Scripture, which is acknowledged to be infallible: they differ also among themselves. Some of them teach heresies, and their works have been seriously interpolated by ancient heretics, and by the expurgatory indices of the Church of Rome.

The definitions of Councils are not competent, because they are frequently contradictory to each other, and are sometimes at variance with Scripture.

The decrees of the Popes are not the rule, because these too are chargeable with similar defects with those of Councils.

The decisions of tradition are uncertain in themselves, and do not possess the authenticity necessary to establish a rule, so that they cannot justly claim our submission and assent.

V. How the Scriptures are the rule of faith.

1. The Scriptures are a rule of faith two ways: first, to form the faith to such a degree of perfection and completeness as man is capable of in this life; and, secondly, to form it to a degree of sufficiency for salvation. In the former respect it is the rule of faith, not only for the things which it clearly expresses, but generally for all that is implied, whether by decisive or equivalent terms, by near or remote consequences. In the second, it is the rule of faith merely for the things which are essential to religion, which it necessarily comprises, and which are fitted to the capacity of every person. To study and understand Scripture in reference to the first, much knowledge and industry will be required, so that even a whole life may be too little to accomplish it. Indeed, the subject is so extensive, that no man in a short life can go through it. It requires the union of all wise and holy men in every age, to collect their united wisdom and research. This is admirably done in the Protestant world; for they have associated the labours of the ancients and the moderns, of Jews, Christians, and Heathens, and brought the whole to throw light on the sacred text. Much is done in the different branches of biblical literature. Kennicott and De Rossi have collated the various readings of the sacred text of the Old Testament. Griesbach and others have laboured in the New. Sacred geography has been successfully cultivated by Wells, &c. The zoology of Scripture has been investigated by Bochart. The evidences of Christianity have been laid before the world by Leland, Paley, Grotius, Horne, and a host of others. To the person who has time and inclination to study the Scriptures, there is more light shed on the sacred volume by the investigations of such men, than by all the Decrees of Councils and decisions of Popes that ever existed.

2. But as to the second way in which the Scripture is the rule of faith, to wit, to form the faith in a degree of mere sufficiency for salvation, through the essential things which it comprises, that its adoption is free from all such difficulties, and is accommodated to the lowest capacity, requiring nothing more than common sense and a right disposition.*

3. First. It is not absolutely necessary that a man should study the question of the apocryphal and canonical books, in order to know the way of salvation; because the essential truths of the Gospel are so clearly and frequently repeated, that the well-disposed can be at no loss how to regulate their faith and manners. But even this question is so clearly laid down by the Protestants, that a person of inferior talents can be at no loss in discerning the force of the evidence in favour of the books which we hold as canonical. This evidence will be produced at a proper time.

* See Claude's "Defence of the Reformation," vol. i., p. 335.

4. Secondly. It is not necessary to know the original languages of Scripture, or the various readings of codices and manuscripts, to ascertain the plain truths of religion; although such knowledge is of importance to the critical examination of the word of God. Even imperfect translations contain the essential truths of religion; and the various readings do not affect any article of the Christian faith. Useful truths are found not in one book only, nor in one passage; but are so plentifully spread over Scripture, that the faults of translators or diversity of manuscripts do not prevent us from finding them; or, should a translator purposely falsify any important passage of Scripture, there would be found individuals in the church to correct the error and warn the people. Of such perversion we have instances in what was done by Veron, who translated the passage in the Acts of the Apostles which says, that they "served the Lord," by the words, "They said mass in the Lord;" or, as the authors of the translation of Mons have done by translating it, "They sacrificed to the Lord:" or in the passage where it is said St. Paul trusted to be given to them through their prayers, they render it, through the merit of their prayers.

5. Thirdly. Neither is it necessary to consult interpreters to assure ourselves of their true meaning. For the objects of faith are so clearly laid down, and in so many places, and so connected one with another, that there is sufficient provision made for the instruction of the mind, the consolation of the conscience, and the sanctification of the soul; that it is not necessary to have recourse to interpreters for these purposes simply, although sober interpretations may be advantageously consulted by all who have time to peruse them.

6. There can be required only the following four conditions in the objects of belief to render them capable of forming a genuine faith in the hearts of the most simple. (1.) That they be sufficient for their salvation. (2.) That they be fitted to their capacities. (3.) That they have a certainty great enough to form a true persuasion in their minds. (4.) That they form a pure faith, free from all destructive errors.

The most plain, by reading the Scriptures, can arrive at a knowledge of what is sufficient for salvation. They distinctly show the character of God, the depravity and sinfulness of man, the remedy and means of delivery through our Lord Jesus Christ, and the influences of the Holy Spirit: they teach repentance toward God, and faith in Christ; they lead men to avoid sin, and to do all manner of good in their power; while they furnish every needful motive drawn from death and judgment, heaven and hell. In a word, what Article in the Apostles' Creed is not clear to any one who reads the Bible? And if this, in the primitive church, were deemed sufficient as an outline of faith, we are at a loss to learn how it has since become defective.

It may be said, "that for the quiet of their consciences they should know that these things are sufficient; but this they cannot know without long and tedious discussion." These truths satisfy all the reasonable demands both of the mind and conscience, which is sufficient. But if the evidences of Christianity are to be examined, then we can refer to those proofs and to those evidences which are more plain, more brief, and more satisfactory than the way proposed by the Church of Rome: unless we would grant them that unreasonable demand, which they have always made; namely, of following them blindly wheresoever they may lead us, without using our own eyes and ears. Nay, our very reason and even our senses must be abandoned, in order to be directed by their infallible decisions. If the evidences of religion are asked for, where can they be sought, as it regards brevity and perspicuity, with equal success as in some Protestant writers, Porteus, Watson, and others?

Still it may be said, "that the Roman and Greek Church deny that all tenets necessary to salvation are contained in Scripture." I answer, that the sentiment of a good conscience, which contents itself with the things found therein, feeling itself supported by the two following reasons, has a better foundation to trust upon, even without farther examination, than all the pretensions of the Roman Prelates, and all the superstitious reveries of the Greeks. The first is, that the minds of common, unlettered people are no more subject to be deluded by the inventions of the human understanding than the learned, under the pretence of tradition and the decision of the Church. The second is, that salvation is as accessible to the unlearned as to the learned.

7. The truths necessary to salvation are found in Scripture, and are adapted to the capacity of all. I speak of such a clearness as will convince a sincere person who does not blind himself by passion or malice, interest or prejudice, but who exercises honestly his reason and his conscience. It is not such a distinctness as will convince all persons, both ill and well disposed: this would not only be impossible in the nature of things, but even an impious requirement. Still we may ask, Is there a perspicuity in tradition, or in the infallible voice of the Church, which will convince every person, both well and ill disposed? Certainly not. The dissent of the Protestant world furnishes the negative.

There is a great difference between persons who have only a general and indistinct notion of the truth, without going any farther, and those who substitute a false idea in its place. The former may be in a state of salvation, and ought to be received into the church; whereas the latter ought not. A plain, unlettered man may have correct views of the divinity of Christ, without having distinct conceptions of the terms essence, person, hypostatical union, &c.; and he may also be ignorant of the subtle and frivolous distinctions of the heretics. Who will not place a great difference between him and a Socinian; who, knowing what these propositions mean,—"Christ is God by his essence; the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are three Persons, and one only divine nature," will deny them, and substitute the following: "Christ is God only by the dignity of his office, and glory of his exaltation; the Father, the Son, and Holy Ghost being only so by denomination?"

8. The truths exhibited in Scripture are sufficient to form a just persuasion in the mind of the weakest as well as the strongest. This is abundantly verified in the earliest converts to Christianity, many of whom were unlettered persons, some were females, and others young men; yet they were enabled to believe the doctrines of the Gospel with the firmest faith. And we cannot suppose that they had better opportunities of forming their faith than Protestants, who have not only the written word, but have this word preached unto them, and have been instructed in its holy doctrines and duties from childhood. Whatever may be the difficulty with Romanists, (who are more accustomed to listen to an unintelligible service than to plain preaching, and to hear more from the Missal and trifling books of devotion than from the word of God,) the case is far different with those who have free access to the Scriptures, and are privileged with faithful Preachers and able Expositors.

9. The fourth condition is, that the faith should be pure, and free from every damnable error; that is to say, those which are incompatible with a true and saving faith. Such errors have a natural repugnancy to the truths which are essential to religion; which truths alone are sufficient to the rejection of injurious doctrines. For example, the principle of the adoration of one only God, is sufficient among Protestants, to make them reject a religious worship paid to creatures, without entering into the controversy with the Church of Rome on that subject. The principle of confidence in God is alone sufficient to make them reject the invocation of saints and angels, with a reliance on their merits. The principle of the one only sacrifice of Christ on the cross is sufficient to lead them to reject human satisfactions, purgatory, and the indulgences of the Pope. The principle of the mediation of one only Jesus Christ is sufficient to make them reject the intercession of saints and angels. The principle of the truth of the human nature of Christ, like unto us in all things except sin, is sufficient to make them reject the dogma of the real presence, transubstantiation, the sacrifice of the mass, and the adoration of the host.

Besides, in consequence of the connexion which exists between the doctrines of the Gospel, and their repugnance to every destructive error, there is scarcely one but what is in opposition to many truths. For example, transubstantiation, which is opposed to the integrity of God, is also repugnant to the human nature of Christ; to the formation of his body of the substance of the blessed Virgin; to the state of that glory in which he is at present in heaven; to the manner in which he dwells in us, which is by his Spirit and by our faith; to the nature of that hunger and thirst which we should have for his flesh and for his blood, which are spiritual; to the character of both the sacraments, wherein there never is any transubstantiation made; and to the perpetual order which God observed when he wrought miracles, which was to lay them open to the senses of men.

VI. The holy Scriptures were put into the hands of the faithful with an obligation to read them.

That the promiscuous reading of the Scripture is of importance to the church and to the world, we can give reason sufficient to satisfy every impartial person. To present this subject in as clear a light as we can, we shall notice what is the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this point; present the Protestant doctrines, and the proofs of them; and then give the objections to, and the arguments against, the Catholic doctrine.

1. We give the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church on the promiscuous reading of Scripture from their own authentic and acknowledged standards; referring to the fourth rule of the Index already quoted on this subject. This rule prohibits the reading of the Scriptures in the vernacular tongue, except to those who obtain a written license for that purpose from their Bishop or Inquisitor. The person who receives such permission must be piously disposed; and if any read them without license, he is to be refused absolution till he deliver up his Bible. Thus every one, except persons reputed pious, that is, confirmed Catholics, and young people, are absolutely prohibited from reading the Scriptures in their own tongue. Those who read are to understand them in that sense only in which the Church of Rome understands them. The versions of all Protestants are prohibited books, and no Romanist can be licensed to read them on any account. The original Scriptures, too, are omitted in the number of books to be read. And the reason for prohibiting the general reading of Scripture is, that the faith and piety of most would be injured; and, as will naturally follow, the promiscuous reading of Scripture would cause more evil than good. Such is the doctrine of the Church of Rome, as established by the Council of Trent; and if her doctrines be unchangeable, they must be the same at this day. It may be proper, however, to adduce her views in more recent times, to show what they are now.

Pope Pius VII., on June 29th, 1816, published a Bull against Bible Societies, addressed to the Primate of Poland, in which he refers to the Council of Trent, and pleads its authority for refusing to the people in general the Bible in their own language, except under those limitations which would deprive them of the free use of the Scriptures. The Pope represents the circulation of the Scriptures by Bible Societies as a crafty device, by which the very foundations of religion are undermined; a pestilence, which must be remedied and abolished; a defilement of the faith, eminently dangerous to souls; impious machinations of innovators; wickedness of a nefarious scheme; snares prepared for men's everlasting ruin; a new species of tares, which an adversary has abundantly sown. Such is the impious language employed by the fisherman's pretended successor. This Bull farther declares, "that, agreeably to the Index, the Bible printed by heretics [Protestants] is to be numbered among other prohibited books; for it is evident from experience that the holy Scriptures, when circulated in the vulgar tongue, have, through the temerity of man, produced more harm than good. It is, therefore, necessary to adhere to the salutary decree of the Congregation of the Index, (June 13th, 1757,) that no versions of the Bible in the vulgar tongue be permitted, except such as are approved by the apostolic see, or published with annotations extracted from the writings of holy Fathers of the Church." Thus all the prohibitory and condemnatory denunciations of the Council of Trent are repeated, extended, and confirmed by the highest authority of the Church of Rome, in the sixteenth year of the nineteenth century. Rome has not changed her doctrine, though she may change her plans; and these are changed for the worse, but never for the better, or for the good of mankind.

Translation of the Bull against Bible Societies, issued June 29th, 1816, by Pope Pius VII., to the Archbishop of Gnezn, Primate of Poland.

"PIUS P. VII.

"VENERABLE BROTHER,—Health and apostolic benediction. In our last letter to you we promised, very soon, to return an answer to yours, in which you have appealed to this holy see, in the name of the other Bishops of Poland, respecting what are called Bible Societies, and have earnestly inquired of us what you ought to do in this affair. We long since, indeed, wished to comply with your request; but an incredible variety of weighty concerns has so pressed upon us on every side, that, till this day, we could not yield to your solicitation.

"We have been truly shocked at this most crafty device, by which the very foundations of religion are undermined; and having, because of the great importance of the subject, conferred in Council with our venerable brethren, the Cardinals of the holy Roman Church, we have, with the utmost care and attention, deliberated upon the measures proper to be adopted by our pontifical authority, in order to remedy and abolish this pestilence as far as possible. In the mean time we heartily congratulate you, venerable brother, and we commend you again and again in the Lord, as it is fit we should, upon the singular zeal you have displayed under circumstances so dangerous to Christianity, in having denounced to the apostolic see this defilement of the faith so eminently dangerous to souls. And although we perceive that it is not at all necessary to excite him to activity who is making haste, since, of your own accord, you have already shown an ardent desire to detect and overthrow the impious machinations of these innovators; yet, in conformity with our office, we again and again exhort you that whatever you can achieve by power, provide for by counsel, or effect by authority, you will daily execute with the utmost earnestness, placing yourself as a wall for the house of Israel.

"With this view, we issue the present brief; namely, that we may convey to you a signal testimony of our approbation of your excellent conduct, and also may endeavour therein still more and more to excite your pastoral solicitude and diligence; for the general good imperiously requires you to combine all your means and energies to frustrate the plans which are prepared by its enemies for the destruction of our most holy religion; whence it becomes an episcopal duty that you, first of all, expose the wickedness of this nefarious scheme, as you have already done so admirably, to the view of the faithful, and openly publish the same, according to the rules prescribed by the Church, with all the erudition and wisdom which you possess; namely, 'that the Bible printed by heretics is to be numbered among other prohibited books, conformably to the rules of the Index; (sect. 2, 3;) for it is evident from experience that the holy Scriptures, when circulated in the vulgar tongue, have, through the temerity of men, produced more harm than benefit.' (Rule iv.) And this is the more to be dreaded in times so depraved, when our holy religion is assailed from every quarter with great cunning and effort, and the most grievous wounds are inflicted on the Church. It is therefore necessary to adhere to the salutary Decree of the Congregation of the Index, (June 13th, 1757,) that no versions of the Bible in the vulgar tongue be permitted, except such as are approved by the apostolic see, or published with annotations extracted from the writings of holy Fathers of the Church.

"We confidently hope that, in these turbulent circumstances, the Poles will give the clearest proofs of their attachment to the religion of their ancestors; and, by your care, as well as that of the other Prelates of this kingdom, whom, on account of the stand they have wonderfully made for the depository of the faith, we congratulate in the Lord; trusting that they all may very abundantly justify the opinion we have entertained of them.

"It is, moreover, necessary that you should transmit to us as soon as possible the Bible which Jacob Wulek published in the Polish language, with a commentary, as well as a copy of the edition of it lately put forth without those annotations taken from the writings of the holy Fathers of our Church, or other learned Catholics, with your opinion upon it; that thus, from collating them together, it may be ascertained, after mature investigation, that certain errors lie insidiously concealed therein, and that we may pronounce our judgment on this affair, for the preservation of the true faith.

"Continue, therefore, venerable brother, to pursue this truly pious course upon which you have entered; namely, diligently to fight the battles of the Lord for the sound doctrine, and warn the people intrusted to your care, that they fall not into the snares which are prepared for their everlasting ruin. The Church demands this from you, as well as from the other Bishops, whom our rescript equally concerns; and we most anxiously expect it, that the deep sorrow we feel on account of this new species of tares, which an adversary has so abundantly sown, may by this cheering hope be somewhat alleviated; and we always very heartily invoke the choicest blessings upon yourself and your fellow-Bishops for the good of the Lord's flock, which we impart to you and them by our apostolic benediction.

"Given at Rome, at St. Mary the Greater, June 29th, 1816, the seventeenth year of our pontificate.

"PIUS, P. VII."

The reader will find the Breve in English in M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. i., p. 262. Eighth Edition.

The Pope's Bull of September 18th, 1819, on the subject of the circulation of the Scriptures in the Irish schools, is in the same strain as that to the Clergy of Poland. He calls circulating the Scriptures in schools sowing tares; he says, the children are by this means infested with the fatal poison of depraved doctrines; and as an aggravation of the crime of circulating the Scriptures, "the directors of these schools are generally Methodists, who introduce Bibles, translated into English by the Bible Society." The Pope finally exhorts the Irish Bishops, to whom the Bull was addressed, that with unbounded zeal they would endeavour to prevent the wheat from being choked by the tares.

"MY LORDS,

"The prediction of our Lord Jesus Christ, in the parable of the sower, that sowed good seed in his field, but while people slept, his enemy came and sowed tares upon the wheat, is, to the very great injury indeed of the Catholic faith, seen verified in these our days, particularly in Ireland; for information has reached the ears of the sacred congregation, that 'Bible schools,' supported by the funds of the heterodox," (that is, the wrong thinking; meaning, no doubt, the heretical Protestants,) "have been established in almost every part of Ireland, in which, under the pretence of charity, the inexperienced of both sexes, but particularly peasants and paupers, are deluded by the blandishments, and even gifts, of the masters, and infested with the fatal poison of depraved doctrines. It is farther stated, that the directors of these schools are, generally speaking, Methodists, who introduce Bibles, translated into English by 'the Bible Society,' and abounding in errors, with the sole view of seducing the youth, and entirely eradicating from their minds the truths of the orthodox faith. Under these circumstances, your Lordship already perceives with what solicitude and attention Pastors are bound to watch, and carefully protect their flock from the snares of wolves, who come in the clothing of sheep. If the Pastors sleep, the enemy will quickly creep in by stealth, and sow the tares: soon will the tares be seen growing among the wheat, and choke it. Every possible exertion must, therefore, be made, to keep the youth away from these destructive schools; to warn parents against suffering their children, on any account whatever, to be led into error. But for the purpose of escaping the snares of the adversaries, no plan seems more appropriate than the establishing schools, wherein salutary instructions may be imparted to the paupers and illiterate country persons. In the name, then, of the bowels (of the mercy) of our Lord Jesus Christ, we exhort and beseech your Lordship to guard your flock with diligence, and with all due discretion, from those persons who are in the habit of thrusting themselves into the fold of Christ in order thereby to lead the unwary sheep away, and mindful of the forewarning of Peter, the Apostle, given in these words; namely, 'There shall also be lying teachers among you, who shall bring in sects of perdition.' Do you labour with all your might to keep the orthodox youth from being corrupted by them; an object which will, I hope, be easily effected by the establishment of Catholic schools throughout your diocess.

"And confidently trusting that, in a matter of such vast importance, your Lordship will, with unbounded zeal, endeavour to prevent the wheat from being choked by the tares, I pray the all-good and omnipotent God to guard and preserve you safe many years.

"Your Lordship's most obedient and humble servant,

"F. CARDINAL FONTANA, Prefect.

"C. M. PEDICINE, Secretary.

"ROME, Court of the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, Sept. 18th, 1819."

A translation of the Bull may be seen in M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. ii., p. 243.

Pope Leo XII., in his Bull, or Circular Letter, to the Irish Priests, dated May 3d, 1824, says, "It is no secret to you, venerable brethren, that a certain Society, vulgarly called THE BIBLE SOCIETY, is audaciously dispreading itself through the whole world. After despising the traditions of the holy Fathers, and in opposition to the well-known Decree of the Council of Trent, this Society has collected all its forces, and directs every means to one object,—the translation, or rather the perversion, of the Bible into the vernacular languages of all nations. From this fact there is strong ground of fear, lest, as in some instances already known, so likewise in the rest, through a perverse interpretation, there be framed out of the Gospel of Christ a gospel of man, or, what is worse, a gospel of the devil." The Irish Roman Catholic Bishops, to whom this was written, publicly avowed their concurrence with the Pope's views, and charged their flocks to surrender to their parish Priests all copies of the Scriptures received from Bible Societies, as well as all publications disseminated by the Religious Tract Society.*

Assertions, similar to those given from the above-mentioned Bulls, have been uttered from the days of the Council of Trent down to the present time, as the recorded and acknowledged authentic and authoritative doctrine of the Church of Rome. The famous Bull Unigenitus, against the Jansenists, (A. D. 1713,) condemns, among others, the following propositions drawn from Quesnel, as false, captious, shocking, offensive to pious ears, scandalous, pernicious, rash, seditious, impious, blasphemous. "It is useful and necessary, at all times, in all places, and for all sorts of persons, to study and know the spirit, piety, and mysteries of the Scriptures. The reading of the holy Scriptures is for every body." Thus the authoritative and infallible decisions of the Roman Catholic Church are against the general reading of the holy Scriptures.

Notwithstanding these authoritative Decrees of the Church of Rome, there is great variety of opinion among her members respecting the reading of the Scriptures. Some are for the promiscuous reading of them, some are not. Some would give them without note or comment, others would not. Thus we perceive great diversity of sentiment exists among them; but in general they either entirely discountenance the reading of Scripture by the laity, or they so limit its exercise as to come up nearly to an entire prohibition.

Conformably to the doctrines of their Church, the greater part of Roman Catholics carry their opposition to Scripture to an extent which proscribes its general circulation. According to them, an unprejudiced person, who was a stranger to Scripture, would take the Bible to be the worst book in the world. The Roman Catholic Clergy of the diocess of Cloyne and Ross, Ireland, in a set of Resolutions drawn up in 1820, recognise all the doctrines of Trent on this subject, and carry them out to the utmost.* As specimens, we give the following, quoted by Mr. Breckenridge in his answer to Hughes, page 283, when referring to the general reading of the Bible:—"With Pighius, you might have called it (see Hierar. lib. iii. c. 3) a nose of wax which easily suffers itself to be drawn backward and forward, and moulded this way and that way, and however you like. Or with Turrian, a shoe that will fit any foot, a sphinx riddle, or matter for strife. Or with Lessius, imperfect, doubtful, obscure, ambiguous, and perplexed. Or with the author, De Tribus Veritatibus, a forest for thieves, a shop of heretics." The following blasphemous sentiment is uttered by Mr. Maguire, in his discussion with Mr. Pope, page 51:—"The royal Prophet laughed at the gods of the Gentiles, because they could not speak: those who make the Scriptures the sole judge of controversies, expose them to similar contempt, because, at the best, they are but a dumb judge, and, consequently, unable to pronounce." At a discussion at Carrick-upon-Shannon, Ireland, in 1824, the Roman Catholic Priests express themselves as follows:—Mr. M'Keon said, "The Scriptures of themselves, unless accompanied by such notes and explanations, lead directly to every species of fanaticism and infidelity. The Catholic Church oppose their indiscriminate circulation." (Page 9.) Mr. Browne says: "Infidelity most assuredly would follow the indiscriminate reading of the Scriptures, were the people deprived of the fostering care of their Pastors. We maintain that the people are to receive their instruction from the Priests, and that it is the duty of the Priest to promulgate the word of God to the flock committed to him. Individually, I will admit that the Pastors are not inspired; but collectively, they most assuredly are. There never was an instance where the people were allowed the indiscriminate use of the Scriptures, that revolution and disorder did not ensue." (Page 18, &c.)

The Irish Priests in general are opposed to their people reading the holy Scriptures, unless it be under such restrictions as amount to a prohibition. They oppose the circulation of the Bible by the Bible Society, without note or comment, among their flock. And their hostility does not appear to be against the versions of Protestants only, but against Scripture itself; as is manifest from their decided opposition to a Catholic version (the Douay) without note or comment, which the Bible Society proposed printing for the use of Catholics, but which was absolutely refused by their Clergy. I adduce the following sentiments uttered by Catholic Clergymen in a debate held in 1824, in Carlow, with several Protestant Clergymen :—Mr. Nowlan states, "If the Bible Society came to distribute copies of the Bible, even of that version which the Catholic Church approves of, on this principle," (that of the Bible Society,) "we should still consider it our duty to oppose them. This principle is abusive of the Scriptures, hostile to the Catholic faith, and prejudicial to the peace and order of society." And again : "The objects of this Society are public,—and they are hostile to the interests of the Catholic religion. The mode itself is subversive of faith, and must not be tolerated." * Mr. Kinshela asks, "Will they not allow us to show, that the reading of Bibles is highly injurious to our flocks, and mischievous to the peace of society ?" (Page 5.) Mr. M'Sweeny remarks, respecting the controversy between Catholics and Protestants : "Our controversy can never be decided by a reference to the Scriptures." (Page 7.) Quotations to the same purpose could be multiplied to any extent, but the above are sufficient as specimens. Indeed, the Scriptures are treated by them with less deference than many other books.

* For extracts from this Bull see Breckenridge, p. 63; Cramp's Text Book, p. 51. Second Edit.

* See this document in the Glasgow Prot., vol. ii., pp. 361–363.

There are, however, instances of Roman Catholics approving of the circulation of the word of God. But then the number of these is small, and their influence and success are limited. Besides, in this they are directly opposed to the order and discipline of their Church ; and when they either approve or connive at the circulation of Scripture, it is owing to other reasons than to a sincere belief that every Christian should own and read the Scriptures. The following letter of the Rev. Andrew Scott, a Catholic Priest of Glasgow, dated Feb. 11th, 1814, and published in most of the Glasgow newspapers, speaks a language at utter variance with the standards of the Church of Rome :—"If it really were a principle of the Roman Catholic Church to deprive her members of the use of the divine word, by forbidding them to read and search the Scriptures, she would indeed be cruel and unjust. But I can confidently declare, (without danger of being contradicted by my brethren, or censured by my superiors,) that it is not at present—that it never was—a principle of the Catholic Church, that the Scriptures should be withheld from the laity ; and there never was any law enacted by the supreme legislative authority in the Catholic Church by which the reading of the Scriptures was prohibited." That Mr. Scott was ignorant of the laws of his Church on this point, is hard to be believed ; and the strong presumption is, that he uttered these things in Protestant Glasgow to avoid the force of Protestant opinions, and for the use he could make of it in proselyting the ignorant and unwary.

We have a case of similar inconsistency in the present Bishop of Cincinnati, Mr. Purcell. This gentleman, if not formally, yet tacitly, consents to the following Resolution of the Western College of Teachers, passed at their session held in Cincinnati, October, 1837 : —"Resolved, That this Convention earnestly recommend the use of the Bible in all our schools, to be read as a religious exercise, without denominational or sectarian comment ; and that it is the deliberate conviction of this College, that the Bible may be so introduced in perfect consistency with religious freedom, and without offence to the peculiar tenets of any Christian sect." As a Roman Catholic Bishop, he acted in direct opposition to his ordination vows in approving of the doctrine of the College. As a Roman Catholic, he favours what is expressly condemned by the Council of Trent, which forbids the circulation of the Scriptures in any vernacular tongue, without note or comment ; or of even the Roman Catholic version without notes, unless the parish Priest recommended the individual to the Bishop, and then the Bishop gave a written license to him who is thus recommended to be a proper person to be licensed, or permitted to read God's message to himself and to every human being. But there is more than presumptive evidence that the Bishop of Cincinnati is, after all, opposed to the promiscuous reading of holy Scripture, and that he considers it a dangerous book to be intrusted with children, or even with mature persons, without the restrictions which his Church imposes.

"Der Wahrheitsfreund," the German organ of the Roman Catholic Church, edited by the Rev. Mr. Henni, a German Priest, and published in Cincinnati, says, in the 29th number, under date of February 7th, 1839 :—

"Bible Societies have in thinking Christians produced a just suspicion, that their zeal, which may please hypocrites, has for its foundation some secret, sinister intentions. However that may be, so much is incontrovertibly true, that those very persons, and those very nations, which have the cheapest Bibles, can least agree with regard to religion, and are most hostile to each other ; and that this unlimited reading of the Bible has originated and does still originate, especially in our fanatical America, the most absurd abortions of phrenzy, and even scenes of horrible crime. This is the verdict of experience, the judgment of the whole cultivated world. If every simpleton could take a translation of the Bible in his hands, and pick out for himself that faith without which it is impossible to please God, there would be no need of Biblical learning, ordered by all intelligent Protestant Churches, which do not, like some sects in this country, scream and croak day and night in the morass of ignorance and senseless enthusiasm."

After endorsing some quotations from German rationalists, "that much in the Bible is so dark, that it cannot edify, but only confound the common man ; that the prophecies of Daniel, the Song of Solomon, the Revelation of St. John, have done far more injury than good ; that the Bible in the hands of the people will always remain a fatal gift, if not accompanied with the right interpretation ; that a great multitude of people have been tempted to sin by reading the Bible ; and that every sect and every passion find in the Bible proofs, justification, and weapons ;"—after calling to aid the opinion of the infidel, David Hume, respecting the Bible, "the Wahrheitsfreund" eulogizes the decrees of the Council of Trent respecting the restriction of Bible reading, and concludes with the following :—"The whole really reasonable and religious world calls aloud with Christ, 'Do not cast pearls before swine.' It was and is only presumption which interpreted the Bible privately, which printed it privately, which distributed it promiscuously : pride only did this, and does it now, it order to get power."

Thus Mr. Henni denounces the Bible, while his diocesan, Bishop Purcell, seems to approve of it. The Priest, however, is teaching his flock in their native German ; but the Bishop is surrounded by a Protestant audience. Both, however, are devoted sons of the Church, and faithful retainers of the doctrine taught by the Council of Trent.

* Discussion at the Carlow Bible Meeting, p. 4.

Among them, however, there are some well-disposed persons, who have always been in favour of the general circulation of the Scriptures. But as far as any sentiment in their favour in this respect has prevailed, it has been owing chiefly to the influence of Protestantism; for in those countries and districts where the Romish religion prevails, such as Spain, Italy, Portugal, and South America, the Scriptures are neither read nor studied, to any profitable extent. We might, however, give quotations from some eminent Catholic Divines, who advocate the indiscriminate reading of the sacred records.

The following extract of a letter from the Rev. J. Spaulding, a Protestant Missionary, under date of September 23d, 1837, Rio Janeiro, in South America, will furnish a true specimen of what exists, and always has existed, when the circulation of the Scriptures depended on the Church of Rome. From generation to generation, it may be truly said, such has been her practice.

"The Bible, to an astonishing and almost incredible extent, is a new book, and a real curiosity in this country. An elderly lady, who in other respects appeared quite intelligent, said, 'she had lived so many years in the world, and never heard of it till lately.' How many are thus totally ignorant of the holy Scriptures is unknown. A gentleman, a Catholic, and with no great faith in Missionary operations, remarked to me, that he did not suppose there were four hundred Bibles in the Brazils —among a population of at least five millions. What is this but an awful famine of the word of God! And what an awful fact, that this famine, which carries moral death and ruin wherever it goes, has continued from generation to generation!"

A recent occurrence has taken place in South America in perfect keeping with the foregoing. The account and accompanying document were published in the Journal of Commerce a short time since, and were copied in the Western Christian Advocate of Cincinnati, in the number for February 22d, 1839. A Mr. Wheelwright had circulated some Bibles and tracts in Escuado, and had also taught a female school. This so provoked the Bishop of Quito, that he addressed the following to the Minister of the Interior:—

"Bishop's Palace, Quito, Feb. 8th, 1838.

"Since the extinction of the tribunal of the Inquisition, it devolves upon the Bishops to take cognizance of matters of faith; which sacred deposit is confided to them, as Pastors appointed by the Holy Spirit to rule the church of God, decide controversies, and inculcate sound doctrines. In this character, however unworthy, I cannot fail to guard against encroachments upon the Catholic religion within my diocess; it being the highest good of man, upon which his eternal welfare and his dearest interests depend.

"Nothing is more opposed to this object, than that the business of teaching should be confided to those who are enemies of that religion, and who will spare no pains to weaken its belief, especially in that tender age which has the flexibility of wax to receive impressions, and the solidity of bronze to retain them.

"It is proved by the annexed testimony that Mr. Isaac Wheelwright, contrary to the prohibitions of the holy Roman Catholic Church, has promoted the general reading of the Bible without notes in the Spanish language, and has circulated a tract entitled, 'A Few Words to the Wise,' the object of which is to show, that the sacred Scriptures are to be understood according to men's private judgment, and not according to the exposition made by the holy Fathers, as saith Father Scio, in his original work. He has also put into the hands of children two tracts of fictitious narrative, one entitled the 'Swiss Village Woman,' and the other the 'Dairyman's Daughter,' which lead to the capital errors of Protestantism.

"The accompanying papers impugn these pernicious maxims, and will convince the supreme Government, that the circulation of the Bibles and tracts alluded to ought to be prevented. They will also inflame its zeal to cut up by the roots this crying enormity. God preserve your Excellency.

"NICHOLAS, Bishop of Quito."

The Rev. J. A. Clark, of the Protestant Episcopal Church of St. Andrew, Philadelphia, in a letter to his congregation, dated Rome, March 24th, 1838, says:—"The Bible in Rome is a strange and rare book. The only edition of it authorized to be sold here, is in fifteen large volumes, which are filled with Popish commentaries. Of course none but the rich can purchase a copy of the sacred Scriptures. Indeed very few of the common people know what we mean by the Bible. The question was proposed the other day by one of my fellow-lodgers, to the lady from whom our lodgings are obtained, and who may be considered as a fair representative in point of intelligence and religious information of the middle class of society in Rome, 'if the people generally had a copy of the Bible in their houses?' The reply was, 'O yes, all the religious people have.' She also added, that she had a very fine copy of the Bible, and immediately went to fetch it. When produced, it proved to be a Mass-book, with here and there a passage of Scripture accompanied with Romish glosses. When it was more fully explained to her what we meant by the Bible, she replied, 'O yes, I know what you mean: that book is in several of the libraries in Rome, and some persons who are very religious have also a copy of it.'" This plainly shows in what estimation the Bible is held in the very centre of Roman Catholicism.

2. That the Bible is commanded to be read by all persons in their vernacular tongue, we have abundant testimony from Scripture. We can also show that such was the doctrine of the primitive church. The Clergy were to instruct the people according to the precepts and doctrines of Scripture; and the laity were to judge of the doctrines of their Pastors.

(1.) When God gave his law to the Israelites he said to Moses, "Gather me the people together, and I will make them hear my words, that they may learn to fear me all the days that they shall live upon the earth, and that they may teach their children." (Deut. iv. 10.) Moses just before his death assembled all Israel together, and said unto them, "O Israel, hearken unto the statutes and unto the judgments which I teach you, for to do them, that ye may live. Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish aught from it, that ye may keep the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you." (Deut. iv. 1, 2.) Having the same people assembled on another occasion, he taught them thus: "These words which I command you this day shall be in thy heart. Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." (Deut. vi. 6, 7.) Thus the fathers were bound to teach diligently these things to their children: and this shows that every father had access to Scripture, in a language which he and they understood. Moses entertained no fear that the people would misinterpret it, or wrest it to their destruction. It is probable that many a Jew did so; nevertheless, that was no reason against every Jew possessing a copy of the law. In numberless places of the Prophets we have similar instructions; and Timothy knew the Scriptures from his childhood, for which he was commended by St. Paul. (2 Tim. iii. 15.) We see, therefore, that, under the Jewish law, the Scriptures were put into the hands of all kinds of persons, young and old, male and female, learned and unlearned, Priest and people, with a command to read them and teach them to others, so that the faith of all might rest upon this foundation.

(2.) Nor was this order of things changed under the Gospel; for we need only peruse the first verses of the Epistles written by St. Paul, Peter, James, and Jude, and we shall find them addressed to the faithful of all the churches, as well as to the Pastors: "To all that be in Rome, called to be saints." (Rom. i. 7.) "To the saints and faithful in Jesus Christ which are at Ephesus." (Eph. i. 1.) "To all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the Bishops and Deacons." (Phil. i. 1.) Thus the private members of the church were addressed; from which we learn that they could understand them, as they were placed in their hands for the express purpose of making them wise unto salvation.

Moreover, the use which Jesus Christ would have us to make of Scripture is, that we might know him to be the Messiah: "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." (John v. 39.) Indeed, we find our Saviour attributing the erroneous opinions of the Sadducees to their ignorance of the Bible: "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures." (Matt. xxii. 29.) It was out of the same book that St. Peter and St. Paul proved our Saviour to be the Messiah, and converted the Jews to Christianity. The Bereans are praised for having searched the Scripture, and judged of its contents. "These were," says St. Luke, "more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so." (Acts xvii. 11.) After this, how can any one affirm that the faithful ought blindly to believe their Pastors, and not to exercise their own judgment? Is not this to condemn what the Scriptures praise?

(3.) Add to this, the primitive Christians, in whose days there were heresies in abundance, did not restrain any person from reading the Scriptures. There is no subject so much insisted on by Fathers and Councils, as the necessity for all, without exception, becoming acquainted with the word of God.

3. But we will now present some objections to, and arguments against, the Roman Catholic doctrine respecting the indiscriminate reading of the sacred book.

(1.) The Romanists boast that their Church does not absolutely prohibit, but in certain circumstances permits, the reading of the Scriptures. Now we maintain that even this permission is an arrogant and antichristian assumption. The Bible is a proclamation of mercy, addressed to sinful men, in such terms as the following: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else." (Isai. xlv. 22.) The Church of Rome stands by, and presumes to decide who shall, and who shall not, hear these words of the Almighty Saviour; and if any person hear them at all, it is by her permission. This is assuming a power and authority equal to that of God, and a right to control, or at least to regulate, the manner of communicating his will to his own creatures. It is arrogating an authority which belongs to no creature, nor to any assembly of creatures, to decide when and to whom the Almighty shall address his overtures of mercy and grace. This claim of an authority to permit, implies an authority to prevent or prohibit, the reading of the Scriptures, whenever it shall happen that prevention is more expedient than permission. This, in general, has been the case; and if her assumed authority of permitting proves her to be in error, much more will her preventing fix that character upon her.

(2.) The obstacles and restrictions under which the members of the Church of Rome are permitted to read the Scriptures, amount almost to a prohibition. This will appear, if we consider their number and nature, together with the extent of the privilege:—1. The original Scriptures are entirely overlooked. 2. Our English, with all Protestant, versions, are placed on the list of prohibited books. 3. The Latin Vulgate only is permitted to be read without a license, and very few can read it. 4. Their Douay version is scarce, and no pains are taken to circulate it among their people. 5. No person is permitted to read the Scriptures, in his native tongue, without a written license from his Bishop, or from an Inquisitor, with the advice of the Priest or Confessor. 6. No person is allowed to be licensed except those who are supposed to receive "an increase of faith and piety;" that is, if he will not, by reading, call in question the doctrines of his Church. 7. He that presumes to read or possess the Bible, without such a license, is punished by a penalty the most terrible to a Romanist; namely, he is not to receive absolution of his sins till he has returned such Bible to his Priest. 8. Any bookseller who sells a Bible to any person, not thus licensed to possess and read it, shall forfeit the price of the book, (librorum pretium amittant,) and submit to other punishments at the will of his Bishop, according to the quality of the offence. (Aliisque pœnis pro delicti qualitate ejus episcopi arbitrio subjaceant. De libris prohibitis, regula iv. 8.) They consider the general reading of Scripture productive of more harm than good, through the rashness of men, and represent the Bible as a dangerous book. 9. Finally, the favoured few who are permitted to read are not to exercise their judgments in reading, but are to be blindly led by the Church; that is, the Priests, or the Notes, without which no Bible is to be printed.

No Romanist can deny these restrictions being those which are imposed by the infallible decisions of the Council of Trent; which, altogether, amount to a prohibition against any profitable reading of Scripture. How exceedingly few, according to these rules, are allowed to read! All young persons are forbidden to read the Bible, because such are never licensed. Hence none from their childhood are acquainted with the word of God. Very few ever apply for a license; being, for the most part, suspected of heresy, if such an application were made. How many in western Pennsylvania, where I now write, apply to the Bishop in Philadelphia for a privilege to read or possess a Douay Bible? Add to this, when the privilege is given to a person of mature age to read the book, how feebly is such a one prepared to understand it! It is no wonder, therefore, that the knowledge of Scripture is scarcely thought of in the Roman Catholic Church. The above is the exact discipline of the Church of Rome on this point, which every Priest and Bishop is bound on OATH to believe and enforce.

(3.) We charge the Church of Rome with opposition to the pure word of God, and from this imputation it is impossible to exculpate them. They have constantly opposed the circulation of the Scriptures in the vernacular language of the people. When Wickliffe published his Translation, Pope Gregory sent a Bull to the University of Oxford, in 1378, condemning the translator as having "run into a detestable kind of wickedness." When Tindal published his translation, it was condemned in 1546. When Luther was translating the Scriptures into the German language, Pope Leo X. published a Bull against him, couched in the most vile and opprobrious language. After the Reformation the Church of Rome was compelled to permit (not authorize, command, or provide for) the translations of the Scriptures into modern languages, but always accompanied with notes. Yet this was viewed as a dangerous expedient; and it was judged best not to give the Bible to the people, except where they were in danger of receiving Protestant versions. The Rhemish divines avow this to have been the motive which produced their translation.

We have ample proof that they are afraid to trust the people with the Scriptures. When the British Bible Society proposed to publish the Douay Bible, without note or comment, for the use of the English Papists, the Roman Catholic Clergy would not allow it. When the proposal was first made to them, Mr. Gandolphy, a Priest of London, said, "If any of the Bible Societies feel disposed to try our esteem for the Bible by presenting us some copies of a Catholic version, with or without notes, we will gratefully accept and faithfully distribute them." Yet when the Society was about to fulfil its engagement, the Roman Catholic Clergy objected, and then Mr. Gandolphy said, "The English Catholic Board did not now intend to disperse gratuitously even their own stereotype edition with notes; for they could not go about to desire people to receive Testaments, because the Catholics did not in any wise consider the Scriptures necessary;" and added, "they learned and taught their religion by means of Catechisms and elementary tracts." *

Thus they are against the Bible, because they are conscious the Bible is against them. It is true, they frequently speak with great reverence of that book, sealed up as it is from the people in the Latin tongue; but when it appears in the vulgar language of any country, and becomes the study of the common people, they speak of it as being the most pernicious book in the world. The avowed doctrine of the Church of Rome, as laid down by the last of her General Councils, by recent Bulls of the Popes, by the writings of modern Papists, and by the general practice of her priesthood, establishes the fact, that she is against the word of God. Proof of her practice in opposing the truth by burning Bibles, and speaking disrespectfully of them, might be adduced, but our limits allow not of our enlarging.†

It has been remarked, however, that the Church of Rome does no more, in this respect, than the Bible Society does, which will not distribute any but the authorized version of the Scriptures. This Society never professed to disallow the distribution of other versions than those it circulates. There is, therefore, no analogy between its procedure and that of the Church of Rome, which authoritatively places the Bible in the list of prohibited books, and declares that if any man shall presume to possess it without a license in writing from his Bishop or Inquisitor, he shall not receive absolution till he delivers the Bible up to his Priest, who, on such occasions, generally commits it to the flames. One thing, however, we do learn from this plea in reference to the Bible Society: it is, that many of them are ashamed of the conduct of their Church in restricting and prohibiting the circulation of the Scriptures. They say they do nothing more than what Protestants do, and this they allege as a sufficient justification of their conduct. This is an admission that there is something in Protestantism which they would wish to ascribe to themselves. They would be thought friendly to the distribution of the Bible; but it is easy to see from their writings that they set little value on its authority.

(4.) Another serious objection must be brought against the Roman Catholic doctrine: it is the following: That the people are not allowed to exercise their judgment in ascertaining the meaning of Scripture. If a person obtain a written license to read the word of God, he is, notwithstanding, prevented from thinking for himself on Scripture subjects. In the Creed of Pope Pius, to which every Catholic must assent, we have the following as an Article of Faith:—"I also admit the sacred Scriptures, according to the sense which the holy Mother Church has held and does hold, to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the holy Scripture; nor will I ever take or interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers." To the same purpose is the following:—"It is as clear as the noon-day light, that by solving the following question, Which is the true Church? you will at once solve every question of religious controversy that ever has been or that ever can be agitated. You will not need to spend your life in studying the sacred Scriptures,—you will only have to hear what the Church teaches upon the several articles of her faith, in order to know with certainty what God has revealed concerning them."* The Roman Catholic is taught "in all hard, obscure, and disputable points to refer all to the arbitration of the Church, to the judgment of those whom God has appointed Pastors and Doctors; never presuming to contend, control, teach, or talk of his own sense and fancy in deep questions of divinity and high mysteries of faith, but expecting the sense of these from the lips of the Priest, who shall keep knowledge, and from whose mouth they shall require the law." † Indeed, ninety-nine Catholics out of a hundred have no other rule to follow than what a few Priests and private writers tell them. As a proof of this, we give the following from Dr. Milner, who is esteemed among them a principal defender of their faith:—"Most likely the Catholic peasant learns the doctrine of the Church from his parish Priest; but then he knows that the doctrine of this Priest must be conformable to that of his Bishop, and that otherwise he will soon be called to account for it. He knows also that the doctrine

* Glasgow Protestant, vol. i., pp. 258, 259. Eighth edit.

† See Glasgow Protestant, vol. i., pp. 289—296, where many instances are given in which, at the present day, the word of God is withheld from the people, and it is made a crime to have it in possession, to read it, or even to acquire the art of reading, so as to have access to it.

* End of Controversy, Letter xvi., p. 118.

† Gother's Papist Misrepresented, p. 60.

of the Bishop himself must be conformable to that of the other Bishops and the Pope; and that it is a fundamental maxim with them all never to admit of any tenet but such as is believed by all the Bishops, and was believed by their predecessors up to the Apostles themselves." * Thus it is clear, in respect to the interpretation of Scripture, that no one, according to the Catholic doctrine, can exercise the powers of his own mind. The work is already done to his hands. He may be a good classical scholar, profoundly versed in Greek and Hebrew, well read in Jewish antiquities, thoroughly acquainted with oriental customs, and be even the best critic of his age; but woe unto him, especially if he happen to live in Italy or Spain, if he presume to bring his stores of knowledge in investigating the sense of Scripture, or dare to bring to the light, even though it should not go beyond the precincts of his own study, any interpretation different from that which his Church teaches.

(5.) It appears to be no part of the Roman Catholic creed to instruct the people in order that they may be qualified to read the word of God. Bishop Milner tells us, that "ninety-nine in every hundred, or rather nine hundred and ninety-nine in every thousand, in different ages and countries, would not be able to read at all, and much less to comprehend a page of the sacred writings. Yet no such means," of instructing the people to read, "were provided by Christ, nor has he so much as enjoined it to his followers in general to study letters."† This shows the low esteem in which the common people are held by the Priests. It is not considered a duty to promote their mental improvement, because there is no express commandment to teach men to write or read. If the Priests find the people ignorant, they will keep them so. Indeed, they depend so little on Scripture, that many of them think they could have done very well if the Scripture had never been written. It will surprise our readers to learn that a Christian Bishop should think so; yet such is the sentiment of Dr. Milner, who says, "The Christian doctrine and discipline might have been propagated and preserved by the unwritten word, or tradition, joined with the authority of the Church, though the Scriptures had not been composed. Religion did prevail and flourish soon after the age of the Apostles, among nations which did not even know the use of letters." ‡

VII. The holy Scriptures are a safe guide in the way of salvation, notwithstanding the numerous objections that have been raised against them. Catholics say that they do more harm than good, when put into the hands of common people in their native language; that this is manifest from experience; and that this is owing to the rashness of men. We will state and answer some of the weightiest objections urged under this head.

1. It is objected, that the Scriptures are wrested by some to their destruction. That they may be perverted, needs not be denied. Our common food has been abused to purposes of gluttony; intellect has been employed in the service of irreligion; civil liberty has been corrupted, and made the instrument of anarchy. But still these gifts may be used to good advantage. An evil disposition may pervert the best gifts of God, to the destruction or injury of its possessor, or of others. Some were so wicked as to turn the grace of God into lasciviousness. The preaching of the cross was received by many, so as to become the savour of death unto death. Still the Apostles preached Christ crucified, although they knew that he would be a stone of stumbling and rock of offence to the disobedient. The unteachable and perverse may wrest the word of God, but the well-disposed will obtain important instruction from it: they will receive the sincere milk of the word, and grow thereby.

It is possible that some may do themselves harm by possessing the Scriptures: but it is in a greater degree possible,—nay, it is certain,—that they will suffer much more harm by their being withheld; for the people may be destroyed for lack of knowledge. (Hosea iv. 6.) And why do not the Catholics show the same caution in other cases as they do in this? Why do they not forbid image-worship, lest the people fall into idolatry? Why do they not forbid the use of indulgences, lest they should be used as a license to commit sin? Multitudes of such questions might be asked; and it is strange that the Papists should be suspicious of nothing so much as the Bible.

Men have been liable to fall into heretical error in all ages; yet neither the Prophets, nor our Saviour and his Apostles, ever thought of preventing these evils by forbidding the reading of Scripture. St. Peter himself, who mentions the danger of destruction from wresting the Scriptures, so far from blaming, commends every man for reading them. St. Paul, whose Epistles were the very Scriptures they wrested, never required them to be kept from any Christian of the several churches to which he wrote. On the other hand, he required the contrary, concerning an Epistle as liable to be misunderstood as any of them, and which actually was misunderstood immediately. "I charge you by the Lord, that this Epistle be read unto all the holy brethren." (1 Thess. v. 27.) The ancient Christians, in whose days heresies abounded, did not restrain the people from reading the Scripture in order to preserve them from those evils. With them, a man who surrendered his Bible was deemed an apostate from the faith. Nothing was so much insisted on by Fathers and Councils, as the necessity of all persons becoming acquainted with the holy Scriptures. The primitive church was apprehensive of no danger from this practice. The Church of Rome, we acknowledge, has cause to be apprehensive; for had the people but liberty to read and judge from Scripture, they would speedily be brought to see what they who now see dare not own, how widely the Scripture differs from the doctrines which they are commonly taught. They are wise in their generation. The Scripture is against them, and they will be against the Scripture; they will lower its credit as far as they dare; keep it out of men's hands where they can; and where they cannot, they will pervert it by erroneous translations, obscure it by false glosses, and make it of none effect by setting up a pretended authority of interpretation, which affixes to it a sense quite different from what it evidently means.

2. It is objected, that fanaticism results from the exercise of private judgment in the interpretation of Scripture. The extravagances of Joanna Southcote and others are adduced as examples.

But it is not from reading the Bible that these excesses arise; for this book is entirely overlooked by fanatics, or they are so much wiser than what is written, that they place their own notions in a far more elevated scale than the word of God. Fanaticism should be rather considered as the offspring of heated passions, a weak understanding, or extremely superstitious, mistaken, and absurd views of a few truths, than as the result of private judgment in reading the Scriptures.

* End of Controversy, Letter xii., p. 82.
† Ibid., Letter viii., p. 41. ‡ Ibid., Letter x., p. 57

But are members of the Church of Rome, who are either forbidden to read the word of God, or to exercise their judgment in order to understand it, exempt from fanaticism? Instances of this evil, and of the perversions of Scripture which have disgraced Protestant countries from the days of Munster down to those of Joanna Southcote, are far outdone in countries where the Bible stood foremost in the list of heretical books, and where the authority of the Church of Rome was predominant. Witness the horrible crucifixion of females so minutely detailed by Baron De Grimm, who was an eye-witness of them during his residence at Paris, and which were suppressed not by the interference of the Clergy, but by order of the Lieutenant of Police. Let any one consult the Edinburgh Review for September, 1814, p. 302, et seq., and he will find detailed instances of the most horrible fanaticism which occurred at Paris.* We allow, that such cases of human infirmity call rather for the exercise of pity and forbearance, than for mutual recrimination. But when the Church of Rome countenances the most glaring fanaticism, many of her usages being founded and supported by it, we think it necessary to rebut, by a just retort, her charges against the reading of God's holy word. The Romish Church has been the steady friend of fanatics and the interior spirit. Witness the Flagellants, in whose processions such fanatics as the King of France and the Cardinal Lorraine have frequently joined. Indeed, many of the peculiar doctrines, rites, and institutions of Romanism originated in gross fanaticism. In their worship of images, in the distribution of works and offices assigned to the vast host of saints, in the canonization of the pious, and adding to the objects of worship and veneration, and also in the grave pretensions of the Romish Church to miraculous powers, there is a singular exhibition of fanaticism. Doctrinal sentiments and rites have been defined and settled by visions and revelations. Their Monkish Orders have been founded by fanatics in their maniacal ravings; such as the Benedictines, Carthusians, Dominicans, Franciscans, Carmelites, Cistercians, Jesuits, &c. Many of their leading ceremonies and rites may be traced to the same source.† Witness, also, the monstrous absurdities printed and circulated in the Lives of the Saints by Dr. Butler, the Visions of St. Theresa, and the Infliction of the five Stigmata of St. Francis.

Fanaticism is occasionally to be found in every Church. But it is proper to make one important distinction between Protestants and Romanists respecting the instances which have occurred. Protestants provide against them by sound instruction, and discourage and disavow fanaticism and enthusiasm when they arise. But the Church of Rome does not scripturally make such provision: she does not discourage or disown, but she rather fosters, the examples of delusion which have arisen among them.

3. It is objected that the miscellaneous reading of Scripture produces heresies.

Mr. Hughes says, "The Protestant rule of faith has given rise to all the heresies that exist." ‡ But are the poor and illiterate those who originate heresies? Not at all. Du Pin, a celebrated Doctor of the Sorbonne, and a Roman Catholic, informs us, "If there be obscure and difficult passages in the Bible, it is not generally the simple who abuse them, but the proud and learned who make á bad use of them. For, in truth, it is not the ignorant and simple who have formed heresies in perverting the word of God. They who do so are generally Bishops and Priests, learned and enlightened persons. So that, so far from knowing by experience that the reading of the Scripture is dangerous to the simple and the ignorant, one may say that we learn therefrom that it seldom causes any but the learned to fall into error, and that the simple have generally found there nothing but what is edifying and instructive." * Cardinal Bellarmine writes as follows:—"Heresies originate with men of rank rather than with the common people. Without doubt, heresiarchs were almost all either Bishops or Presbyters. So that heresies are certain factions of leading men, without whom there would be no revolts of the people in the Church." † From these two testimonies of Roman Catholics, who, in this respect, speak the words of soberness, the reading of Scripture by the common people does not produce heresies. But the supposed importance of such an objection is another proof of the low estimation in which the Scripture is held by those who make it.

But we ask, How have Catholics succeeded in putting an end to disputes, and rooting out heresies? Their rule has worked far worse than ours. In settling controversies, neither by reason, nor by the Bible, nor by the records of history, but by authority and force, they have driven Church after Church, and nation after nation, from their communion. How did they settle the dispute with the Waldenses and Albigenses, with the Greek Church, and the Reformers? The Church of Rome, where she is dominant, may succeed by the power of the Inquisition, and similar means, in repressing a manifestation of opinion; such measures have produced infidelity in France, Spain, and elsewhere; but it never succeeded in promoting pure and undefiled religion.

The Church of Rome accuses Protestantism of producing Socinianism, and asserts that this heresy is the legitimate result of following the Protestant rule. She also declares that the divinity of Christ cannot be proved from Scripture, and that the principles of her Church are in direct opposition to the Socinian or Unitarian heresy. Now we think we can prove the contrary of all this, so as to show unequivocally, that the charge of producing heresy, in reference to Socinianism, cannot justly be attributed to the Protestant rule. On this the following observations are offered:—

First. The Socinian does not adopt the Protestant rule: nor can he, with propriety, be ranked among Protestants.

The Protestant rule is the all-sufficiency of Scripture, interpreted by the legitimate canons of interpretation, under the direction and illumination of the Holy Spirit; or, in other words, the orthodox Protestant rule is the entire canon of Scripture, accepted and received

* Correspondence Littéraire, Philosophique, et Critique, addressée á un Soverain d' Allemagne: Depuis 1753 jusqu'en 1769. Par Baron De Grimm et par Diderot.

† See Brownlee, p. 105.

‡ Controversy with Breckenridge, p. 22.

* Disser. Prelim. sur la Bible, b. i., c. 9, par. 1701.

† "Hæreses autem ab optimatibus potius quàm à plebeiis hominibus excitantur. Certè, Heresiarchæ ferè omnes aut Episcopi aut Presbyteri fuerunt. Itaque sunt hæreses quædam quasi optimatium factiones, sine quibus nullæ essent in Ecclesia populorum seditiones." —Bellarm. Disput. tom. i., De Rom. Pont., lib. i., c. 8, p. 625. Fol Ingolst. A. D. 1601.

as a divine revelation, interpreted according to the proper rules of language, and requiring the illumination of the Holy Spirit. This is not the rule of the Socinian; nor are these the foundations of his opinions. He denies and rejects many parts of the sacred canon; he rejects also the doctrine of divine influence, and transgresses the laws of sober interpretation by a rash self-sufficiency. The position, therefore, of the orthodox and heterodox Protestant is totally different: their rule of faith is different, and consequently different results are produced. In fact, the creed of the Socinian is formed previously to his approaching the Scriptures; and his business is to adjust them according to his previously-received creed. His doctrine and the doctrine of Scripture are altogether different. The orthodox Protestant has a rule of faith wholly divested of absurdity and difficulty. The Papist's rule is involved in that of the Socinian. The first is founded on the unity of the divine communications, while the latter supposes such a communication to be insufficient.

Secondly. Romanists assert, that the divinity of Christ cannot be proved from the testimony of Scripture.

We shall show that the Scripture fully maintains this doctrine. To the orthodox Protestant, in his defence against the Socinian and the Romanist, the Scripture is a litera scripta, or written document, on whose pages are inscribed such passages as the following:—"Immanuel, God with us;" "The Word was God;" "I and the Father are one;" "Who is over all, God blessed for ever;" "The great God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ," &c. Now what does the Socinian do with all these? Why, he has a previously-formed creed, and has absolutely settled the thing beforehand, that these things cannot be. In order to reconcile this to a professed reverence for Scripture, he has recourse to interpretation, and with him interpretation is omnipotent. Give a man that, and he fears not. Grammatical meaning with him will signify nothing. For will any man, not a bedlamite, say that the Socinian derives his creed from Scripture,—from any grammatical, and therefore just, interpretation? We say grammatical, not literal; for we do not require him to believe that Christ was a vine, any more than that he was two persons when he instituted the sacrament of the supper—one in himself, and the other in the bread which he held in his own hand!

Thirdly. Notwithstanding the Socinians and Catholics disagree in many things, there are nevertheless strong features of resemblance traceable between them.

(1.) There are resemblances in doctrine. The Church of Rome has had the honour of maintaining orthodox doctrine, after many other Churches had embraced great errors,—such as the Arian heresy, which afterward merged into the Socinian, denying both the divinity and the atonement of Christ. But eventually she fell into similar errors. It was too much to persuade men that Christ was a creature; but the same object was effected by persuading men to worship creatures only, and to trust in the merits of creatures, and in their own penances. Denying, or rendering obscure, the divinity of Christ, may be done in two ways: First. By bringing him down to the level of a mere creature. This was for the learned and philosophical; but there was something too shocking in it for the bulk of mankind. The second method served the purpose better; which was, to raise certain beings to the rank and place of the Saviour. Both these systems seem to be opposed to each other; but both agree in creature-worship and creature-merit, and are both subversive of genuine Christianity, and far removed from the character of apostolicity. The Socinians deny Christ's divinity, the Papists expressly maintain it; but they affirm that this doctrine cannot be proved from Scripture; and assert that the primitive Fathers wrote nothing against Arianism. They also overthrow the doctrine by allowing worship to creatures. Thus, to a considerable extent, they make common cause with the Socinians, and agree with them in practice, though they cry out against them.

(2.) There are striking resemblances between Socinians and Catholics in regard to the liberties which they have taken with the word of God, or rule of faith, in adding thereto, and weakening its force. The Church of Rome adds tradition to the sacred testimony which they both verbally acknowledge the word of God; but cry out, that the originals, the Hebrew and Greek, are corrupted. Dr. Priestley accuses the Apostles of reasoning inconclusively, and Moses of giving a lame account of the creation. Dr. Milner says, "If Christ had intended that all mankind should learn his religion from a book,—namely, the New Testament,—he himself would have written that book." This, certainly, is speaking very disrespectfully of the word of God.

(3.) In the rules of interpretation there are striking coincidences. Popery and Socinianism agree in this,—that there is an authority among men superior to Scripture, by which the Scriptures are to be tried, and their meaning determined. This may be called the nucleus of the two systems. The authority which the Catholics set over the Scripture is, the Church and tradition; that among the Socinians, is reason and conscience. Thus the Church of Rome identifies herself with this heresy, by setting human authority over the word of God. I cannot do better here than adduce a quotation from Tertullian's Prescriptions against Heretics; and I take a Papal translation: "Heresy does not receive some scriptures; nor, if it receives any, does it receive them entire; but either adds or subtracts to prove its own tenets; and when it seems to keep the words, perverts the sense by different comments and interpretations." *

(4.) Let the reader observe, that though there are strong features of resemblance between Popery and Socinianism, we do not speak of Papists and Socinians personally; nor do we assert, that the prevailing tendency of the two bodies is the same. In respect to literature, and all the decencies of enlightened society, the latter are not behind their Protestant neighbours. They acknowledge no foreign power, civil or religious; they do not think it lawful to propagate their principles by force, or to punish men for heresy.

4. Another objection to the exercise of judgment in the reading of Scripture is, the divisions among Protestants; or, in other words, that the circulation of the holy Scriptures in the vulgar tongue produces numerous sects. It appears that there were sects among the Jews in the Apostles' days, and among the primitive Christians. And as it respects one notable Jewish sect, our Lord declares, that the cause of their error was ignorance of the Scriptures: "Ye do greatly err, not knowing the Scriptures." Reading the Bible was not the cause of their errors, or of their sectarianism; but their neglect of the Scriptures, and ignorance of them. It is plain, that the reading and reasoning upon the Scriptures, is the method appointed by our Saviour to prevent error, to convince heretics, and convert them to the faith. Protestant Churches excommunicate heretics where they appear, and Romanists ought not to do any thing more. Nevertheless, they add force and persecution; and if this be a more effectual way, it is certainly an unscriptural one. There are two ways of settling disputes,—by reason, and by force: Protestants take the former, Catholics the latter.

* "Ista hæresis non recipit quasdam scripturas, etsi quas recipit, adjectionibus et detractionibus ad dispositionem instituti sui intervertit. Et si recipit, non recipit integras. Et si aliquatenus integras præstat, nihilominus diversas expositiones commentata convertit."—Tertul. opera. De Præscript. Hæret., p. 100. Fol. Basil. A. D. 1528.

The Papists have no just cause to exult, that their rule and its enforcement have proved successful toward the prevention of various sects. Among them Jansenists and Jesuits still exist, and many other schisms. Have the divisions among the Franciscans and Dominicans escaped their recollection? Have they never read of the rupture between Fenelon and Bossuet, respecting the mystic notions of Madame Guion? And, also, when the matter was referred to the Pope, he, through fear of Bossuet, and regard for Fenelon, hesitated to decide, until compelled to yield to the influence of the former?

The Roman Catholic Church cannot boast of a unity equal to that which exists among the leading Protestant Churches of Europe or America. It could be easily shown, that the common bond of union—that is, the Bible—is among Protestants stronger and more efficacious than that which arises from union with the see of Rome.

5. We are also sometimes told, that the unrestrained reading of the Scriptures produces insubordination, disloyalty, and rebellion. The only reply we shall make to this is, that the careful perusal of Scripture will lead men to assert their natural and civil rights, and to oppose tyranny and despotism both in the church and the state. And as the Catholic system is supported by, and therefore fosters, despotism, it is no wonder that the devotees of the Church of Rome pronounce an anathema against the circulation and reading of Scripture among all classes of mankind.* If all men, in this free country, were not permitted the exercise of private judgment; if they were not even allowed to twist the sacred letter to whatever sense or nonsense they pleased; Romanists would not be allowed to hold, much less to publish, their folly; for of all the sects in existence, none exhibit such a mass of foolishness as the Church of Rome: it is the nonsense of wresting many plain texts of Scripture to unhallowed and destructive purposes!

6. Let us examine Bible-reading by its effects. The Church of Rome declares that it is the cause of more harm than good.

It is remarkable, that those periods of the world's history in which the morals of mankind were in the worst state, and the places where iniquity most abounded, were the times and places where the greatest scarcity of the word of God prevailed. Such was the case before the flood. "The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence." Here is what tradition could do; here is what a destitution of Scripture could accomplish. Greece and Rome, under the guidance of tradition and philosophy, were sunk in every species of crime and error; as appears from the first chapter to the Romans, as well as from their own writers. The same is the case with modern heathen nations. Roman Catholic countries, where the word of God is little read, and less known, furnish ample proof of the corrupting effect of prohibiting the general reading of the word of God, by the ignorance, errors, and immorality which predominate. And in parts where the Bible is circulated, very few, if any, of those who have become intemperate, or are inmates of penitentiaries, were constant and careful readers of the Bible.

Besides, the good effects of Bible-reading are great and numerous. Was ever any one injured by reading the Bible, or induced by it to injure others? Nay, we may appeal to any one, who has paid attention to the subject, whether he ever knew a good man become bad, or even a bad man become worse, in consequence of reading the Bible? But if we are to believe the Catholics, we find that their experience is against Bible-reading: accordingly, they speak of it as one of the greatest mischiefs in the world. Indeed, they ascribe most of the evils which have afflicted Europe for the last three hundred years, to reading the word of God.

7. It is objected, that Christ and his Apostles did not propagate the Gospel by the instrumentality of the written word. Mr. Hughes says, "Christ has made the promise of infallibility to the succession of TEACHING; and not to reading, writing, or private interpretation."* Dr. Milner, Vicar-General of all England, in his End of Controversy, declares, "If Christ had intended that all men should learn their religion from a book,—namely, the New Testament,—he would have written that book himself, and enjoined the obligation of learning to read it, as the first and fundamental precept of religion. But Christ wrote no part of the New Testament himself, and gave no orders to his Apostles to write it." The Papists maintain, that Christ sent his Apostles "to teach all nations; that this always means oral instructions: they were sent to preach, not to write books." To this we reply, that Christ and his Apostles continually alluded to the written word; and although they declared many truths which were not contained in the Old Testament, they enlarged upon, and more fully explained, what had been formerly written. The Apostles propagated Christianity by means of the sacred writings; and the phrases, "according to the Scriptures," "as it is written in the law, the Prophets, the Psalms," show what use they made of those documents. The first Preachers proved that Jesus was the Christ, from the Scriptures. (See Luke xxiv. 44, 45; Rom. xvi. 26; Acts xviii. 28.) In a word, it may be said of the New, as well as of the Old Testament, "Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope."

Teaching implies as much the use of written, as of oral, instruction. Our Lord's command to teach, included equally an injunction to write, as to speak. Apostolical usage proves this: the Apostles wrote as well as preached; they declared that they were enjoined to write. (See John xx. 31; Rev. i. 11, 19.)

The Apostles and Evangelists not only made large use of the Scriptures of the Old Testament, but they also wrote the New for the instruction of all. And so far were they from thinking, that those whom they instructed in Christianity were sufficiently taught without written information, though they possessed the writings of Moses and the Prophets, they thought it necessary to leave with the whole church, the laity as well as Clergy, those portions also which compose the New Testament.

* See the Discussion at the Carlow Meeting, pp. 63, 64.

* Controversy with Mr. Breckenridge.

If it be stated, that the Scriptures are to be used for the edification of the faithful, but not for the purpose of converting the Heathen to Christianity, we reply that nothing is more erroneous. For is it a more convincing way to persuade men to become Christians by oral declarations respecting events that have long since transpired, than to accompany such oral teaching with written documents which have every external and internal mark of genuineness, as well as the solemn impress and seal of inspiration? Thomas Paine, and other infidels, never made a grosser attack on Scripture than this: such an attack, however, furnishes us with an additional proof of the oneness of infidelity and Popery.

Dr. Milner further argues, that since few can read, and no means were provided by Christ to teach men to read,—therefore, to instruct men by the written word is absurd and impossible. "Christ has not so much as enjoined it to his followers, in general, to study letters." So says a Vicar-General of England. But we answer, that the very giving of the Scriptures in the language of men, is a proof that Christ intended them for the instruction of mankind. He provided means for their reading and understanding them, when he endowed men with rational powers, and promised the aid of his Spirit to guide them. To say that Christ did not intend the Bible to be our director in religion, because he did not teach all men to read, is as absurd as to say, that he did not intend the fruits of the earth to be the food of man, because he did not directly instruct him in the arts of husbandry.

VIII. Romanists deny that the canon of Scripture can be ascertained without referring to the authority of their Church, or to tradition. That the canon can be, and actually is, defined and ascertained, we have ample proof, though the Church of Rome were blotted out of existence; for what belongs to the church catholic, or universal, is as much ours as theirs. They have introduced the Apocrypha into the canon,—we reject it; and for this rejection we have ample authority. We call the books of the Bible canonical, either because they are included in the catalogue of books which we receive as inspired, or because they are the rule of faith,—the word canon (κανων) signifying a "rule," or standard. We call those books apocryphal, (from the word αποκρυπτω, "to hide," or "conceal,") that is, doubtful, or uncertain, which are not acknowledged to be divine, or inspired of God. Protestants reject the latter from being to them a rule of faith; while Romanists acknowledge many of this description as canonical. The following reasons induce us to reject the Apocrypha:—

1. The canon of Protestants, as it respects the Old Testament, is the same with that which the Jews always did, and do now, acknowledge.

The learned Du Pin, a Roman Catholic, quotes Jerome on this subject as follows:—"Thus all the books of the Old Testament among the Jews are two-and-twenty; of which five belong to Moses, eight to the Prophets, and nine to the other holy penmen. Some reckon four-and-twenty, by separating Ruth from Judges, and the Lamentations from the Prophecy of Jeremiah, and placing them in the number of holy writings. This preface, adds he, may serve as a head or preface to all the books which we have translated from the Hebrew; and we are to take notice, that whatever is not contained in the number of these books is apocryphal. From hence it follows that the book of Wisdom, commonly ascribed to Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, said to be composed by Jesus the Son of Sirach, Judith, Tobit, and the Pastor, do not belong to the canon. no more than the two books of the Maccabees, of which one was in Hebrew, and the other (as appears plainly from the style) was written in Greek."* Neither the ancient Prophets, Christ or his Apostles, nor ancient Christians, as is worthy of remark, accused the Jews of omitting any canonical book; which they would not fail to have done, had they considered the books called Apocrypha, as properly belonging to the inspired writings.

2. The apocryphal books were not admitted into the canon of Scripture during the first four centuries of the Christian church.

The ancient Christians followed the Jewish canon in the books of the Old Testament. The first catalogues of the canonical books, made by the ecclesiastical Greek and Latin authors, comprehended no more. We quote again our Catholic historian on this point. "The first and most ancient catalogue that we have of the Canonical books drawn up by a Christian author, is that of Melito, Bishop of Sardis, who flourished under the Empire of Marcus Antoninus. It is taken from a preface which he had put at the head of several extracts he had made of the books of the Law and the Prophets, and mentioned by Eusebius in the fourth book of his history, chap. xxvi. He reckons only two-and-twenty books of the Old Testament, among which he does not include Esther, dividing Ruth from that of Judges. Origen, in a passage extracted from his Commentary on the first Psalm, and mentioned by Eusebius, book vi., chap. xxv., reckons also two-and-twenty; but he takes in Esther, joining Ruth with Judges, and observes, that the books of the Maccabees are excluded out of the canon. The Council of Laodicea, which is the first Synod wherein the number of canonical books was determined, assigns only two-and-twenty books of the Old Testament, including Esther, and joining Baruch, the Lamentations, and the Letters, with the Prophecy of Jeremiah. This catalogue is followed by St. Cyril of Jerusalem, in his fourth Catechetical Lecture; by St. Athanasius in his Festival Epistle, and by the author of the Synopsis which goes under his name. The last two do not include Esther in the number of canonical books, but join Baruch with the Lamentations, and the Epistle of Jeremiah with his Prophecy; and observe that the books of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Judith, Tobit, and the Maccabees are excluded the canon, though they be useful books and proper for edification. The author of the Synopsis does likewise take notice that the book of Esther is placed by some among the canonical books. Amphilochius in the Epistle to Seleucus, mentioned by Balsamon, author of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy; Leontius of Byzantium in his Treatise de Sectis; Anastatius, St. John Damascene, and the two Nicephori, do all follow the catalogue of Melito. But St. Hilary follows that of Origen, and acknowledges the book of Esther for canonical. Of the same opinion are St. Jerome and Ruffinus, who observe that the forementioned apocryphal books are not of the canon. St. Epiphanius, in the eighth heresy, reckons seven-and-twenty canonical books of the Old Testament, yet he admits of no more than are in the catalogue of Origen, and takes notice in his tract of Weights and Measures, that the Jews reduced it to two-and-twenty books, and some of the Latins to four-and-twenty, which they say were denoted by the four-and-twenty Elders in the Apocalypse. This is likewise the opinion of Victorinus, Primasius, Berengaudus, of the author of the Poem against Marcian bearing Tertullian's name, of Bede, of the author of the Sermons upon the Apocalypse ascribed to St. Augustine, and of several others who distinguish the book of Ruth from that of Judges, and the Lamentations from the Prophecy of Jeremiah. In the apostolical canon, the three books of the Maccabees are added to those which are in Origen's catalogue, though that of Wisdom be excluded the canon. But it is to be questioned whether they are not added by some late writer, since it is not in that canon mentioned in the collection of John of Antioch, (Tit. 50,) nor in any of the canons of the Greek authors." * To this decisive evidence against the canonical authority of the Apocrypha, we may add that they were never used in the Christian church until the fourth century, when they were read for example of life and instruction of manners, but were not applied to establish any doctrine, as Jerome saith. The Council of Laodicea, held between 360 and 370, and representing the catholic or universal church, ordains in her sixtieth canon, that the canonical books of the Old Testament are those which are acknowledged by the Jews, and rejects the Apocrypha. "These canons," says Du Pin, "have been received by the whole church, and put in the code of the canons of the universal church."†

* Du Pin's History of the Canon, &c., fol., vol. i., p. 7. London, 1699.

3. The apocryphal books are not canonical.

(1.) They possess no authority whatever, either external or internal, to procure their admission into the sacred canon.‡

(2.) The apocryphal books contain many things which are fabulous, contradictory, and directly at variance with the canonical Scriptures.

(3.) They contain passages which are in themselves false, absurd, and incredible.

(4.) Many parts contained therein are at variance with the authentic records of profane historians. Our limits do not permit us to enlarge. §

(5.) The apocryphal books are not quoted in the New Testament; but those which were received into the canon of the Jews are frequently quoted. ‖

4. The introduction of the Apocrypha among the canonical books is not of primitive, but rather of modern, usage.

Monsieur Du Pin speaks on this subject as follows:— "The first catalogue wherein the books of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Tobit, Judith, and the two Maccabees were admitted as canonical, and as having the same authority, is that of the third Council of Carthage, held in the year 397; which confirms the Decree of the Council of Hippo of the year 393, wherein these books were received into the canon; yet upon condition that the Church beyond sea should be consulted for its confirmation, as is implied in an ancient note on that canon, which runs thus, De confirmando isto canone transmarina ecclesia consulatur. This very canon is repeated in the Council of Carthage, held in the year 419, with a clause much like the former: Ut fratri et consacerdoti Bonifacio, et earum partium Episcopis innotescat; that is, That it might be communicated to Pope Boniface, and to the Bishops of Italy. St. Augustine, according to the authority of the African Church, reckons all these books as canonical in the eighth chapter of his second book, De Doctrinâ Christianâ; but withal he takes notice, that of the canonical books there are some which are received by all the Catholic churches, and others which are not received every where as canonical.

"The Church of Rome has agreed herein with that of Africa. For Innocent I., in his letter to Exuperius, places the same books in the canon of the Old Testament, as Pope Gelasius, in the Council held in the year 494. However, in the canon of the latter, mention is only made of the book of Ezra, and one book of the Maccabees, and in some manuscripts, the book of Job is omitted. In some others the two books of the Maccabees are included; but all the manuscripts reckon but one book of Ezra, which is a falsity, since none has ever called the second book of Ezra into question.

"The Decree of Pope Eugenius, and the canon of the Council of Trent, agree with the canon of the Council of Carthage, and with the Decree of Pope Innocent; and therein are ranked among the sacred books of the Old Testament, Tobit, Judith, Esther, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, and the two books of the Maccabees." *

From this it appears that, during the first four centuries, the Jewish canon alone was received in Christendom. The decision of the Council of Laodicea was received by the universal church. But the Council of Carthage, in Africa, in 397, decided only for themselves; and besides, they wished to consult Churches in other countries on this subject. And when in 419 an African Council took in the Apocrypha, they were so far from deciding absolutely on this subject, that they thought proper to confer with the Churches of Italy. In brief, it remained for the Council of Trent, held in 1545, to add the uninspired Apocrypha to the word of God. How destitute, then, of truth is the declaration of the Popish Priest, in his Controversy with Breckenridge, when he says, respecting the Roman Catholic canon, "I defy you to show that the Christian church, previous to Luther, ever held a different canon!" (P. 86.) Nothing is more common than for Romanists, especially Jesuits, to deny or pervert the best authenticated historical facts; and the only reason which can induce the Church of Rome to receive as canonical the Apocrypha is, that many of her doctrines derive their authority from these books.

IX. Genuineness, authenticity, and inspiration of Scripture.

It is stated by Romanists, "that the genuineness, authenticity, and inspiration of Scripture cannot be maintained, without tradition and the authority of the Church."

1. If by tradition we mean written historical documents, well authenticated, and delivered down (tradita) to us, we grant they are of great importance; but we utterly deny that unwritten tradition is of any use to this purpose. Nor can we agree, that authority merely can be of any value in ascertaining the genuineness, authenticity, or inspiration of Scripture, unless it is the authority derived from written documents, affording historical evidence, or

* Du Pin's History of the Canon, &c., fol., vol. i., p. 8. London, 1699.

† Ecclesiastical History, vol. i., p. 613, where he quotes the articles of the Council.

‡ Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the holy Scriptures, vol. i., p. 633, et seq. Fifth edit.

§ Ibid.

‖ See this established fully by the Catholic Du Pin, in his Preliminary Dissertation, prefixed to his Ecclesiastical History, vol. i., p. 17, and notes f and g, p. 9, English translation. Dublin, 1723.

* Du Pin's History of the Canon, &c., fol., vol. i., pp. 8, 9. London, 1699.

the authority derived from internal proofs; or, in other words, the authority arising from the internal and external evidences of the Scriptures. But both these are entirely different from the authority which the Church of Rome claims.

We have a body of evidence in support of the genuineness, authenticity, and inspiration of the canonical books of Scripture, as received by Protestants, so wholly independent of the Church of Rome, that if that Church had never existed, this testimony would stand on the same immovable basis of proof as it does at the present day.

2. In proof of the GENUINENESS of Scripture we have the testimonies of Christian, Jewish, heretical, and antichristian writers. By the term genuineness, we mean, that the several parts of the Bible were written by those persons to whom the authorship is attributed.

We have many Christian testimonies respecting the genuineness of the New Testament. In the age immediately succeeding the apostolic we have a number of writers, such as Barnabas, Clemens Romanus, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp, who are styled apostolic Fathers, who frequently quote and refer to the holy Scriptures. In the second, third, and fourth centuries we have an uninterrupted chain of writers who constantly allude to the canonical books. Add to this, the whole Christian church, which, from the days of those who were contemporary with the Apostles, have held the genuineness of the holy Scriptures, and have implicitly received them, without ever calling them in question. These are the testimonies of Christian writers—men who lived at different periods and in different countries—men of learning, talent, and integrity, who were not likely to be deceived.

Among Jewish writers we have the testimony of Philo and Josephus.

Among heretical writers we have testimonies from the works of Cerinthus, Marcion, Noetus, Paul of Samosata, Sabellius, Marcellus, and others.

The antichristian writers, Celsus and Julian the apostate, never call in question the genuineness of the Scriptures; but constantly refer to them, as books which have existed from the origin of Christianity.

Besides these external proofs of the genuineness of the Scriptures, we have confirmatory testimony from internal evidence. We mention the character of the writers; the minute and circumstantial details contained in the New Testament; the obvious coincidence between its different parts; and the agreement of many allusions with customs that then prevailed. It is true, the external evidence may be called a kind of tradition; but it is the tradition of historical testimony, and therefore entirely different from the Popish notion of oral or unwritten tradition. In a word, we have more abundant evidence of the genuineness of Scripture, than we have in behalf of any classical author, whether Grecian or Roman; and if we reject the former, we cannot retain the latter.

3. With regard to the authenticity of Scripture, we are asked by Romanists, How do we know that it is authentic? Must we not here have recourse to authority and tradition? We answer, By no means. We have ample proof that we have received, without mutilation, the sacred records. On this point we adduce the following evidence. And first with regard to the Old Testament.

(1.) The Jews were divided into Talmudists and Caraites; and consequently, on account of their mutual jealousies, neither party, if such were the wish, could adulterate the Scriptures without detection.

(2.) Again: the Jews and Samaritans regarded each other with feelings of great jealousy and ill-will, which also proved an inviolable guarantee to the preservation of the Scripture; for the Samaritan Pentateuch agrees in all material points with the Jewish.

(3.) Besides, the Jews had such a veneration for the sacred Scriptures, that they not only enumerated the sections into which the books were divided, but also the letters and words in each book, and even fixed on the middle word therein, all of which were set down at the end in the form of Masoretic notes. They considered all copies useless which were not perfect; and would sooner sacrifice their lives, than mutilate the least part of the original text.

(4.) Moreover, were they disposed to alter any part, we should suppose, that they would have fixed upon those portions of the sacred volume, which record their own rebellions and idolatries, and the infirmities and sins of their leaders. This was never done; which goes far to show, the great fidelity with which they preserved their sacred records.

(5.) But we have another indisputable proof that the books of the Old Testament were preserved uncorrupted to the time of the Christian era; for though our Saviour reproved the Pharisees for making the word of God of none effect through their traditions, he also informed the Sadducees that they erred, because they did not know it; and charged the Jews with great inattention, in not being able to recognise him as the Messiah, from a perusal of their own Scriptures; but he never accused them either with adding to or diminishing from the original documents, or with mutilating them in any way. The Old Testament was therefore preserved until our Saviour's time unadulterated.

(6.) Since the Christian era, the Old Testament could not have undergone any change. The Christians had their copies of the Old Testament. The Jews possessed theirs. Both watched the other with jealousy. On comparing their copies, they exactly agree.

(7.) The various translations of the Old Testament also show its integrity. The paraphrases of several parts of the Old Testament into Chaldee, and the translation of the Seventy interpreters into Greek, about three hundred years before Christ, agree in the main with our Hebrew text, and furnish additional strong proof of the authenticity of our canon.

(8.) Add to all these, Dr. Kennicott collated about seven hundred and fifty manuscripts of great antiquity; and found, after laborious research, abundant evidence both in confirmation of the canon of Scripture, and of the uncorrupted state in which it has descended to us. He found, also, that the various readings did not affect the present Hebrew text in any one material point.

That we possess uncorrupted copies of the NEW TESTAMENT, we have likewise convincing proof.

(1.) The number of sects which have prevailed since the Christian era, and which have watched over each other with sleepless constancy, furnish strong assurance that the New Testament has not been altered.

(2.) Several translations were made at an early stage of Christianity. Of these we possess copies. They have been compared with the Greek copies, with which they are found to agree; and thus furnish farther proof of the integrity of the originals.

(3.) Besides, we have Greek manuscripts of very ancient date. Griesbach compared about three hundred of them, and found that they afforded strong evidence of the purity of the Greek text, and established the present canon of the New Testament. It is true, we have various readings; but these concern the text so little, that there is not a single doctrine of the New Testament affected by them, although much light is thrown on many passages. But though they cast both light and beauty on the text, the greater part are apparently lost in an ordinary translation.

(4.) God is a being of infinite wisdom, goodness, and power. Is it, therefore, saying too much, that, by his particular direction and overruling providence, he will watch his own word, and preserve it from the corruptions of ignorant and wicked men? This, at least, if not demonstration, is presumptive proof. Indeed, we can easily trace the superintending care of God in the preservation of his word to us.

4. As it regards the inspiration of Scripture, it is supported by evidence so clear in itself, and so convincing, and so independent of the Church of Rome, that on this part of the controversy we occupy ground which she can never successfully dispute, or at any rate disprove. It is true, they ask, "How do you prove the Bible to be inspired?" To which we answer, From internal and external evidence. The external evidences are prophecy and miracles. The internal are the purity of the doctrines and morals, the harmony and connexion of the parts, their preservation, efficacy, &c. Now, from these we prove the inspiration of the word of God, to the conviction of all reasonable men, without having recourse to that blind submission which the authority of the Church of Rome requires, when propounding Scripture as inspired.

We acknowledge the HISTORICAL EVIDENCE OF TRADITION; and Protestants avail themselves of its light and truth, without having recourse to the absurd dogma of the hierarchy of Rome, which asserts, that we depend on the Church for proof of the inspiration of Scripture. It is utterly false to assert, that we are indebted to the Church of Rome for the Scriptures. The Jews preserved the Old Testament, which was originally committed to them. The Christian church has preserved the New Testament, together with the Old. And all the sections of the church have done this. The Bible is handed down to us by the Jews, by the Syrian Churches still existing in India, by the Greek Church, more ancient and more pure than that of Rome; by the famous African Churches, which in the days of Augustine denied their fealty to the Pope; by the Waldensian Churches, which possessed the old Italic version long before the Vulgate was written; by the apostolic Churches in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Spain, before they were overrun by Popery; by the Church of Rome herself, which preserved the Scriptures, though with less fidelity than any other Church possessed of equal advantages; and, finally, by the Protestant Churches, which, during the last three hundred years, have done infinitely more than all others to transmit in its purity, and to extend the circulation of, the word of God. Proof to any amount can be brought of this fact. To mention the existence and operations of the British and American Bible Societies, is alone sufficient to stop the mouth of every Romanist, and to cover him with confusion. All the versions of the Bible made in the first, second, and third centuries, in Asia, Africa, and Europe, have the valid authority of undoubted historical traditions.

It will be observed, that we have given only a brief epitome of the evidences for the genuineness, authenticity, and inspiration of Scripture. But we refer to Horne's Introduction for a complete discussion of the whole, as he has collected the entire amount of argument on the subject. It is lamentable that the Roman Catholics take infidel ground in opposing Protestantism, which is a proof of their fearful corruption, and also of the fact, that infidelity has deeply affected their own Clergy.

X. When other methods of disparagement fail, Papists attempt to undervalue the English version of the Scriptures. We have the testimony of the best and ablest scholars—such as Selden, Lowth, Horsley, Whitaker, Taylor, Scott, Adam Clarke, and others—in favour of the correctness and fidelity of our authorized translation. The singular pains which were taken with it, give strong assurance of its accuracy. It has been stated by a gentleman, who has collated the original Douay Bible, Dr. Challoner's, and Haydock's editions, and the authorized English version, that he is convinced that Challoner's and Haydock's editions are corrected and amended by King James's Bible. Besides, no one doctrine or moral precept is altered or perverted by any of all the translations of the Reformed Churches. Moreover, Protestants receive the original Hebrew and Greek Scriptures as infallible, to which they resort in all cases of dispute.

How little weight, then, can be given to the decisions of Roman Catholics, when, as Mr. Hughes says, they "regard the Protestant Bible as a spurious version, mistranslated, and containing only a part of the sacred Scriptures!"* If pressed beyond the power of successful reply, the sophistical Priest utters the following, which, though utterly inapplicable to Popery, is in perfect keeping with the conduct of the primitive and Protestant Churches:—"The Catholic Church has always been zealous to disseminate the sacred Scriptures among her children. Witness the fact, that, so early as the fourth century, as St. Augustine testifies, 'the number of those who had translated the Scriptures from the Hebrew, into the Greek, might be computed; but that the number of those who had translated the Greek into the Latin could not be numbered.' At that period, Latin was the language of the western empire." †

A few years ago, in England, in consequence of the misrepresentations of the Papacy, and of others, respecting the English Protestant version, suspicions were awakened respecting its integrity. Charges of numerous and wide departure from the first edition of the translators had been freely circulated. Many letters and pamphlets were published to substantiate these charges. In these circumstances, the authorized printers of the Bible at the University of Oxford published a fac-simile of the first edition of King James's Bible, issued in 1611, in order that it might be compared with modern editions. This copy is prepared with great minuteness, not only as it respects the text, but the orthography, punctuation, and even the embellishments. The Board of Managers of the American Bible Society procured one of these copies, and instituted a rigid comparison between it and the standard copy of the Society. A Committee of supervision was appointed by the Board, consisting of one member from each denomination of Christians connected with the Society. A skilful reader first compared the early and modern copies, word for word, noting all the discrepancies. Professor Bush, the Editor of the Society's publications, having in the library a great variety of Bibles, issued during the last three hundred years, examined these differences, ascertaining where and when these changes were introduced. The Committee, each having a copy of the Bible to be scrutinized before him, then carefully followed the Editor, and tried his investigations. The result was, that the variations existing between the present and early copies of the English Bible consisted in unimportant particulars,—such as capital letters, commas, Italic words, &c., not in any degree affecting the sense. *

* Controversy with Breckenridge, p. 302. † Ibid.

After all the clamours which have been raised against our English version, it still keeps its ground as a good translation, and is far more faithful to the original than the Douay Bible. Nevertheless, Romanists pronounce it a perverted edition,—than which nothing can be more incorrect.

XI. After having given, as we think, sufficient proof of the genuineness, authenticity, and inspiration of the original Scriptures, as well as having answered the objections against our English translation, we may with justice retort upon the Church of Rome, both in regard to the original Scriptures, and their translations from them.

1. The Church of Rome has treated the original Scriptures with great disrespect, in pronouncing the Vulgate to be authentic; so as to be used in all sermons, expositions, and disputations. On this account many Roman Catholics contend, that the Vulgate was dictated by the Holy Spirit; at least, that it was providentially guarded against all error; and, consequently, is of divine authority, and more to be regarded than the original Hebrew and Greek texts. Hence the translation has taken the place of the original; and their translators, instead of adopting the Hebrew and Greek texts, translate the Vulgate when they furnish a quotation in a vernacular language. Sometimes, indeed, when they find the Vulgate notoriously defective, they consult the originals; but, in general, the Vulgate is their original text; so that when they translate, they give us a translation of a translation; by which much of the spirit of the original Scriptures is lost.

2. In reference to the Latin Vulgate I would make a few remarks. Jerome finished his translation A. D. 384. Before his day the old Italic version existed, which was made about the close of the second century; and which was rendered from the Greek of the Seventy, and the Greek New Testament. Jerome's translation was professedly made from the Hebrew and Greek originals, and in process of time was called the Vulgate, or common translation. The Council of Trent pronounced the Vulgate divine. Accordingly, Sixtus V. ordered the various editions to be collected, and published an edition in 1590. The text thus revised, Sixtus pronounced to be the authentic Vulgate, which had been the object of inquiry in the Council of Trent; and denounced, with the greater excommunication, any person who should dare to change the smallest particle, minima particula, and not even to be absolved by the Pope. Notwithstanding the labours of this Pope, this edition was found by Clement VIII. to contain at least two thousand errors. Clement published his edition in 1592, which differs considerably from the Sixtine. When Clement published his own work, he condemned that of Sixtus, and pronounced it incorrect. It is not our intention to misrepresent or depreciate any thing belonging to the Church of Rome. It is therefore due to remark, that though the Latin Vulgate is neither infallible nor inspired, and cannot be compared with the originals, yet it is in general a faithful translation, and sometimes exhibits the sense of the Scriptures with greater accuracy than several modern versions. The Latin Vulgate is by no means to be neglected by the biblical scholar; for even in its present state, notwithstanding the variations between the Sixtine and Clementine editions, and that several passages are mistranslated, in order to support the peculiar dogmas of the Church of Rome, it preserves many true readings, where the modern Hebrew copies are corrupted. For a correct account of the Vulgate, we refer to Horne.* Notwithstanding its excellences, it contains too many errors to be received as the infallible word of God, in the place of the inspired originals.

3. We may here notice the Douay Bible. In the year 1582, the Romanists, finding it impossible to withhold the Scriptures from the common people, printed an English New Testament at Rheims. It was translated, not from the original Greek, but from the Vulgate; and is, therefore, also a translation of a translation. Indeed, the translators laboured to conceal the light of truth, under one pretence or another. The Old Testament was rendered into English, from the Vulgate, at Douay, in 1609. Annotations, also, were subjoined. Both of these form the English Bible, which alone was used by the Romanists who speak English.† Both the notes and version of the Douay Bible are very faulty.

Let us examine some of the translations of the Rhemish Testament. They render Matt. iii. 2, by, "Do penance for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" and thus rendering μετανοειτε, from μετα, signifying change, and νους mind, do penance. The word certainly means a change of mind or disposition, and is very improperly rendered by the words, do penance; for what connexion hath this word with bodily austerities? Again: Heb. xi. 21 is rendered thus: "By faith Jacob, when he was dying, blessed each of the sons of Joseph, and adored the top of his rod." They render the first clause of the second commandment, "Thou shalt not make to thyself a graven thing," instead of "image." And the phrase, "Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them," they render, "Thou shalt not adore them."

After noticing these mistranslations, we refer to some comments. "Confess your sins one to another." (James v. 16.) Upon this text, the Testament, sanctioned by the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Ireland, observes, "That is, to the Priests of the Church, whom he had ordered to be called for, and brought to the sick." Take as specimens the notes in the Rhemish Testament on the following texts:—Matt. x. 41: "He that receiveth a heretic into his house, and a false Preacher, doth communicate with his wicked works." Matt. xiii. 29: "Heretics may be punished and suppressed, and may and ought, by public authority, either spiritual or temporal, to be chastised or executed." Gal. i. 8: Catholics should "not spare their own parents, if heretics." Heb. v. 7: The translators of the Protestant Bible "ought to be abhorred to the depths of hell." Rev. xvii. 6: "But the blood of Protestants is not called the blood of saints, no more than the blood of thieves, man-killers, and other male-

* See Report of the American Bible Society for 1838.

* Introduction to the Critical Study, &c., vol. ii., p. 199, et seq.

† For an account of this version see Horne, ibid., p. 249.

factors; for the shedding of which, by the order of justice, no commonwealth shall answer."*

4. Although the Catholic Church has limited the reading of Scripture to translations made by members of her own communion, which must always be accompanied with notes extracted from the Fathers, or from their approved Divines, she has not fixed on any translation, or even notes, as standards, but leaves this important matter a subject of doubt and dispute. Dr. Poynter, in his examination before the House of Commons, stated this fact. Neither the texts nor the comments, attached to the different editions of the Douay Bible, received the formal approval of the Church of Rome. The original notes of this Bible were the produce of the labours of the Douay Doctors. Dr. Challoner in his edition revised and abridged them; and this underwent a farther emendation in Dr. Troy's edition; all of which are the interpretation of individuals, and not of the Church. Nevertheless, though the Douay Bible has not received the direct authoritative sanction of a Pope or Council; yet, both it and the notes are the result of the Decrees of the Council of Trent, and, therefore, are binding on the conscience of British Roman Catholics until they are repudiated.

5. No Greek edition of the New Testament, or Hebrew edition of the Old, that is, the original Scriptures, has issued from the press of the Vatican. One of the former was projected by Pius V., but countermanded. So little cause has the Church of Rome to boast that she has preserved the holy Scriptures. Indeed, according to the Decrees of the Council of Trent, the original Scriptures are overlooked in the formation of the standard edition.

XII. Difficulties attending the Roman Catholic plan.

Whatever difficulties stand in the way of consulting the Scripture, many more will arise in the way of referring to the records of the Church and of unwritten tradition. To make this appear, let us suppose a Popish Priest attempting the conversion of a Heathen. The Priest tells him that the Church is to expound the word of God, and authoritatively demands his obedience. He will ask, How do you prove that the Church has any such authority? This will be a difficult question. But admitting, for the sake of the argument, that this difficulty is removed, the man will ask, "Which is the true Church, and by what marks can I know it?" The Priest will answer, "By its antiquity, holiness, unity, universality," &c. Now, how can a man discover these marks without exercising that private judgment which the Priest, in all similar cases, condemns? We will suppose him, however, to try the Church by one of them, and he will be told that the antiquity of the Church is one of its distinguished tokens. Here he must plod through ancient history in search of the marks of this antiquity. Suppose him to have made up his mind on this point, we then refer him to sanctity of doctrine. Except he be previously acquainted with theology and divinity, how will he be able to judge concerning this sign? Thus to ascertain these two evidences, he must be acquainted with divinity and general history.

How much more easy and direct is the way which the word of God points out? "Ask, and it shall be given you." (Matt. vii. 7.) "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." (James i. 5.) The man's case is met by the sacred volume. He knows himself to be a sinner; and here he is pointed to the Saviour of sinners, through whom he obtains pardon and peace. He is surrounded by the sorrows of the world; here he finds consolation. He sees himself a dying creature; here he sees death conquered, and life and immortality brought to light. Such a one may not be able to refute all the sophistry of the infidel; but, having the witness in himself, he can confidently trust in the Rock of Ages, and be happy.

* See several specimens in the London Protestant for 1831, p. 51; and also in the Glasgow Protestant. And for proofs of the unwillingness with which the Papists furnished the English Douay Bible, see some extracts from the preface of the Rhemish Testament in the Glasgow Protestant, vol. i., p. 250. See also the notes on the following texts, 1 Tim. iii. 2, 4; Titus i. 6; 1 Cor. ix. 5; 2 Tim. iii. 15—17.

CHAPTER III.

TRADITION.

I. The Doctrine defined. Council of Trent quoted. Bishop Hay quoted. Also Dr. Milner. Protestant views of tradition. —II. Tradition explained. 1. Scriptural use of the word: 2. The traditions approved of in Scripture were delivered by inspired men: 3. All important truths delivered by the Apostles were committed to writing: 4. The doctrines of the heathen philosophers were called traditions: 5. The traditions of the Jews.—III. Traditions of the Church of Rome examined. 1. What they mean by tradition: 2. Examination of the Scripture texts brought for their support. Traditions of the Corinthians and Thessalonians. "They that hear you, hear me," &c., Rom. xvi. 17; John xvi. 12: 3. Their argument from unwritten law: 4. Patriarchal traditions examined: 5. Propagation of the Gospel by preaching, instead of writing, considered.—IV. Arguments against Oral Tradition. 1. The Scriptures are against it: 2. Oral tradition, in its nature, is uncertain and changeable, and cannot be a rule of faith: 3. Some traditions, claiming to be apostolical, are false, and others apocryphal: 4. Some are contrary to each other, and to Scripture: 5. Some traditions are become obsolete: 6. The Church of Rome has invented many new ones: 7. In point of clearness they present more difficulties than Scripture: 8. They are attended with pernicious effects: 9. Romanists are discordant in their sentiments respecting tradition: (1.) Some make them equal to Scripture; (2.) Others say they are inferior to Scripture; (3.) Others make them superior to Scripture; (4.) Discordant sentiments on tradition entertained by the Divines of Trent.—V. Whether Protestants receive some Things on the Authority of Tradition, and therefore they ought to receive others. 1. Scripture does not depend on tradition: 2. Nor the baptism of infants: 3. Nor the observance of the Christian Sabbath: 4. Nor the procession of the Holy Spirit: 5. Nor eating of blood: 6. Nor the divinity of Christ.—VI. Of Written Traditions.—VII. Testimony of the Ancient Fathers. 1. Preliminary remarks. Character of the Fathers. Weight of their testimony. Nature of the first traditions: 2. Fathers of the second century. Ignatius: 3. Fathers of the third century. Irenæus. Tertullian. Clemens of Alexandria. Origen. Cyprian: 4. Fathers of the fourth century. Hippolitus. Eusebius Pamphilus. Athanasius. Ambrose. Hilary. Gregory Nyssen. Cyril of Jerusalem: 5 Fathers of the fifth century. Chrysostom. Theophilus Alexandrinus. Jerome. Augustine. Cyril of Alexandria. Theodoret: 6. Fathers of the sixth century. Anastasius Sinaita. John Damascene.

I. As we have already observed, we quote the acknowledged standard authorities of the Church of Rome, in stating what their doctrines are. The authentic Decree of the Council of Trent,* already quoted in the article on Scripture, embraced also the subject of tradition. The Council, speaking of the Gospel as preached by Christ and his Apostles, says, that it was contained in written books, and in unwritten traditions. It then states, in regard to traditions, that "they have come down to us, either received by the Apostles from the lips of Christ himself, or transmitted, by the hands of the same Apostles, under the dictation of the Holy Spirit; that these traditions relate both to faith and morals, have been preserved in the Catholic Church by continual succession, are to be received with equal piety and veneration (pari pietatis affectu ac reverentiâ) with Scripture, and whosoever shall knowingly and deliberately despise these traditions is accursed." The Council here betrays its usual ambiguity; for it does not say how these traditions were preserved and transmitted down to the present time. The same uncertainty is noticed in placing tradition on the same footing with Scripture; for as this of itself has no certain meaning, unless as explained by the Church, tradition is left in a vague, undetermined sense, liable to such constructions as she, at any time, may see fit to impose.

* Decretum de Canonicis Scripturis, Sess. iv.

To show still more clearly the doctrine of tradition as held by the Church of Rome, we quote some of her authorized writers. Bishop Hay holds the following language on this subject:—"QUES. What is meant by tradition? ANS. The handing down, from one generation to another, whether by word of mouth, or by writings, those truths revealed by Jesus Christ to his Apostles, which either are not at all contained in the holy Scriptures, or at least are not clearly contained in them. Q. What is the principle upon which tradition proceeds? A. It is the laying down, as an invariable rule, to be observed in every generation, firmly to adhere to the doctrine received from the preceding generation, and carefully to commit the same to the succeeding generation, without addition or diminution." * Dr. Milner asserts, that the Roman Catholic rule of faith is "Scripture and tradition, and these propounded and explained by the Catholic Church. This implies that we have a twofold rule or law; and that we have an interpreter or Judge to explain it, and to decide upon it in all doubtful points."† Speaking of the preaching of the Apostles, he says that Christ "inspired some of them and their disciples to write CERTAIN PARTS of these doctrines and precepts; namely, the canonical Gospels and Epistles." ‡ In his eleventh Letter he says, "The Catholic rule is the whole word of God, together with her living authority in explaining it: for while this rule and this authority are acknowledged, there can be no heresy or schism among Christians; as whatever points of religion are not clear from Scripture, are supplied and illustrated by tradition; and as the Pastors of the Church, who possess this authority, are always living and ready to declare what is the sense of Scripture, and what the traditions, on each contested point, which they have received in succession from the Apostles."§ Dr. Milner also says, "The first part of this rule conducts us to the second part; that is to say, tradition conducts us to Scripture."

Protestants both acknowledge and maintain, that the Gospel was first proclaimed by word of mouth, and then set down in writing; and that the church of Christ, in all succeeding ages, was bound, not only to preserve these writings delivered to her, but also to deliver to her children, and to the world, by word of mouth, the form of wholesome words contained therein. When, therefore, Romanists boast that the commission of preaching and teaching was specially given to the Apostles, they cannot claim more, nor even as much as the Protestant Ministers can, who so far excel them both in preaching and teaching the truths of religion. Traditions, therefore, of this nature, namely, of preserving the Scriptures, and preaching the Gospel, come not within the compass of our dispute. Again: in this controversy we speak of doctrines delivered as the word of God, and not of rites and ceremonies left to the disposal of the Church. Traditions, therefore, of this kind are not embraced in this controversy. But that the traditions of men should be obtruded upon us for articles of religion, or for parts of God's worship; or that any traditions at all should be accepted for portions of God's word besides the holy Scriptures, and such doctrines as are contained in them; we have reason to gainsay. "In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." (Matt. xv. 9.)

II. We shall first examine those traditions which are sanctioned by the word of God, and afterward those which it condemns.

1. To ascertain the scriptural use of the term tradition, the following observations are offered. The word tradition, from the Latin traditio, means something delivered by word of mouth, without written memorials; or any thing delivered orally from age to age. But the Greek word παραδοσις, for which the word tradition is used as a translation, is of more extensive signification, and means "precept," "instruction," "ordinance," delivered either orally or in writing. The compound root of this word is παραδιδωμι, "to deliver from one to another," "to deliver down," and is from παρα, "down," and διδωμι, "to give," "to extend," or "to deliver from one to another."

It is worthy of remark, that the inspired writers received their knowledge of the doctrines of the Gospel, not by the operation of reasoning, but by the inspiration of God: they were consequently instructed to publish them, not as the conclusions of reason, but as a revelation from above. St. Paul, therefore, says, that he received them, and delivered them AS he received them. For these terms evidently imply, that he neither discovered them by reasoning, nor established them by reasoning. Thus: "I have received of the Lord that which also I DELIVERED" (παρεδωκα) "unto you, that the Lord Jesus, the same night in which he was betrayed, took bread." (1 Cor. xi. 23.) "For I DELIVERED unto you first of all that which I also RECEIVED, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." (1 Cor. xv. 3.) Therefore, because the Apostles received the doctrines of the Gospel from Christ by revelation, and delivered them to the world as revelations from him, they are fitly called παραδοσεις, "traditions," or "things delivered," from παραδιδωμι, "to deliver from one to another," "to deliver down." Wherefore, when Paul commended the Corinthians for holding fast the traditions as he delivered them, (1 Cor. xi. 2,) and commanded the Thessalonians to hold fast the traditions which they had been taught, whether by his word or his Epistle, (2 Thess. ii. 15,) it is plain he did not mean doctrines which others delivered verbally as from him, which is the Popish sense of traditions, but those doctrines of revelation which he had himself delivered to them, whether by word or by writing. The word tradition is, therefore, common to things written and unwritten, to things delivered by word of mouth, and by epistle. And παραδοσις, "tradition," is the same with δογμα, "a doctrine;" and παραδιδοναι, "to deliver down," is the same with διδασκειν, "to teach," as grammarians say. The παραδοθεισα πιστις, "the faith delivered," in Jude, is the same with the "traditions which ye were taught," mentioned by St. Paul. Therefore, the whole Christian faith is a tradition. (Jude 3.) The doctrine of Christ's

* The Sincere Christian instructed in the Faith of Christ, vol. i., p. 160. Dublin.

† End of Controversy, Letter x., p. 53.

‡ Ibid., Letter x., p. 55.

§ Ibid., Letter xi., p. 62.

death, burial, and resurrection is a tradition; παρεδωκα γαρ, "for I delivered" these doctrines, saith St. Paul, (1 Cor. xv. 3,) and certainly these form the great subject of the New Testament. Irenæus calls it a tradition, that "Christ took the cup," and said, it was his blood; and 'to believe in one God, and in Christ who was born of a virgin, was the old tradition."*

2. The traditions approved of in Scripture are only such as were taught by the inspired writers. St. Paul delivered them to the Corinthians: that "you keep the ordinances" (traditions) "as I delivered them to you." (1 Cor. xi. 2.) The same Apostle, and his associates, delivered to the Thessalonians, by word and Epistle, the traditions, or doctrines, of Christ. (2 Thess. ii. 15; iii. 6.) Whenever we have sufficient evidence that other doctrines were delivered by the inspired writers than those contained in their writings, we will cordially receive them. But as for the traditions said to be delivered by other persons, either in the apostolical age, or since that period, of which we have no account in Scripture, except a positive command against receiving them, we must reject all such from having any part in our religious creed. The Church of Rome cannot adduce a single article of religion, or ordinance of worship, which she has derived from oral tradition, that is not contrary to, or inconsistent with, some part of the written word. Therefore it cannot be of God; for it is impious to say he has commanded his servants to teach one thing with their pen, and a contrary thing with their mouth.

There are three kinds of tradition spoken of in Scripture: namely, the traditions of men, which St. Paul condemns, (Col. ii. 8,) and also our Lord; (Mark vii. 9;) there were also traditions touching things indifferent, or those which were of a temporary or local nature, such as the frequency of communion, the temporary ordinance respecting marriage given to the Corinthians; and, finally, traditions by inspiration, which were first communicated orally, were afterward committed to writing, and are now comprised in the New Testament.

3. Besides, we have no reason to doubt, that every thing delivered by the Apostles of any importance was committed to writing. And although, when St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians and to the Thessalonians, he mentions the traditions that were formerly delivered to them by word or Epistle, we have no account in Scripture, that any important truths were omitted either by the Evangelists themselves, or by the other writers of the New Testament. That the word which St. Paul preached was afterward written by St. Luke, we learn from undoubted history, or tradition. This is recorded by Irenæus and Eusebius in the following words:—"But Luke, the follower of Paul, wrote in a book the Gospel which was preached by Paul."† Irenæus says in the same chapter, that "the Gospel which the Apostles preached, afterward, by the will of God, they delivered to us in the Scriptures, that it might be the foundation and pillar of our faith."‡ It was a tradition still, not in its modern and ecclesiastical sense, but in its primitive and natural acceptation. Nor were those things which were written done by accident, as some Roman Catholics say; they were written under the immediate providence of God, so as to be entitled to as much credit as if Christ had written them with his own hand, as is declared by Augustine in the following words:—"For as many of his actions and sayings as Christ wished us to read, these he commanded to be written in a book, as if it were by his own hands. For this common bond of unity, and harmonious ministry of the members, in different offices, under one head, each should understand, and should receive the narratives of Christ's disciples in the Gospel no otherwise than if he saw the very hand of Christ writing it, which was attached to his own body."* How strange is it that Roman Catholic Divines, such as Milner, Hughes, &c., will assert that Christ never commanded the New Testament to be written, when at the same time they profess great reverence for Augustine and Irenæus, and many other Fathers, who declare that Christ did positively command his followers to write the New Testament!

We cannot reasonably suppose that the Evangelists would pretend to write the history of Jesus Christ, and while they insert many things more than necessary, omit others, and yet call it the Gospel of Jesus Christ. But when the four Evangelists, the Acts, Epistles, and the Apocalypse are collected, it is altogether improbable that this should not be the whole Gospel.

4. The doctrines of the heathen philosophers seem to go by the name of tradition. "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ." (Col. ii. 8.) It was called "the tradition of men," because it was received solely on the authority of the Teacher who delivered it. Hence arose the maxim, so famed among the ancient philosophers, Αυτος εφη, Ipse dixit, "The master said it." Traditions of this kind are condemned by the word of God; and yet a large number of them are maintained by the Church of Rome. They are truly traditions of men.

5. We have an account in the Gospels (Matt. xv. 1—10; Mark vii. 1—13) of the traditions of the Jews, who believed that with the written law there was communicated the oral or the unwritten law; that this oral law was given to the Elders of Israel, and that they delivered it to their posterity. Let us examine what our Lord says respecting the Jewish, and then draw the parallel between them and the Popish, traditions. (1.) They endeavoured to exalt them, calling them the traditions of the Elders or the Fathers who sat in Moses' seat. The Latins will have theirs also to be apostolical, as emanating from the Fathers and Popes who sat in St. Peter's chair. (2.) Yet our Lord calls them the "commandments of men," the traditions of the Pharisees and Scribes. The traditions of Rome are, it is true, the commandments of the church; but they are human commands, not divine, not given by inspiration of God, and, therefore, destitute of divine authority. (3.) The Pharisees laid aside, rejected, and made of none effect the

* "Veterem traditionem diligenter custodientes, in unum Deum credentes fabricatorem cæli et terræ et omnium quæ in eis sunt, per Christum Jesum Dei Filium."—Irenæus, adversus Hæres., lib. iii., c. 4, p. 172. Folio edit., 1570.

† "Lucas autem, sectator Pauli, quod ab illo prædicabatur Evangelium, in libro condidit."—Λεκας ὁ ακολουθος Παυλε, το ὑπ' εκεινε κηρυσσομενον εναγγελιον εν Βιβλιῳ κατεθετο.—Eus. Hist. Eccl., lib. v., c. 8.

‡ "Evangelium quidem tunc præconiaverunt, postea vero per Dei voluntatem in Scripturis nobis tradiderunt, fundamentum et columnam fidei nostræ futurum."—Irenæus adversus Hæres., lib. iii., c. 1, p. 169. Edit., 1570.

* "Quicquid enim ille de suis factis et dictis nos legere voluit, hoc scribendum illis tanquam suis manibus imperavit. Hoc unitatis consortium et in diversis officiis concordium membrorum sub uno capite ministerium, quisquis intellexerit, non aliter accipiet quod narrantibus discipulis Christi in Evangelio legerit, quam si ipsam manum Domini, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, scribentem conspexerit."—Augustini Opera, tom. iv. De Consensu Evangelist., lib. i., cap. 35. Fol. Basil. 1541.

commandments of God by their traditions. This is done by the Romanists. (4.) By traditions the Pharisees teach in the place of doctrines, that is, divine truths, human inventions, such as the washing of hands, cups, pots, &c. The Romanists have many ecclesiastical constitutions, rites, and ceremonies, which are only the traditions of their Elders, or those who sit in St. Peter's chair, and which, like those of old, make void the commandments of God; such as the worship of images, communion in one kind, prayers in an unknown tongue, &c. It is granted that suitable ceremonies may properly be used in the church of Christ; but then they should not be considered as necessary, but as things indifferent; not used for sanctification, but only for order and decency; not computed as parts, but only as circumstances of worship.

III. We shall now examine the character of the traditions sanctioned by the Church of Rome, by which they are made equal with the word, and which pronounces an anathema on all who reject them.

1. The simple statement of what Romanists mean by tradition might be sufficient to convince any persons of common sense, of the folly of depending upon them. It consists of certain doctrines and precepts which Christ and his Apostles are said to have spoken, but which were not committed to writing, having been delivered from age to age by word of mouth, and having come down to us as pure as the written word contained in the Gospels and in the Epistles. Some of their Doctors assert that the knowledge of Christianity might have been preserved and propagated in the world, even had the New Testament never been written.

2. We examine those passages of Scripture which are brought to authorize unwritten tradition.

We are aware that this kind of tradition is not authorized by St. Paul in his Epistles to the Corinthians and to the Thessalonians, although there are passages in them which are quoted with great confidence. In addition to what has been said respecting the traditions held by the Churches at Corinth and Thessalonica, we may observe, that the traditions referred to were originally delivered to these Churches. We may therefore ask, How and at what time did they come into the possession of the Church at Rome? And by what means did the latter assure herself that they were the same instructions which the Apostle delivered by divine inspiration? Moreover, were the Churches of Corinth and Thessalonica infallible? That they were not so, is obvious from the former having erred respecting the eucharist, and the latter concerning the day of judgment. The Church of Rome having received these traditions (if she have received them) through such channels, is a fact which is of itself sufficient to prevent us from giving to traditions an equal authority with the Scriptures. But admitting these traditions to have been received by the Church at Rome, what evidence have we that they have been faithfully preserved, and without alteration transmitted to us? Would the Church of Rome have us to receive religious doctrines and ordinances, professedly delivered about eighteen hundred years ago, and which were conveyed by oral tradition, with the same confidence as that with which we receive the holy Scriptures?

Another argument for tradition is taken from Christ's command to all men to hear his Apostles: "He that heareth you, heareth me;" and, "If he refuse to hear the church," &c. It is granted that all are bound to hear what the Apostles have said; but this has very little to do with what others have said, or may even yet say; and Popish tradition consists entirely of what other men have said. We deny that the Apostles taught what is embraced in Romish traditions; and the proof is to be given by those who hold them. But they cannot prove the genuineness of a single sentence which is ascribed to Christ and his Apostles, beyond that which we have in the New Testament. We have shown that the command to hear the church means no such thing as that which the Church of Rome attempts to deduce from it.

A passage from the Epistle to the Romans is quoted in favour of traditions, where the Apostle says, "Mark them that cause offences contrary" (not to the Scriptures, but) "to the doctrines they had received." (Rom. xvi. 17.) But to make this argument of any force, it must be proved that this doctrine which they had received was not contained in Scripture, either then or afterward. St. Paul speaks of doctrines received from the mouth of the Apostles by the Romans; and when the unwritten traditions of the Church of Rome are proved to have been uttered by them, and enjoined as doctrines, Protestants will doubtless cordially receive them.

In favour of tradition the following text is also adduced: "I have many things to say to you, but you cannot bear them now." (John xvi. 12.) But then it is added, "When he, the Spirit of truth, shall come, he will teach you all truth." Accordingly the Holy Spirit was afterward given to them; and the different parts of the New Testament were written, which contained all truth necessary for the edification of the Christian church.

3. Dr. Milner argues in favour of tradition from the lex non scripta of England. "All written laws necessarily suppose the existence of unwritten laws, and, indeed, depend on them for their force and authority. Not to run into the depths of ethics and metaphysics on this subject, you know, dear sir, that in this kingdom (England) we have common or unwritten law, and statute or written law, both of them binding; but that the former necessarily precedes the latter."* To this we reply, that the case is not properly parallel. We must, in religion, have recourse to Scripture, which existed many ages before either England or the United States made any figure among the nations of the world. We might, however, ask, whether the law of the Ten Commandments, written on tables of stone on Mount Sinai, necessarily supposed the existence of another law, prior to it, but not written, and upon which this written law depended for its force and authority? The argument, then, for the lex non scripta of the Romish Church can find no foundation in common law; especially when the principal traditions maintained in the Roman Catholic Church are either contrary to the Scripture, or embraced in the Scripture, or not found in it at all. And if we are told, that the Patriarchs lived under the authority of the lex non scripta, or unwritten law, this will avail nothing, unless it be proved that this law was different from that of Moses.

4. Accordingly we are told, that the faithful had nothing but tradition to guide them for above two thousand years, that is, from Adam to Moses. Dr. Milner's words are, "It is then certain that the whole doctrine and practice of religion, including the rites of sacrifice, and indeed the whole sacred history, were preserved by the Patriarchs in succession from Adam to Moses, during the space of two thousand and four hundred years, by means of tradition: and when the law was written, many most important truths regarding a future life, the emblems and prophecies concerning the Messiah, and the inspiration and authenticity of the sacred books themselves, were preserved in the same way."* To this we reply, (1.) The principles of religion during the antediluvian ages were very few, and, therefore, were easily transmitted and remembered. (2.) It is not true, that all or any of the Patriarchs had to depend upon mere tradition, in the Romish sense of that word. The Patriarchs had direct communication with God; and what he revealed to them, and what they imparted to their families, was not human tradition, but divine revelation, and which served the purposes of inspired teaching until the law and the testimony were written. (3.) Supposing the truths of religion, in the patriarchal ages, had been matters of mere tradition, they passed through so few hands that they might have been preserved to the time of Moses, among a few Patriarchs, without any great admixture of error. Methuselah was contemporary with Adam and Shem, and the latter lived at the same time with Isaac, so that the whole narrative of the creation, and the promises of redemption, came down to the family of Jacob through four hands only; whereas no apostolical tradition can come down to us, without having passed through upwards of fifty generations. (4.) But we do not admit, that the family of Jacob received the knowledge of God by tradition, even through hands so few and so clean. God revealed his will to Enoch, to Noah, to Abraham, and to Jacob himself, who were all inspired men; for they are called, in the Psalms, Prophets. (Psalm cv. 15.) (5.) Moreover, the example of both Patriarchal and Jewish times is utterly destructive of Popish traditions. For notwithstanding the doctrines of religion in the first ages of the world, all flesh had corrupted his way; and even posterior to the flood, for want of written documents, the doctrines of religion were either corrupted, or lost, or superseded by the degenerating influence of tradition. The Jews also, by their traditions, transgressed the commandments of God, and rendered them of none effect. The history of the Patriarchs and of the Jews proves to us, that the word which has been written by inspired men, does not depend for its meaning and for its authority upon the unwritten word, which has come to us through ages of gross darkness, and through hands polluted with every crime.

* End of Controversy, Letter x., p. 54. Eighth edit.

5. We are informed by the Roman Catholics, "that the Gospel was first propagated by preaching, and not by the written word, and that the church had to depend for two or three centuries on instructions communicated by word of mouth, and that this was the only way in which barbarous nations did, or can now, receive the Gospel." To this we reply, the Protestants acknowledge, that the Gospel was first declared by word of mouth, and that barbarous nations, unable to read, are to be instructed in that manner. But when we concede this, we yield nothing in favour of Popish traditions. In the primitive church, there were two cases in which they were used. One was, when the Scriptures had not been written or communicated, as among divers nations of the barbarians. The other case was, when they disputed with heretics who received not the whole Scriptures, such as the Carpocratians, of whom Irenæus speaks.† In these cases, tradition was urged by the Fathers, as Antonius Marinarius, a Carmelite Friar, wisely said, "The Fathers served themselves of this topic only in case of necessity, never thinking to make use of it in competition against holy Scripture." Those who had received the Scriptures among the first Christians, relied upon them; they that had not received them, were to use tradition and the argument from succession, in order to prove that their doctrine was derived from the Apostles; that is, they would call witnesses where they could not prove a will by writing. The Romanists now assume the same ground which these ancient heretics occupied. The heretics said, "Jesus in mystery said to his disciples and Apostles some things in secret and apart, because they were worthy."* So Bellarmine: "They preached not to the people all things, but those which were necessary to them, or profitable; but other things they delivered apart to the more perfect."† Thus the pretence of the old heretics and modern Roman Catholics is precisely the same.

IV. Arguments against oral tradition.

1. The Scripture overturns the authority of oral tradition. St. Peter says, "Moreover I will endeavour that you may be able after my decease to have these things always in remembrance." (2 Peter i. 15.) St. Peter was not of opinion that oral tradition was better than writing to preserve the memory of these things; or, that without writing they might be preserved. Moses was commanded to write the Pentateuch: the Prophets afterward committed to writing their revelations. The Evangelists and the writers of the New Testament did the same. We have, therefore, the examples of inspired men, and the command of God, to commit to writing the communications of his will to man.

2. Besides, oral tradition in its very nature is so uncertain and changeable, as not to be capable of becoming a rule of faith. Common sense dictates, that tradition, after any lapse of time, having gone through many hands naturally unsettled and variable, must be altered, extended, or diminished, since these changes happen in process of time to all things; and thus it would become too vague to regulate the conduct of men. The following quotation from one of our English Divines will place this in a strong light:—"Suppose but the easiest common story were to be told from one person to another, without being written down for only one hundred or two hundred years, and let each person as he received it have never so strict a charge to tell it in the same manner; yet, long before the end of that time, what security could we possibly have that it was true at first and unaltered still? And you cannot but see there is much less security that a considerable number of doctrines, especially such as compose the Popish creed, should be brought down safe for seventeen hundred [eighteen hundred] years together, through so many millions of hands, that were all liable, through ignorance, forgetfulness, and superstition, to mistake them, or through knavery or design to alter them.

"But it will be said, in a case of such importance

* End of Controversy, Letter xi., p. 70.

† Irenæus adversus Hæreses, lib. i., cap. i., xxiv., pp. 34, 79, et seq. Edit. 1570.

* "Jesum dicentes in mysterio discipulis suis et apostolis seorsum locutum, et illos expostulasse, ut dignis et assentientibus, seorsum hæc traderent, per fidem enim et charitatem salvari."—Irenæus adversus Hæres., lib. i., c. xxiv., p. 81. Edit. fol. 1570.

† ["His notatis, dico, illa omnia scripta esse ab Apostolis, quæ sunt omnibus necessaria, et quæ ipsi palàm omnibus vulgò prædicaverant: alia autem non omnia scripta esse. Cum igitur Irenæus ait, Apostolos scripsisse quæ prædicaverunt in mundo, verum est, et non contra traditiones, quia non prædicaverunt populis omnia, sed solum ea, quæ illis necessaria vel utilia erant; cætera seorsim perfectioribus tradiderunt."—Bellarm. Disput., tom. i., De Verbo Dei non scripto, lib. iv., cap. 11. Edit. Paris., 1608.—EDIT.]

as religion, men would be more careful in delivering truth than in others. Undoubtedly they ought: but who can be secure that they would? It is of equal importance to be careful in practising it too; yet we all know how this hath been neglected in the world: and, therefore, have reason to think the other hath been no less so.

"But whoever made the first change, they say, must have been immediately discovered. Now so far from this, that persons make changes in what they relate without discovering it themselves; alterations come in by insensible degrees: one man leaves out, or varies, or adds one little circumstance; the next another; till it grow imperceptibly into a different thing. In one age a doctrine is delivered as a probable opinion; the following age speaks of it as certain truth; and the third advances it into an article of faith. Perhaps an opposition rises upon this, as many have done. Some have said such a doctrine was delivered to them, others that it was not: and who can tell whether at last the right side or the wrong have prevailed? Only this is certain, that whichsoever prevails, though by a small majority at first, will use all means of art and power to make it appear an universal consent at last; and then plead uninterrupted tradition. But though such things as these may possibly be done in almost any age, yet they are easy to be done in such ages as were five or six of those that preceded the Reformation; when, by the confession of their own historians, both Clergy and laity were so universally and so monstrously ignorant and vicious, that nothing was too bad for them to do, or too absurd for them to believe."*

It is not doubted, that the morals of the priesthood were exceedingly corrupt before the Reformation. Now, suppose it were admitted, that tradition contained nothing but sound doctrine for an age or two after the Apostles, it must, almost necessarily, have become corrupt, when taken up and transmitted by such vicious men. They could not have been the means of preserving, and also the medium of communicating, holy doctrines and precepts, by which they condemned men, and which they must have abhorred. Whatever came in contact with them must have been defiled. It may be admitted that, by the increase and diffusion of knowledge, the character of the Priests of the present day is not so bad as it was formerly, at least in Protestant countries; but allowing this to be so, nothing is gained in favour of oral tradition, as the corruption of which we speak took place before the present race of Priests had an existence.

There is considerable uncertainty arising from the manner in which the Church of Rome propounds and explains her traditions. She is very backward in communicating information with regard to those particular doctrines and ordinances which she has received from that source. So far as we are aware, there is no publication which contains a summary of what this Church believes under the head of tradition. It may be any thing, or it may be nothing, for what we can tell; the very writing of it would destroy it as a matter of oral tradition; and therefore no one can possibly tell what their tradition is. Lay individuals in the Church of Rome must receive it from the lips of the Priest. Tradition, in fact, is what the Church propounds; and as this is too large a body to state any thing otherwise than by the mouth of its official organ, every Priest is the exhibiter of what he considers the traditions of the Church. Thus there may be as many traditions as Priests, all contradicting one another; for there is no established standard to which any appeal can be made. But the Catholic Church, that is, the Priests, are not only the propounders, they are also the explainers of both the written and unwritten word; and neither Scripture nor tradition is to be considered the rule of faith, otherwise than as exhibited and explained by them. Let the articles of tradition be ever so contradictory, the explanation of a Priest can reconcile them with the utmost ease.

After all, if there be any doctrines of faith or morals which are not contained in Scripture, and yet were preached by the Apostles, let that fact be proved, let the traditions be produced, and let sufficient credible and authentic records be forthcoming, and we will receive them.

It will be contended, by the advocates of oral tradition, that it is preserved incorrupt by the Church, which is itself superintended and aided for this purpose by the Holy Spirit. But if we can show that many of the Popish traditions are false and apocryphal, that others of them are contradictory to each other and to Scripture, that many ancient ones have been disused, and many new ones invented, it will afford us sufficient reason for rejecting them. All this we can do.

3. Some of the most ancient traditions, claiming to be apostolical, are manifestly false; and others are apocryphal, that is, of uncertain origin, and of doubtful authority.

Some usages or traditions that are truly apostolical are difficult, and indeed impossible, to be distinguished from those which are apocryphal. From the first rise of Christianity, heretics observed, as may be seen in Irenæus, that "what they had were the sacred mysteries which the Apostles taught, not to all in common, but to the perfect in particular."* Papias himself, as Eusebius testifies, had made "a collection of fables and new doctrines, under the title of unwritten traditions, which he had learned from the mouths of those who had seen the Apostles, and had conversed familiarly with them." †

Many were evidently false. Irenæus speaks of a certain tradition which had passed current in his time in Asia, as coming immediately from the Apostle John; namely, that Christ taught after his fortieth year; which is now held to be false by all chronologers.‡ Papias,

* Archbishop Secker's First Sermon on Popery. Sermons, vol. vi., pp. 301, 302. Edit. 1771.

* ["Etenim si recondita mysteria scissent Apostoli, quæ seorsim et latenter ab reliquis perfectos docebant, his vel maxime traderent ea quibus etiam ipsas ecclesias committebant, valde enim perfectos et irreprehensibiles in omnibus eos volebant esse, quos et successores relinquebant, suum ipsorum locum magisterii tradentes, quibus emendatè agentibus fieret magna utilitas, lapsis autem summa calamitas."—Irenæus adversus Hæres., lib. iii., cap. 3. Edit. 1570.—EDIT.]

† ["Et statuerunt duos, Joseph qui vocabatur Barsabas, qui cognominatus est Justus, et Matthiam. Et orantes dixerunt, Idem præterea scriptor alia nonnulla nudæ vocis traditione ad se pervenisse testatur, novas quasdam scilicet Servatoris parabolas ac prædicationes aliaque fabulis propiora. Inter quæ et mille annorum spatium post corporum resurrectionem fore dicit, quo regnum Christi corporaliter stet in orbe terrarum. Quæ quidem ita opinatus esse videtur Papias ex male intellectis Apostolorum narrationibus cum ea quæ arcano quodam sensu et exempli causa ab illis dicebantur, non satis pervidisset. Fuit enim mediocri admodùm ingenio præditus, ut non scriptis illius conjicere licet: plerisque tamen post ipsum ecclesiasticis scriptoribus ejusdem erroris occasionem præbuit, hominis vetustate sententiam suam tuentibus: puta Irenæo, et si quis alius ejusdem opinionis fautor extitit."—Eusebius, Eccles. Hist., lib. iii., c. 39. Edit. Gr. et Lat. Paris., 1678. Folio.—EDIT.]

‡ "Quia autem triginta annorum ætas primæ indolis est juvenis, et extenditur usque ad quadragesimum annum, omnis quilibet con

Bishop of Hierapolis, in the beginning of the second century, inculcated the doctrine of the millennium,—that our Saviour was to live and reign a thousand years upon the earth, as an undoubted truth. Irenæus, who received this doctrine from Papias, undertook to give the very words of Christ in proof of it; and almost all the orthodox Fathers, according to Justin Martyr, embraced it. Many other instances might be adduced, were it necessary.

4. Some traditions are contradictory to each other, and to Scripture. "The Churches of Asia who have the feast of Easter celebrated precisely on the fourteenth day of the moon's age, after the vernal equinox, boast, for that purpose, of the tradition of St. John and St. Philip; and the rest of the Church hold, on the contrary, by apostolical tradition also, that it ought to be celebrated on the Sunday of our Lord's resurrection. The Greeks, Nestorians, Abyssines, Latins, Armenians, have their contrary traditions; for tradition changes its face and form, according as the nation changes: one sort hold for a tradition, the necessity of three immersions in baptism, and that of the use of leavened bread in the sacrament of the eucharist; and the other mock at it, and reject it: the one sort believe a purgatory by tradition; the others believe it not: the one by tradition circumcise their children; the others hold that practice in horror, as being a relic of Judaism: the one sort fast by tradition upon the Saturday; the rest have that fasting in execration: one sort by tradition sacrifice lambs at this day, after the manner of the Jews; the rest detest that custom. Who can say justly, in so great a confusion, 'This is apostolical, and this is not so?'

5. "Moreover, there are a great many ancient traditions, which public use heretofore authorized, and which time has so abolished, that there remains not the least shadow of them among the Latins: as that of not baptizing, without a case of necessity, but only at the solemn feasts of Easter and Whitsuntide; of giving of milk and honey to the baptized; of administering the eucharist to little children after baptism; of praying standing upon the Lord's day, and from Easter till Whitsuntide; of celebrating the communion on the evening of fast-days; of every one's carrying home with him a piece of the bread of the communion; of distributing the cup to all the faithful communicants; of receiving the communion not on one's knees, but standing; of mutually kissing one another before the communion; and divers others, which the Latins have abrogated.

6. "On the other side, how many Latin traditions are there which the use of the Church of Rome authorizes at this day, of which we cannot find the least trace in the primitive church, and which from thence visibly discover themselves to be new, and by consequence false, and not apostolical! as the worshipping of images; invocation of saints; transubstantiation; adoration of the host; use of altars; that of lights or tapers; masses without any communion; the divine service in a tongue not understood by the people; the sovereign authority of the Church of Rome over all other Churches; auricular confession; the number of the seven sacraments; and as many more, that the primitive church, which came nearest to the Apostles, never knew, as we have often proved, —from whence it follows, that they are not apostolical, and descending from that only and last revelation, without which there is no word of God. There is, therefore, nothing more improper to be the rule of faith, than that pretended tradition which is not established upon any certain foundation, which serves for a pretence to heretics, which is embraced pro and con, which changes according as times and places do, and by the favour of which they may defend the greatest absurdities, by merely saying that they are the traditions which the Apostles transmitted from their own mouths to their successors."*

7. Traditions present many more difficulties than the Scriptures, both in respect to clearness and to certainty. "All the intricate perplexity" which the Romanists pretend "to find in the way of the Scripture, falls back again upon the way of tradition, when they would by this, without the aid of the Scripture, be fully satisfied concerning the authority of the Church of Rome. It is necessary to discern a true tradition from a false one; it is necessary to consult the originals; it is necessary to know the different ways of reading passages; it is necessary to search out the meaning with great diligence; it is necessary to examine the like expressions, and contrary passages; it is necessary to see divers interpretations of both sides; it is necessary to know why the Roman Church distinguishes between points which every faithful man is bound to believe with a distinct faith, and those which it is enough to believe upon the faith of the Church; it is necessary to examine that which each sect, that does not acknowledge the Roman Church, says against her; and, after all that, it is necessary that every one should mistrust his own eyes, and the defects of his memory, and that he should be always recollecting his first thoughts, to keep himself from passing a wrong judgment.

"In fine, we will also demand, whether they would not give the Scripture this honour,—to reckon it for one part of tradition, since it contains the first sermons of the Apostles; from whence we may draw a great deal of light for the deciding of the question upon which we are, which is that of the authority and infallibility of the Church of Rome. For how can any man rationally determine himself, upon a point of that weight, without consulting the first and the most ancient piece of tradition? But that being so, we see here how we are fallen back into the difficulties and perplexities which they pretend to be unconquerable." †

Nor can the Church of Rome boast that her traditions have preserved her from controversy, since even these have been the subject of sharp and protracted dispute. The supremacy of the Pope, the sacrifice of the mass, images, the time of keeping Easter, the immaculate conception, infant communion, &c., have long agitated her community.

Furthermore, Romanists are not agreed about the competency of the testimony, or what is sufficient to prove tradition to be apostolical. Some think that the testimony of the present Catholic Church is sufficient, others do not. Thus confusion and uncertainty surround them: we will give one important instance of this. Those who support the doctrine of the immaculate conception allege, that they have the consent of nearly the universal Church, fitebitur, a quadragesimo aut quinquagesimo anno declinat jam in ætatem seniorem, quam habens Dominus noster docebat, sicut Evangelium et omnes seniores testantur, qui in Asia apud Joannem discipulum Domini convenerunt, idipsum tradidisse eis Joannem. Permansit autem cum eis usque ad Trajani tempora. Quidam autem eorum non solum Joannem, sed et alios apostolos viderunt, et hæc eadem ab ipsis audierunt, et testantur de hujusmodi relatione."—Irenæus adversus Hæres., lib. ii., cap. xxxix., p. 138. Edit. 1570 and of all Universities, especially that of Paris, where no man was admitted to be Master in Theology, unless he bound himself by oath to maintain that doctrine. On the other hand, Cajetan brings the irrefragable testimony of fifteen Fathers against it; others bring no less than two hundred; and Bandellus adduces nearly three hundred. To this array of witnesses, the friends of the immaculate conception reply, that some of these authors have been brought in falsely, and that the multitude of witnesses is of little avail, seeing their opinions may all be traced to some individual Doctor. Thus they contend, and decide nothing.*

* See Claude's Defence of the Reformation, vol. i., pp. 316—318.

† Ibid., vol. i., pp. 330, 331.

8. Unwritten traditions have been attended and followed by the most pernicious effects to those who have been guided by them. Had Christianity not been committed to writing at its commencement, in all probability by this time there would remain scarcely a single doctrine which could be considered genuine. And although tradition has been preserved from degenerating as much as it otherwise would, by some regard having been paid to Scripture; yet, for want of sufficiently attending to it, first needless, then uncertain, then false and pernicious, articles of faith have crept into the Church,—the progress of which, for the most part, we can trace. The faith of the first ages changed by little and little successively, and always for the worse; till at length the Church of Rome, nearly three hundred years ago, at the Council of Trent, when she was publicly and universally called to reform these abuses, chose rather to establish them under the name of "primitive tradition," and to condemn all who would not receive them with the same respect as they do the Scripture itself. Just as it was in our Saviour's time among the Jews, who asked, "Why walk not thy disciples after the tradition of the Elders? And he said unto them, Full well ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition." (Mark vii. 5, 9.) And as St. Paul foretold it would happen among Christians: "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, and not after Christ." (Col. ii. 8.)

9. The discordant opinions held by the Roman Catholics themselves respecting tradition, form an overwhelming argument against them. Some believe tradition to be equal to the written word, others consider it to be superior, while some hold it inferior to Scripture.

(1.) The Council of Trent taught, that ecclesiastical and apostolical traditions are of equal authority with the word of God. Such is properly the doctrine of the Church of Rome posterior to the sitting of that Council, although previous to that period opinions varied much concerning the authority of tradition.

(2.) Some Roman Catholic Divines are of opinion that tradition is inferior to Scripture. The famous Gerson says, "In the trial of doctrines, that which is first and principally to be considered is, whether a doctrine be conformable to the holy Scriptures, &c. The reason of this is, because the Scripture is delivered to us as a sufficient and infallible rule for the government of the whole ecclesiastical body and its members to the end of the world." † Lyra says, "As in philosophy truth is discovered by reducing things to their first principles; so in the writings delivered by the holy Doctors truth is discovered, as to matters of faith, by reducing them to the canonical Scriptures." * Additional instances might be given, where Romish Doctors speak of Scripture as superior to tradition in authority.

(3.) Other Doctors of the Church of Rome declare tradition to be superior to the written word. It is true, this idea is not authorized by the express decision of the Council of Trent, which only makes tradition equal to Scripture. Yet the true spirit of Popery, apart from many of her formal Decrees, gives too much countenance to the exaltation of tradition above Scripture. Accordingly, some of the most zealous sons of Rome have most unequivocally made tradition superior to Scripture. Thus Cardinal Baronius teaches, that tradition is the foundation of Scriptures, and excels them in this,—that the Scriptures cannot subsist unless they be strengthened by traditions; but traditions have strength enough without Scriptures. † Lindanus says, "Traditions are the most certain foundations of faith, the most sure ground of the sacred Scriptures, the impenetrable buckler of Ajax, the suppresser of all heresies. On the other side, the Scripture is a nose of wax, a dead and killing letter without life, a mere shell without a kernel, a leaden rule, a wood of thieves, a shop of heretics." ‡ Bishop Canus gives the following reason why traditions are to be preferred to the Bible:—"Because tradition is not only of greater force against heretics than the Scriptures, but almost all disputation with heretics is to be referred to traditions." §

(4.) At the Council of Trent, when the subject of tradition was under discussion, opinions were various and contradictory. ‖ Vincent Lunel, a Franciscan, thought it would be preferable to treat of the Church in the first instance, because Scripture and tradition derived their authority from the Church; and that it belonged to the Church to determine what we are to receive for tradition. Anthony Marinier was of a different opinion; and, for the purpose of giving his sentiments in the most convincing form, we will quote them in the words of a Roman Catholic writer of great and just celebrity,—Du Pin, a Doctor of the Sorbonne,—who states as follows: "Antonius Marinarus, a Carmelite, said, that traditions ought not to be spoken of; and that, in order to ascertain the first proposition, they ought first to determine whether it were a question of fact or of right; that is to say, whether the Christian doctrine has two parts,—one, that which God commanded to be written; and the other, that which he prohibited to be put in writing, and commanded to be taught by word of mouth. Or whether, all the doctrine being taught, one part was accidentally committed to writing. He added, that it was manifest

* Bishop Taylor's Dissuasive from Popery, part ii., book i., sec. iii.; Works, vol. x., pp. 451, 452.

† [Attendendum in examinatione doctrinarum, primo et principaliter, si doctrina sit conformis sacræ Scripturæ tam in se quam in modi traditione. Declaratur ex autoritate beati Dionysii dicentis in sententia nil audendum dicere divinis, nisi quæ nobis a scriptura sacra tradita sunt. Cujus ratio est, quoniam Scriptura nobis tradita est tanquam regula sufficiens et infallibilis, pro regimine totius ecclesiastici corporis et membrorum, usque in finem seculi.—Gersonii Opera, tom. i., De Examinatione Doct., pars ii., consid. i., fol., Paris, 1606.—EDIT.]

* Nicol. de Lyra, Postilla, tom. i., Prolog. de Lib. Bib., fol., Romæ, 1471.

† "Ex his igitur videas quanti ponderis sit ipsa traditio, ut ex ipsa Novi Testamenti scripta omnia auctoritatem acceperint: quam qui non admittunt ab ipsis etiam canonicis scriptis excidant necesse est. Quum itaque Scripturarum fundamentum sit ipsa traditio, eo convulso, totam desuper structam molem collabi, quis non facillimè credet?"—Baronius, Annal. liii., tom. i., p. 395. Romæ, 1607.

‡ Lindani Panoplia Evangelica. Paris., 1564.

§ Canus, Melchior, De Locis Theologicis, lib. iii., cap. 3. Lovanii, 1569. Lynde, "Via Tuta" et "Via Devia," p. 289. London, 1632.

‖ Paul's History of the Council of Trent, book ii., pp. 141, 142. Pallavicini Historia Concilii Trident., lib. vi., cap. xiv. Antwerp, 1673.

that, under the old covenant, God commanded the faith to be written, and that he wrote it himself, with his own finger; but that, under the new, Jesus Christ engraved the evangelical law in men's hearts, yet without forbidding it to be written; so that no man can say that the Apostles having preached and written as they were inspired by the Holy Spirit, God forbade them to write any particular thing, in order to keep it as a mystery. From whence it follows, that we are not to distinguish two sorts of articles of faith,—some published in writing, and others taught only by word of mouth; and if any one, says he, is of a contrary opinion, he will have two great difficulties to encounter: one is, to determine wherein the difference of these articles does consist; the other, how the successors of the Apostles could put that in writing which God forbade. To say that it was by accident that some things were written, is to do God an injury, who guided the Apostles' hands. Whence he concluded that it was better to imitate the Fathers, who never mentioned tradition but upon urgent necessity; and who also took great care not to equal it to the holy Scriptures; and so much the rather because the Lutherans had not yet enlarged upon this question, though they had said that they would have no other judge but Scripture."* This advice, sound as it was, had but few approvers. Cardinal Pole particularly opposed it. Some desired a distinction to be made between traditions of faith, and those which related to rites and customs; the latter to be universally received, but of the rest only such as had been sanctioned by the custom of the Church. Others there were who urged the reception of every tradition which was enjoined.

When the Decree of the Council was proposed for consideration, and that part was read which enacted that the Scripture and tradition should be regarded "with equal piety and veneration," Bertani objected that the fact of so many traditions having fallen into disuse seemed to indicate, that even God himself did not intend that they should be venerated equally with the Scripture. The Bishop of Chiozza ventured to assert, that it was impious to equalize the authority of Scripture and tradition. But notwithstanding there were many in the Council of Trent who uttered sentiments such as these, yet, as the assembly was entirely under the control of the Pope, those of opposite sentiments prevailed, and determined that unwritten tradition should be of equal authority with the word of God. This topic, before this session of the Council in 1545, had chiefly been matter of opinion; but by the present decision of the Council the paramount authority of tradition with Scripture became an article of faith. Still it appears that all the assumed infallibility of Rome is unable to produce any thing like uniformity on this subject; some placing tradition below, others equal, and others superior to the word of God. This presents a complete refutation of their doctrine concerning tradition.

V. It is objected, that "as Protestants receive some things on the authority of tradition; such as Scripture, infant baptism, observance of the Christian Sabbath, &c.; why may they not receive others on similar authority?"

1. We certainly do not receive Scripture on the authority of Popish tradition, which means something handed down, through eighteen centuries, by word of mouth, independent of written proof. Such a tradition as this furnishes the least part, if any part at all, of the testimony on which we receive Scripture. But while Protestants reject such dubious testimony as this, they do not reject that which is written. They avail themselves of it as furnishing rational evidence of the genuineness of the books of Scripture; that they were written by the men whose names they bear. Of this we have the written testimony of both the friends and enemies of Christianity. Some of these authors were contemporary with men who had been contemporary with some of the Apostles, and all agree in fixing on the same books which are now embodied in the New Testament. We know it to be impossible that forgeries should gain universal credit, because human nature and the laws of moral evidence are the same in all ages. We receive the holy Scriptures as undoubtedly genuine, independently of the authority of the Church of Rome and her traditions, because they were identified with the literature of the period before the Church of Rome was distinguished above other Churches. And it was impossible that she could, after the fourth century, add to the evidence in favour of the apostolic writings, which had been established beyond all dispute in the second and third centuries. Indeed, were the testimony of the Roman Church annihilated, we have ample witnesses in the bosom of the Greek and other Churches in favour of the genuineness and authenticity of Scripture. The utmost amount of Roman oral tradition would be only a probable proof with regard to things not contrary to Scripture. We do not receive the apostolical writings on authority so vague; for besides their having been written at first, which puts them out of the rank of oral traditions, the substance of them was speedily incorporated in the writings of the Greek and Latin Fathers. And as it regards the inspiration of Scripture, it depends upon higher testimony than mere tradition. In proof of this we have the miracles which attest Scripture, the prophecies which are recorded in it, the excellency of its precepts and doctrines, the force of its motives,—in short, the most convincing evidence of its being a revelation from God. But a bare probability is the utmost evidence that can be produced by oral tradition in the mind of a serious inquirer after historical truth. This is all it can effect, and that only in regard to things not contrary to Scripture; so that no wise man can build any article of faith or ordinance of worship upon such an uncertain foundation. Faith in the word of God, which constitutes a man a Christian, is founded on higher authority than even the tradition of written testimony, which produces only a rational conviction, not a divine faith. We have shown in another place how we know the Bible to be the word of God independently of human testimony.

Popish authors claim great merit, on the part of their Church, for having preserved the Bible so carefully for us, during so many ages, and then for having given it to the world at last. But they forget that the word of God was not given to the Churches to be hidden among the learned and the priesthood, but to be published and spread abroad in the native language of all, and among all classes of people. Therefore, in adopting this plea of merit, the Church of Rome appears in as fearful a condition as "the wicked and slothful servant" who vainly pleaded that he had hidden his Lord's talent in a napkin.

2. As it regards the baptism of infants, we observe, (1.) Admitting this to be established by tradition, we have that of the Syriac, Greek, African, ancient Italian

* Du Pin's Ecclesiastical History, vol. iii., p. 419.

Churches, &c., on this subject, as well as that of the Church of Rome. (2.) Those who baptize children among Protestants never quote tradition as authority for this purpose. (3.) Abundant Scripture evidence can be adduced in favour of baptizing children, which has been frequently quoted by Pædobaptist writers; to whose works the reader is referred.

3. Nor do we depend entirely on tradition for the observance of the Christian Sabbath; because, though tradition be a confirmation of the apostolical practice in observing the Lord's day, yet that very practice and the ground of it are sufficiently deduced from Scripture. The proportion of time thus consecrated is fixed by divine authority to be one day out of seven. The seventh day was originally appointed, for the reason assigned at the institution of the Sabbath, and repeated in the fourth commandment. And that the seventh part of time is intended, appears plain, because the precise period cannot be observed at the same moment by any two portions of the human family who live at any great distance from each other, east or west, without a breach of the commandment. And that the change from the seventh to the first day of the week took place at the opening of the Christian dispensation, we have positive proof from Scripture, with which corresponds the testimony of tradition. The abrogation of the Jewish Sabbath appears plainly recorded in the following passage:— "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days." (Col. ii. 16.) We find the first Christians uniformly assembling together on the first day of the week for divine worship. (John xx. 19; Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2.) Accordingly we find it recognised by St. John: "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day." (Rev. i. 10.) Here then is sufficient Scripture warrant to prove the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week. And as far as tradition is concerned, in regard to the change of the Sabbath, the evidence from that source is but small when separated from written documents and from Scripture.

4. It is said, that "the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son is an article of faith, and yet nowhere told in Scripture, and consequently tradition must assist in making the rule of faith." To this we reply, that the Greeks and Latins seem to differ in this matter only in words, or that their difference is not a subject of serious importance. Yet the procession of the Spirit seems plainly taught by the following text:— "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth which PROCEEDETH from the Father, he shall testify of me." (John xv. 26.) It is worthy of notice, that the Rhemish annotators and Bishop Hay, author of the Sincere Christian, deduce the doctrine of the procession from this passage. It is somewhat strange that these Roman Doctors should attempt to prove this doctrine from Scripture, if, as they say, it be not contained in Scripture. Here then we have a specimen of the harmony existing among them in their interpretation of the word of God.

5. Concerning the prohibition from eating blood, (Acts xv.,) we are told that it is abrogated, not by Scripture, but by tradition, so that neither Protestants nor Romanists have any scruple in eating blood or things strangled. On this we may remark that the passage clearly prohibits fornication, things offered to idols, things strangled, and blood; and since this precept is not revoked, it stands in full force, whether Protestants or Romanists observe it or not. Protestants who refrain from blood and things strangled are not guided by tradition, but by Scripture: and even Dr. Milner, the celebrated Roman Catholic controvertist, speaking in justification of those who eat blood and things strangled, says, they "act in contradiction to the express words of both the Old and New Testament." If this be the case, no man can be at a loss to know that it is his duty to abstain from things strangled and from blood; and if Popish tradition has annulled this law of God, as Romanists say it has, then it is most flagrantly opposed to the word of truth, and ought to be rejected.

6. We are farther told, that "the doctrine of the divinity of Christ depends principally for its support on tradition, and not on Scripture." So Dr. Milner asks, "Is it demonstratively evident from mere Scripture, that Christ is God, and to be adored as such?" To this we reply, that the Scripture proof on this subject, brought forward by Protestant Divines, amply demonstrates the divinity of Christ, independently of tradition; and it is much to be deplored that Roman Catholics have given up the Scripture evidence in favour of this vital article of faith, and have fled to the uncertainty of tradition. Socinians and Unitarians are pleased with their concession that this doctrine cannot be proved by Scripture; and being aware that it cannot be maintained by tradition, they reject it altogether. Thus the Popish Doctors help to make infidels in Italy, and Socinians in Poland.

VI. However, Roman Catholics inform us, that "the traditions, on which they depend, are not altogether unwritten, but partly written by the ancient Fathers of the Church." We reply, that we acknowledge that ancient writers, on matters wherein they all agree, are a very valuable evidence of the faith, though a fallible one; because we can prove that these writers, as they lived nearer the apostolic age, were of our faith.

If antiquity were an argument, the greater the antiquity, the stronger the argument; and, therefore, the authority of the Bible for this, as well as many other reasons, is the strongest of all. An original account is of the greatest authority. Those which come after may be of use to illustrate and confirm; but wherever they appear to contradict, they must be rejected without scruple. Those which come a considerable time after, and upon which the Church of Rome depends, deserve little or no credit.

VII. We shall now collect the views of the ancient Fathers respecting traditions, and examine how far the Church of Rome has authority to make tradition equal with the word of God.

1. Before we adduce the testimony of the Fathers, a few preliminary observations may be proper, that we may understand more correctly the weight which we ought to attach to their declarations.

The writers of the first six centuries are commonly included in the list of Fathers. Those who were contemporary with the Apostles are called apostolical Fathers. These are Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp. They all wrote in Greek, and, excepting Clement, were natives of the East. They wrote before any association took place between philosophy and religion, which fact is attested by their style and manner of reasoning. They neglected formal arrangement in exhibiting their arguments. The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are clearly and scripturally inculcated, which are everywhere so interwoven with the highest precepts of morality, as to prove that the faith of these men was inseparable from their practice. They delivered their moral and doctrinal instructions as part of the same scheme; and have constant reference to the books of the New Testament, such as we now possess. The principal Greek writers, who succeeded the apostolical Fathers, were Justin Martyr and Irenæus. These ancient teachers were not remarkable either for their learning or eloquence; but they invariably express the most pious and admirable sentiments in a plain and unadorned style.

We do not profess any blind veneration for their names, or submission to their opinions; yet we are very far from treating them with contempt. They were erring and feeble mortals like ourselves, and much inferior to moderns in intellectual discipline, being under early prejudices, proceeding from the oblique principles and perverse systems of their day. Learned men are not unanimous concerning the degree of esteem that is due to them. Some represent them as the most excellent guides in the paths of piety; while others place them in the lowest rank of moral writers. Without attempting to determine this point with precision, it appears that in the writings of the ancient Fathers there are many things well adapted to form a religious life; while they abound with precepts of an excessive and unreasonable austerity, with stoical and academical dictates, vague and indeterminate notions, and with decisions absolutely false, and in opposition to the precepts of Christ. Admitting them as honest and faithful witnesses and historians of the times during which they lived, we are not to place much weight on their moral precepts, otherwise than as they accord with the holy Scriptures. As historians, they are valuable in transmitting to us the occurrences of their times; but as teachers, they are not to be followed beyond the due bounds of holy writ.

Traditions on the first publication of Scripture were clear, evident, recent, easily remembered, and talked of by Christians in their meetings, both public and private; so that to misunderstand or to pervert them, was equally difficult; to remember them was an easy task; and had there been a mistake, one of the Apostles, or an immediate disciple, was present to rectify it. After the death of these witnesses heresies sprung up; to support which tradition was quoted, but rarely Scripture; for it was accounted so honourable to have been taught by an Apostle, that even good men were willing to believe all that their scholars professed to have learned at the feet of these inspired men; and many, alas! were even forward to say they heard them teach what they never taught. On this account the more sober appealed to Scripture; and accordingly, the general sentiment among the ancients was, that Scripture was the standard of belief and morals. We, therefore, adduce testimony on this point; from which it will appear that the Fathers triumphantly support the Protestant side of the question. For it must not be supposed that generally a most complete consistency can be expected even from the Fathers, so as to preserve a unanimous consent in all the minutiæ of Protestant or primitive faith and practice. We range the evidence of these venerable men under the different centuries in which they lived; fixing, however, for precision, each under the century in which he died, so that the exact time in which he lived and flourished may more easily be ascertained and remembered.

2. Fathers of the second century.

Ignatius. It has been said he was about seven years of age when Christ preached; others assert that he was not born till after the crucifixion. He was called Theophorus of Asia, was made Bishop of Antioch, A. D. 70, and governed that church under Vespasian and his successors till the tenth year of Trajan, by whom he was put to death, A. D. 107. Eusebius informs us that Ignatius, being on his way from Syria to Rome, where he was to suffer martyrdom, addressed the several churches on his journey, to establish them in the faith, and to guard them against the heresies which then prevailed. "He exhorted them to adhere firmly to the tradition of the Apostles, which, for the sake of greater security, he deemed it necessary to attest, by committing it to writing." *

3. Fathers of the third century.

Irenæus, a Greek, was born about the year 140, was a disciple of Polycarp and Papias, went into Gaul, was ordained Priest, and afterward Bishop of Lyons, A. D. 178, and suffered martyrdom in the year 202 or 203. Our first citation from Irenæus will be concerning those barbarous nations who believed without the Scriptures. "If it had so happened that the Apostles had left us no scriptures, must we not then have followed the order of TRADITION, which they committed to those with whom they intrusted the churches? To this course many nations of illiterate barbarians, who believe in Christ, do truly assent, having salvation written in their hearts by the Holy Spirit, without writing or ink, and thus preserving the ancient tradition, believing in one God, the Maker of heaven and earth," &c.† This passage is frequently quoted by the Roman Catholic Divines, to show that the primitive church recognised an authoritative, unwritten tradition, as well as the written word; that oral instruction is amply sufficient for the laity; and that, in point of obligation, the written word needs not be communicated to them by the priesthood. To ourselves the passage appears decidedly to establish the contrary. For doubtless, as Irenæus justly remarks, IF it had so happened that the Apostles had left us no scriptures, we should then have been compelled, like believers in the patriarchal ages, to follow the order of tradition, either purely oral, or unauthoritatively committed to writing by uninspired individuals like ourselves. But, through the good providence of God, the Apostles have left us the Scriptures. Therefore, by intrusting us with them, they have practically demonstrated to us the insufficiency and insecurity of tradition; for had oral tradition from age to age been sufficient, the written word would have been superfluous, and would not have been given. Should it be said that Irenæus, in the case of the barbarians, speaks of oral tradition in terms of approbation, be it so; but was the oral tradition commended by him the same as that which the Council of Trent placed upon an equal footing with Scripture? Nothing of the kind. The tradition commended by Irenæus was simply an oral catechumenical communication of the truths contained in the written word; whereas that enforced by the Council of Trent sets forth sundry matters, not only not contained in the

* "Hortatusque est ut apostolorum traditionibus tenaciter inhærerent, quas quidem ad certiorem posteritatis notitiam testimonio suo confirmatas scriptis mandare necessarium duxit."—Euseb., lib. iii., cap. 36, fol. Paris, 1678.

† "Quid autem, si neque Apostoli quidem scripturas reliquissent nobis, nonne oportebat ordinem sequi traditionis, quam tradiderunt iis quibus committebant ecclesias? Cui ordinationi assentiunt multæ gentes barbarorum, eorum qui in Christum credunt, sine charactere et atramento scriptam habentes per Spiritum in cordibus suis salutem, et veterem traditionem diligenter custodientes, in unum Deum credentes, Fabricatorem cœli et terræ," &c.—Irenæus adversus Hæres., lib. iii., cap. iv., p. 172, fol. Edit. Basil., 1570.

Bible, but directly contrary to it. The oral tradition advocated by the ancient Gnostics was exactly the same in kind and quality as that of the Church of Rome. This appears by the following quotation from our author, where he precisely describes modern Romanists under the character of the ancient heretics, who insisted on the authority of tradition in consequence of supposed defects in the Scriptures:—"For when they" (the heretics) "are accused by Scripture, they turn upon the accusation of Scripture itself, as though it were not entirely correct or of authority, and because it furnishes different modes of expression, and because truth cannot be obtained from it by those who are ignorant of tradition. For the truth was not delivered by writing, but by the living voice; on account of which Paul said, 'We speak wisdom among them that are perfect, but not the wisdom of this world.' And each of them calls that wisdom which he derives from himself, although it be only a fiction. But when we again refer those who are averse to tradition, to that tradition which is from the Apostles, and which is preserved by succession of Presbyters in the churches, they will say that they are not only wiser than the Presbyters, but also than the Apostles, and have found out the unadulterated truth."* Thus, as Irenæus condemned the Gnostics, so would he also have condemned the Tridentine Doctors and their followers, the present Romish priesthood. And instead of being favourable to Popish tradition, he would directly, through the persons of the Gnostics, reject and reprobate all such additions to the word of God.

In another place Irenæus declares, "We have known the method of our salvation by no others than those by whom the Gospel came to us; which Gospel they then truly preached; but afterward, by the will of God, they delivered to us in the Scriptures, to be for the future the foundation and pillar of our faith." † Could any thing be spoken more fully to our purpose than this, whereby he shows that the Scriptures are given to us for the foundation of our faith, and not for the infallibility of the Church or vague tradition?

We will close our quotations from Irenæus by two short extracts:—"Knowing very well that the Scriptures are perfect, for they are spoken by the word of God and his Spirit." ‡ He says also: "Read more diligently that Gospel which is given to us by the Apostles; and read more diligently the Prophets, and you will find every action and the whole doctrine of our Lord preached in them."§

Tertullian, originally of Africa, a Carthaginian, Presbyter of Carthage, a Latin writer. He flourished under the Emperors Severus and Caracalla, from the year 194 till toward the year 216. He became a Montanist, A. D. 207, and died about 220. Before quoting from Tertullian, we observe, that, in the primitive church, tradition principally referred to doctrine; and the great TRADITION was the same as the Apostles' Creed, or what, in recent times, obtained the appellation, "the rule of faith." In the work of Tertullian, De Præscriptionibus Hæreticorum, the Roman controvertists contrive to find the tradition of their Church, and a rule of faith embracing whatever their Church has thought fit to impose on the credulity of her subjects; and which has at last assumed the form and name of the Creed and Oath of Pope Pius IV., comprehending the Canons and Decrees of the eighteen admitted Councils, all the writings of the ancient Fathers, and the Apocrypha. The text of Tertullian's book, De Præscript., &c., in common with other writings of the Fathers, as it descended to us, is in many places so obscure, or so corrupted, that no mortal can understand some portions of it. More, however, is intelligible than the defenders of Rome wish, or find to their purpose, without flagrant mistranslation, and making common cause with the very heretics, the Gnostics, whom Tertullian professes to refute, and which he does most heartily. From him it appears that the Gnostics were reluctant to argue from Scripture, because they preferred tradition,—not the public and well-known tradition of all the churches, but a secret doctrine alleged to have been committed to their sect. This is the origin of the Disciplina Arcani or secret discipline, the unfailing refuge of modern Romish controvertists; and of which Dr. Trevern has made so much use in his controversy with Mr. Faber.

We now adduce quotations from Tertullian. He says, "Whether all things were made of any subject matter, I have as yet read nowhere. Let the school of Hermogenes show that it is written: if it is not written, let them fear the curse allotted to such as add or diminish."* Speaking of the heretics of his day, Tertullian, in his Prescriptions, makes use of the following language, which exactly applies to the modern Roman Church:—"They confess indeed that the Apostles were ignorant of nothing, and differed not among themselves in their preaching; but they are unwilling to allow that they revealed all things to all: for some things they delivered openly, and to all, some things secretly and to a few; and that because Paul uses this saying to Timothy: O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust. And again: That good thing which was committed unto thee, keep."† These same texts, adduced by the ancient heretics, are quoted by the Doctors of the Church of Rome in favour of their traditions, Bellarmine and others. ‡

* "Cum enim ex Scripturis arguuntur, in accusationem convertuntur ipsarum Scripturarum, quasi non rectè habeant, neque sint ex authoritate, et quia variè sint dictæ, et quia non possit ex his inveniri veritas ab his qui nesciant traditionem. Non enim per literas traditam illam, sed per vivam vocem: ob quam causam et Paulum dixisse; Sapientiam autem loquimur inter perfectos, sapientiam autem non mundi hujus. Et hanc sapientiam unusquisque eorum esse dicit, quam à semetipso adinvenit, fictionem videlicet. Cum autem ad eam iterum traditionem, quæ est ab apostolis, quæ per successiones presbyterorum in ecclesiis custoditur, provocamus eos; qui adversantur traditioni: dicent, se non solùm presbyteris, sed etiam apostolis, existentes sapientiores, sinceram invenisse veritatem."—Irenæus adversus Hæres, lib. iii., cap. ii., p. 169.

† "Non enim per alios dispositionem salutis nostræ cognovimus, quàm per eos, per quos evangelium pervenit ad nos; quod quidem tunc præconiaverunt; postea verò per Dei voluntatem in Scripturis nobis tradiderunt, fundamentum et columnam fidei nostræ futuram," —Idem, lib. iii., cap. 1, p. 169.

‡ "Rectissimè scientes quia Scripturæ quidem perfectæ sunt, quippe à verbo Dei et Spiritu ejus dictæ."—Idem, lib. ii., cap. 47, p. 147.

§ "Legite diligentius id quod ab Apostolis est evangelium nobis datum, et legite diligentius Prophetas, et invenietis universam actionem, et omnem doctrinam, et omnem passionem Domini nostri prædicatam in ipsis."—Idem, lib. iv., cap. 66, p. 296.

* "An autem de aliquâ subjacenti materiâ facta sint omnia, nusquam adhuc legi. Scriptum esse doceat Hermogenis officina. Si non est scriptum, timeat væ illud adjacientibus aut detrahentibus destinatum."—Tertull. Opera, Contr. Hermog., p. 272. Fol. edit. Paris, 1580.

† "Confitentur quidem nihil Apostolos ignorasse, nec diversa inter se prædicasse, sed non omnia volunt illos omnibus revelasse; quædam palám, et universis; quædam secretò, et paucis demandasse: quia et hoc verbo usus est Paulus ad Timotheum: O Timothee, depositum custodi. Et rursum: Bonum depositum custodi."—Tertull. Opera, De Præscrip. adv. Hæret., p. 79. Fol. edit. Paris, 1580.

‡ "Quartum testimonium est primæ Tim. ult. O Timothee, de positum custodi. Et 2 Tim. i. Formam habe sanorum verborum quæ Tertullian seems to have formed some very curious opinions respecting traditions. He asks: "Do you not think it lawful for every faithful man to appoint whatever he thinks may please God unto discipline and salvation?"* Tertullian was of opinion, that when customs are derived from their ancestors, and have been duly observed, they are properly apostolical: "If I find no written law for the thing, it follows that tradition hath sanctioned by usage this custom, which, by a rational interpretation, must possess apostolical authority."† How far the opinions of Tertullian are to be followed with respect to tradition, will appear from the following quotation, where he defends the conduct of a certain soldier, who had refused to place a crown upon his head; maintaining that Christians are positively prohibited wearing a crown, or even to bear arms. He speaks of custom, and relates examples of ceremonies, which he declares were derived from tradition.

["In fact, to begin with baptism, when we are about to come to the water, in the same place, but at a somewhat earlier time, we do in the church testify, under the hand of a chief Minister, that we renounce the devil, and his pomp, and his angels: then are thrice dipped, pledging ourselves to something more than the Lord hath prescribed in the Gospel: then, some undertaking the charge of us, (suscepti,) we first taste a mixture of honey and milk, and from that day we abstain a whole week from our daily washing. The sacrament of the eucharist, commanded by the Lord at the time of supper, and to all, we receive even at our meetings before day-break, and from the hands of no others than the heads of the church. We offer, on one day in every year, oblations for the dead, as birth-day honours. On the Lord's day we account it unlawful to fast, or to worship upon the knees. We enjoy the same freedom from Easter-day even unto Pentecost. We feel pained if any of the wine, or even of our bread, be spilled upon the ground. In all our travels and movements, in all our coming in and going out, in putting on our shoes, at the bath, at the table, in lighting our candles, in lying down, in sitting down, whatever employment occupieth us, we mark our forehead with the sign of the cross. For these and such like rules if thou requirest a law in the Scriptures, thou shalt find none. Tradition must be pleaded to thee as originating them, custom as confirming them, and faith as observing them."] *

From the foregoing it is obvious that many things, as triple immersion, giving milk and honey to the baptized, &c., were considered important traditions. Yet these and many similar, the Church of Rome has long since abandoned or never received; and consequently, for the same reason, she ought to reject many others which she has adopted on equally inadequate authority.

Clemens of Alexandria, who flourished from A.D. 196 to A.D. 220, and died in 220, in his Stromata, employs the following language:—"He hath lost the character of a man of God, and of being faithful to the Lord, who hath kicked against ecclesiastical tradition, and hath turned to the opinions of human heresies." What this ecclesiastical tradition is, he explains as follows:—"But he who, returning out of error, obeys the Scriptures, and hath intrusted his life to truth, he is, of a man, in a manner made a god. For the Lord is the principle of our doctrine, who by the Prophets and the Gospel and the blessed Apostles, at sundry times, and in divers manners, leads us from the beginning to the end. He that is faithful of himself, is worthy of faith in the voice and Scripture of the Lord, which is usually exercised through the Lord to the benefit of men; for this Scripture we use for the finding out of things; this we use as the rule of judging. But if it be not enough to speak our opinions absolutely, but that we must prove what we say, we expect no testimony that is given by men, but by the voice of the Lord we prove the question; and this is more worthy of belief than any demonstration; by which knowledge, they who have tasted of the Scripture alone are faithful." Afterward he tells us how the Scriptures are a perfect demonstration of the faith: "Perfectly demonstrating out of the Scriptures themselves, concerning themselves, we speak or persuade demonstratively of the faith; although even they that go after heresies do dare to use the Scriptures of the Prophets. But for it, they use not all, neither them that are perfect, nor as the whole body and contexture of the prophecy does dictate: but choosing out those things which are spoken ambiguously, they draw them to their own opinion." Again he says: "They that are ready to spend their time in the best things, will not give over seeking for truth until they have found the demonstration from the Scriptures themselves."† Clement wrote these things not only by way of á me audisti, Bonum depositum custodi per Spiritum sanctum, qui habitat in nobis. Et c. ii. Tu ergo, fili mi, confortare in gratia quæ in Christo Jesu; et quæ audisti á me per multos testes, hæc commenda fidelibus hominibus, qui idonei erunt et alios docere. In his locis nomine depositi, non potest intelligi Scriptura, sed thesaurus doctrinæ, intelligentia dogmatum divinorum, id est tam sensus Scripturarum, quam aliorum dogmatum, quam totam doctrinam propagari volebat per traditionem, ut explicant Chrysostomus et Theophylactus in hunc locum, quo alludit etiam Irenæus, lib. iii., cap. iv., cum ait: Apostoli quasi in depositorium dives plenissimè in ecclesiam contulerunt omnia, quæ sunt veritatis. Et lib. iv., cap. xliii.: Obaudire, inquit, oportet Presbyteris Ecclesiæ, qui successionem habent ab Apostolis, qui cum Episcopatus successione charisma veritatis certum, secundum placitum Patris acceperunt. Et facile ex ipsis verbis colligitur. Nam si loqueretur de verbis scriptis, non tam anxie commendaret depositum; Scripturæ enim facilè conservantur in thecis et á librariis: Apostolus autem vult servari per Spiritum sanctum in pectore Timothei; et deinde non adderet: Hæc commenda fidelibus, qui idonei erunt et alios docere: sed diceret, Commenda librariis, ut multa exempla transcribant. Nec diceret: Quæ audistis à me per multos testes: sed, Quæ scripsi tibi. Itaque non verba solùm, sed etiam sensum, ac multo magis hunc, quam illa Timotheo Apostolus commendat, ac ut per manus tradat successoribus suis jubet."—Bellarm. Disput., tom. i.; De Verbo Dei non scripto., lib. iv., cap. v., fol. Paris, 1608.

* "An non putas omni fideli licere concipere et constituere duntaxat quod Deo congruat, quod disciplinæ conducat, quod saluti proficiat?"—Tertull. Opera, De Corona Milit., p. 343. Fol. edit. Paris, 1580.

† "Si legem nusquam reperio, sequitur ut traditio consuetudini morem hunc dederit, habiturum quandoque Apostoli autoritatem ex interpretatione rationis."—Idem, p. 342.

* "Denique ut a baptismate ingrediar, aquam aditurі, ibidem, sed et aliquanto prius in ecclesia sub antistitis manu contestamur, nos renunciare diabolo, et pompæ et angelis ejus. Dehinc ter mergitamur amplius aliquid respondentes quam Dominus in Evangelio determinavit. Inde suscepti, lactis et mellis concordiam prægustamus: exque ea die lavacro quotidiano per totam hebdomadam abstinemus. Eucharistiæ sacramentum et in tempore victus, et omnibus mandatum a Domino, etiam antelucanis cœtibus, nec de aliorum manu quam præsidentium sumimus. Oblationes pro defunctis, pro natalitiis, annua die facimus. Die dominico jejunium nefas ducimus, vel geniculis adorare. Eadem immunitate a die Paschæ in Pentecosten usque gaudemus. Calicis aut panis etiam nostri aliquid decuti in terram anxie patimur. Ad omnem progressum atque promotum, ad omnem aditum et exitum, ad vestitum et calceatum, ad lavacra, ad mensas, ad lumina, ad cubilia, ad sedilia, quæcunque nos conversatio exercet, frontem crucis signaculo terimus. Harum et aliarum ejusmodi disciplinarum si legem expostules Scripturarum, nullam invenies; traditio tibi prætendetur auctrix, consuetudo confirmatrix, et fides observatrix."—Idem, p. 337.

† "Ουτως ουν και ἡμεις απ' αυτων περι αυτων των γραφων τελειως· αποδεικνυντες εκ πιστεως πειθομεθα αποδεικτικως. Καν τολμησωσι προφητικαις χρησασθαι γραφαις, και οι τας

caution to the Christians, but in opposition to the Gnostics, who, like the Roman Catholics, laid claim to ancient traditions. He affirms that Scripture is the κριτηριον, the criterion, or rule of judging the controversies of faith; that the ecclesiastical tradition is the whole truth taught by the church of God, and preached to all men, and found in Scripture. And to prove that he had no idea of any infallible interpreter, he shows us how the Scriptures can be best interpreted: "They who rely upon them must expound scriptures by scriptures, and by the analogy of faith, comparing spiritual things with spiritual, one place with another, a part with the whole, and all by the proportion to the divine attributes." This was the plan of the church of Christ in the time of Clement, and such is the practice of the Protestant Churches, although repudiated by the Church of Rome.

Origen was born about the year 185, at Alexandria; he was appointed Catechist of the school in that place about 203, and flourished till the year 252, when he died. In his fifth sermon or homily on Leviticus, Origen hath these words:—"In which (the two Testaments) every word that appertaineth to God may be required and discussed; and all knowledge of things may be understood out of them. But if any thing yet remain which the holy Scripture doth not determine, no other third Scripture ought to be received for authorizing any knowledge (scientiæ) or doctrine; but that which remaineth we must commit to the fire, that is, we will reserve it for God. For in this present world God would not have us know all things."* Origen supposed Scripture to be so perfect as to be sufficient for every part of Christian instruction. "We know Jesus Christ is God, and we seek to expound the words which are spoken, according to the dignity of the person. Wherefore it is necessary for us to call the Scriptures into testimony; for our meanings and enarrations, without these witnesses, have no belief." † To these words Bellarmine answers, that "Origen speaks of the hardest questions, on which, for the most part, traditions do not treat." ‡ It is evident, however, that Origen requires the testimony of Scripture, not because of the difficulty, but because, without such testimony, these things are not to be believed. Whether, therefore, the subjects proposed be easy or difficult, if they be not in the Scripture, they must not be received. That this is the sense of the argument, the following will show:—"After these things, as his custom is, he will affirm from the holy Scriptures what he had said; and will also give example to the Doctors of the church, that those things which they speak to the people, they should prove to them, not as produced by their own sentences, but defended by divine testimonies; for if he, so great an Apostle, believe not that the authority of his saying can be sufficient, unless he teach that those things which he says are written in the law and the Prophets—how much rather ought we, who are the least, to observe this thing, that we do not, when we teach, produce our own, but the sentences of the Holy Ghost!"* Add to this, what he also says in another place: "As our Saviour imposed silence upon the Sadducees by the word of his doctrine, and faithfully proved that to be a false opinion which they thought to be truth; so shall the followers of Christ, by the example of Scripture, declare what is that sound doctrine, by which every voice of Pharaoh shall be silenced."† In another place Origen says: "No man ought, for the confirmation of doctrines, to use books which are not canonized scriptures."‡ Again he says: "As all gold, whatsoever it be, that is without the temple, is not holy; even so every sense which is without the divine Scripture, however admirable it may appear to some, is not holy, because it is foreign to Scripture." § Again: "Consider how imminent their danger is, who neglect to study the Scriptures, in which alone a knowledge of their condition can be ascertained." ‖

Cyprian was Bishop of Carthage from A. D. 248 to A. D. 258, and died in the latter year. Augustine (lib. v., c. xxvi., contra Donat.) quotes Cyprian as follows:—Ut ad fontem recurramus, i. e., ad apostolicam traditionem, et inde canalem in nostra tempora dirigamus:—"That we ought to recur to the fountain, that is, to apostolical tradition, and thence direct the channel to our own times." Now as Cyprian wrote to Pompeius against Stephen, Bishop of Rome, we conclude that it was Stephen who pleaded custom and tradition, to which Cyprian replies in the following words:—"Whence comes this tradition? doth it descend from the Lord's authority, or from the commands and Epistles of the Apostles? for those things are to be done which are there written," &c. "If it be commanded in the Gospels or the Epistles and Acts of the Apostles, then let this holy tradition be observed." ¶

4. Fathers of the fourth century.

Hippolytus, who suffered martyrdom A. D. 330, writes as follows against the heresy of Noetus:—"There is one God, whom we do not otherwise acknowledge, brethren, but out of the holy Scriptures. For as he that would possess the wisdom of this world cannot otherwise obtain it, than by reading the doctrines of the philosophers; so, αιρεσεις μετιοντες, ωρωτον μεν, ου ωασαις, επειτα, ου τελειαις, ουδε ως το σωμα και το ὑφος της ωροφητειας υπαγορευει· αλλ' εκλεγομενοι τα αμφιβολως, ειρημενα, εις τας ιδιας μεταγουσι δοξας, ολιγας σποραδην απανθιζομενοι φωνας· ου το σημαινομενον απ' αυτων σκοπουντες, αλλ αυτη ψιλ η αποχρωμενοι τη λεξει."—Clem. Alex. Opera. Strom., lib. vii., sec. xvi., p. 893, fol. Oxon., 1715.

"Αλλ' 'οι ωονειν ετοιμοι επι τοις καλλιστοις, ου ωροτερον αποστησονται ζητουντες την αληθειαν, ωριν αν την αποδειξιν απ' αυτων λαβωσι των γραφων."—Idem, p. 889.

* "In quibus (duobus Testamentis) liceat omne verbum quod ad Deum pertinet requiri et discuti; atque ex ipsis omnem rerum scientiam capi. Si quid autem superfuerit quod non divina Scriptura decernat, nullam aliam debere tertiam Scripturam ad authoritatem scientiæ suscipi: sed igni tradamus quod superest, id est, Deo reservemus. Neque enim in presenti vitâ Deus scire nos omnia voluit,"—Origen. Opera, Hom. in Lev. v., tom. i. Edit., Benedict., Paris, 1759.

† "Jesum Christum scimus Deum; quærimus verba quæ dicta sunt juxta personæ exponere dignitatem. Quapropter necesse nobis est Scripturas sanctas in testimonium vocare: sensus quippe nostri, et enarrationes, sine his testibus, non habent fidem."—Tractatus 5 in Matt. Vide etiam homil. 25 in Matt., homil. 7 in Ezek., homil. 4 in Jer.; which places Bellarmine cites.

‡ Profert Originem, in cap. iii., ad Rom., in Matt., Hom. xxv., in Ezek., Hom. vii., in Hierem., Hom. i., ubi dicit oportere nos de rebus divinis non loqui ex proprio sensu, sed omnia confirmare Scripturæ testimoniis: Necesse nobis est, inquit, Scripturas sanctas in testimonium vocare. Sensus quippe nostri, et enarrationes sine his testibus non habent fidem. Respondeo, Loquitur Origines de obscurissimis quæstionibus, quales plurimum non sunt illæ, quæ testimonium habent traditionis in tota ecclesia receptæ.—Bellarm. De Verbo Dei non Scripto, tom. i., lib. iv., cap. xi.

* Origen. in Epist. ad Rom., lib. iii.

† Tract. 23, in Matt.

‡ Nemo uti debet, ad confirmationem dogmatum, libris, qui sunt extra canonizatas Scripturas.—Tract. 26 in Matt. Bishop Taylor, Works, vol. x., p. 444.

§ Hom. 25 in Matt., Lat. edit., Basil, 1571.

‖ Lib. x., cap. xvi., in Rom., Basil edit.

¶ "Unde est ista traditio? utrumne de Dominica et Evangelica auctoritate descendens, an de Apostolorum mandatis atque epistolis veniens? Ea enim facienda esse quæ scripta sunt, &c. Si in Evangelio præcipitur, aut in Apostolorum Epistolis vel Actibus contineturobservetur divina hæc et sancta traditio."—Cypriani Opera, Epist. 73, ad Pompeium, p. 211., fol. Oxon., 1682.

whosoever of us will exercise piety toward God, cannot learn this but out of the holy Scriptures. Whatsoever, therefore, the holy Scriptures do preach, that let us know; and whatsoever they teach, that let us understand." *

Eusebius Pamphilus was born about the year 264, was ordained Bishop of Cesarea, in Palestine, A. D. 313, and died A. D. 338. We refer to that remarkable sentence of his, delivered in the name of the three hundred and eighteen Bishops assembled at the first General Council of Nice:—"Believe the things that are written: the things that are not written, neither think upon nor inquire after." †

Athanasius was born about the year 300, ordained Bishop of Alexandria A. D. 326, and maintained the faith of the Gospel until his death, which took place about the year 375. In his oration against the Gentiles, toward the beginning, he says: "The holy Scriptures, given by inspiration of God, are of themselves sufficient toward the discovery of truth." ‡ Athanasius believed that the divinity of Christ was recognised as established by Scripture at the Nicene Council. And speaking of the true orthodox Christians of his age, he says: "The Catholic Christians will neither speak nor endure to hear any thing in religion that is foreign to Scripture; it being an evil heart of immodesty to speak those things which are not written." §

St. Ambrose, who died A. D. 396, says: "How can we use those things which we do not find in the holy Scriptures?" ‖ Again: "I read that he is the first, I read that he is not the second: they who say he is the second, let them show it by reading." ¶

Hilary, who was ordained Bishop of Poictiers about the year 350, and who died A. D. 367, says in his second book, addressed to Constantius Augustus: "O Emperor! I admire your faith, which desires only according to those things that were written."  Again, he says in the same chapter: "You seek the faith, O Emperor. Hear it then, not from new writings, but from the books of God. Remember that it is not a question of philosophy, but ■ doctrine of the Gospel." ††

Gregory Nyssen, brother to St. Basil, who was born about the year 330, constituted Bishop of Nyssa A. D. 379, and who died A. D. 395, says: ‡‡ "Let a man be persuaded of the truth of that alone which has the seal of the written testimony."

Cyril of Jerusalem, who died A. D. 386, speaks thus: "Not even the least of the divine and holy mysteries of the faith ought to be handed down without the divine Scriptures. Do not simply give faith to me while I am speaking these things to you, except you have the proof of what I say from the holy word. For the security and preservation of our faith are not supported by ingenuity of speech, but by the proofs of the sacred writings." *

5. Fathers of the fifth century.

Chrysostom, Bishop of Constantinople, who was born A. D. 347, flourished from 370 to about 400, and died A. D. 407, gives ample testimony to the sufficiency and clearness of Scripture. He says that the Scripture, "like a safe door, doth prevent an entrance to heretics, guarding us in safety in all things we desire, and not permitting us to be deceived." † He therefore concludes: "Whoso useth not the Scriptures, but cometh in otherwise, that is, cuts out for himself a different and unlawful way, the same is a thief." ‡

Chrysostom writes also: "Formerly it might have been ascertained by various means which was the true church, but at present there is no other method left for those who are willing to discover the true church of Christ but by the Scriptures alone. And why? Because heresy has all outward observances in common with her. If a man, therefore, be desirous of knowing the true church, how will he be able to do it, amidst so great resemblance, but solely by the Scriptures? Wherefore our Lord, foreseeing that such great confusion of things would take place in the latter days, ordered the Christians to have recourse to nothing but the sacred writings." On the passage, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God," Chrysostom says, "The man of God could not be perfect without the Scriptures. 'Instead of me,' saith Paul, 'thou hast the Scriptures: if thou desirest to learn any thing, hence thou mayest.' But if he writes these things to Timothy, who was filled with the Holy Spirit, how much more must we think of these things as spoken to us!" § Furthermore he says: "It is absurd, while we refuse to trust other people in pecuniary affairs, but rather choose to reckon and calculate for ourselves, that in matters of far higher consequence we should implicitly follow the opinions of others, especially as we possess the most exact and perfect rule and standard by which to regulate our several inquiries, I mean the regulation of the divine laws. I, therefore, could wish that all of you would reject what this or that man saith, and that you would investigate all these things in

* "Unus Deus est, quem non aliunde, fratres, agnoscimus, quam ex sanctis Scripturis. Quemadmodum enim si quis vellet sapientiam hujus sæculi exercere, non aliter hoc consequi poterit, nisi dogmata philosophorum legat: sic quicumque volumus pietatem in Deum exercere, non aliunde discemus, quam ex Scripturis divinis. Quæcunque ergo divinæ Scripturæ prædicant, sciamus; et quæcunque docent, cognoscamus."—Hippolyti Opera et Fragmenta, Biblioth., Vet. Patrum, tom. ii., p. 459, fol. Edit. Venet., 1776.

† "Τοις γεγραμμενοις πιστευε· τα μη γεγραμμενα μη εννοει, μηδε ζητει."—Concilia. General. et Provinc, tom. i.; Gelasii Cyziceni Acta Concilii Nicæni, lib. ii., cap. 19. Colon., 1618.

‡ "Αυταρκεις μεν γουν εισιν αι ἁγιαι και θεοπνευστοι γραφαι, προς την της αληθειας απαγγελιαν."—Athanasii Opera, tom. i., p. 1. Edit. Paris., 1698; Orat. contra Gentes.

§ Athanasii Opera, tom. ii., p. 709. Edit. Benedictin, Paris., 1698. Exhort. ad Monachos.

‖ "Quæ in Scripturis sanctis non reperimus, ea quemadmodum usurpare possumus?"—Ambrosii Opera, tom. ii.; De Officiis Ministrorum, lib. i., cap. 23. Edit. Paris., 1690.

¶ "Lego quia primus est, lego quia non est secundus: illi qui secundum aiunt, doceant lectione."—Idem, in Virginis Instit., c. 11.

 "Domine Constanti Imperator, admiror fidem tantùm secundùm ea, quæ scripta sunt desiderantem."—Ad Constant. August., lib. ii.; Hilarii Opera, p. 1230. Paris., 1693.

†† "Fidem, Imperator, quæris: audi eam, non de novis chartulis, sed de Dei libris. Memento eam non quæstionem philosophiæ esse, sed Evangelii doctrinam."—Idem.

‡‡ "Εν τουτῳ μονῳ την αληθειαν πιθεσθω, ᾧ σφραγις επεστι της γραφικης μαρτυριας."—Gregorii Nysseni Opera, tom. iii.; Dialogus de Anima et Resurrectione, p. 207. Edit. Paris., 1638.

* ["Oportet enim circa divina et sancta fidei mysteria ne minimum quidem absque divinis scripturis tradi: nec temere probabilitatibus, argumentisque in verborum artificio consistentibus abduci. Ne mihi quidem ista proferenti ultro credas: nisi de divinis Scripturis eorum quæ tibi adnuncio demonstrationem acceperis. Hæc enim fides, cui nostram salutem debemus, non ex commentitia disputatione, sed ex divinarum Scripturarum demonstratione vim habet."—St. Cyrilli Hierosol. Opera, Cat. iv., Dogm. vii. Paris., 1720.—EDIT.]

† "Καθαπερ γαρ τις θυρα ασφαλης, ουτως αποκλειει τοις αιρετικοις την εισοδον, εν ασφαλειᾳ καθιστωσα ἡμας περι ὧν αν βουλωμεθα παντων, και ουκ εωσα πλανασθαι."—Chrysost. Opera, edit., Montfaucon, tom. viii., Homilia, lix. in Johan. c. ii., p. 346. Paris., 1728.

‡ "Ὁ γουν μη ταις γραφαις χρωμενος, αλλα αναβαινων αλλαχοθεν· τουτεστιν, ετεραν εαυτῳ καί μη νενομισμενην τεμνων ὁδον, ουτος κλεπτης εστιν."—Idem.

§ "Δια τουτο, φησι, γεγονεν η των γραφων παρακλησις, ἱνα αρτιος ᾖ ὁ του Θεου ανθρωπος· ουκ αρα χωρις αυτης αρτιον ενι γενεσθαι· αντι εμου, φησι, τας γραφας εχεις· ει τι

the Scriptures." * He also declares: "Hear, I beseech you, all you secular men: provide you Bibles, which are the medicines for the soul: at least get the New Testament." †

Whole pages could be given from Chrysostom to show that not tradition, but Scripture, was the rule of conduct to the Christians. One more for the present must suffice.

On the text, "Search the Scriptures," &c., Chrysostom, after observing that in secular things the greatest diligence is necessary, says: "So when Christ sent the Jews to the Scriptures, he did not send them for the sake of a single reading, but for accurate examination. For he did not say, 'Read the Scriptures,' but, 'Search the Scriptures,' because those things which are said in them require much investigation. So he commands them to dig diligently, that they may find those things which lie deep." ‡

Theophilus Alexandrinus, who died A. D. 412, says plainly, "It is the part of a devilish spirit to think any thing to be divine that is not in the authority of the holy Scriptures." §

Jerome, who died A. D. 420, writes thus: "The kingdom of Christ which flourishes here possesses churches in all the world, is joined by the unity of the Spirit, and has the cities of the law, the Prophets, the Gospels, and the Apostles. She has not gone forth from her boundaries, that is, from the holy Scriptures." ‖ Again: "Those things which they make and find, as it were, by apostolical tradition, without the authority and testimony of Scripture, the sword of God smites." ¶ Again, on the question whether the Zachariah slain between the porch and the altar was one of the minor Prophets, or the father of the Baptist, Jerome would admit of no decision on the case, because Scripture did not decide. "This," says he, "because it hath no authority from Scripture, is with equal facility despised as it is proved."  St. Jerome writes thus against Helvidius: "As we deny not those things that are written, so we refuse those things which are not written. That God was born of a virgin, we believe, because we read it; that Mary did marry after she was delivered, we believe not, because we do not read it." *

Although Jerome acknowledged no standard for faith and morals except the Scripture, he nevertheless seems to be of opinion, that several customs had obtained in the church, for which there was not divine authority. In his Dialogue between an orthodox Christian and a Disciple of Lucifer Calaritanus, he gives instances, which we will produce as quoted by Du Pin in his Ecclesiastical History, (vol. i., p. 348,) with his accompanying remark. "There is," says Du Pin, "in that treatise a curious passage about tradition, which he proves by the custom of imposing of hands, and the invocation of the Holy Ghost after the administration of baptism. He adds, that 'many other things are observed in the Church upon the account of tradition, without being authorized by a written law, as the dipping of the head three times in water at baptism, the giving milk and honey to the baptized, not bowing the knee upon Sundays, nor all the time between Easter and Whitsuntide.'" It is not surprising that Jerome found no such traditions as these authorized by the word of God; and yet they are similar to many of those which are observed in the Church of Rome, as well as to others practised by the ancient Pharisees, which our Lord condemned.

St. Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, who flourished from A. D. 387, the time of his conversion, till his death in 430. We select the following pertinent remarks of this Prelate:—"In those things which are clearly laid down in Scripture, all may be found which pertain to faith and morals." † And again: "Whatsoever ye hear from thence, (the Scriptures,) let that be well received by you: whatsoever is without them refuse, lest ye wander in a cloud." ‡ And in another place: "All those things which in times past our ancestors have mentioned as having been done toward mankind, they have delivered unto us; all those things also which we see and deliver to our posterity, so far as they pertain to the seeking and maintaining true religion, the holy Scripture hath not passed in silence." § "Whatever our Saviour would have us read of his actions or sayings, he commanded his Apostles and disciples, as his hands, to write." ‖ And in another place, where he mentions that saying of Cyprian: "Hence," says he, "it is in vain for them to object custom, who are overcome by reason; as though custom were greater than truth; or as though that were not to be followed in spiritual things which is revealed by the Holy Ghost." "This," saith Augustine, "is βουλει μαθειν, εκειθεν δυνηση· ει και Τιμοθεῳ ταυτα εγραφε τῳ πνευματος εμπεπλησμενῳ, πωσῳ μαλλον ὑμιν."—Idem, Homil. ix. in 2 Tim., c. iii., tom. xi., p. 714.

* "Πως γαρ ουκ ατοπον ὑπερ μεν χρηματων μη ετεροις πιστευειν, αλλ' αριθμῳ και ψηφῳ τουτο επιτρεπειν· ὑπερ δε πραγματων ψηφιζομενοις, απλως ταις ετερων παρασυρεσθαι δοξαις· και ταυτα ακριβη ζυγον απαντων εχοντας, και γνωμονα, και κανονα, των θειων νομων την αποφασιν; Διο παρακαλω και δεομαι παντων υμων αφεντες τι ᾧ δεινι και τῳ δεινι δοκει περι τουτων, παρα των γραφων ταυτα απαντα, πυνθανεσθε."—Idem, Homil. xiii., c. iv. in 2 Cor., tom. x., p. 536.

† "Ακουσατε, παρακαλω, παντες οἱ βιωτικοι, και κτᾶσθε βιβλια φαρμακα της ψυχης· ει μηδεν, ετερον βουλεσθε την γουν καινην κτησασθε."—Idem, Homil. ix. in c. iii. ad Col., tom. xi., p. 391, c.

‡ "Δια τουτο και ὁ Χριστος παρεπεμπων τους Ιουδαιους ταις γραφαις, ουκ εις ἁπλην αναγνωσιν, αλλ' εις ερευναν ακριβη και κατανενοημενην αυτους παρεπεμπεν· ου γαρ ειπεν, αναγινωσκετε τας γραφας· αλλ', ερευνατε τας γραφας· επειδη γαρ τα περι αυτων λεγομενα πολλης εδειτο της επιμελειας—Δια τουτο και κατασκαπτειν αυτους μετα ακριβειας κελευει νυν, ἱνα τα εν τῳ βαθει κειμενα δυνηθωσι ευρειν."—Idem, Serm. xl. in Johan. "Scrutamini Scripturas," c. v., tom. viii., p. 243.

§ Theoph. Episc. Alexand. Opera; Epistol. Pasch., A. D. 402; Bibl. Vet. Pat. Venet., tom. vii., A. D. 1770.

‖ "Ecclesia autem Christi quæ habitat benè, et in toto orbe ecclesias possidet, spiritus unitate conjuncta est; et habet urbes legis, Prophetarum, Evangelii, et Apostolorum, non est egressa de finibus suis, id est, de Scripturis sanctis."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iii.; Comment in Michæam, lib. i., cap. i. Paris., 1704.

¶ "Sed et alia, quæ absque auctoritate et testimoniis Scripturarum, quasi traditione apostolicâ, sponte reperiunt atque confingunt, percutit gladius Dei."—Idem, in Aggæi. c. 1., Opera, tom. iii.

 "Hoc, quia de Scripturis non habet auctoritatem eâdem facilitate contemnitur quâ probatur."—Idem, in Matt. 23, Opera, tom. iv.

* "Ut hæc quæ scripta sunt non negamus; ita ea quæ non sunt scripta renuimus. Natum Deum esse virginis, credimus, quia legimus; Mariam nupsisse post partum, non credimus, quia non legimus."—Idem, adversus Helvidium de perpetua Virginitate B. Mariæ. Opera, tom. iv.

† "In iis quæ apertè in Scripturâ posita sunt, inveniuntur illa omnia quæ continent fidem moresque vivendi."—Augustini Opera, tom. iii., De Doctrina Christ., lib. ii., c. 9. Basil, 1541.

‡ "Quicquid inde audieritis hoc vobis bene sapiat: quicquid extra est respuite, ne erretis in nebulâ."—Idem, tom. ix., in lib. de Pastor., c. 11.

§ "Omnia quæ præteritis temporibus erga humanum genus majores nostri gesta esse meminerunt, nobisque tradiderunt; omnia etiam quæ nos videmus, et posteris tradimus, quæ tamen pertinent ad veram religionem quærendam, et tenendam, divina Scriptura non tacuit."—Idem, tom. ii., Epist. 42.

‖ "Quicquid enim ille (Servator) de suis factis et dictis nos legere voluit, hoc scribendum illis tanquam suis manibus impetravit."—Idem, de Consensu Evangelist., tom. iv., lib. i., cap. 35.

evidently true, because reason and truth are to be preferred to custom."* Again Augustine declares: "Who knows not that the sacred canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament are contained within certain bounds; and ought so far to be preferred to the later writings of Bishops, that we are not to doubt or call in question any thing therein written, whether it be true and right, or not."† He also saith in another place: "All writings, since the confirmation of the canon of Scripture, are liable to dispute; and even Councils themselves are to be examined and amended by Councils." When speaking of the unity of the church, Augustine says, "I am unwilling that the church be demonstrated by human documents, but by the divine oracles."‡ Referring to the Donatists, he says, "Let them if they can demonstrate their Church, not by the talk and rumour of the Africans, not by the Councils of their own Bishops, not by the books of their disputers, not by deceitful miracles, against which we are cautioned by the word of God, but in the prescript of the law, in the predictions of the Prophets, in the verses of the Psalms, in the voice of the Shepherd himself, in the preaching and works of the Evangelists; that is, in all canonical authorities of the sacred Scriptures."§

"I would not believe the Gospel, unless the authority of the Catholic Church moved me thereto."‖ This sensible and ancient decision, in a false sense, is adduced by the Church of Rome to establish their high claims of Church authority. In opposition to their views we adduce the following, and to us indubitable, evidence:— (1.) They substitute the Roman Church in Italy for the entire church catholic; whereas Augustine meant the universal church. Augustine did not refer to the Church of Rome singly; because, as the head of a number of African Bishops, he did not acknowledge the authority of the Romish Church, for he opposed appeals to that see. (2.) When Augustine adduces the authority of the Catholic Church for the reception of the canonical Gospels, he means, that had any one Gospel wanted the evidential attestation of the universal church from its first appearance, he would reject it on the same ground as that on which we disown the Gospel of Christ's infancy, and the like unattested and apocryphal productions. In short, Augustine says nothing more than that he would not receive the Gospel without sufficient evidence of its genuineness; and this we possess from the extant written memorials of the early ages; and that, also, independent of the testimony of the provincial Church of Rome. (3.) That such is the meaning of Augustine, is evident from the connexion of this passage, as well as from other places, some of which we have already quoted. We will, however, adduce another from his treatise on the City of God, which is as follows:— "Therefore let us leave out the fables contained in those writings, which are called apocryphal, because their obscure and private origin was not evident to the Fathers, from whom the authority of the true Scriptures has reached us, in a succession which is at once well certified and generally known. Many things are brought forwards by the heretics under the name of other Prophets, and other more recent writings under that of the Apostles: all which, designated Apocrypha, have, after diligent examination, been removed by canonical authority."* Nothing can be more rational than this statement and evidential principle of Augustine; but with the pretensions of the Church of Rome it has no sort of alliance. (4.) Several Roman Catholic Divines of eminence refer the saying of St. Augustine not to the present Church, but to the church in the time of the Apostles. Thus Durandus de St. Sourcain, after having quoted the words of that Father, observes, "That which is said concerning the approbation of the Scriptures by the church, is to be understood only of the church which was in the time of the Apostles, who were filled with the Holy Spirit, and, withal, saw the miracles of Christ, and heard his doctrine; and on that account were fit witnesses of all things which Christ both did and said, that by their testimony the Scriptures, containing the actions and sayings of Christ, might be proved."† To the same purpose is the following declaration of Driedo, another Roman Catholic Divine:— "When Augustine says, 'I would not believe the Gospel,' &c., he understands it of the catholic church which was from the beginning of the Christian faith, increasing according to the course of succession of Bishops to these times, which church comprehends in it the college of the Apostles."‡ Again: Gerson, commenting on this passage of Augustine, says, "By 'the church,' Augustine means the primitive assemblies of those who had seen and heard Christ, and had been his witnesses."§ From all these things put together, it is evident that modern Roman Catholics have no support from the quotation

* "Proinde, inquit, frustra quidam qui ratione vincuntur, consuetudinem nobis abjiciunt, quasi consuetudo major sit veritate; aut non id sit in spiritualibus sequendum quod in melius fuerit a Spiritu Sancto revelatum. Hoc planè verum est, quia ratio et veritas consuetudini præponenda est."—Idem, tom. vii., de Baptism. contra Donat., lib. iv., c. 5.

† "Quis autem nesciat sanctam Scripturam canonicam, tam Veteris quam Novi Testamenti, certis suis terminis contineri, eamque omnibus posterioribus Episcoporum literis ita præponi, ut de illâ omnino dubitari et disceptari non possit, utrum verum, vel utrum rectum sit, quicquid in eâ scriptum esse constiterit."—Idem, tom. vii., De Baptism. contra Donat., lib. ii., c. 3.

‡ ["Quia nolo humanis documentis, sed divinis oraculis sanctam ecclesiam demonstrari."—Idem, tom. vii.; De Unitate Ecclesiæ, cap. iii.—EDIT.]

§ ["Remotis ergo omnibus talibus, ecclesiam suam demonstrent si possunt, non in sermonibus et rumoribus Aphrorum, non in conciliis episcoporum suorum, non in literis quorumlibet disputatorum, non in signis et prodigiis fallacibus, quia etiam contra ista verbo domini præparati et cauti redditi sumus: sed in præscripto legis, in prophetarum prædictis, in psalmorum cantibus, in ipsius pastoris vocibus, in evangelistarum prædicationibus et laboribus, hoc est in omnibus canonicis sanctorum librorum auctoritatibus."—Idem, tom. vii.; De Unit. Eccles., cap. xvi. Basil., 1542.—EDIT.]

‖ "Ego verò Evangelio non crederem, nisi me catholicæ ecclesiæ commoveret auctoritas."—Idem, tom. vi.; Epist. contra Manich. quam vocant Fundamenti., lib. i., cap. 5.

* "Omittamus igitur earum Scripturarum fabulas, quæ Apocryphæ nuncupantur, eo quod earum occulta origo non claruit patribus, a quibus usque ad nos autoritas veracium Scripturarum, certissima et notissima successione, pervenit. Multa sub nominibus et aliorum Prophetarum, et recentiora sub nominibus Apostolorum ab hæreticis proferuntur; quæ omnia, sub nomine Apocrypharum, ab autoritate canonica, diligenti examinatione, remota sunt."—Idem, tom. v.; De Civitate Dei, lib. xv., cap. 23.

† "Hoc autem quod dictum est de approbatione Scripturæ per ecclesiam, intelligitur solum de ecclesiâ quæ fuit tempore Apostolorum, qui fuerunt repleti Spiritu Sancto, et nihilominus viderunt miracula Christi, et audierunt ejus doctrinam, et ab hoc fuerunt convenientes testes omnium quæ Christus fecit aut docuit, ut per eorum testimonium, Scriptura continens facta et dicta Christi, approbarentur."—Durandus, lib. iii., dist. xxiv., q. i., sec. 9.

‡ "Augustinus cum dicit, Ego Evangelio, &c., intelligit de ecclesiâ catholicâ quæ fuit, ab initio Christianæ fidei, secundum seriem successionis Episcoporum crescens ad hæc usque tempora, quæ sanè ecclesia complectitur collegium Apostolorum."—Driedo, tom. i., lib. iv., cap. 4. See Stillingfleet's Grounds, p. 184.

§ ["Et hic aperitur modus intelligendi illud Augustini; Evangelio non crederem nisi me auctoritas ecclesiæ compulisset. Ibidem enim ecclesiam sumit pro primitiva congregatione fidelium, eorum qui Christum viderunt, audierunt, et sui testes extiterunt."—Gersonii Opera, tom. iii., De Vita Spiritu li Animæ, lect. ii., corol. vii., part 4., fol. Antw., 1706.—EDIT.]

from Augustine, which says, "I would not believe the Gospel, did not the authority of the catholic church move me thereto."

Indeed, Augustine was no friend to such tradition as that authorized by the Church of Rome. In his fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth letters, which are addressed to Januarius, he declares, that "the Christian religion was so burdened with human traditions, rites, and ceremonies, in the times in which he lived, that the condition of the Jews under the law, was more tolerable than the state of Christians under the Gospel; for that the Jews were subject only to the burden of the law, and not also to that of human tradition." It is due to remark, however, that though Augustine teaches many things which are in direct opposition to Popish traditions, he, nevertheless, does not generally speak with a clearness and decision, which prevent his sentiments appearing to favour some of the dogmas of Rome.

Cyril of Alexandria, who died A. D. 444, says, "The holy Scripture is sufficiently able to make those who are instructed in it wise, well approved, and to furnish them with excellent understandings."* "That which the holy Scripture hath not said, how should we receive and account it among such as are true?"†

In the writings of Theodoret we meet with the following:—"By the holy Scriptures alone am I persuaded."‡ "I am not so bold as to affirm any thing which the sacred Scripture passeth by in silence."§ "We ought not to seek after those things which are passed in silence, but be content with the things that are written."‖

6. Fathers of the sixth century.

Anastasius Sinaita, who died about the year 599, in giving instructions respecting a pious life, observes: "We must be persuaded that the Church has traditions about these things which are not in the holy Scriptures: as, for instance, that one ought to be fasting when he receives the eucharist; that he should turn toward the east in the time of prayer; that the mother of Christ continued a virgin after she had brought forth a child; and that she brought forth Christ in a cave."¶

John Damascene, who was condemned by the Iconoclaust Council, A. D. 754, says: "We receive, and acknowledge, and reverence all things which are delivered in the law, the Prophets, the Apostles, and Evangelists; and we seek after nothing beyond these."

Toward the close of the sixth century the mystery of iniquity began to work, when human tradition and new ceremonies were in considerable request; so that, from this period, till the Reformation by Luther, the Church was burdened with a load of traditions and unmeaning institutions.

We have now given an unbroken chain of testimony from the Fathers of the first six centuries, which conveys the evidence from the apostolic age, through the purest periods of the church; and their united declaration is, that the Scripture alone is the rule of the Christian's faith; and that we have no adequate support for Roman Catholic traditions, to induce us to consider them of equal value with the word of God. There are not less than twenty-two Fathers of the first six centuries cited; and from these we have given many quotations, which, when taken together, present overwhelming proof against Popish traditions.

["What, then, is the practical effect of this appeal to tradition? It 'makes void the word of God.' It leads men to attach no importance to the language of the inspired volume; however plain and explicit its meaning, they must distrust their eyes, and ears, and understanding, till it has been explained by the infallible authority of the Church: and as the Priest is the only representative of that infallibility to the immense majority of individuals in the communion of the Church, they must, of course, affix no sense of their own to the words of Scripture; they must implicitly receive his explanations; and thus a foundation is laid for the most humiliating dominion over the faith and consciences of men. The assertion of an individual becomes the rule of judgment. The habit of neglecting the Scriptures is confirmed by their systematic rejection of them as the ultimate rule; and ignorance, superstition, and ecclesiastical intolerance prevail, in exact proportion to the practical and uncounteracted influence of this traditionary authority.

["It is related of Omar, the Caliph of Alexandria, that when he committed to the flames the valuable library of that city, he asked, in reference to the volumes, only two questions: 'Are they agreeable to the Koran? Then burn them, they are unnecessary. Are they against the Koran? Then burn them, they are false!' Far be it from me to approve the mad decision of this savage Saracen; but I would apply the principle of his inquiry to the question before us. Does tradition agree with the Scriptures? Then, as a rule of faith, it is unnecessary. Does it oppose them? Then it is false. 'What is the chaff to the wheat?' 'Let God be true, but every man a liar.'

["In the language of Chillingworth let us remember, that 'THE BIBLE, THE BIBLE ALONE, IS OUR RELIGION.' 'I profess plainly,' exclaims that acute and learned writer, 'that I cannot find any rest for the sole of my foot, but upon this rock only. I see plainly that there are Popes against Popes, Councils against Councils, some Fathers against others, the same Fathers against themselves, a consent of Fathers of one age against a consent of Fathers of another age, the Church of one age against the Church of another age. Traditive interpretations of Scripture are pretended; but there are few or none to be found. No tradition, but only of Scripture, can derive itself from the fountain, but may be plainly proved, either to have been brought in, in such an age after Christ, or that in such an age it was not in. In a word, there is no sufficient certainty, but of Scripture only, for any considering man to build upon. This, therefore, and this only, I have reason to believe: this will I profess, and according to this I will live. Propose me any thing out of this book, and require whether I believe it or no; and, seem it never so incomprehensible to human reason, I will subscribe it with hand and heart, as knowing no demonstration can be stronger than this,—God hath said so, therefore it is true. In other things, I will take no man's liberty of judgment

* "Sufficit divina Scriptura ad faciendum eos qui in illa educati sunt sapientes, et probatissimos et sufficientissimam habentes intelligentiam."—Cyril contra Jul., lib. vii. Edit. Lips., 1696.

† "Ὁ γουν ουκ ειρηκεν ἡ θεια γραφη, τινα κατα τροπον παραδεξομεθα, και εν τοις αληθως εχουσι καταλογουμεθα."—Cyrill. Alex. Opera, tom. i.; Glaphyrorum, in Gen., lib. ii. Lutet., 1638.

‡ "Εγω γουν μονῃ πειθομαι τῃ θειᾳ γραφῃ."—Theodoreti Opera, dial. i., Ατρεπτ.

§ "Ου γουν ουτως ειμι θρασυς ωστε φαναι τι σεσιγημενον παρα τῃ θειᾳ γραφῃ."—Idem, dial. ii., Ασυγχυτ.

‖ "Ου δει ζητειν τα σεσιγημενα στεργειν και προσηκει τα γεγραμμενα."—Idem, Quest. in Gen. 45.

¶ Du Pin's Ecclesiastical History, vol. i., cent. vi., p. 68.

 "Παντα τοινυν τα παραδιδομενα ημιν δια τε νομου, και προφητων, και αποστολων, και ευαγγελιστων δεχομεθα και γινωσκομεν, και σεβομεν ουδεν περαιτερω τουτων επιζητουντες."—Johannis Damasceni Opera, De Fide Orthodoxâ. Basil., 1575.

from him, neither shall any man take mine from me. I will think no man the worse man, nor the worse Christian, I will love no man the less, for differing in opinion from me. And what measure I mete to others, I expect from them again. I am fully assured, that God does not, and therefore that men ought not, to require any more of any man than this,—to believe the Scripture to be the word of God, to endeavour to find the true sense of it, and to live according to it.'—Chillingworth's Works, chap. vi." *]

CHAPTER IV.

INFALLIBILITY.

I. STATEMENT OF THE DOCTRINE. Roman Catechism quoted. Council of Florence. It is their great boast.—II. THE PROOF EXAMINED. 1. Consideration of the texts brought to support it: (1.) Matt. xvi. 18, considered; (2.) Matt. xviii. 17; (3.) Matt. xxviii. 20; (4.) John xiv. 15, 16; (5.) The infallibility professed by the Apostles confined to their own times; (6.) 1 Tim. iii. 16: 2. Their argument from the necessity of infallibility to decide controversies considered; (1.) This argument would make men the judges of what God ought to do; (2.) It would suppose that all men are infallible; (3.) The Jewish Church had no such guide; (4.) According to this argument, sin must not have existed; (5.) It would suppose that an infallible judge must exist in temporal and civil matters; (6.) Such a judge is unnecessary; (7.) Nor could he end controversies; (8.) There is no absolute need for determining all controversies; (9.) There were dissensions in the Apostles' times: 3. Their argument from prescription.—III. OPINIONS OF ROMAN CATHOLICS ON THE SEAT AND EXTENT OF INFALLIBILITY. 1. They differ in their sentiments respecting its seat and extent: 2. Opinions stated. Sentiments of the Jesuits. Pighius cited. Maguire. Opinions of the French. Of the Hungarian Jesuits. Of Milner: 3. Four systems respecting the seat of infallibility, containing twelve cases.—IV. INFALLIBILITY OF THE POPE. 1. Popes have contradicted Popes: 2. Some have been heretics. Vigilius. Liberius. Honorius. Some were guilty of simony: 3. Some were unskilled in divinity: 4. There were anti-Popes: 5. Some were grossly immoral: 6. The subject is involved in perplexity, on account of the objects of infallibility.—V. INFALLIBILITY OF A GENERAL COUNCIL. 1. It is disputed what is a General Council: 2. Councils have decided against Councils. The Council of Nice in 325, and of Ephesus in 431, against Trent, on adding new articles. The Council of Laodicea in 360, or 370, against Trent, respecting the canon of Scripture. Constantinople in 754, against the second Council of Nice, on images. The first Council of Nice, sixth canon, against several others on supremacy.—VI. INFALLIBILITY OF A POPE AND COUNCIL. 1. Two fallibles cannot make an infallible: 2. The Councils of Constance and Basil are against Leo and the Lateran: 3. Lateran II., in 1139, against Scripture, in regard to matrimony: 4. Lateran III., in 1179, against Scripture, on persecution: 5. Lateran IV., in 1215, against Scripture and the primitive church, on transubstantiation: 6. Lateran IV. against Scripture, on the temporal power of the Pope: 7. The Council of Trent against itself, also against Scripture.—VII. INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME, OR THE UNIVERSAL CHURCH. 1. Not in the church diffusive: 2. Nor in the Church of Rome, as she teaches false doctrines: 3. It is involved in perplexity: 4. Infallibility of the Protestant rule.—VIII. ARGUMENTS AGAINST INFALLIBILITY. 1. Its title, at best, is doubtful: 2. The primitive churches did not pretend to it: 3. By it men are prevented from exercising their reason: 4. It depends on a false theory: 5. It produces error and sin: 6. It fails to accomplish what it proposes. It does not decide controversies, nor explain Scripture: 7. It presents greater difficulties than the Protestant plan: 8. Their plan would require all men to be infallible: 9. It shuts the door against reformation.

I. THE Latin Church, and those in communion with her, claim for themselves the high prerogative of infallibility in doctrine and rules of morality.† They say that this prerogative was given by Christ to the church, or catholic church; and that they are that church. They also pronounce all other Churches to be sunk in the most pernicious errors. "But as this one Church, because governed by the Holy Ghost, cannot err in faith and morals, it necessarily follows that all other societies arrogating to themselves the name of Church, because guided by the spirit of darkness, are sunk in the most pernicious errors, both doctrinal and moral." * This virtually includes the infallibility of the Pope. Indeed, the following decision of the Council of Florence, on the 5th of July, 1439, will include something equivalent to it: "The Pope of Rome hath the supremacy over all the earth; that he is the successor of St. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, and the head of the church, the father and teacher of all Christians; and that Jesus Christ hath given him, in the person of St. Peter, the power to feed, rule, and govern the catholic church, as it is explained in the acts of œcumenical Councils, and in the holy canons." †

Infallibility is their great boast; and, if this Church be truly infallible, we ought to bow to its decisions. But on the most careful examination of Scripture, as well as of every other evidence that can be produced, it appears to us Protestants, that this claim is unscriptural, being opposed to divine truth; that it is a novelty in the Church; that it is insufficient to answer those purposes for which the claim is made; that it is attended with greater and more numerous difficulties than those it proposes to remedy; and that it is also followed by a variety of fearful consequences.

II. We proceed to the examination of the proof upon which the Romanists found their claims to infallibility. They not only quote Scripture for this purpose, they also present us with several arguments, which they say, are drawn from reason, and which establish this as a privilege pertaining exclusively to the Church of Rome.

1. We first take a survey of those texts of Scripture which are commonly quoted to establish the vaunted infallibility of the Papal hierarchy. We may here premise, that if infallibility be a doctrine of Scripture, and so important as the Romanists say it is, then it must be clearly revealed in Scripture as well as the place where it is to be found. We assert, however, that it is not a doctrine taught by Scripture, and that the texts adduced to prove it do not confer it; or, if they do, they are applicable exclusively to the Apostles.

(1.) In proof of the Church's infallibility, the following words of our Saviour to Peter are urged:—"I say unto thee, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." (Matt. xvi. 18.) ‡ It is not controverted between

* [Fletcher's Lectures on the Roman Catholic Religion, p. 79. —EDIT.]

† [The infallibility of the Papal Church has been one of the perpetual controversies between the Protestants and the Roman Catholics. By this assumed privilege she declares, that she cannot at any time cease to be pure in her doctrine, nor fall into any destructive error. She asserts herself to be the supreme arbitrator in all religious disputes; and from whose decision there is no appeal. Under this delusive notion she claims, 1. To determine what books are, and what are not, canonical; and to compel all Christians to receive or reject them, as she may determine. 2. To impart authority to the word of God. 3. To determine and publish the sense of divine truth, which all must with submission receive. 4. To declare what is necessary to salvation,—it being of no consequence whether such declaration be consonant with the sacred Scriptures or not. And, 5. To decide all controversies respecting subjects of faith and practice.—EDIT.]

* Catechism of the Council of Trent.

† Du Pin's Ecclesiastical History, vol. iii., p. 35.

‡ [The greatest advocates and writers of the Church of Rome acknowledge that this is a principal text for infallibility. We give the following extract from the Commentaries of Menochius, a work them and us whether or not Christ is the great foundation of his church, for in this we are all agreed; but the controversy lies here, Does the term "rock" refer to Peter or to Christ? The construction of the original plainly distinguishes between Peter and the rock. If it were written, επι τουτῳ τῳ Πετρῳ, "upon this Peter," there might be some ground to think that Peter and the word "rock" were the same. But it is not so: the words of Christ are, Συ ει Πετρος, και επι ταυτῃ τῃ πετρᾳ, "Thou art Peter," (a stone,) "and upon this πετρα," (a rock,) which thou hast confessed, &c.; πετρος being in the masculine gender, and πετρα in the feminine. The Latin Vulgate speaks the same language: Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock," the one being masculine and the other feminine. That the word "Peter" signifies "a stone," we have our Saviour's testimony: "Thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation a STONE." (John i. 42.) Christ, or the doctrines of Christ, seem plainly then to be the rock mentioned in the text. This view is supported by several texts of Scripture. Peter says, "Behold, I lay in Zion a chief corner-stone," ("rock," verse 8,) "elect, precious, and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded." (1 Peter ii. 6.) Here we have, first, Christ the Foundation, or Rock; secondly, his church, or believers in him; and, thirdly, they shall not be confounded, or the gates of hell shall not prevail, &c. Peter also calls Christ the stone which was set at nought by the builders, which is become the head of the corner. Add to this, the ancient Fathers viewed the passage in the same light,* making Christ, or rather his doctrines, which were confessed by Peter, the foundation or rock. Thus we have the construction of the original, the testimony of the Fathers, and corresponding texts of Scripture, in favour of our interpretation. Indeed, it is absurd to suppose that Christ built his church on Peter personally, or on his individual profession of faith; inasmuch as Peter afterward denied Christ, and stood in need of repentance and conversion. But the faith which Peter confessed, that is, that Christ was the Son of the living God, was the foundation on which the church was built.

["Our Lord had now, by his miracles, teaching, and conduct, so impressed on the minds of his Apostles the certainty that he was the Messiah, whom they had expected, that St. Peter makes the fullest confession of his faith, in the most energetic terms. Our Lord immediately addresses him in that remarkable language, which has been said, by the Church of Rome, to be the immoveable foundation of her undoubted supremacy, and her exclusive privileges, as the depositary of truth, and of her consequent infallibility, as the director and instructer of the world. The question, therefore, is, whether the confession made by St. Peter was the rock on which the church of Christ was to be founded, or whether the Apostle himself was that rock. The most eminent of the ancient Fathers have espoused the same opinion. Chrysostom* interprets the passage, Τῇ πέτρᾳ—Τουτέστι τῇ πίστει τῆς ὁμολογίας, 'upon the rock, that is, upon the faith of his profession.'

["The most probable meaning of the passage appears to be that which shall comprise both of the controverted senses. St. Peter was always the most zealous of the Apostles, and to him was reserved the honour of first preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles. The probable reason why our Lord addressed himself particularly to Peter was, that he happened to be the first who had acknowledged him as the Christ the Son of the living God. St. Peter generally proved himself the chief speaker; and he continued to do so after our Lord's ascension, without, however, of established repute and reference in the College of Maynooth, to show the acknowledged opinions of the Romish Church, as well as the character and strength of Dr. Elliott's argument:—

["Tu es Petrus—Non imponit nunc illi Petri nomen, jam enim inde a principio vocationis suæ sic appellabatur, ut constat ex Marco iii. 16; et Luc. vi. 14.—Quod ad sensum attinet, idem est ac si dixisset; Tu es Petra, et super hanc Petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam. In Græco enim πετρος, et nomen proprium est, et appellativum Petram significans. Adde in linguâ Hebraicâ, vel Chaldaica, in qua Matthæum scripsisse perhibent, non esse hoc discrimen masculini et fœminini, ut est in Græco, et potuit quidem Græcus interpres dicere, Συ ει πετρος, και επι ταυτῃ τῃ πετρᾳ, &c., et non επι ταυτῃ τῃ πετρα; tamen primo loco πετρος dixit, genere masculino, quia de Petro viro loquebatur, qui proinde vocabulo masculino videbatur signandus. Secundo vero loco πετραν dixit, quia de illo ut petra fundamentali loquebatur: hujusmodi autem lapides πετραι potius a Græcis dicuntur fœminino genere, quam πετροι masculino.

["Ædificabo Ecclesiam meam—Scilicet, dando tibi supremam in Ecclesia potestatem, ut statim explicatur. Est quidem Christus fundamentalis petra præcipuè, sed ei successerunt Petrus et reliqui summi pontifices, ut Vicarii cum summa potestate. Ecclesiæ vox adeo nobilis in Christianismo, hoc loco primum occurrit in Novo Testamento.

["Portæ inferi non prævalebunt, &c.—Id est, Satanæ vires Ecclesiam expugnare non poterunt, imo quantumvis se muniat adversus Ecclesiam, quasi portis, vectibus et feris; Ecclesiæ vires et impetum non sustinebit, sed regnum illius evertetur."—Menochii Commentarii, in loco.—EDIT.]

* [St. Augustine, in his Retractations, tells us, that he often had expounded the words to this purpose, although he did not absolutely reject that interpretation which made St. Peter the rock, leaving it to the reader's choice which of the two is the most probable. "Scio me postea sæpissime exposuisse, et Super hanc Petram intelligeretur quem confessus est Petrus; harum autem duarum sententiarum quæ sit probabilior eligat lector.—Aug. Retract. i. 21. Vide August. in Johan. tr. 124, de Verbo Dom. in Matt. Serm. 13. Super hanc, inquit, Petram quam confessus es ædificabo ecclesiam meam. Aug. in Johan., tr. 124, et de Verbo Dom. in Matt. Serm. 13. (Tom. x.) Super hanc Petram, id est, super me, ædificabo ecclesiam meam. Aug. in Matt. xvi. 18." Others, and those most eminent Fathers, do take the rock to be St. Peter's faith or profession. "Upon the rock," saith the Prince of interpreters, "that is, upon the faith of his profession;" and again, "Christ said that he would build his church on Peter's confession;" and again, (he, or another ancient writer under his name,) "Upon the rock, he said, not upon Peter; for he did not build his church upon the man, but upon his faith." Τῃ Πετρᾳ—Τουτεστι τῃ πιστει της ὁμολογιας.—Chrysost. in Matt. xvi. 18. Την εκκλησιαν εφησεν επι την ὁμολογιαν οικοδομησειν την εκεινου.—Chrysost. in Johan. i. 50. Επι ταυτῃ τῃ πετρα—Ουκ ειπεν, Επι τῳ Πετρῳ, ουτε γαρ επι τῳ ανθρωπῳ αλλ' επι την πιστιν την ἑαυτου εκκλησιαν ωκοδομησε.—Chrysost., tom. v., Orat. 163. Super hanc igitur confessionis Petram ecclesiæ ædificatio est.—Hil. de Trin. 6. "Our Lord," said Theodoret, "did permit the first of the Apostles, whose confession he did fix as a prop or foundation of the church, to be shaken." Αποστολων τον πρωτον, ου την ὁμολογιαν, οιον τινα κρηπιδα και θεμελιον της εκκλησιας κατεπηξε, συνεχωρησε σαλευθηναι.—Theod. Epist. 77. Whence Origen saith, "that every disciple of Christ is the rock, in virtue of his agreement with Peter in that holy confession. Πετρα γαρ πας ο Χριστου μαθητης," &c.—Orig. in Matt. xvi. This sense even Popes have embraced. In vera fide persistite, et vitam vestram in petra ecclesiæ, hoc est, in confessione B. Petri Apostolorum principis solidate.—Gregorii Magni Epist. iii. 33. "Persist in the true faith, and establish and fix your life upon the Rock of the church, that is, upon the confession of blessed Peter, the Prince of the Apostles." Super ista confessione ædificabo ecclesiam meam. Felix III., Epist. 5. Vide Nic. I., Epist. ii. 6. John VIII., Epist. 76. Others say, that as St. Peter did not speak for himself, but in the name of all the Apostles, and of all faithful people, representing the Pastors and people of the church; so correspondently our Lord did declare, that he would build his church upon such faithful Pastors and Confessors. Unus pro omnibus loquens et ecclesiæ voce respondens.—Cyprian, Epist. 55. "One speaking for all; and answering in the name of the church." Cui ecclesiæ figuram gerenti Dominus ait, Super hanc.—Aug., Epist. 165. "To whom, representing the whole church, our Lord saith, Upon this rock," &c. Petrus ex persona omnium Apostolorum profitetur.—Hieronymus in loc. "Peter professes in the person of all the Apostles." See Barrow on Supremacy, Works, vol. vii., p. 125. 8vo. edit. Oxford. Watson's Exposition, Matt. xvi 18.—EDIT.]

* ["Vide Elsley in loc., who quotes Chrysostom in Matt. xvi. 18. —EDIT.]

assuming the least degree of authority over the rest of the Apostles. The occasion of our Lord's addressing Peter was the confession the Apostle had just made; and he may be considered as speaking prophetically, when he said, pointing to or resting his hand upon the Apostle, 'Thou art Peter; and on thee, as the first Preacher to the Gentiles, and on this confession, which thou shalt preach to them, I will establish my church.'—Beza, Lightfoot, Bishop Burgess, in his Treatise, inserted in a collection of tracts lately published, and many others, among whom may be reckoned some of the Popes themselves, have espoused this conclusion. Bishop Marsh, however, in his work on the Comparison between the Churches of England and Rome, Grotius, Michaëlis, Whitby, with Père Simon, and the Romanists in general, have adopted the latter opinion.

["Among other of the Protestant writers who have strenuously advocated the opinion that Christ, and not St. Peter, was the founder of the Christian church, we meet with the venerable name of the late Granville Sharp. The assumption of supremacy over all the churches of Christ by the Church of Rome filled him with astonishment. He was induced, in consequence, to pay particular attention to the passage upon which this arrogant claim was supported, and the result of his examination is here annexed. The Greek word πετρος, he observes, does not mean 'a rock,' though it has, indeed, a relative meaning to the word πετρα, 'a rock;' for it signifies only a 'little piece of rock,' or 'a stone that has been dug out of a rock;' whereby the dignity of the real foundation intended by our Lord, which he expressed by the prophetical figure of petra, ('a rock,') must necessarily be understood to bear a proportionable superiority of dignity and importance above the other preceding word petros; as petra, 'a real rock,' is comparatively superior to a mere stone, or particle from the rock; because 'a rock' is the regular figurative expression in holy Scripture for a divine Protector; יהוה סלעי—'Jehovah (is my Rock.)' (2 Sam. xxii. 2, and Psalm xviii. 2.) Again: אלהי צורי 'My God (is) my rock;' (2 Sam. xxii. 3, and Psalm xviii. 2;) and again: ומי צור מבלעדי אלהינו—'And who (is) a Rock, save our God?' (2 Sam. xxii. 32.)

["That our Lord really referred to this declaration of Peter relating to his own divine dignity, as being the true rock, on which he would build his church, is established beyond contradiction by our Lord himself, in the clear distinction which he maintained between the 'stone' (πετρος, petros) and the 'rock,' (πετρα, petra,) by the accurate grammatical terms in which both these words are expressly recorded. For whatsoever may have been the language in which they were really spoken, perhaps in Chaldee or Syriac, yet in this point the Greek record is our only authoritative instructer. The first word, πετρος, being a masculine noun, signifies merely 'a stone;' and the second word, πετρα, though it is a feminine noun, cannot signify any thing of less magnitude and importance than 'a rock,' or 'strong mountain of defence.'

["With respect to the first. The word πετρος, petros, in its highest figurative sense of 'a stone,' when applied to Peter, can represent only one true believer, or faithful member of Christ's church; that is, one out of the great multitude of true believers in Christ, who, as figurative stones, form altogether the glorious spiritual building of Christ's church, and not the foundation on which that church is built; because that figurative character cannot, consistently with truth, be applied to any other person than to God, or to Christ alone. And though even Christ himself is sometimes, in holy Scripture, called 'a stone,' (λιθος, but not πετρος,) yet, whenever this figurative expression is applied to him, it is always with such a clear distinction of superiority over all other figurative stones, as will not admit the least idea of any vicarial stone to be substituted in his place; as, for instance, he is called, 'the head-stone of the corner,' (Psalm cxviii. 22,) 'in Zion a precious corner-stone,' (Isai. xxviii. 16,) by whom alone the other living stones of the spiritual house are rendered 'acceptable to God;' as St. Peter himself (previous to his citation of that text of Isaiah) has clearly declared, in his address to the churches dispersed throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, wherein he manifestly explains that very text of Isaiah, as follows:—'Ye also,' says the Apostle, 'as living stones, are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God, by' (or through) 'Jesus Christ.' (1 Peter ii. 5.) Thus plainly acknowledging the true foundation, on which the other living stones of the primitive catholic church were built, in order to render them 'acceptable to God,' as 'a holy priesthood.'

["From this whole argument of St. Peter, it is manifest that there cannot be any other true head of the church than Christ himself; so that the pretence for setting up a vicarial head on earth, is not only contrary to St. Peter's instruction to the eastern churches, long after Christ's ascent into heaven, but also (with respect to the inexpediency and impropriety of acknowledging such a Vicar on earth as the Roman pretender) is equally contrary to our Lord's own instruction to his disciples, (and, of course, also contrary to the faith of the true primitive catholic church throughout the whole world,) when he promised them that, 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name,' (said our Lord Jesus, the true Rock of the church,) 'there am I in the midst of them.' (Matt. xviii. 20.)

["So that the appointment of any Vicar on earth, to represent that Rock, or eternal Head of the church, whose continual presence, even with the smallest congregations on earth, is so expressly promised, would be not only superfluous and vain, but must also be deemed a most ungrateful affront to the benevolent Promiser of his continual presence; such as must have been suggested by our spiritual enemies, to promote an apostasy from the only sure foundation, on which the faith, hope, and confidence of the true catholic church could be built and supported.

["A due consideration also of the second noun, πετρα, 'a rock,' will demonstrate that the supreme title of the 'rock,' which, in other texts of holy Scripture, is applied to Jehovah, or God alone, most certainly was not intended by our Lord to be understood as applicable to his disciple Peter; but only to that true testimony which St. Peter had just before declared, concerning the divine dignity of the Messiah, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.'

["I have already remarked, that πετρα, 'a rock,' is a feminine noun; and a clear distinction is maintained between πετρος, the masculine noun in this text, and the said feminine noun πετρα, 'the rock,' by the grammatical terms in which the latter, in its relatives and articles, is expressed, which are all regularly feminine throughout the whole sentence, and thereby they demonstrate that our Lord did not intend that the new appellation, or nominal distinction, which he had just before given to

Simon, (namely, πετρος, the masculine noun, in the beginning of the sentence,) should be construed as the character of which he spoke in the next part of the sentence; for, if he had really intended that construction, the same masculine noun, πετρος, must necessarily have been repeated in the next part of the sentence with a masculine pronoun; namely, επι τουτῳ τῳ πετρῳ, instead of επι ταυτῃ τῃ πετρᾳ, the present text; wherein, on the contrary, not only the gender is changed from the masculine to the feminine, but also the figurative character itself, which is as much superior in dignity to the Apostle Simon, and also to his new appellative πετρος, as a rock is superior to a mere stone. For the word πετρος, cannot signify any thing more than 'a stone;' so that the Popish application to Peter, (or πετρος,) as the foundation of Christ's church, is not only inconsistent with the real meaning of the appellative, which Christ at that very time conferred upon him, and with the necessary grammatical construction of it, but also with the figurative importance of the other word, πετρα, 'the rock;' επι ταυτῃ τῃ πετρᾳ, 'upon this rock,' he declared the foundation of the church should rest; this is a title of dignity, which may be easily shown, from several texts of Scripture, to be applicable only to God or to Christ.

["And observe farther, that the application of this supreme title ('the rock') to Peter, is inconsistent, above all, with the plain reference to the preceding context, made by our Lord in the beginning of this very verse, 'And I also say unto thee,' which manifestly points out, both by the copulative 'and,' and the connective adverb 'also,' the inseparable connexion of this verse with the previous declaration of Peter, concerning our Lord's divine dignity in the preceding sentence, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God;' and thereby demonstrates that our Lord's immediate reply, ('And I also say unto thee,' &c.,) did necessarily include this declaration of Peter, as being the principal object of the sentence,—the true foundation or rock, on which alone the catholic church can be properly built, because our faith in Christ (that he is truly the 'Son of the living God') is unquestionably the only security, or rock, of our salvation.

["And Christ was also the Rock, even of the primitive church of Israel; for St. Paul testifies, that 'they' (that is, the hosts of Israel) 'did all drink of that spiritual drink, for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ.' (1 Cor. x. 4.) And the Apostle, in a preceding chapter, says, 'Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.' (1 Cor. iii. 11.)

["It would exceed all due limits to attempt to discuss, at full length, the controversies which have divided Christians, when the peculiar passages of Scripture, upon which each controversy principally depends, come under consideration. The observations of Granville Sharp, which I have now extracted, appear to be deserving of attention. The various points which separate the Catholic and Protestant Church, will soon, perhaps, compel the more serious attention of the Protestant world, by the general revival and increase of Popery, and the reaction in its favour in a neighbouring country. And it may be considered the bounden duty of every theological student to make himself acquainted with the controversy existing between the Churches of England and Rome.*

["The political discussions respecting the extent of the privileges which the state may conveniently assign to the members of the Church of Rome, have of late years so entirely absorbed public attention, that they have almost superseded the religious argument, which is by far the most important part of the controversy; inasmuch as mistaken religious principle is the root of that system of action which originally excited the vigilance of the Legislature, and still requires a watchful superintendence."*]

There is no doubt, however, but our Lord intended to impart something special on Peter. Accordingly he bestows on him the keys of the kingdom of heaven; that is, the honour of first preaching the Gospel among the Jews and Gentiles. As stewards of great families bore a key or keys in token of their office, the phrase of giving a person the keys, means, investing him with power or authority, as steward. See Isai. xxii. 22. Now, whatever was meant by the keys was equally bestowed upon all the Apostles; (Matt. xviii. 18; John xx. 23;) and, therefore, the supremacy of Peter over them, or over the whole church of Christ, has no foundation in this passage. The use of a key being to open a door or gate, Christ promises to Peter that he should be the person who should first open the kingdom of heaven, that is, the Gospel dispensation, to both Jews and Gentiles. (Acts ii. 14; x.; xv. 7.) But it is also evident that James and John exercised this office independently of Peter, in converting those of the circumcision as well as he: St. Paul was likewise, by way of excellence, and by virtue of his mission, the Apostle of the Gentiles, and opened the kingdom of heaven to far more Gentiles than even the former did. Peter could not have a successor in his peculiar privilege of the keys, because it would involve the absurdity, that the door of faith is yet to be opened to the Jews and to the Gentiles. The use of the keys, therefore, means to declare authoritatively the laws of the Gospel and the terms of salvation, and to exercise discipline in the church, by refusing admission to those who objected to comply with these terms, and by excluding all who should violate those laws.

["Lightfoot has given us abundant proofs of the manner in which this expression was understood among the Jews, and the manner in which it consequently ought to be understood among Christians. The phrase לאסור ולהתיר 'to bind and to loose,' in the common language of the Jews, signified to prohibit and to permit, or to teach what is prohibited or permitted, what is lawful or unlawful. Lightfoot then produces many instances, and goes on to observe: 'By this sense of the phrase the intention of Christ is easily ascertained; namely, he first confers on the Apostles the ministerial power to teach what is to be done, and the contrary; he confers this power on them as ministers, and on all their successors, to the end of the world. Their power was more extensive than that of others, because they received authority to prohibit or to allow those things that were ordained in the law of Moses.' †

["In his Hebrew and Talmudical Exercitations on St. Matthew,‡ Lightfoot produces many more instances where the words 'to loose and to bind' are applied in this sense; and he shows that these words were first used in doctrine

* ["See on this subject the tracts of the Bishop of St. David's, the tracts against Popery; the ninth volume of Bishop Hall's Works; Bishop Bull's Reply to the Bishop of Meaux; Barrow's Pope's Supremacy; and many others."] and in judgments, concerning things allowed or not allowed in the law. Secondly, that 'to bind,' is the same with to forbid, or to declare forbidden. To think that Christ, (he continues,) when he used the common phrase, was not understood by his hearers in the common and vulgar sense, shall I call it a matter of laughter, or of madness?

* [Townsend's Chronological Arrangement of the New Testament, vol. i., pp. 284—287.—EDIT.]

† ["Lightfoot's Harmony of the New Testament, Works, folio, vol. i., p. 238.

‡ ["Idem, vol. ii., p. 205.

["To this, therefore, do these words amount: When the time was come wherein the Mosaic law, as to some part of it, was to be continued and to last for ever, he granted Peter here, and to the rest of the Apostles, (Matt. xviii. 18,) a power to abolish or confirm what they thought good; being taught this, and led by the Holy Spirit: as if he should say, Whatsoever ye shall bind in the law of Moses, that is, forbid, it shall be forbidden, the divine authority confirming it; and whatsoever ye shall loose, that is, permit, or shall teach that it is permitted and lawful, shall be lawful and permitted. Hence they bound, that is, forbad, circumcision to the believers; eating of things offered to idols, of things strangled, and of blood for a time, to the Gentiles; and that which they bound on earth was confirmed in heaven. They loosed; that is, allowed purification to Paul, and to four other brethren, for the shunning of scandal: (Acts xxi. 24:) and, in a word, by these words of Christ it was committed to them, (the Holy Spirit directing,) that they should make decrees concerning religion, as to the use and rejection of Mosaic rites and judgments, and that either for a time, or for ever.

["Let the words be applied, by way of paraphrase, to the matter that was transacted at present with Peter. 'I am about to build a Gentile church,' saith Christ; 'and to thee, O Peter, do I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven, that thou mayest first open the door of faith to them: but if thou askest by what rule that church is to be governed when the Mosaic rule may seem so improper for it, thou shalt be so guided by the Holy Spirit, that whatsoever of the law of Moses thou shalt forbid them, shall be forbidden; whatsoever thou grantest them, shall be granted, and that under a sanction made in heaven.' Hence in that instant, when he should use his keys, that is, when he was now ready to open the gate of the Gospel to the Gentiles, (Acts x.,) he was taught from heaven that the consorting of the Jew with the Gentile, which before had been bound, was now loosed; and the eating of any creature convenient for food, was now loosed, which before had been bound; and he in like manner looses both these.

["Those words of our Saviour, 'Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted to them,' (John xx. 23,) for the most part are forced to the same sense with these before us, when they carry quite another sense. Here the business is of doctrine only, not of persons; there of persons, not of doctrine. Here of things lawful or unlawful in religion, to be determined by the Apostles; there of persons obstinate, or not obstinate, to be punished by them, or not to be punished.

["As to doctrine, the Apostles were doubly instructed.

["1. So long sitting at the feet of their Master, they had imbibed the evangelical doctrine.

["2. The Holy Spirit directing them, they were to determine concerning the legal doctrine and practice, being compl^ately instructed and enabled in both, by the Holy Spirit descending upon them. As to the persons, they were endowed with a peculiar gift, so that, the same Spirit directing them, if they would retain and punish the sins of any, a power was delivered into their hands of delivering to Satan, of punishing with diseases, plagues, yea, death itself: which Peter did to Ananias and Sapphira; Paul to Elymas, Hymeneus, and Philetus, &c.

["Schoetgen * adds many instances to those collected by Lightfoot, that 'to loose and to bind' signified to pronounce what was lawful and unlawful, clean and unclean, condemned or permitted in the Mosaical dispensation. From all which he infers, that among the Jews this power of binding and loosing was given to Rabbis, or Teachers, who were skilled in the law, and appointed to instruct the people; and that our Lord not only claimed to himself the same power which had hitherto been possessed by the Jewish teachers, but bestowed it upon his own disciples, and invested them in his new dispensation with the same authority as that which had been hitherto exerted only by the Jewish teachers.

["The power of binding or loosing, of declaring what is lawful and what is unlawful, is evidently the highest power of governing, and of imposing laws for the guidance and direction of the spiritual society of the church. It was the belief of the primitive church, that this power was confided to the Apostles; and, as far as the circumstances of the various churches may require, was continued to their episcopal successors. The power of binding and loosing is generally called the power of the keys; and consists of authority to admit into the church, and to exclude from it; and it implies, as the words of our Lord decidedly assert, the power to condemn for sin, and to absolve from sin.† "] ‡

Accordingly, the power of binding and loosing, added to the power of the keys, may be considered as explanatory of that power. To bind and loose were words employed by the Jewish Doctors to signify the lawfulness or unlawfulness of things, as is proved by many able writers. It referred to the power of declaring the Gospel terms of salvation, by which they bound men with every proper obligation of righteousness, and loosed them from every unnecessary or temporary ceremony or institution. And as they acted under the influence of the Holy Spirit, their decisions were ratified in heaven. The Apostles did not enjoy this high power in its full extent till the day of Pentecost, when they received the Holy Ghost in the plenitude of his gifts. After this their decisions, in points of doctrine and duty, being all given by inspiration, were of infallible authority, and were ratified in heaven. But to establish from this passage the supremacy of Peter and of his pretended successors, or their infallibility, is contrary to its proper meaning.

"The gates of hell" (ᾅδου, hades) "shall not prevail against it." The expression, gates of hades, as used by the ancient Greeks, Jewish writers, and the Seventy interpreters, is not employed to signify the power of heresy, schism, sin, or Satan, but the state of the dead, whether righteous or wicked, or the entrance into that state.§ It seems, therefore, to imply that even death itself should not prevail against the genuine members of Christ's

* ["'Our Lord only asserts in very general terms, that the Apostles had power to decide what was approved or disapproved of God; but the Jews taught (Jalkut Simeoni, part i., fol. 225. 1.) whoever is excommunicated one day on earth, (although he be then absolved,) is not pardoned in heaven until after seven days: he who is thus condemned on earth for seven days, is absolved in heaven at the end of thirty.'—Schoettgen, Hor. Heb., vol. i., pp. 145, 146."] church. For if the words, gates of hades, never signify, in any ancient writer, or in the language of the east, heresy or error, to interpret them as meaning a security from error as promised to the church, must be to wrest them from their proper signification. Christ did not, therefore, in this text, promise to the church infallibility, but only perpetuity. He did not say that his church should never err, but that it should never perish.

† ["See also this subject fully discussed in Potter's Church Government, chap. v., pp. 330—361; Scott's Christian Life, folio edit., part ii., chap. vii, p. 492."]

‡ [Townsend's Chronological Arrangement of the New Testament, vol. i., pp. 288, 289.—EDIT.]

§ Whitby's Commentary in loc.

Besides, if the gates of hell or the powers of darkness were never to prevail against the Papacy, how came it to pass that the Protestant Reformation was effected, the principles of which are so widely different from those of the Church of Rome? How came the Romish religion and the Papal authority to be expelled from so many states that embraced Protestantism? How is it that she has not retained the superiority which she once enjoyed, or that she does not now number one half of the nations of the earth which formerly submitted to her yoke? We can solve the difficulty: we do not expect that the powers of hell will attempt to prevail against the Church of Rome, but we confidently believe that the powers of heaven are prevailing, and shall finally triumph over and subdue it.

If, by "the gates of hell" sin be meant, then the prevalence of sin in the Church of Rome has been fearfully great. She tells us of twenty-seven mortal sins, which corrupt and destroy the soul; that whoever, whether Clergyman or layman, allows himself in desire or act to practise any of them, he is not of Christ or his church, but of the synagogue of Satan. Such has been the language of several of the Roman Doctors. How awfully have these sins prevailed against the members of the Church of Rome? who are, nevertheless, continued members thereof, as if nothing evil had transpired; whilst no breach of any divine precept is considered so great, as to neglect the vain superstitions and traditions of the Church, by which she has made the commandments of God of none effect: and however bravely some of her sons may have resisted such immorality, she has, notwithstanding, compelled the great mass of her Clergy and people to partake of the cup of her abominations.

But if the expression "gates of hell" imply error in articles of faith, then the case of the Church of Rome is equally desperate. The Roman Catholic Doctors reject the imputation of novelty; but this rejection appears to us to be nothing more than an unworthy artifice to keep the ignorant in awe. They teach, that should the church believe or inculcate any doctrine contrary to those which were taught by Christ, the gates of hell would prevail against it. We ask, Did Christ or his Apostles teach the doctrines of extreme unction, purgatory, transubstantiation, sacrifice of the mass, worship of the host, communion in one kind? &c. Now the testimony of Popish writers can be easily adduced to show that they are new doctrines; and are, consequently, heresies, fearful additions to, or alarming detractions from, the word of God. Are not these astounding accusations against a Church which teaches such opinions? Is she then the pure spouse of Christ? Thus the gates of hell, including heresy and mortal sin, have prevailed against the Church of Rome. Her infallibility, therefore, has no foundation, inasmuch as the promise under consideration will not prevent the universal church from being either defiled by sin, or deformed by error. All that the promise implies is, that neither the one nor the other should abolish, though, on account of the frailty and weakness of men, both should greatly pollute, it.

(2.) They argue farther: "If a man neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican." (Matt. xviii. 17.) That is, say they, "If he, who will not hear the church, be counted as a heathen, and if God will ratify in heaven her decisions on earth, the church cannot err in any subject pertaining to faith, because it is impossible that God should approve her error, or require us under this penalty to hear her." Let any one read the two preceding verses, and he will discover that the whole passage refers to private quarrels between members of the same church or congregation. It is a case in which one brother sins against, or offends, another. The subject is not that which concerns doctrines or the principles of morality, but one of scandal or offence. In the process here laid down, the following plan is recommended:—1. "Go and reprove him alone." If this do not succeed, then, 2. "Take one or two more." But if he neglect to hear them, then, 3. "Tell it to the church;" that is, to the particular congregation or community to which they both belonged, or to the persons who may have the oversight of such congregation. Now it cannot be the universal church that is here spoken of, because such a process in reference to her would be impossible. Nor can it be the church met in Council, much less the Church of Rome thus assembled, that is here intended: for, 1. No such Councils existed for the first three centuries, none being held prior to the time of Constantine, in the year 325. 2. The church must always be assembled in such a Council, because there are, and doubtless will be always, persons thus offending against their brethren. And, 3. Every private member would be obliged, at what distance soever he be from it, to travel to this Council, and lay his grievance before it. Therefore, as these things are so absurd, there can be nothing in the above passage, about disobeying the Romish Church concerning a disputed doctrine, but rather slighting the admonition of a particular church concerning some known sin; and these churches are fallible.

(3.) Again: it is stated that Christ has promised infallibility to his church in the following words:—"Lo, I am with you alway, even to the end of the world." (Matt. xxviii. 20.) It is true, that Christ will not only be with the governors of his church, but also with its members, by the influence of his Spirit, even to the end of time; but this does not imply that every member or Bishop is infallible. In regard to the faithful, Christ hath promised to be with them and to dwell in them; (2 Cor. vi. 16;) yet this gives no assurance that they may not misunderstand, and ultimately renounce, Christianity. Indeed, this promise declares as much in favour of impeccability as it does of infallibility; and as he has not vouchsafed the former, we conclude he hath not imparted the latter. In short, it is His spiritual presence, and not infallibility, that is promised to the Apostles and to their successors although from other passages it appears, that they were infallible in what they delivered as the doctrines of Christ, in no place of Scripture does Christ assert the same in behalf of the church. The gracious presence of Christ with his people does not include the conjunctive infallibility of the Pastors, as a necessary foundation for the church diffusive. This passage, as well as those of a similar character, proves only that the presence of Christ is promised to his church, even to the end of time. And let it also be observed, that this promise of the divine presence is not made to the church in any one place, (for the seven churches of Asia have long since become extinct,)—but to those who teach whatsoever Christ commanded, and who observe and obey the things which are taught. Therefore, as far as the Romanists are proved defective in neither teaching all Christ's commands, nor in keeping them, so far are they not allowed to claim the benefit of this declaration; for the promise is made to those only who do and teach: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you."

(4.) From the promise made by Christ to his Apostles, that he would bestow upon them the Spirit of truth, who should abide with them, and guide them into all truth, the Roman Catholic writers also claim infallibility for their Church. We will quote the passage entire, because they usually take detached words and expressions from which to prove their favourite doctrines, and thus wrest the Scripture. "If ye love me, keep my commandments. And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever." (John xiv. 15, 16.) "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said to you." (John xiv. 26.) "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will show you things to come." (John xvi. 13.) Dr. Whitby's note on this passage furnishes a correct interpretation: "The Spirit of truth will lead you into all truth necessary to your apostolical office, and to direct the Christian church to the end of the world in all saving truth. For, as Irenæus notes, 'The doctrines which they taught, they after delivered in the Scriptures to be the pillar and foundation of our faith.' And as St. Austin adds, 'Christ having committed to them the writing of those things which he would have us read, they chose out of those things to write what they judged sufficient to be written for the salvation of the faithful.' It is, therefore, certain that the Apostles, in compiling the canon of Scripture, were so assisted by the Holy Spirit as to write all truths necessary for the salvation of believers, and consequently, that all things necessary to be believed or done by Christians are fully and perspicuously contained in the holy Scriptures."

From the expressions, "He shall teach you things to come," and, "He shall bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said to you," the two following points are evident:—1. That this promise can belong only to the Apostles; because it was to their remembrance only that these things could be brought. 2. That this promise cannot possibly pertain to any Council or Pope after the death of the Apostles, seeing that they never challenged to themselves the gift of prophecy, nor had future contingencies revealed to them. If the Bishops of the Church of Rome can show that they have the gift of prophecy in continued succession, and are enabled to foretell things to come, as the Apostles, then we shall be ready to own that the promise was directed to this Church in all ages, but not till then.

But admitting that the passage refers to the Apostles and their successors, or, which is different, to the whole church, the Apostle John declares: "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things," that is, all things necessary and useful; not that they were incapable of mistaking, but that with due care they might avoid all serious mistakes. Besides, the promise is made to those who love God and keep his commandments; which gives no very good ground for many Popes and others of the Roman Catholic Clergy to put in a claim to the privilege which the promise thus implies.

Nothing can be more unreasonable than to challenge a right to a power, by virtue of a promise granted on very different grounds from those on which that claim is made. The promise of infallible assistance had peculiar respect to the Apostles and to the infancy of the church, and not to the state of the church in all ages. It is therefore unwarrantable that a promise made to persons in one office must of necessity be applied in the same manner to persons holding a different one; that a promise made to each individually must be equally applied to others collectively in a Council; that a promise made by an immediate and divine revelation, enabling those persons to whom it was given to work miracles and utter prophecies in order to certify their testimony to be infallible, should be applied to those who dare not challenge divine revelation, and who never did work a miracle or utter a prophecy to attest such supernatural assistance. Yet all this is done by Romanists when they endeavour to deduce the infallibility of their Church from those promises of the assistance of Christ and his Spirit, which were made to the Apostles.

(5.) In confirmation of the fact, that the promise of infallibility made to the Apostles is to be restrained to their own times, we refer to the following serious difficulties which attend the contrary supposition:—(i.) It is altogether a different thing to say, that there shall always be a church, and that that church shall always be infallible. Protestants maintain, that the church shall never be extinct, and that there shall always be a number of men professing Christianity in the world, but without infallibility; and should the members of the Roman Church become defunct or renounce Christianity, there would still be a number in the Protestant and Greek Churches, who would profess the true religion, and perpetuate the faith. (ii.) The duration of the church rather argues the infallibility of the promise than that of the church; for certainly the infallibility of the latter cannot be inferred from a promise of perpetuity. All the infallibility implied in this case, is the certainty of the accomplishment of the promise; such as, that the sceptre should not depart from Judah (Gen. xlix. 10) till the days of the Messiah. This declaration did not secure infallibility to the Jewish polity, but a continuance unto the appointed time. When God said, "In Jerusalem have I set my name for ever," does it follow that Jerusalem should be always infallible? And there is no such declaration in behalf of Rome as that which was made to Jerusalem. To make the promise to the church faithful and true, there needs only a succession of Christians in the world. (iii.) Should I grant that the existence of a church necessarily supposes the assistance of God's Spirit, which is readily granted; still this assistance does not confer infallibility, otherwise every Christian would necessarily be infallible. (iv.) Supposing I grant this assistance to be infallible, does infallible assistance make the testimony of those possessing it infallible? If Romanists can prove that they have this infallibility by working miracles and uttering prophecies, they may satisfy us; but whatever comes short of this proves nothing. (v.) Supposing I grant that the testimony of the Catholic Church is infallible, this concession will avail nothing, unless Romanists prove their Church to be the only Catholic Church; which they never can do. (vi.) But suppose we grant their Church to be the Catholic Church, yet even this is far from proving the Pope, or Council, or both, to be infallible.

How, or by what means, do they claim the infallibility of which they boast? Where is it said that the promises made to the church are, bona fide, made to the representatives of that church? The Apostles had this promise given to them in their personal and individual character, but not in their representative. Thus the Romish hierarchy are at least six removes from any title or claim to that infallibility which was promised to the Apostles.

(6.) The following text is also quoted in favour of infallibility:—"But if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of truth." (1 Tim. iii. 15.) The Romanists have long assumed to themselves the name of "the Catholic Church," to the exclusion of all other Churches; and have affirmed that, as the only true "church of the living God," they are "the pillar and ground of the truth," so that her decisions are infallible, and her constitutions and discipline are binding on the whole Christian world. In opposition to such conclusion, we offer the following remarks:—(i.) That the Church of Rome has no authority to call herself "the church of the living God," to the exclusion of all others. Every society of believers who, with their Pastors, meet to worship God in spirit and in truth, according to the Gospel form, is as really a "true church" as that of Rome, and is called so in the Scripture, whether the members thereof be more or less numerous. Thus, "The church of God which is at Corinth;" (1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Cor. i. 1;) "The churches of Galatia;" (Gal. i. 1;) "The church of the Thessalonians." (1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1.) And in the conclusion of some of Paul's Epistles, "The church" in such or such a house is saluted. All associated are represented as making one great community, which is sometimes called "the church of God," sometimes "the body of Christ," and sometimes "the house" and "temple of God." This will prove that no particular society of Christians, however numerous or pure, is in Scripture called "the church of the living God," to the exclusion of all other Christian societies; and that the whole of these taken together form "the pillar and support of the truth." Besides, if the Apostle, in this passage, had spoken of any particular church at all, not the Church of Rome, but that at Ephesus must have been alluded to; because Timothy, when this Epistle was written, resided at Ephesus, and not at Rome. Wherefore, the claim of Rome to be exclusively the only Catholic Church, ought to be rejected with contempt, because it is a usurpation which is contrary to Scripture. (ii.) But what is "the truth" of which the Church is said to be the pillar and support? "The truth" referred to cannot be any particular system of doctrine expressed in the words of human invention, such as the "symbols of faith" composed by Councils or Synods, whether general or particular, in ancient or modern times. "The truth" is the revelation of God to man: "Thy word is truth." (John xvii. 17.) "The truth" belonging to the Christian church is composed of the writings of the Old and New Testaments. It was expressed in "the form of sound words," which St. Paul exhorted Timothy "to hold fast." (2 Tim. i. 13.) The Gospel revelation is called "the truth" in several passages of Scripture. (Gal. iii. 1; v. 7; Eph. i. 13; 2 Thess. ii. 10, 12; 1 Tim. ii. 4; vi. 5; 2 Tim. ii. 15, 18; Titus i. 1, cum multis aliis.) (iii.) This truth has been preserved by the Churches throughout the world; for almost every Church procured a copy of the sacred writings, which was transmitted to their successors; and with such care have these been preserved, that in comparing the almost innumerable manuscripts and translations together, their integrity is indeed miraculous. The Church of Rome has done no more than her share in preserving Scripture truth. And had she never existed, or were we to judge of the preservation of truth by those documents which we have, without having recourse to any belonging to her, the truth of Scripture and of revealed religion would stand on the same immovable basis as it does at present. (iv.) The church is called "the pillar and ground of the truth," not in respect to its teachers, but rather to its members being an assembly of believers; and, therefore, the infallibility of the representatives of the church can never be established on words which expressly relate to the whole body of believers, as distinguished from their Bishop. (v.) "The church of the living God" is composed of believers who live piously, avoid sin, and do good to all. Wicked men never were employed or authorized by Heaven to be the supporters of his infallible truth. (vi.) The phraseology commonly used by the ancient Fathers was, to style eminent persons "the pillars and ground of faith;" and yet they were far from judging that any of them were infallible. It therefore follows, that according to the judgment of the primitive church, this phrase does not import infallibility. (vii.) The church cannot here be styled "the pillar and ground of truth,"—the foundation on which the truth is built, and which gives to it authority: "Truth being," saith Chrysostom, "the pillar and ground of the church."* St. Paul says that the church is "built on the foundation of the Apostles;" (Eph. ii. 19, 20;) and our Lord declares, "On this rock will I build my church;" that is, on the truth. The church therefore is emphatically the church of Christ because she holds the truth, and because it is essential to her existence that she maintain and teach all necessary truths.

2. In favour of infallibility, Romanists argue from the necessity there is for a judge in matters of controversy. That without such a court of appeal there would be nothing but endless confusion; that without it God has not made sufficient provision for the assurance of men's faith, and for the peace and unity of his church; and that because God is wise and good, he must have bestowed infallibility on the church, for the purpose of preventing disputes, and of promoting unity. Or, as it is expressed in the canon law, Aliter Dominus non videretur fuisse discretus: "Otherwise our Lord had not seemed to be discreet." The following observations will show that this argument is insufficient for the purpose.

(1.) It rather supposes what God should have done according to our opinion, than what he has actually accomplished. Our Lord commands us to search his word; and Paul asks, "Why of your own selves judge ye not what is right?" The Church of Rome seems to differ from both, and says, if this liberty were permitted, God had not seemed to be wise. Now such notions are not only fanciful, but very suspicious, and are not to be justified by any criterion of truth. The whims of men may dictate many plausible hypotheses concerning what was necessary to be done. Yet to such it may be said, with the Apostle on another occasion, "O man, who art thou, that repliest against God?" It is an insecure way of arguing a priori in reference to the revealed truths of religion—that God has done what we suppose he must have done. It is far more modest and safe, to receive the truth of God as he hath plainly revealed it, without limiting the exercise of his attributes by our short-sighted and preconceived notions.

* Της εκκλησιας και στυλος και εδραιωμα.—Chrysostom in 1 Tim. iii. 15.

(2.) A much more effectual way of preventing disputes and errors, and of promoting unity, would have been to make every man infallible; and yet God hath not done this.

(3.) The Jewish church was not infallible; for she denied our Saviour, by following tradition. How then does it appear, that the Christian church must of necessity be infallible?

(4.) We might argue from the wisdom and goodness of God, that sin would not enter into the world at all; or with the Universalists, that the redemption procured by Christ will ultimately and must of necessity effect the salvation of all men: whereas sin is in the world, and the Scripture plainly declares that all men will not be saved. Now if God has not prevented sin, or absolutely secured the salvation of all, why should we wonder that he refuses to bestow infallibility on his church?

(5.) If an infallible universal judge were necessary for the unity and peace of the church, we must also conclude that there is, or ought to be, a universal infallible judge in temporal and civil matters, inasmuch as this is necessary to the peace of the world. Men generally are as obstinate in affairs of a temporal and political nature as they are in those pertaining to faith. But it is evident there is no such judge; and men may, notwithstanding, live in peace and harmony. Nevertheless an acute reasoner may argue very plausibly, that as God is wise and good, so he must have given infallibility to some person or persons, by which he or they might know how to govern the world with universal sway, in order to prevent confusion, controversy, and wrong. And he might quote the phrase, otherwise God would not be discreet, with as great show of truth as any, in order to prove the necessity of infallibility in religious matters.

(6.) There is no need of such a judge in subjects pertaining to religion, because men may be sufficiently certain without it. The doctrines and precepts which are revealed in Scripture, as being necessary to faith and practice, are clear enough to every one. They are certainly as intelligible and as capable of being understood in the sacred text, as they are in the canons and decrees of Bishops and Popes, and in the expositions of Priests: for undoubtedly, Protestants understand these truths better from the Bible and from their teachers, than Romanists are enabled to do from the decisions of their Popes and Clergy.

(7.) An infallible umpire, supposing one to exist, is not a certain and safe means to end controversies and preserve unity, unless we were satisfied with his character as a judge, and acquainted with the extent of his authority. Until we are certain on these subjects, the dispute must remain as it is. There are three controversies now existing, namely, one between Roman Catholics and Protestants, whether there be an infallible judge; and the other two are among the Romanists themselves, namely, who this judge is, and what is the extent of his authority: neither of which has as yet been satisfactorily decided.

(8.) There is no such absolute need as is pretended for determining all controversies. If men would divest themselves of prejudice as they ought, they would soon become unanimous on religious subjects of any importance; but while they are influenced by evil passions, they would not hearken to an infallible judge, if there were one, for they would speedily call his infallibility in question. In doubtful and trivial matters, charity and forbearance would make the church as happy and peaceable as it is designed to be in the present life. And to this agree the words of St. Paul: "Though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing." This charity or love is of more value than even knowledge. If men were governed by it, broils and contentions would cease; for charity covers a multitude of sins. And whatsoever knowledge men may have, if their hearts be unrenewed, envy, malice, ill-will, emulation, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, unmercifulness, implacability, &c., will naturally spring up. But, alas! to a very great degree, the religion of Rome has substituted her infallibility and kindred doctrines, for the pure charity of the Gospel.

(9.) Were there not dissensions and divisions in the Apostles' times? St. Paul says, "For there must be also heresies (or divisions) among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you." (1 Cor. xi. 19.) The necessity of heresies is not absolute, or by the appointment of God, they rise from the wickedness of man. Nor is the reason for their existence causal, as if the wisdom of God designed they should exist, that they who are approved might be made manifest, but rather eventual; as if the Apostle had said, Whence it will come to pass, that they who are approved will be made manifest. The Apostle made no reference to an infallible judge in order to prevent or to destroy heresy; because he knew nothing of those judges for whom Rome, in modern times, contends.

3. It is argued that the Catholic Church, which term the Romanists confine to those who are in communion with the Pope, cannot err in her doctrines, because they have regularly descended to her, link by link, in an unbroken chain, from the Apostles themselves, whose inspired infallibility was universally acknowledged.

This is a modification of the well-known argument of prescription, employed by Irenæus and Tertullian in the second century with so much success. But what was a very good argument in their time, is a very lame one in ours, when we are not separated from the Apostles by one or two links, but by fifty or sixty; and part of that time has been a long night of ignorance and superstition. That some novelties have been introduced, and several apostolical customs disused, we have undoubted testimony. The argument from prescription, so far as it respects the nature of God and of Christ, the doctrines especially referred to by Irenæus and Tertullian, is as strong now as it was in their days, because we still possess their writings; and, consequently, for all controversial purposes, we occupy the same ground as they. But this argument, in the hands of Romanists, is altogether futile, because they have introduced several novelties into their system, such as transubstantiation, sacrifice of the mass, worship of the host, purgatory, indulgences, auricular confession, and absolution, extreme unction, with many others: and although we cannot point out the precise period when they began to exist, we can determine the time when they did not exist, which answers every purpose sufficiently to overthrow the argument under consideration.

"Whatsoever is first is true; whatsoever is more recent is spurious." This sentiment may be employed unfairly, even in attempting to establish that which is false; for there are errors in the world far more ancient than Christianity itself. Is it then fair reasoning to say, that these errors are established truths, because of their antiquity? Still the argument may be applied with some advantage. But what then? Will this give sanction to the above-named doctrines of the Latin Church which are of recent origin? Certainly not.*

III. We shall now produce and examine the various opinions entertained by Roman Catholics, respecting the seat and extent of infallibility.

1. If infallibility belonged to the Church of Rome, we should certainly infer, that it would not be difficult to ascertain where it was, and who were the depositaries of it. For if the seat of it were a subject of doubt or uncertainty, the fact itself must be viewed as suspicious. If one party place it in the hands of some, and another party consider others to possess it, this would produce difficulties far more great and insuperable than those among Protestants, inasmuch as there is among them no diversity of opinion respecting the seat of infallible direction, namely, the Holy Scriptures.

There is a variety of opinion among Romanists respecting where this infallibility exists. All will say that it exists in the Church; but when they come to fix on the place of its residence, that they divide into four. Some consider it in the universal Church scattered over the world; some lodge it in the Pope; others in a general Council independent of the Pope; while many assert that a General Council, with a Pope at its head, is infallible.

2. As our plan is to regard the testimony of the standards of the Roman Church in declaring what her doctrines are, we shall therefore quote the opinions of her Doctors in giving their true sentiments on infallibility.

The Jesuits and their followers maintain that the Pope is infallible; that he is the source of that unlimited and universal power which Christ has granted to his church; that Bishops and subordinate rulers derive their authority from him; that he is not bound by any laws of the Church, nor by any decrees of its Councils; and that he is supreme lawgiver, whose decisions it is in the highest degree criminal to oppose or disobey. We give the following as the sentiments of the Jesuits which are found in the Roman Catholic Du Pin, whose extensive knowledge and general honesty entitle him to credit and respect. An important thesis was maintained on the 12th of December, 1661, by one of the Jesuits in the College of Clermont, and which was strenuously supported by that fraternity afterward; namely, that "Jesus Christ has granted to St. Peter and his successors, as often as they speak in the chair, (ex cathedrâ,) the same infallibility which he himself possessed;" from whence the Jesuit concluded, "That there is in the Roman Church an infallible judge of controversies, even excluding a general Council, as well in questions of right as in those of fact." A short time after, the author of the thesis published an explanation of these propositions, wherein he declared:—"First, That he did not acknowledge in the Pope the same personal infallibility which is in Jesus Christ, but only an infallibility of assistance, whereby the Vicars of Jesus Christ are rendered infallible in their definitions. Secondly, Upon his having extended this infallibility to questions of fact, that he spoke only of facts joined to questions of faith."† But the Popes themselves assert the absolute infallibility of their decisions and decrees; as will appear to any one who is conversant with the style and claims of their bulls. Pighius says: "The judgment of the apostolic see, with a Council of domestic Priests, is far more certain than that of an universal Council of the Priests of the whole earth, set apart from the pontifical authority."* The Rev. T. Maguire, an Irish Roman Catholic, in his Discussion with the Rev. R. T. Pope, says: "The Pope at the head of a Council regularly convened, in their decrees regarding faith, are admitted to be infallible. That is one instance. Also, if the Pope, with a few Bishops assembled, should issue decrees touching the deposite of faith, and which are subsequently received by the Church dispersed, we account them infallible."† Again he says: "The Pope's infallibility is not a doctrine of mine, nor of any Catholic. There are differences on the subject between the French and Ultramontanists, (Italians,) but they are merely the private opinions of Divines. The Church has pronounced no opinion on it. She only pronounces on essentials."‡ The Rev. Mr. Nolan, an Irish Roman Catholic Priest, says: "Some Catholic Divines, indeed, maintain that the Pope, in his ministerial capacity, speaking ex cathedrâ, on matters of faith, is infallible; and there are others who do not hold this opinion. But all Catholics know and believe that the Church is infallible, whether assembled in a General Council of her Bishops, with the chief Pontiff at their head, or when dispersed throughout the world, her Bishops receive and assent to the definitions of faith promulgated by the chief Pastor. Every Catholic knows and believes this."§

["That system which places infallibility in the Church virtual, or Roman Pontiff, is called the Italian system.‖ The Italian Clergy, placed under the influence of the Pope, concur with abject submission in this opinion. These receive the official definitions of the supreme hierarch on faith and morals as the divine oracles of infallibility.

["This system, in all its absurdity, has been patronized by theologians, Popes, and Councils. Many Romish Doctors have entertained this opinion, such as Baronius Bellarmine, Binius, Carranza, Pighius, Turrecremata, Canus, Pole, Duval, Lainez, Aquinas, Cajetan, Fabulottus, and Palavicino. Several Pontiffs, as might be expected, have been found in the same ranks; such as Pascal, Pius, Leo, Pelagius, Boniface, and Gregory.¶ These, and many others who have joined the same standard, form a numerous and influential faction in the bosom of the Papacy. Bellarmine, Duval, and Arsdekin indeed have represented this as the common sentiment entertained by all Popish theologians of distinction.

["This system seems also to have been embraced by the Councils of Florence, Lateran, and Trent. These conventions conferred on the Pontiff an authority above all Councils. The pontifical therefore is superior to synodal authority; and, according to the Florentine and

* Faber's Difficulties of Romanism.

† Du Pin's Ecclesiastical History, cent. xvii., p. 147. Edit. Oxford, 1725.

* "Longe certius est unius apostolicæ sedis cum concilio domesticorum sacerdotum judicium, quàm universalis concilii totius orbis sacerdotum seclusa authoritate unius sedis apostolicæ."—Pighius Albert. De Hierarch. Eccles., lib. vi., c. i., p. 212. Edit. Colon. 1538.

† Discussion with Pope, p. 26.

‡ Idem, pp. 47, 48.

§ Discussion at Carlow, November, 1824, p. 94.

["‖ 'Per Ecclesiam intelligimus Pontificem Romanum.'—Gretser., c. 10. 'Papa virtualiter est tota Ecclesia.'—Herv., c. xxiii.; Jacobitius, i., p. 63.

["¶ Bellarm, iv., 2; Fabul., c. 8; Caron., c. 18; Du Pin, 336; Labb., Concil. xviii., 1427; Maimbourg, 56.

[" 'Est hæc communis Theologorum doctrina.'—Arsdekin, Theologia, tom. i., p. 57. Antwerp, 1686.

Lateran decisions, must possess infallibility. The Lateran Synod, besides, renewed and approved the bull of Boniface VIII., which declared subjection to the Roman Pontiff necessary to all for salvation. 'The Pope,' said Cardillus in the Council of Trent, without contradiction, 'is so supplied with the aid and light of the Holy Spirit, that he cannot err to a degree of scandal, in defining faith or enacting general laws.' * These Councils were general, and accounted a representation of the whole Church. The belief of pontifical exemption from error, therefore, was not confined to a mere party, but extended to the whole communion.

["The infallibility of the Roman Pontiff, maintained in this manner by theologians, Popes, and Councils, has also been rejected by similar authority. Doctors, Pontiffs, Synods, and indeed all antiquity, have denied the inerrability of his Roman Holiness. The absurdity has been disclaimed by Gerson, Launoy, Almain, Richerius, Alliaco, Victoria, Tostatus, Lyra, Alphonsus, Marca, Du Pin, Bossuet, and many other Romish Divines. Many Popes also have disowned this prerogative; such as Damasus, Celestin, Pius, Gelasius, Innocent, Eugenius, Adrian, and Paul.† The French likewise explode this claim. These superhuman pretensions have been also rejected by the Councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basil.

["The assertors of pontifical infallibility, outraging common sense and varying from others, have, also, on this subject, differed among themselves. Few, indeed, have had the effrontery to represent even the Pope as unerring in all his decisions. His Holiness, according to Bellarmine and Dens, may, in a personal and private capacity, be subject to mistake, and, according to Costerus, be guilty of heresy and infidelity. The Transalpines, accordingly, have disagreed among themselves on the object, form, and certainty of infallibility.

["The object of infallibility has been one topic of disputation among the partisans of the Italian school. These contend whether this prerogative of his Holiness be restricted to faith or extended to fact. The majority seem to confine this attribute of the Pontiff to faith, and admit his liability to error in fact. Bellarmine and his partisans seem to limit inerrability to the former, and leave the latter to the contingency of human ignorance and imbecility. One party, however, though a small one, in the Romish communion, would cover even the varying form of discipline with the shield of infallibility.

["The Jesuits and Canonists in general would extend infallibility both to questions of right and of fact. These patrons of sycophancy and absurdity, in their celebrated thesis of Clermont, acknowledged an unerring judge of controversy in both these respects. This judge, according to Jesuitical adulation, is the Pope, who, seeing with the eye of the Church, and enlightened with divine illumination, is unerring as the Son of God, who imparts the infallibility which he possesses.* We tremble while we write such shocking blasphemy. John, Boniface, and Alexander, monsters of iniquity, were, according to this statement, inspired by God, and infallible as Emmanuel. Talon, the French Advocate-General, protesting against this insult on reason and common sense, stigmatized it as impiety and blasphemy.

["This blasphemy, however, was not confined to the cringing, unprincipled Jesuits. Leo, in the Lateran Council in the eleventh session, recognised the same principle in all its hatefulness and deformity. He declared his ability 'to supply the defects both of right and fact, from his certain knowledge, and from the plenitude of his apostolic power.'† The declaration was made with the full approbation of the holy Roman Synod, which represented the universal Church. Its belief, therefore, should be an article of faith, and its rejection a heresy. The Jansenists, on this topic, opposed the Jesuits, and betrayed, by their disputations, the boasted unity of Catholicism.

["The Italian school also vary with respect to the form of infallibility. This party, indeed, confess the Pope's liability to error and deception, like other men, in a private or personal capacity, and limit his infallibility to his official decisions, EX CATHEDRA, or when he speaks from the chair. But the friends of official infallibility, agreeing in word, have disagreed about the interpretation of the term. One variety, on this topic, represents his Holiness as speaking with official authority when he decides in Council. This explanation has been patronized by Viguerius, Bagot, and Monilian. But these, it is plain, betray their own cause, by transferring infallibility from the Pope to his Council. A second variety limit his judicial sentences to the determinations which he delivers according to Scripture and tradition. This interpretation has been countenanced by Callot and Turrecremata. But these, like the former, miss their aim, and ascribe infallibility, not to the Pope, but to Scripture and tradition. The difficulty still remains, to know when his Holiness speaks in accordance with these standards. A third variety, supported by Canus and his partisans, reckon these official instructions, such as are uttered after mature and diligent examination.‡ But all the wisdom of Canus, and his friends, would be necessary to distinguish between the Pontiff's deliberate and hasty determinations.

["The fourth and commonest variety, on this topic, is that of Bellarmine, Duval, Raynald, Dens, and Cajetan. His Holiness, according to these Doctors, utters his oracles ex cathedrâ, when, in a public capacity, he teaches the whole Church concerning faith and morality.§ But a difficulty still remains, to determine when this is the case; and this difficulty has divided the advocates of this folly into several factions. The Pontiff, say some, teaches the whole Church, when he enacts laws; and, say others, ["* 'Arsdekin, i., 114, 118; Du Pin, iii., 148; Crabb, Concilia iii., 697; Labb., Concilia xix., 968.

['Romanum Pontificem, neque in rebus fidei definiendis neque etiam in condendis legibus generalibus, usquam sic errare posse, ut scandalo sit aliis. Nam in his rebus perpetuo illi adest Spiritus Sancti patrocinium lumenque divinum, quo ejus mens copiose admodum illustrata, velut manu ducatur.'—Cardill. in Labb., xx., 1177.

["† 'Certum est quod Pontifex possit errare etiam in iis, quæ tangunt fidem.'—Adrian, 6; De Min., Art. 3; Maimbourg, 138. 'Non dubito, quin ego et decessores mei errare aliquando potuerimus.'—Paul, 4 in Maimbourg, 139; Du Pin, 364; Caron., c. 18; Launoy, 1, 145. 'Galli aliique moderni ipsius infallibilitatem impugnent.'—Dens, i., 5. 'Papa solus potest errare et esse hæreticus.'—Panormitan, Q. 1, N. 21, p. 140.

["* 'Papam non minus infallibilem in materia facti vel juris esse quam fuerit Jesus Christus.'—Caron., 60; Walsh, Controversial Letter, p. 9. 'Nullum errorem cadere posse in doctrinam, quam Pontifex authoritate summa definit et proponit universæ Ecclesiæ, sive illa juris sive facti quæstionem contineat.'—Arsdekin, i, 124.

['Papam, nec dicto nec facto, errare posse credebant.'—Barclay, 35, c. 4.

["† 'Tam juris quam facti defectus supplentes, ex certa nostra scientia, et de apostolicæ potestatis plenitudine.'—Labb., xix., 968.

["‡ Launoy, ad Metay; Du Pin, 340; Maimbourg, 55; Launoy, iii., 29, 40.

["§ 'Censetur loqui ex cathedrâ quando loquitur ex plenitudine potestatis, præscribens universali Ecclesiæ aliquid tanquam dogma fide credendum vel in moribus observandum.'—Dens Theologia, ii., 159; Du Pin, 341; Launoy, iii., 24; Maimbourg, 56.

when he issues rescripts. The Pontiff, say Tannerus and Compton, instructs the whole ecclesiastical community, when his bull has, for some time, been affixed to Peter's door and the apostolic chancery. This, which Du Pin calls the height of folly, is the concentrated spirit of sublimated nonsense. Maimbourg requires public and solemn prayer, with the consultation of many Councils and Universities.

[" The certainty or uncertainty of pontifical exemption from error has, in the Romish communion, been a subject of disagreement and disputation. While the Ultramontane contends for its truth, and the Cisalpine for its falsehood, a numerous and influential party maintain its utter uncertainty, and represent it as a question, not of faith, but of opinion. The class-book of Maynooth stoutly advocates the probability of both systems.* The sage writer's penetrating eye could, at a glance, discern the probability of two contradictory propositions. The author must have been a man of genius. Anglade, Slevin, and Kenney, at the Maynooth examination, declared, on oath, their indecision on this inquiry. The learned Doctors could not tell whether their visible head be the organ of truth or the channel of error, even in his official decisions, and on points of faith. A communion, which boasts of infallibility, cannot determine whether the sovereign Pontiff, the plenipotentiary of heaven, and 'the father and teacher of all Christians,' be, even when speaking from the chair, the oracle of Catholicism or of heresy."]

In the Romish Confession of Faith imposed upon the proselytes to Popery in Hungary, and drawn up by the Jesuits, previous to 1829, and in the nineteenth century, the second article is as follows:—"We confess and believe that the Pope of Rome is the head of the Church, and that HE CANNOT ERR."†

Bishop Hay, in the "Sincere Christian," gives two systems of infallibility as the true doctrine of his Church; he then gives two additional systems respecting the infallibility of the Pope personally, and firmly maintains that his Holiness cannot err, and proceeds a great way towards placing all who oppose him in the list of heretics. The following are these systems:—"QUEST. In whom, then, does the infallibility properly reside? ANS. In the body of the Pastors, joined with their head. Q. How so? A. In either of these two ways: (1.) When the Pastors of the Church are called together by the chief Pastor, in a General Council, to decide any thing about religion, whether regarding faith or manners, they are then infallible in their decisions, and their decrees are considered as dictated by the Holy Ghost. (2.) When the head of the Church, without calling together the other Pastors, publishes any decree concerning faith or morals, and this decree is accepted and received by the body of the Pastors, either expressly or tacitly, it then becomes a decree of the whole Church, and of the same infallible authority as if it had been made in a General Council."‡ Here are two systems of infallibility, as claimed by the Pope, and the body of Pastors. Then the other two systems follow, respecting the personal infallibility of the Pope:—"QUEST. When the head of the Church publishes any decree concerning faith or morals, to which he requires submission from all the faithful, is he himself infallible in what he teaches? ANS. This is not proposed as an article of divine faith, nor has the Church ever made any decision concerning it. Great numbers of the most learned Divines are of the opinion, that in such a case the head of the Church is infallible in what he teaches. Q. On what grounds do those Divines form their opinion who believe that the Pope himself, when he speaks to all the faithful, as head of the Church, is infallible in what he teaches? A. On several very strong reasons, both from Scripture, tradition, and reason. Q. What proofs do they bring from Scripture? A. These following." After adducing several inappropriate texts, the Bishop says: "Whence it follows that St. Peter, as head of the Church, and consequently his successors in office, shall never fail in faith nor teach false doctrine." He adduces proofs from tradition, or the ancient Fathers, and then gives several reasons for the Pope's infallibility; after which he concludes with the following assertion, which, in our opinion, contradicts what he had said just before:—"As this is a question in which faith is not concerned, because the Church has never given any decision about it, one may believe it or not in his private opinion." We shall have occasion again to consider the reasons for the Pope's infallibility, and probably shall refer to these quoted by Dr. Hay.

Many Roman Catholics, especially the French, place infallibility in a general Council lawfully assembled; and affirm that the Pope, as distinct from the Council, is liable to error. ["According to this class, an ecumenical Synod is the sovereign tribunal, which all ranks of men, even to the Roman Pontiff himself, are bound to obey. An assembly of this kind, guided by the Holy Spirit, is superior to the Pope, and supreme judge of controversy. The Pontiff, in case of disobedience, is subject to deposition by the same authority."*] The following is a declaration of the Faculty of Divinity of Paris, made to the King, May 8th, 1631, which expresses the true opinion of the French Church, at that period, on this subject:—"That it is not the doctrine of the Faculty that the Pope is above a General Council."† "That it is not the doctrine or opinion of the Faculty that the Pope is infallible when he has not the concurring consent of the Church."‡ In 1663, in consequence of the doctrine of the Jesuits, the whole matter came before the French King and Parliament, from whose decisions we make the following extracts, in their own words, from the judgment which was formed on six propositions respecting the power of the Pope, two of which are given above:—"No body is ignorant of the efforts and artifices practised by the partisans of the court of Rome, for above thirty years, to advance the power of the Pope, by fictitious prerogatives, and to introduce into these parts of the world the new opinions of the Ultramontanes." (Italians.) "And at length affairs have arrived at such a crisis, that, having insinuated secretly these false and dangerous propositions in writings, they have had the boldness to publish them, and to insert them in theses to be openly disputed and canvassed. This rashness has not remained unpunished, forasmuch as this august assembly, equally jealous of maintaining the royal authority, the rights of the Crown, the liberties of the Gallican Church, and the ancient doc-

["* 'Utramque sententiam esse probabilem.'—Anglade, 180, 181; Slevin, 201, 202; Kenney, 37."]

† London Protestant, 1831, p. 208.

‡ Sincere Christian, vol. i., p. 184. Dublin, 1822.

["* Du Pin, iii., 283; Gibert, ii., 7; Crabb, Concilia ii., 1018; Caranza, 565."—EDIT.]

† "Doctrinam facultatis non esse, quod summus Pontifex sit supra concilium œcumenicum."

‡ "Non esse doctrinam vel dogma facultatis, quod summus Pontifex, nullo accedente Ecclesiæ consensu, sit infallibilis."—Du Pin, Ecclesiastical History, cent. xvii., p. 150.

trine, to all which these opinions, respecting the infallibility and superiority of the Pope over a Council, are directly opposed, has not failed to restrain these enterprises by the severity of its arrêts, and even to punish the authors of them, so that one may say that these monsters have been stifled in their birth, and that these attempts have been so far from meeting with any success, that they have served only the more powerfully to confirm the truth, and to cover with shame the emissaries of the court of Rome. And since the six propositions contain not only the condemnation of every thing that could establish any superiority of the Pope in temporals, but also whatever could be brought to support the chimera of infallibility, and also of an imaginary dependence of a Council upon the Pope ; it being certain that if the Faculty does not believe that the Pope is infallible, it must by necessary consequence believe, that he may fall or be seduced into error, and corrected by a superior power, which can be no other than that of a General Council and the universal Church : and all the world being agreed that there must be a subordination, when one acknowledges that the Pope is not above a Council, it necessarily follows that he must be below it, and subject to its decisions, and to the observation of the canons." The Parliament also considered the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility as " contrary to the ancient doctrine of the Church, the canons of General Councils, and the liberties of the Gallican Church." *

[" The Gallican Church has distinguished itself, in every age, by its opposition to pontifical usurpation and tyranny. The Pontiff's authority, in consequence, never obtained the same prevalence in France, as in several other nations of Christendom : his infallibility is one of those claims which the French school never acknowledged. His liability to error, even on questions of faith, has accordingly been maintained by the ablest French Divines, such as Launoy, Gerson, Almain, Richerius, Maimbourg, Marca, Bossuet, and Du Pin. These Doctors have been supported by many French Universities, such as Paris, Angiers, Toulouse, and Orleans ; which have been followed by those of Louvain, Herford, Cologne, Cracow, and Vienna. Many Pontiffs, also, such as Damasus, Celestine, Felix, Adrian, Gelasius, Leo, Innocent, and Eugenius, admitting their own liability to error, have referred infallibility to a General Council.†

[" The General Councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basil, enacted a similar decision. These proceeded, without any ceremony, to the demolition of pontifical supremacy and inerrability. All this is contained in the superiority of a Council to the Pope, as established by these Synods, as well as by their deposition of Benedict, Gregory, John, and Eugenius. These Pontiffs, the Fathers of Pisa, Constance, and Basil found guilty of contumacy, incorrigibility, simony, perjury, schism, and heresy, and founded synodal authority on the ruins of Papal presumption and despotism. The Basilians, in express terms, declared the Pope's fallibility, and, in many instances, his actual heresy. Some of the supreme Pontiffs, said these legislators, 'have fallen into heresy and error. The Pope may and often does err. History and experience show, that the Pope, though the head and chief, has often been guilty of error.' * These quotations are plain and expressive of the Council's sentiments on the Roman hierarch's pretended exemption from the common weakness of humanity.

[" The French, in this manner, are opposed to the Italian school. Theologian is opposed to theologian, Pope to Pope, University to University, and Council to Council. The Council of the Lateran, in a particular manner, contradicts the Council of Basil. Leo, in the former assembly, and with its entire approbation, declared his certain knowledge both of right and fact. The latter congress, in the plainest language, admitted the Pope's fallibility and actual heresy.† "]

Bishop Milner, in his End of Controversy, defines infallibility thus :—" The infallibility of our Church is not a power of telling all things, past, present, and to come, such as the pagans ascribe to their oracles, but merely the aid of God's Holy Spirit, to enable her truly to decide what her faith is, and ever has been, in such articles as have been made known to her by Scripture and tradition." ‡ He gives his opinion of the place of its location in the following words :—" A General Council, with the Pope at its head, or the Pope himself issuing a doctrinal decision, which is received by the great body of Catholic Bishops, is SECURE FROM ERROR." §

[" A Pope or Synod, according to this theory, may, when disconnected, fall into error ; but when united, become unerring. A Council, under the direction and superintendence of the Pontiff, is, say these speculators, raised above mistake on subjects of faith and morality. ‖

[" This class is opposed by both the former. The system contradicts the assumption of pontifical and synodal infallibility, and the sentiments of the French and Italian schools. Its partisans differ not only from the Cisalpine theologians, Launoy, Gerson, Almain, Bossuet, and Du Pin, but also from the Ultramontane Doctors, Baronius, Bellarmine, Binius, Caranza, and Cajetan ; and are exposed to the fire of the Councils of Florence and Lateran, as well as of Pisa, Constance, and Basil.

[" This party, varying from the French and Italian schools, vary from their own theory, and from the acknowledged facts of the General Councils. The Romish communion admits the authority of several Synods, undistinguished by pontifical summons and ratification. The eight Oriental Councils, as Launoy, Du Pin, Gibert, and Caron have clearly shown, were summoned sometimes against the Pontiff's will, and always without his authority. The Pope, in the first, second, third, and fifth General Councils, at Nicæa, Ephesus, and Constantinople, presided neither in person nor by representation ; while the second Ephesian Synod, says Mirandula, having a lawful call and legantine presence of the Roman Bishop, prostituted its authority nevertheless to the subversion of the faith. Several General Councils were not sanctioned, but, on the contrary, resisted by pontifical power. This was the case with the third canon of the second General Council, which declared the Byzantine next in rank and dignity to the Roman see. The twenty-eighth canon of

* Du Pin, Ecclesiastical History, cent. xvii., p. 150. Oxford, 1725.

[" † ' Hanc esse Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ certam et indubitabilem doctrinam.'—Arsdekin, Theologia, i., 117. ' Affirmativam tuentur Galli.' —Dens, ii., 156 ; Launoy, Theologia, i., 145 ; Du Pin, 362, 364 ; Maimbourg, c. 15 ; Caron., c. 18.

[" * ' Nonnulli summi Pontifices, in hæreses et errores lapsi leguntur. Errante Pontifice, sicut sæpe contingit, et contingere potest.'—Crabb, Concilia iii., 12, 146, 148 ; Binius, 8, 22 ; Caranza, 580 ; Du Pin, 361, 404.

[" † Labb., xix., 968 ; Crabb, iii., 148."]

‡ End of Controversy, Letter xii., p. 84.

§ Idem, Letter xii., p. 85.

[" ‖ Maimbourg, c. 6 ; Bellarm. IV., 2 ; Caron, c. 18 ; Kenney, 398."]

the fourth General Council at Chalcedon, which raised the Constantinopolitan Patriarch to an equality with the Roman Pontiff, met with similar opposition. But the Chalcedonian Fathers disregarded the Roman Bishop's expostulations and hostility. The fifth General Council decided against Vigilius, and, in addition, complimented his Holiness with an anathema, and the imputation of heresy. The sixth œcumenical Synod condemned Honorius; and its acts were confirmed by the Emperor, and afterward by Leo. The Basilian assembly was ridiculed by Leo X., and both cursed and confirmed by Eugenius. His Holiness, of course, between malediction and ratification, showed ample attention to the Fathers of Basil. The French Clergy reject the Councils of Lyons, Florence, and the Lateran, though sanctioned by Innocent, Eugenius, and Leo. The Italian Clergy, on the contrary, and the partisans of pontifical sovereignty, have proscribed the Councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basil, though ratified by Alexander, Martin, and Nicholas."]

Many other authors might be quoted to show the discordant sentiments of the members of the Church of Rome respecting her assumed infallibility. The Church has never yet declared herself respecting the seat of this high prerogative, but has left her children to contend on this single point to an extent that has sometimes endangered her very existence.

["Another division in the Romish communion, rejecting the other systems, persist in attributing exemption from error only to the Church collective or dispersed, embracing the general body of Christian professors. These, disclaiming pontifical and synodal infallibility, as well as both united, patronize ecclesiastical inerrability. The partisans of this theory, however, are few, compared with the other factions. The system, notwithstanding, can boast of several patrons of celebrity, such as Panormitan, Mirandula, and Alliaco.* Panormitan, the famous Canonist, was one of the advocates of this theory. Councils, according to this author, may err, and have erred. The universal Church, he adds, 'comprehends the assembly of all the faithful; and this is the Church which is vested with infallibility.' Mirandula adopted the opinion of Panormitan. He represents the second Council of Ephesus as general and lawful; which, nevertheless, 'betrayed the faith.' Alliaco's statement on this head in the Council of Constance, is remarkable. He observed, that 'a General Council, according to celebrated Doctors, may err, not only in fact, but also in right, and, what is more, in the faith.' He delivered the statement as the opinion of many. The declaration, besides, was made in an assembly containing about a thousand of the Clergy, and constituting a representation of the whole Church, with general approbation and consent.

["This party, dissenting from pontifical and synodal infallibility, differ also among themselves, and are subdivided into two sections. One subdivision places illiability to error in the Clergy dispersed through Christendom. The laity, according to this speculation, have nothing to do but obey the Clergy, and be safe. The other subdivision reckons the laity among the participators of infallibility. Clergy and laity, according to this supposition, form one sacred society, which, though dispersed through Christendom, and subject to mistake in an individual capacity, is, in a collective sense, raised above the possibility of error in the faith."]

3. From the above we collect four principal systems, which concern the seat of infallibility; and these contain a considerable number of subdivisions, the chief of which are expressed in the following analysis.

First system. This embraces the infallibility of the whole Church, and includes two cases: (1.) The Church diffusive, that is, all her Clergy, as a body, inasmuch as the people, whenever infallibility is concerned, compose no part of the Church. (2.) The Bishops as the representatives of the Church, though not assembled in Council.

Second system. A Council composed of all the Bishops; and this also is divided into two cases: (1.) The decision of a Council when approved by the whole Church. (2.) The decision of a Council when not approved by the whole Church.

Third system. A Council and Pope united. There are four cases of this: (1.) A Council convened by the Pope. (2.) A Council confirmed by the Pope. (3.) A Council convened by the Pope, and whose decisions are received by the whole Church, or the body of her Pastors. (4.) A Council confirmed by the Pope, and received subsequently by the Church.

Fourth system. Respects the infallibility of the Pope himself. This has the four following cases: (1.) The Pope himself deciding officially. (2.) The Pope and a few Bishops. (3.) The Pope, when his decisions are received by the whole Church. (4.) The Pope and a few Bishops, whose decisions are received by the whole Church.

Any person who will examine the quotations given from Roman Catholic authors will perceive these four distinct systems, together with the several cases under each. If we also consider their differences in regard to the extent of infallibility, (some confining it to articles of faith, and precepts of morality, and others making distinctions between matters of right and facts, and then of facts connected with faith, and also that their Church has not precisely defined where this infallibility is to be found,) then we may safely say, that the bare recital of their endless divisions respecting the seat of infallibility will prove that the thing is not in existence. All Protestants are UNITED in placing infallibility in the Bible; but Romanists are constantly DIVIDED as to its situation. We might here safely rest our cause, and request a perusal of the conflicting opinions of those who claim it: we shall, nevertheless, examine each system separately.

IV. Infallibility of the Pope examined.

The Jesuits, Canonists, Italians, with others, maintain the infallibility of the Pope personally, when aided by a few Bishops, or when his decisions are received by the Church. In opposition to this we shall adduce the arguments which Roman Catholics themselves bring forward against the infallibility of the Pope, in any one or all of the cases already mentioned.

1. Popes have contradicted Popes. For example, Gregory, surnamed the Great, about the conclusion of the sixth century, says: "I confidently say, that whosoever calls himself the Universal Priest, or desires to be so called, in his arrogance is a forerunner of antichrist."*

["* 'Tota Ecclesia errare non potest.'—Panormitan, a. 1, No. 21, p. 140. 'Ecclesia universalis non potest errare.'—Panormitan de Jud. No. 4.

['Nihilominus in eversionem fidei agitatum.'—Mirandula, Th. 4.

['Secundum magnos Doctores, Generale Concilium potest errare, non solum in facto, sed etiam in jure, et quod majus est, in fide.'—Hard., xi. 201; Lenfant, i., 172."]

* "Ego fidenter dico, quod quisquis se universalem sacerdotem vocat, vel vocari desiderat, in elatione sua, antichristum præcurrit."—Greg. Max. Ep., lib. vi., ep. 30.

Yet this title and office have been strenuously claimed and used by succeeding Popes, who declare that the Roman Pontiff may be called Universal Bishop. Thus Gregory VII. declares "that the Roman Pontiff alone can be properly called universal." * Innocent I., and his followers, until Pope Gelasius, asserted the communion of infants as necessary, which was condemned by subsequent Popes. Popes Leo and Gelasius condemned communion in one kind, while all modern Popes enjoin it. Gregory the Great condemned the worship of images, the title of Universal Bishop, and the canonicity of the books of Maccabees. Stephen VI., in a provincial Council held at Rome, annulled all the acts of Formosus, one of his predecessors. John IX., his successor, in a Council held at Ravenna, annulled Stephen's acts with respect to Formosus. Sergius annulled the acts of Formosus, a second time. Some Popes acknowledged their own fallibility. Innocent IV. taught that a Pope is not to be obeyed when his commands are heretical. Urban V., Gregory XI., and Clement VI., disavowed every thing which they had advanced contrary to the faith, either in consistory or Council.†

2. The fact that several Popes have been heretics, and condemned as such, proves unequivocally that they cannot be infallible.

Pope Vigilius erred, as Pope, in first condemning, and then approving, the decision of the fifth General Council, held A. D. 553.‡

Pope Liberius, in the fourth century, erred, as Pope, in condemning Athanasius, and in consenting to the heretical faith of the Arians, and holding communion with them. On this account he was anathematized by Hilary.§

Honorius, who was made Pope A. D. 626, and died A. D. 638, became a Monothelite; that is, he believed there was in Christ but one will and one operation. Forty-two years after his death he was condemned in the Council of Constantinople, held A. D. 680; therefore he must be a heretic, if a General Council cannot err. The most celebrated Roman Doctors acknowledge the heresy of Honorius. Pighius and Baronius deny that he held this doctrine; but Du Pin proves it beyond contradiction. He says: "Honorius was a favourer of heresy, because he forbade speaking both of one and two operations in Jesus Christ. He was a heretic, because he owned but one will in Jesus Christ: and the Roman Church hath so plainly acknowledged that Pope Honorius did advance the error of the Monothelites, that in her ancient Breviary she declared that he was condemned, with the other Monothelites, for maintaining the doctrine of the one will." Again he says: "The Council had as much reason to censure him as Sergius Paulus, Peter, and the other Patriarchs of Constantinople." And he concludes his proofs of the alleged heresy by saying: "This will stand for certain, then, that Honorius was condemned, and justly too, as a heretic, by the sixth General Council." ‖ The sentence was approved by the Legates of the reigning Pope, Agatho, who afterward confirmed the decree. It is said, however, that Honorius was deceived in that matter. Be it so: therefore he could not be infallible. It is enough that the Council condemned him as a heretic, and proscribed his name and memory; and by this they declare that Popes may err, and that they are not the rule of faith. Whether he erred as a private person, as some say, or by a false dispensation, he would have imposed silence on the orthodox: it amounts precisely to the same thing. Those who depended upon him as an infallible guide must have been deceived in either case. These are nothing more than mere Jesuitical quirks, which may amuse the trifling, but can never be received for sound argument with the intelligent. How could those Popes be infallible who confirmed the decrees of Constance and Basil, when the decrees of these Councils maintained the fallibility of Popes, and the superiority of a Council over them? In this case Popes testify against their own infallibility. The Council of Basil * pronounced Pope Eugenius, a fide devius, pertinax hæreticus; "a pertinacious heretic, deviating from the faith."

There is one heresy of which many Popes have been guilty, and called by Gregory VII. simoniaca hæresis; "the heresy of simony." † If it be said these were no Popes,—be it so. Then there were no true Popes for centuries, and no infallibility.

3. It sometimes happened that Popes were not skilled in divinity, and therefore could not pronounce on matters of faith except by miracle. So Pope Innocent X. said: "The Vicar of Jesus Christ was not obliged to examine all things by dispute; for the truth of his decrees depended on divine inspiration." ‡

4. What became of this assumed infallibility, when there were two or three Popes at the same time, excommunicating one another, and all claiming to be infallible?

5. The immorality of the Pontiff disqualifies him for being incapable of error. The inconstancy of some, the wickedness and treachery of others, forbid us to consider them as free from erroneous decisions. For we must not separate these things from their official acts: so far from it, many of their decisions have been given to gratify the basest and most wicked dispositions, both in themselves and in others. The Almighty never vouchsafed his Spirit for the gratification of vicious passions. In proof that many Popes were extremely wicked men, we have the testimony of Romanists themselves. §

["Many of these hierarchs carried miscreancy to an unenvied perfection, and excelled, in this respect, all men recorded in the annals of time. A John, a Benedict, and an Alexander, seem to have been born to show how far human nature could proceed in degeneracy; and, in this department, outshine a Nero, a Domitian, and a Caligula. Several Popes in the tenth century owed their dignity to Marozia and Theodora, two celebrated courtezans, who raised their gallants to the pontifical throne, and vested them with pontifical infallibility. ‖ Fifty of these Vice-

* "Quod solus Romanus Pontifex jure dicatur universalis."—Idem, lib. ii., ep. 55.

† See Barrow on Supremacy, Works, vol. vii., pp. 568, et seq. Ouseley on Papal Novelties, pp. 133, et seq.

‡ Du Pin, Ecclesiastical History, vol. i., p. 709. Mosheim, cent. vi., part ii., chap. iii., sec. 10.

§ Du Pin, vol. i., p. 190, where he proves at large the heresy of Liberius.

‖ Idem, vol. ii., p. 16.

* Concil. Basil., Sess. 24.

† Ep., lib. iii., 7.

‡ "Le Pape répondit, que le Vicaire de Jesus-Christ n'étoit point obligé d'examiner toutes choses par le dispute; que la vérité de ses décrêts dépendoit seulement de l'inspiration divine."—Mem. Hist. de 5 Propos.

§ See Ouseley on Papal Novelties, fifth edit., p. 107, et seq. Du Pin, Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii., p. 176.

["‖ 'Intruderentur in sedem Petri eorum amasii Pseudo-Pontifices.'—Baron., 912, viii.; Spon., 900, i.; Genebrard, iv.

['On ne voyoit alors plus des Papes, mais des monstres. Baronius écrit qu'alors Rome étoit sans Pape.'—Giannon, vii., 5; An. Eccl. 345."] roys of heaven, according to Genebrard, degenerated, for one hundred and fifty years, from the integrity of their ancestors, and were apostatical rather than apostolical. Genebrard, Platina, Stella, and even Baronius, call them monsters, portends, thieves, robbers, assassins, magicians, murderers, barbarians, and perjurers. No less than seventeen of God's Vicars-General were guilty of perjury. Papal ambition, usurpation, persecution, domination, excommunications, interdicts, and deposition of Kings, have filled the earth with war and desolation."]

6. The distinction made by some, that the Pope is only infallible in matters of faith, but not in matters of fact; by others, that he is infallible only in reference to such facts as belong to faith; or, by some, that his decisions are not to be taken as infallible, unless when they are received by the whole Church—are individually fatal to infallibility. On these topics Roman Catholics have been ceaselessly divided among themselves. For while some deny that the Popes are infallible in any capacity, others contend that they are so in matters of faith. And their different views on subjects of right and fact, of the reception and non-reception of Papal decisions, have so far perplexed them, that a person of piety will rejoice to find that the Bible is liable to none of these difficulties.

V. Some Roman Catholics, especially the French, who reject the infallibility of the Pope, contend for the infallibility of the Catholic Church, and maintain that it is deposited with each General Council regularly called, as the representative and organ of the Church.

1. It is a question among them what makes a Council general, and what is a regular call. Some reckon eighteen General Councils, and some at most but seven or eight. And indeed they might well doubt whether there was ever such an one in the world. They are also divided about the Council of Carthage. The Italians deny that it was œcumenical in all its sessions, while the French Church vigorously maintain the opposite opinion. The fifth of Lateran is also questioned. Yet both these Councils are required to make up the number eighteen. There is also considerable controversy respecting the proper calling or assembling of a Council. The Popes, for many centuries, convened them, and claim it as a matter of right. The first at Nice, the second at Constantinople, the third at Ephesus, the fourth at Chalcedon, and the sixth at Constantinople, were not summoned by Popes, but by Emperors: several of them being summoned contrary to the will of Popes, and therefore, according to some, not legally convoked. Moreover, there is much controversy, amidst the great number of forgeries, which of the canons are reputed genuine and which are not. Besides, the meaning of some of the most important is much disputed.

2. We learn from indisputable testimony, that Councils, both in doctrines and morals, have decided frequently contrary to one another.

The Council of Nice, A. D. 325, and of Ephesus, A. D. 431, decree with an anathema, "that no new Article for ever shall be added to the Creed or faith of Nice." But the Council of Trent, more than twelve hundred years after, added twelve new Articles to this Creed, pronouncing an anathema on all who will not embrace them.

The Council of Laodicea, A. D. 360 or A. D. 370, and the Council of Trent, A. D. 1545, decided in direct opposition to each other respecting the canon of Scripture. The former decreed on the canon which Protestants acknowledge, rejecting the Apocrypha; and the latter pronounced the Apocrypha canonical.

The Council of Constantinople, A. D. 754, unanimously decreed the removal of images, and the abolition of image-worship; but the second Council of Nice, A. D. 787, decreed that image-worship should be established.*

["The General Councils, like the Roman Pontiffs, were a stigma on religion and man. Many of these conventions, in point of respectability, were inferior to a modern cock-fight or bull-baiting. Gregory Nazianzen, who is a Roman saint, has described these scenes with the pencil of truth, and with the hand of a master. 'I never,' says the Grecian Bishop, 'saw a Synod which had a happy termination. These conventions, instead of diminishing, uniformly augment, the evil which they were intended to remedy. Passion, jealousy, envy, prepossession, and the ambition of victory, prevail and surpass all description. Zeal is actuated rather by malignancy to the criminal, than aversion to the crime.' He compares the dissension and wrangling exhibited in the Councils, to the quarrels of geese and cranes, gabbling and contending in confusion; and represents such disputation and vain jangling as calculated to demoralize the spectator, rather than to correct or reform.† This portrait, which is taken from life, exhibits in graphic delineation, and in true colours, the genuine features of all the General, infallible, apostolic, holy Roman Councils.

["The General Synods of Constantinople, Nicæa, Lyons, Constance, and Basil are, in a particular manner, worthy of observation. These conventions were composed of the lowest rabble, and patronized the vilest abominations. The Byzantine assembly, which was the second General Council, has been described by Nazianzen. This convention the saint characterizes as 'a cabal of wretches fit for the house of correction; fellows newly taken from the plough, the spade, the oar, and the army.' Such is a Roman saint's sketch of a holy, apostolic, unerring Council. ‡

["The Constantine Council was characterized by Baptiza, one of its own members. His portrait is frightful. The Clergy, he declared, 'were nearly all under the power of the devil, and mocked all religion by external devotion and Pharisean hypocrisy. The prelacy, actuated only by malice, iniquity, pride, vanity, ignorance, lasciviousness, avarice, pomp, simony, and dissimulation, had exterminated Catholicism and extinguished piety.' §

["The Councils of Nicæa, Vienna, and the Lateran, patronized the hateful and degrading doctrine of materialism. Angels and souls, the Nicæans represented as corporeal. The angels of heaven and the souls of men, if the Nicæan Doctors are to be credited, possess bodies, though of a refined, thin, subtile, and attenuated description. These angelical and mental forms, the learned metaphysicians admitted, were composed of a substance

* See the variations of the Church relative to image-worship accurately traced by Faber, Difficulties of Romanism, p. 13, et seq. Edit. London, 1826.

["† 'Χηνων η γερανων ακριτα μαρνομενων.'

['Ενθ' εριs, ενθα μοθοs.'—Gregory, 2, 82, Carm. x., Ep. 56; Du Pin, i., 658.

["‡ 'Alii ab aratris venerant adusti a sole: alii a ligone vel bidente totum diem non quiescente: alii remos exercitusve reliquerant, redolentes adhuc sentinam vel corpus fœdatum cicatricibus habentes.....Flagriones, et pistrinis digni.'—Greg. Quer. Ep. Labb., ii., 1158; Du Pin, i., 259.

["§ 'Presque tout le Clergé est sous la puissance du diable. Dans les Prélats, il n'y a que malice, iniquité, negligence, ignorance, vanité, orgueil, avarice, simonie, lasciveté, pompe, hypocrisie.'—Baptiza, in Lenfan., ii., 95.

less gross indeed than the human flesh or nerve, and less firm than the human bone or sinew; but nevertheless material, tangible, and visible. The Council of Vienna improved on that of Nicæa. The holy, infallible Fathers of Vienna declared the soul not only of the same substance, but also essentially and in itself of the true and perfect form, of the body. The rational and intellectual mind, therefore, in this system, possesses a material and corporeal shape, and has circumference, diameter, length, breadth, and thickness. This definition the sacred Synod issued, to teach all men the true faith. This doctrine, according to the same authority, is Catholicism, and the contrary is heresy. The Lateran Council, in its eighth session, followed the Viennese definition, and decreed that the human spirit, truly, essentially, and in itself, exists in the form of the human frame.* Three holy universal Councils, in this manner, patronized the materialism which was afterward obtruded on the world by a Priestley, a Voltaire, and a Hume.

["The Romish Church was as demoralized as the Roman Pontiffs or the General Councils. During the six hundred years that preceded the Reformation, the Papal communion, Clergy and laity, were, in the account of their own historians, sunk into the lowest depths of vice and abomination." †]

Respecting the supremacy of the Pope, Councils have differed. The first Council of Nice, canon sixth, decreed that the Bishop of Constantinople should possess equal privileges with the Bishop of Rome. Every one knows how this has since been contradicted, both by Councils and Popes.

["'We ordain that the ancient custom shall be observed, which gives power to the Bishop of Alexandria over all the provinces of Egypt, Lybia, and Pentapolis, because the Bishop of Rome has the like jurisdiction over all the suburbicary regions: (for this addition must be supplied out of Ruffinus:) we would likewise have the rights and privileges of the church of Antioch, and the other churches preserved; but these rights ought not to prejudice those of the Metropolitans. If any one is ordained without the consent of the Metropolitan, the Council declares, that he is no Bishop; but if any one is canonically chosen by the suffrage of almost all the Bishops of the province, and if there are but one or two of a contrary opinion, the suffrages of the far greater number ought to carry it for the ordination of those particular persons.' This canon being thus explained has no difficulty in it. It does not oppose the primacy of the Church of Rome, neither does it establish it. It preserves to great sees their ancient privileges; that is, the jurisdiction or authority which they had over many provinces, which was afterwards called, the jurisdiction of the Patriarch or Exarch. In this sense it is that it compares the Church of Rome to the Church of Alexandria, by considering them all as patriarchal churches. It continues also to the church of Antioch, and all the other great churches, whatsoever rights they could have." ‡]

VI. Some Roman Catholics are of opinion that a Council is not infallible, unless its decrees are approved by the Pope. And hence some have argued, that as the Council of Constantinople did not receive the confirmation of the Pope, its decrees are not infallible. This opinion, however, is comparatively modern among Roman Catholics. But before it can be of weight, it ought to be shown that the Pope lawfully possesses, by scriptural authority, the power of passing a veto upon, or of confirming, the decrees of Councils.

1. That infallibility resides in a Council confirmed by the Pope, can never be supported; for according to this system the Council of itself is fallible; and so also is the Pope. But how these two fallibles united can constitute an infallible body, and promulgate infallible decisions, is inexplicable.

2. The decrees of the Councils of Constance and Basil declare the supremacy and infallibility to be in General Councils; that these are above Popes, and that they are heretics who deny this doctrine. On the other hand, Pope Leo and the Lateran Council assert, that it is necessary to salvation that all Christ's faithful people should be subject to the Bishop of Rome, and that the Pope has authority over Councils. Here, then, is a palpable contradiction.

3. The Scripture informs us that "marriage is honourable IN ALL, and the bed undefiled; but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." (Heb. xiii. 4.) And this holds good as well to Clergymen as to laymen. (1 Tim. iii. 2, 4, 11, 12; iv. 3.) Yet the second Lateran Council, held in 1139, being the tenth General Council, strictly forbids the marriage of Ecclesiastics, down to the rank of the Sub-Deacon inclusive, and forbids the laity to hear mass from any Priest who violates this commandment. The following is the canon:—"When they ought both to be and to be called the temple of God, the vessels of the Lord, the shrines of the Holy Ghost, it is unworthy that they should become the slaves of chambering and uncleanness."* It is not enough to say that this is merely a point of discipline, and therefore mutable, and a matter of expediency, because it is considered an immoral act to violate this injunction. Now if the word of God be infallible, the Council certainly cannot claim the same prerogative, inasmuch as it decides contrary to Scripture.

4. Nothing is clearer in the sacred record than that oaths are solemnly to be kept. (Num. xxx. 2; Lev. xix. 12; Deut. xxiii. 23; Psalm xv. 4; Zech. viii. 17; Rev. xxi. 8.) But the third Council of Lateran, which decreed the persecution of heretics, and was held in 1179, encourages the violation of all kinds of oaths which are not favourable to the Church of Rome. This Council decrees: "For they are not to be called oaths, but rather perjuries, which are contrary to ecclesiastical utility and the institutes of the holy Fathers." † Here the obligation or non-obligation of an oath depends solely on its utility or non-utility to the interests of the Church of Rome, as those interests shall be understood and explained by the Governors of the Church for the time being. Accordingly the Emperor Sigismund, in breaking his oath to John Huss, acted in accordance with the doctrine of the Church. And all who maintain her ["* 'Catholica ecclesia sic sentit esse quosdam intelligibiles, sed non omnino corporis expertes et invisibiles, verum tenui corpore præditos. In loco existunt et circumferentiam habent. Nemo, vel angelos, vel animos dixerit incorporeos.'—Caranza, 478; Labb., viii., 1446.

['Anima rationalis non sit forma corporis humani per se et essentialiter, tanquam hæreticus sit censendus.'—Caranza, 560; Du Pin, viii., 545.

['Illa humani corporis existat.'—Caranza, 604; Labb., xix., 812; Bin., vi., 928."]

[† Edgar, Variations of Popery.]

[‡ Du Pin, Ecclesiastical History, vol. i., p. 600. Dublin, 1723.—EDIT.]

* "Cum enim ipsi templum Dei, vasa Domini, sacrarium Spiritus Sancti, debeant et esse et dici; indignum est eos cubilibus et immunditiis deservire."—Conc. Lat. II., can. 6. Labb., Concil., tom. x., p. 1003.

† "Non enim dicenda sunt juramenta, sed potius perjuria, quæ contra utilitatem ecclesiasticam et sanctorum patrum veniunt instituta."—Con. Lat. III., can. 16. Labb. Con., tom. x., p. 1517.

infallibility, stand pledged to vindicate Sigismund and the Council of Constance. Indeed, they are bound to act so, should they ever be placed in similar circumstances. Let the Romanist swear by ever so solemn an oath, still, if his spiritual leaders pronounce that oath to be contra utilitatem ecclesiasticam, "contrary to the interests of the Church," he is compelled to violate it. Should he disclaim such an obligation, he contradicts the Council of Lateran, and thus, by a necessary consequence, denies the infallibility of his Church. He is therefore reduced to this dilemma; either to maintain that an oath pronounced to be against ecclesiastical utility is not binding, or to deny the infallibility of the Church.

5. In the year 1215, the fourth Council of Lateran decreed, that the bread and wine in the sacrament of the eucharist underwent a physical change, which they termed "transubstantiation." * This Council received the full approbation of the reigning Pope, Innocent III. But we have historical evidence, that, during the first five centuries, the Catholic Church, so far from teaching the doctrine of a physical change, positively, explicitly, and controversially denied it. Thus it is manifest, that as the Catholic Church at one period denied the doctrine of transubstantiation, and at another time maintained it, it is impossible that she should be infallible.

6. Besides, how can we believe in the infallibility of assemblies, which taught doctrines at once unjust and subversive of society, and in which the adulation of the Pope is carried to an extent which is blasphemous? Could the fourth Council of Lateran be infallible, in which the Pope was acknowledged to possess the power of disposing of the temporalities of sovereigns, of depriving them of their crowns, and of delivering their subjects from the oath of allegiance? Could the fifth Council of Lateran be infallible, which, in its first session, gave to the Pope the appellation of "Prince of the universe," and commended Boniface VII. for having taken the kingdom of France from Philip the Fair?—which, in its second session, called the Roman Pontiff "a Priest and King, who is to be adored by all people, and who is very like unto God?"—which, in its fifth session, spoke of Leo X. in these terms: "Weep not, daughter of Zion, for behold the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David: behold, God hath raised thee up a Saviour?" Thus they applied to a sinner the prophetic words which designate the Saviour of the world. Could the Holy Spirit inspire such blasphemies as these?

The thirteenth session of the Council of Trent declares, that the bread is constituted only the body, and the wine is changed only into the blood of Christ: "There becomes a conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the substance of the body of Christ our Lord, and of the whole substance of the wine into the substance of his blood." † But the twenty-first session of the same Council declares, that under one kind only the whole and perfect Christ and true sacrament is taken: "If any one shall deny that the whole and entire Christ, the fountain and author of all grace, is received under the species of bread alone, let him be accursed." ‡ Thus the Council of Trent contradicts itself, and therefore cannot be infallible.

* Concil. Lat. IV., can. 1. For several authorities see Faber's Difficulties of Romanism, p. 46.

† "Conversionem fieri totius substantiæ panis in substantiam corporis Christi Domini nostri, et totius substantiæ vini in substantiam sanguinis ejus."—Cap. iv., De Transubstantiatione.—Can. et Decret.

‡ "Si quis negaverit, totum et integrum Christum, omnium gratiarum fontem et auctorem, sub una panis specie sumi, anathema sit."—Cap. iv., De Communione, &c.—Idem.

VII. Some place infallibility in the Church of Rome, or the universal church.

1. Those who do not hold the infallibility of a Council or Pope, either jointly or separately, account no doctrine fundamental unless the whole body of the Roman Church receive it. But the whole Church could not meet to make decrees, or to choose representatives, or to deliver their sentiments on any question; and less than the whole congregated body would not be the whole Church, and so could not claim the privilege. And how, especially, would the ignorant know with certainty when they have all received it, and in what sense they have received? But what claim has the Church of Rome to this right, any more than the Churches of Greece, Asia, Ethiopia, or the Protestant Churches? In short, were it as easy as it is difficult to collect the several opinions of all Christians in the world, what one point would they, in all ages, agree to as necessary, besides those general doctrines of Christianity which are allowed to be clearly contained in Scripture?

2. Many doctrines and practices might be adduced which are taught by the Church of Rome, and yet are contrary to Scripture. Such are the use of an unknown tongue, purgatory, transubstantiation, worship of saints and angels, &c. Indeed, although the Church of Rome pretends to infallibility and antiquity, she is peculiarly addicted to novelty and deviation.

3. Let any one possessed of common candour consider these varieties of opinion in the Latin Church respecting the seat of infallibility, and he must conclude that either it does not exist among them at all, or if it does, it leaves them in such a state of hesitation as to answer no important end. Indeed, it is the source of the most perplexing uncertainty. If those who believe the Pope to be infallible be right, then those who deny it must be in a most deplorable condition. Those who admit his infallibility, must be perplexed by the doubts arising from the various opinions held on this point, namely, whether or not he is infallible in questions of right or fact, or by the uncertainty produced from the reception of his decrees by the Church; while those who believe a Council to be infallible are in a similar state of perplexity respecting the number, the character, and the confirmation or reception of their decrees. This uncertainty is increased still more, when we take into view the various cases under the four great systems of infallibility already enumerated. But the difficulty does not rest here; for the extent to which infallibility reaches is also a subject of great dispute. Some confine it to fundamentals; others extend it beyond. Some confine it to doctrines and rules of morality; others include discipline. The French Church never received the decrees of the Council of Trent regarding discipline, and in a part of Ireland, also, we are told such decrees are not received. Thus, amidst these uncertainties, there arise endless perplexities to the inquiring Romanist, especially as his Church either prevents him from reading the Scriptures, or so restricts him in the use of them, that he is left without any certain guide for his faith. The result is, that the man either sinks down into stupid acquiescence with whatever the Church teaches, makes his act of faith, and receives what the Church receives, without examination; or, on the other hand, if he reason at all with any accuracy on his religion, he immediately becomes sceptical, and shortly after an infidel, either openly or in disguise, according to circumstances. Such are the bitter fruits of Popish infallibility.

4. It is altogether otherwise with the Protestant. He is in no doubt about his infallible direction. The word of truth does not contradict itself; and he is certain, that he whom it does contradict must be wrong. The word of God "is able to make him wise unto salvation."

VIII. We proceed to notice some of those difficulties and consequences which arise from the assumption of infallibility.

1. The title to this infallibility, and spiritual supremacy, which is connected with it, is extremely dubious. The reality of it, in order to be the guide and rule of faith, ought to be a subject not of authority, but of proof. He who claims obedience in virtue of delegated power, is bound to prove his appointment. So, before we yield our reason to one who calls himself God's Vicar, our judgment should be satisfied that God has appointed him to that office. The Church of Rome maintains that Christ made Peter the head of his church, and gave the same power to the Popes of Rome; and that to the church thus united under Peter and his successors, Christ ensured infallibility in doctrine and morals. The commission on which this claim is founded is, "Thou art Peter," &c. This passage, certainly, does not maintain the above claim; and a person unacquainted with the divinity of Rome, would never suppose that it gave any ground for such assumption at all. And even supposing that our Saviour did, by this promise, endow that Church with the supernatural assistance for which she contends, it is confessedly one of the most obscure truths in the Gospel. It might reasonably have been expected that Peter, in his discourses or Epistles, would have removed the doubt resting on the passage; and that since the grant of infallibility to him, to his peculiar church, and to his successors in the see of Rome, was made the only security against the attacks of hell, he would have taken care to explain the true meaning of Christ's address to him. Peter, however, does not make the slightest allusion to such privileges, either for himself or his successors; nor does he ever mention Rome, but dates his Epistles from Babylon. The sense, therefore, which the Roman Catholic Church puts on the alleged passage is exceedingly doubtful. It will therefore follow, that the divine right claimed by the Pope and his Church, to be the infallible rule of faith, having no other than an obscure and doubtful foundation, the belief of it cannot be obligatory upon Christians. For it would be an inefficient preservative from doubt and uncertainty, to leave no information by what means, or by whom, such perplexities are to be removed.

2. We cannot believe that Christ has any infallible church on earth, because none of the primitive churches made any pretensions to it, not even that of Rome herself. We do not find that the doctrine of the infallibility of the church, much less the Roman Church, is asserted by any ancient Council or Father. We cannot ascertain that in controversies the guides of the church had recourse to the argument of infallibility to terminate them; for, had they been aware of such an expedient, that would have been the easiest way to end them. The ancient Fathers had a far better method of confuting heretics and schismatics than by appealing to infallibility. Their practice was to bring the doctrines to be tested, to the ancient usages and doctrines of the apostolical churches, and especially to the Scripture, which they considered to be the entire and only rule of faith. Moreover, other churches never thought of ascribing infallibility to the Church of Rome; which appears from their behaviour in opposing her decisions as vigorously as they did those of any other that differed from them.

3. The Pope and his Council, by the claim of infallibility, have deprived the faithful of the privilege of the use of reason, which Christ has granted to them in the Gospel. Placing themselves between mankind and the Redeemer, they only allow those to approach him who have first surrendered their judgment to Popes and to Councils. A belief in Christ and in his truth, grounded on Scripture and its evidences, is made useless, except it be preceded by faith in Roman infallibility and supremacy, grounded on mere conjecture or bare assumption. The broad foundation of Christian evidence is removed, to make way for the exercise of that authority which proscribes reason and requires blind submission. The Roman Catholic ACT OF FAITH, "I believe whatsoever the Church believes and teaches," prepares the Romanist to receive every thing taught by his spiritual leader, however ridiculous and absurd.

4. The doctrine of infallibility depends upon a theory which is founded on a series of suppositions, doubts, and evasions. (1.) They assume that which is in question, namely, the necessity of an infallible judge in matters of faith. (2.) Upon the strength of this assumption, they interpret certain passages of Scripture to favour this opinion. (3.) They are then in doubt as to the identity of the judge, whether Church, Council, or Pope. (4.) To avoid this difficulty, they avail themselves of the term Church, as including the Pope and Council. (5.) They are then obliged to contrive another method to meet the objections arising from dissensions between Councils and Popes, such as between the Councils of Basil, &c., and the contemporary Pontiffs. This is done by allowing no Council to be infallible, until it has received the sanction of the Bishop of Rome; which at once resolves church infallibility into the mere opinion of the Roman see. (6.) And, finally, they intrench themselves within the distinction of infallibility, on abstract doctrines of faith, and liability to sin.

Now mark the consequences to which the whole of this system leads. The only sensible mark of a legitimate Council, is the approbation of the Pope; and the only sensible mark of a legitimate Pope, is his possession of the see of Rome. They have therefore, (1.) Entailed the gift of infallibility on the strongest of the rival candidates for that see. (2.) And as moral worth is denied to be a necessary characteristic of the Vicar of Christ, they have added one chance more of having for their living rule of faith, the candidate who shall contend for the popedom under the least restraint of moral obligation. Hence no episcopal see has ever been so polluted by wicked and profligate Bishops as that of Rome. For what prospect of success could a true follower of Christ have of filling the chair of St. Peter, when a Borgia was bent upon occupying it? Gold, steel, and poison were the instruments of acquiring it, while the belief that the faith was still safe, prevented opposition from the force of public opinion. Thus Alexander VI. was considered the true representative of Christ upon earth!

The theory of infallibility requires the aid of sophistry for its support. As evidence of this assertion, we may quote their distinction between doctrines and opinions, as well as their use of the circle in argument, or, as it is sometimes called, though improperly, the vicious circle, for all arguing in a circle is unsound. In order to preserve their assumed infallibility and pretended union, they draw a distinction between doctrines and opinions.

All those doctrines on which their Church is divided they call opinions; and those are called doctrines on which they are agreed. Of course, then, they are always agreed upon doctrines, or points of faith. For example: it is a cardinal doctrine among them, that their Church is infallible. But where this infallibility is lodged, is a matter of opinion; that is, they are not agreed where it exists, whether in the whole Church, the Pope, a Council, or Pope and Council united. The immaculate conception, although discussed warmly, and contested for in the Council of Trent, was left undecided, and therefore must remain a matter of opinion. Yet the Council could decide that infants cannot be saved without baptism, and that baptism is not valid without the intention of the administrator!

There are few accusations which the Roman Catholics hate more cordially, than being charged with proving church infallibility by what is called reasoning in a circle. Nevertheless, they have recourse to this kind of argument; that is, they prove the infallibility of the Church from Scripture, and then prove the authenticity of the Scripture from infallibility. Hear Dr. Milner on this point: "True it is that I prove the inspiration of Scripture by the tradition of the Church, and that I prove the infallibility of the Church by the testimony of Scripture, which are two distinct things; but you must take notice, that independently of, and prior to, the testimony of Scripture, I knew from tradition, and the general arguments of the credibility of Christianity, that the Church is an illustrious society, instituted by Christ, and that its Pastors have been appointed by him to guide me in the way of salvation. In a word, it is not every kind of mutual testimony which runs in a vicious circle; for the Baptist bore testimony to Christ, and Christ bore testimony to the Baptist."* Dr. Milner would have us believe that he does not reason in a circle, because he proves the inspiration of Scripture by the tradition of the Church, which is one thing; and the infallibility of the Church by the testimony of Scripture, which is another thing. Now this is a mere sophism in Dr. Milner, because he knew very well that in disputing with us who admit the inspiration of Scripture, the proof thereof is foreign to the question. The circle consists in proving the infallibility of the Church by the pretended testimony of Scripture, while the proof of that testimony is avowedly based upon the authority of an infallible interpreter!

Besides, although Dr. Milner, in arguing with Protestants, attempts to prove infallibility from Scripture, yet he "protests against the right of Protestants to argue on the same ground." And though he endeavours to prove infallibility from Scripture, because "the whole business of the Scriptures belongs to the Church, and she alone authoritatively explains them," he would force his Protestant opponent into silence by this sweeping conclusion: It is impossible that the real sense of Scripture should ever be against the Church of Rome and her doctrine: she understands the passage differently from Protestants, therefore they mistake her meaning.† What a monstrous conclusion! As if that could be a proof to us which is unintelligible without the assistance of the very thing to be proved! Thus the Scripture, not rationally, but infallibly, interpreted, is made to prove the infallibility which is itself the matter in dispute. Herein, then, lies the fallacy, that church infallibility is compelled to prove itself. Dr. Milner therefore begs that which he professes to prove. It would have been more consistent had he candidly confessed that holy mother is her own authority,—that we must believe her to be infallible, not because Scripture says so, but because she claims to be so. Dr. Milner, also, seems to have been aware that his ground was not tenable, because he forsakes this subject after bestowing on it a few more lines than those quoted above. But no art of man can avoid the consequence that the argument for church infallibility inculcates, although on the issue of this question the pretensions of Rome must either stand or fall.

5. The distinction, that infallibility on subjects of faith may consist with profligacy in manners, although a necessary position for the purpose of maintaining infallibility, is peculiarly adapted to produce error in doctrine, and viciousness in life. The Pope may be in heart and practice an enemy to Christ and his Gospel, and yet enjoy all the privileges granted to Peter, in consequence of the love which he bore, above all others, to his Master. (John xxi. 15.) He may be a monster in vice, and yet not cease to be the Vicar of Him who did no sin. The Church under him may be corrupt in head and members, that is, in Pope and Clergy, and still infallible in matters of faith. Such is the solidity of the structure on which infallibility rests; and unless these things are true, the gates of hell have prevailed against her. A moral corruption of head and members may prevail in every possible form, and to any extent; and yet, according to this doctrine, the Church after all may be free from error. What a gross mistake is this! How preposterous it is to take for granted that the victory of hell consists in the diversity of abstract doctrines among Christians, and not in the prevalence of dark works of wickedness, provided they be wrought in the unity of the Papal faith!*

Moreover, the distinction between infallibility in doctrine, and liability to misconduct, is easily transferred, and has been, from the Pope to the inferior Clergy. As a clear consequence from this, the ministrations of common Priests, however wicked they may be, are all valid. Hence the profane and profligate may as authoritatively teach righteousness, as though they were the holiest men on earth. And so teacheth the Church of Rome in the infallible Trent Catechism: "Were even the lives of her Ministers debased by crime, they are still within her pale, and, therefore, lose no part of the power with which her ministry invests them."† The same principle also affects the laity, who will claim to themselves the privileges of Christianity without partaking of its spirit or practising its duties; and all this by virtue of their membership with the infallible Church. In this false doctrine are they instructed by the last-mentioned authority, which, speaking of persons not heretics, schismatics, and infidels, says: "However wicked and flagitious, it is certain that they still belong to the Church."‡

6. The infallibility claimed by the Latin Church is insufficient to accomplish that for which it is intended. We cannot receive the doctrine, because we discover no good effects of it in the world, or in the Church which claims it. Nor does it answer the design for which it is asserted, and is attended with the same, or even greater,

* End of Controversy, Letter xi., p. 74. Eighth edit.
† Idem, Letter xii., p. 78.

* Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism, &c., by the Rev. J. B. White. Letter iv. Second edition.
† The Catechism of the Council of Trent, translated by the Rev. J. Donovan, p. 96. Dublin, 1829.
‡ Ibid.

difficulties than the doctrine of Protestants. For notwithstanding the claims of the Church of Rome to infallibility and unity, she has long been the mother of more diversity of opinion, and more heresies in doctrine, than ever disturbed the faith and peace of the Protestant Church in her worst days.

It is said, "that without a living infallible Judge controversies cannot be ended." To this we answer, that the Church which pretends to it is not agreed in itself on several points pertaining to religion. The doctrine of infallibility, as to the locality and extent of it, is a matter of controversy which has never been decided. This is as great a subject of dispute as any that exists among Protestants. Whether infallibility resides in the Pope, or the Council, or both united, or the Church at large, completely divides the whole hierarchy of Rome. Some of them, to get rid of this infallibility, have sheltered themselves under the wing of universal tradition. Others confess that there is no way of avoiding the vicious circle on the common ground. Their Divines, Universities, and Colleges, have been continually employed in this discussion. The different orders of the Clergy, as the Calvinistic Jansenists and Pelagian Jesuits, the Franciscans and Dominicans, have always been at war with each other. The Popes, with all their authority, could never compose the differences between these contending sects. Kings, Emperors, and Princes, have continually been contending with Popes. The most silly questions, such as whether the Virgin Mary was conceived in original sin or not, are themes of dispute. For about three hundred years they were calling one another heretics respecting this; and their General Councils, with all their infallibility, have not yet ventured to decide it. They have also quarrelled about affairs of the greatest moment. For instance: whether a King or Prince may, for heresy or disobedience to the Church, be deposed, and his subjects absolved from their allegiance. The Popes, and the greatest part of their Church, since the eleventh or twelfth century, have held that they might, and have practised accordingly, as many nations to their sorrow have felt. But what traditions have taught, and what General Councils have decreed on this point, is so various and contradictory, that it would take a man's life to investigate, even limitedly, the points in debate: so that some Roman Catholic writers speak of the affirmative of this question as an article of faith, and others as an impious error. One or the other of these opinions must certainly be erroneous. Who, then, are the heretics? And what is their infallibility worth, which either cannot or will not decide questions of such importance as these to the welfare of human society?

It is said again, "that without an infallible guide the Scripture cannot be expounded, the sense of texts cannot be ascertained." But what advantage, in this respect, has the Church of Rome, that pretends to infallibility, above other Churches which pretend to none? Are they better informed in the Scriptures than Protestants? Do their laity understand the Bible better than the Protestant laity? Do their Clergy comprehend the sacred record more fully than Protestant Clergymen? Have they discovered the import of one doubtful sentence, by means of infallibility, during all the time they have pretended to it? Let them produce one text, the sense of which is by this means ascertained. We believe they cannot. They know as well as we do, that all those passages which have been difficult and obscure at first are so still, for any thing that infallibility has done to remove the difficulty. And if the sense of any obscure portion be better understood now than formerly, we are not indebted for that illumination to any infallible Judge, but to fallible commentators, whose learning and industry, through the blessing of God, have been successful in the great work of elucidating the truth. Nay, farther, of all expositors, the Popes themselves, who are by some accounted infallible judges, are most unhappy in their explications. And so far have they been from clearing obscure texts, they have miserably perverted and misapplied the plainest; many instances of which might be given out of their epistles, which now constitute a considerable part of the canon law. These are incontestable proofs that Christ did not design that we should arrive at the knowledge of his will by means of an unerring and human guide, but by employing our intellectual and moral powers in the use of those means which are afforded for our instruction.

7. This boasted infallibility throws greater difficulties in the way of an inquirer than the Protestant plan. Persons who follow the Roman Catholic rule labour under disadvantages unknown to us. Both they and we acknowledge Scripture to be infallible. We say that it is so plain, in all necessary points, that every Christian, with the help of such means as he possesses, may rightly understand it in all things requisite to salvation, so that he may have a sure foundation on which to build his hope. Their position is, that a layman cannot be certain that he is in the right way, unless he is convinced that he adheres to the doctrines of the Church, and governs his faith by them, the Church being the only infallible interpreter of Scripture. Now we maintain that their course presents more and greater difficulties than ours.

In the case of the Romanist a question arises, How shall he ascertain that he holds all points of faith as the Church holds them? This he must be able to know to a certainty before he can have a proper ground for his faith. Though the Church should be infallible, what does it profit him, unless he be acquainted with what she teaches? But how shall he know that any better than he can tell what the Scriptures teach? Nay, how can he know it as easily as he may the other? For the decrees of the Church, in matters of faith, are more numerous and more obscure than those of Scripture, and are generally shut up in an unknown tongue. Their infallible rule ranges over at least eight folio volumes of Bulls, ten of Decretals, thirty-one Acts of Councils, fifty-one Acta Sanctorum, and at least thirty-five volumes, folio, of the Greek and Latin Fathers. All these put together make one hundred and thirty-five folio volumes. Add to this, that these are all in untranslated Greek and Latin, and therefore beyond the reach of most readers. To increase the difficulty, an unlimited quantity of unwritten tradition must be added. All these are to be joined with the Scripture in order to complete the Roman Catholic rule. Now every man who considers the two rules must see at once that the Romanist has none for his direction; for that which is so long that he is unable to examine it, so intricate that he cannot understand it, and withal in an unknown tongue, must be the same as having none at all. And this is the case with most Roman Catholics; for they know but little of their rule except as they are taught by the Priest.

But to this it is answered, "that private persons must be directed by their better informed guides, and receive the doctrines of the Church from them." But here the question returns, Are particular guides infallible or not? If they be not, then it is possible that the guides themselves may be mistaken; and if so, they may mislead the man that trusts to them; and then of what service is church infallibility to him for the certainty of his faith? If it be said that particular guides are infallible, it is what they themselves do not pretend to; yet supposing it to be so, their difficulties do not end here, unless every private person be infallible. When a Priest expounds the Roman Catholic faith to an individual, and the man is certain he doth rightly expound it, we ask, how is he certain that he rightly understands it, and in the sense of the infallible Church and teacher? It is not a new thing for instructers to hear that their discourses are miserably misunderstood and strangely perverted by many who hear them. What security have they which we have not, who, besides the instruction of abler Clergy, make use of our eyes in examining by Scripture the doctrines we are taught? Our security is certainly greater than theirs. There is the same difference in the two cases as that which exists between one man receiving a statement at the third or fourth hand from a credible person, and depending upon its truth as he obtains it, without farther examination; and another taking the story from the same person, but withal tracing it up, in every particular, to the original author.

We readily allow that the exercise of private judgment is to be taken with some caution and limitation. We acknowledge that private persons are to judge only for themselves, and not to impose their judgment upon others. The privilege of judging for ourselves does not take away the necessity and use of teachers in religion, nor does it exempt men from a due submission and obedience to their instructers and governors, or extend so far as to assume that every man is able to dispute on the controversies of religion. But while we grant these, we contend that private persons are fit to judge for themselves in matters of religion, because the most necessary points to be believed and practised are so plain, that every man of ordinary capacity, under competent instruction, can judge as well for himself as any man or company of men can for him. Besides, the Scripture allows this privilege to every man, as will be proved in the sequel. Indeed the Roman Catholics are forced to allow this in effect. For though they deny a liberty of judging in particular points, they are obliged to grant this upon the whole. For when they would persuade a Jew or Heathen to become a Christian, or a heretic to abjure his heresy and come over to them, they require each to judge of the true Church, and of the true religion. Now, if men are capable of deciding on a subject of so much importance as the choice of their religion, they certainly are able to judge on topics of less importance.

It is also conceded, that the present condition of human nature does not admit of any state in knowledge that can be considered perfect, and those who have assumed it, notwithstanding such high pretensions, have been as liable to inconveniences and mistakes as their more humble and less ambitious neighbours. It is true, that state is best which is liable to the fewest and least of them. But if men will modestly and willingly learn, the Almighty has done sufficient to instruct them in the truth and certainty of religion. For he has by his word, his Spirit, his providence, and the Christian ministry, made all things that are necessary so clear, that if men will not listen to these, they will not attend to any other. For when Christ taught, he was disobeyed; and at the time God was giving the law from Sinai, the Israelites were making an image to worship at the foot of the mount. While the Apostles were teaching,—heresies, contentions, and schisms were rising in the church. So we see, that if men will refuse to hear our Lord, Moses, the Prophets and Apostles, they cannot fail to disregard others. Inconveniences will remain, not because sufficient has not been done, but because men refuse to pay attention to the things which are revealed.

8. The absurdity of the dogma of the infallibility of the Church of Rome will appear farther if we consider, that to claim an infallibility which would preserve every one from error, all men must be constituted infallible, be they Clergymen or laymen.

It will require infallibility in the Priest, that he may neither receive erroneous views of the doctrines of the Church, nor communicate wrong ideas to his hearers. For if he errs, either in understanding the Church, or in making known her declarations unto others, the person who is so guided will as certainly be led into error, as if he had erred in the use of his own private judgment. To avoid this glaring result from the doctrine of infallibility, Roman Catholics are led to attach to their Clergy a prerogative in deciding points of faith and morals, which falls but little short of infallibility itself. Indeed, as this prerogative is exercised by many Priests, and confided in by many Roman Catholics, it amounts to nothing less. It is true, their controvertists deny that Priests are individually infallible; but in their practice we cannot separate from them the assumption of the highest degree of infallibility, whether it regards the absolute decisions of the Clergy, or the implicit submission of an ignorant people. In proof of this we give the following extract from Dr. Milner, one of their most eminent disputants: —"Most likely the Catholic peasant learns the doctrine of his Church from his parish Priest; but then he knows that the doctrine of this Priest MUST be conformable to that of his Bishop, and that otherwise he will soon be called to an account for it. He knows also that the doctrine of the Bishop himself MUST be conformable to that of the other Bishops and the Pope, and that it is a fundamental maxim with them all never to admit of any tenet but such as is believed by all the Bishops, and was believed by their predecessors, up to the Apostles themselves." * Mr. Nolan, an Irish Priest, declares as follows:—"True, he" (the Roman Catholic) "knows the Pastor is not infallible; he is nevertheless aware that, as the organ of the Church, he communicates to him the Catholic doctrine pure and unadulterated. He knows that the doctrine of the Priest MUST be conformable to the doctrine of the Bishop, and that the doctrine of the Bishop MUST be the same as that which is believed and taught by the chief Pontiff, and all the other Bishops of the Catholic world." † From these quotations, which might easily be multiplied, it appears that nothing less than the prerogative of infallibility can enable Priests and Bishops to perform what is here assumed. Indeed, the power ascribed to their Clergy, in their standard works, falls nothing short of it. They are represented by them as being the mouth of God, the representatives of Christ, in such a sense as to require nothing less than infallibility to enable them to discharge the high functions which they arrogantly claim.

Furthermore, not only the Priest, but the layman must be infallible, or he may mistake the decisions of his Church and teachers; and this is an inevitable consequence of the doctrine of Roman Catholic infallibility. It is true the Clergy never think of ascribing this power to the people; for when they speak of the Church as infallible, the people form no part of it, the Pope and Clergy being emphatically the Church. Nor do the people themselves suppose they are so; for they cannot even allow themselves to judge at all in matters of religion, knowing that they must receive implicitly whatsoever the Clergy teach. What we assert is, that, to prevent the people from misunderstanding that which Roman Catholics believe, they ought to be free from mistake, as nothing less than the prerogative of infallibility can prevent this; and therefore, to carry out the system, all men must be infallible, whether Clergy or laity.

* End of Controversy, Letter xii., p. 82 Eighth edit.

† Discussion at the Carlow Bible Meeting, November, 1824, et infra.

Now as God has not made every man infallible, the plan of salvation is known with much more certainty, and with less risk of error, from the word of God, than from the decisions and definitions of Councils and Popes. The teacher and hearer have the unerring decisions of God in Scripture. More than this they cannot have from any Church which claims infallibility. Indeed, the way is more direct in the one than the other. The Scripture has the decided advantage: it is more concise, more clear, and in every way more adapted for "instruction in righteousness."

Roman Catholics err, therefore, in not making a distinction between objective and subjective infallibility. Protestants acknowledge that there is an objective infallibility, or that the Bible is free from error; but they do not allow that there is subjective infallibility, or that those who receive this rule must necessarily be thus free. This distinction, properly observed, would help to correct many of their deviations from the truth.

9. The claim and exercise of this prerogative completely shut the door against reformation. When the Church has once proclaimed herself immutable and invariable, there is no room left for correction. Those errors that imperceptibly crept into the Church in an age of ignorance and superstition, receive the sanction that belongs to truth; whilst verities that have been obscured or overlooked in the days of ignorance are kept from the world, merely because those pretending to exemption from error, have not seen fit to recognise them.

This does not apply to doctrines only: it has a powerful effect on morals. For when, previous to the days of Luther, the reformation of the Church in its head and members, that is, the Pope and Clergy, was earnestly desired by all good men, the intrigues and wickedness of those who governed the Church were such that nothing advantageous could be effected.

In proof that the Church of Rome needs reformation, and that her claim of infallibility has gone far toward producing errors and immorality, we can adduce the testimony of her own children. We refer to the ten grievances of the German nation,* and also to the memorable advice presented to Paul III., in 1538, by nine distinguished Prelates, in which there is contained a catalogue of vices of the most glaring description. Nevertheless, no reformation could be effected.†

[In conclusion, "Have I not a right to say to any man, or to any set of men, who would impose upon me their decisions, 'Who made you a ruler or a judge over me?' I am bound, indeed, to receive truth, from whatever quarter it be addressed to me; and if I do not, I sin unquestionably: but I myself must judge of what is truth; and no man may presume to say authoritatively, 'This is, or is not, true.' I am God's creature, and therefore I am subject to him; but I am subject to no man. God has bestowed upon me intellectual and moral powers, and therefore I am responsible to him for the purposes to which they are applied; but whilst he is my Master, I acknowledge no master besides. My mind and my conscience are the gifts of God, not the gifts of man; and no man may usurp authority over them, or command or control their movements in one direction or another. The question is obvious at a glance, Why am I endowed with an intelligent moral nature? Why have I conscience to sit in judgment on right and wrong, on truth and error? Why am I capable of thinking and willing? Why has God bestowed such faculties on me, if I must not exercise them, and if I must believe and act just as I am told to believe and act? Why have I eyes, if I must keep them shut, or only open them as far as I am permitted? As surely as God has distinguished me with the attributes of mind and conscience, so surely am I responsible to him—but to him alone—for the manner in which they are employed. And if I myself must answer to God and not another; and if the consequences of error and of sin must come down upon my head, and not on another,—how can I suffer my rational, and moral, and responsible nature, to be in any keeping but my own? Carry with you this conviction, that although none but God is, yet God is the LORD of the mind and the conscience. If you be answerable to no human tribunal for your religious belief, you are amenable to the tribunal of heaven; and if no man, and no set of men, may interfere, with his or their authority, to impose upon you articles of faith, yet you are responsible to God for every sentiment you hold, and he will one day call you to account. You are free, in so far as man is concerned; but you are not free to err, or to sin,—not so free, as that you may sin or err with impunity. 'We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ,' to render account, amongst other things, of the use which we have made of that high but awful right, THE RIGHT OF JUDGING FOR OURSELVES IN MATTERS OF RELIGION."*]

* Du Pin, Ecclesiastical History, vol. iii., p. 141.
† Idem, p. 233.

CHAPTER V.

THE ANCIENT FATHERS—THEIR AUTHORITY IN THE CHURCH OF ROME.

1. Some of them have been corrupted by the intermixtures of heretics: 2. Words and phrases have been altered: 3. The Church of Rome, by her expurgatory indices, has corrupted them: 4. Some of the Fathers have taught false doctrines: 5. The Council of Trent decreed many things contrary to the decisions of the Fathers: 6. They contradict each other in many things: 7. Their character as interpreters: 8. Opinions of Roman Catholics respecting the authority of the Fathers: 9. Their unanimous consent considered: 10. Uses of their testimony.

THE writings of the ancient Fathers form the standard of interpretation in the Church of Rome: the Creed of Pope Pius IV. affirms that Scripture is to be interpreted "according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers;" consequently Roman Catholic disputants have recourse to their writings on almost every occasion to prove their peculiar views. They consider the unanimous consent of the Fathers sufficient to establish any doctrine or moral rule. Their authority, however, is allowed to be nothing more than a branch of tradition. But as tradition is infallible in their estimation, the concurrence of the Fathers is viewed in the same light. The following are among the reasons which satisfy Protestants, that as infallible guides, the Fathers are overrated; while at the same time their writings have numerous important uses, and can be shown to be more in accordance with the views of Protestants, than with the dogmas and institutions of Popery.

[* Young's Lectures on the chief Points in Controversy between Protestants and Roman Catholics, pp. 111—113.—EDIT.]

1. Some of the Fathers have been corrupted by the intermixtures of heretics. Many false books were issued in their names; and many of their writings were lost, which would have explained their sense. The Fathers were made to speak, not what themselves thought, but what other men pleased. The writing of books with the inscription of great names began early in the Church, and continued for some time. The Arians wrote an epistle to Constantine, under the name of Athanasius.* The Eutychians wrote against Cyril of Alexandria under the name of Theodoret. In the books attributed to St. Basil, containing thirty chapters, De Spiritu Sancto, fifteen of them were written by another hand, as is manifest from the difference of style and manner. This appears clear from the preface of Erasmus to his edition of Basil.† Scarcely any Father who is the author of a considerable number of books has escaped the injustice of the times. The abuse has been so evident, that interested persons of any party, when pressed with the authority of an ancient Father, attempt to escape by accusing the edition, or the author, or the hands through which it passed.

[Archbishop Ussher, in his Answer to a Challenge made by a Jesuit, has entered largely on the subject of the corruptions of the Fathers by the Church of Rome, from which the following paragraphs have been extracted:—

["Our adversary," says the learned Prelate, "layeth down a number of points, held by them, and denied by us: which he undertaketh to make good, as well by the express testimonies of the Fathers of the primitive Church of Rome, as also by good and certain grounds, out of the sacred Scriptures, if the Fathers' authority will not suffice. Where, if he would change his order, and give the sacred Scriptures the precedency, he should therein do more right to God the author of them, who well deserveth to have audience in the first place, and withal ease both himself and us of a needless labour, in seeking any further authority to compose our differences. For if he can produce (as he beareth us in hand he can) good and certain grounds out of the sacred Scriptures for the points in controversy, the matter is at an end: he that will not rest satisfied with such evidences as these, may, if he please, travel further, and speed worse. Therefore as St. Augustine heretofore provoked the Donatists, so provoke I him: 'Auferantur chartæ humanæ: sonent voces Divinæ: Ede mihi unam Scripturæ vocem pro parte Donati.' 'Let human writings be removed: let God's voice sound: bring me one voice of the Scripture for the part of Donatus.'‡ Produce but one clear testimony of the sacred Scripture for the Pope's part, and it shall suffice: allege what authority you list without Scripture, and it cannot suffice. We reverence indeed the ancient Fathers, as it is fit we should, and hold it our duty to 'rise up before the hoary head, and to honour the face of the old man:' (Lev. xix. 32:) but still with reservation of the respect we owe to their Father and ours, that 'Ancient of days, the hair of whose head is like the pure wool.' (Dan. vii. 9.) We may not forget the lesson, which our great Master hath taught us: 'Call no man your father upon the earth; for one is your Father which is in heaven.' (Matt. xxiii. 9.) Him, therefore, alone do we acknowledge for the Father of our faith: no other Father do we know, upon whose bare credit we may ground our consciences, in things that are to be believed.

["And this we say, not as if we feared, that these men were able to produce better proofs, out of the writings of the Fathers, for the part of the Pope, than we can do for the Catholic cause; (when we come to join in the particulars, they shall find it otherwise;) but partly to bring the matter unto a shorter trial, partly to give the word of God his due, and to declare what that Rock is, upon which alone we build our faith, even 'the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets;' (Eph. ii. 20;) from which no sleight that they can devise shall ever draw us.

["The same course did St. Augustine take with the Pelagians; against whom he wanted not the authority of the Fathers of the Church. 'Which if I would collect,' saith he, 'and use their testimonies, it would be too long a work, and I might peradventure seem to have less confidence than I ought in the canonical authorities, from which we ought not to be withdrawn.'* Yet was the Pelagian heresy then but newly budded; which is the time wherein the pressing of the Fathers' testimonies is thought to be best in season. With how much better warrant may we follow this precedent, having to deal with such as have had time and leisure enough to falsify the Fathers' writings, and to teach them the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans? The method of confusing heresies by the consent of holy Fathers, is by none commended more than by Vincentius Lirinensis; who is careful, notwithstanding, herein to give us this caveat: 'But neither always, nor all kinds of heresies are to be impugned after this manner, but such only as are new, and lately sprung; namely, when they do first arise, while by the straitness of the time itself, they be hindered from falsifying the rules of the ancient faith; and before the time that, their poison spreading farther, they attempt to corrupt the writings of the ancients. But far-spread and inveterate heresies are not to be dealt withal this way, forasmuch as by long continuance of time, a long occasion hath lain open unto them to steal away the truth.'† The heresies with which we have to deal, have spread so far, and continued so long, that the defenders of them are bold to make universality and duration the special marks of the Church: they had opportunity enough of time and place, to put in use all deceivableness of unrighteousness; neither will they have

* Apol. Athanas. ad Constant., vide Baron. Annal., 553.

† See Bishop Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying, sec. 8, Works, vol. ii., p. 85. Heber's edit.

["‡ August. Opera, tom. v., Serm. 46, p. 242. Edit. Bened.

["* 'Quos si colligere, et eorum testimoniis uti velim, et nimis longum erit, et de canonicis auctoritatibus, a quibus non debemus averti, minus fortasse videbor præsumpsisse quam debui.'—Idem, de Nupt. et Concupiscent, lib. ii., c. 51, p. 328. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1606.

["† 'Sed neque semper, neque omnes hæreses hoc modo impugnandæ sunt, sed novitiæ recentesque tantummodo, cum primum scilicet exoriuntur; antequam infalsare vetustæ fidei regulas, ipsius temporis vetantur angustiis, ac priusquam manante latius veneno majorum volumina vitiare conentur. Cæterum dilatatæ et inveteratæ hæreses nequaquam hac via aggrediendæ sunt, eo quod prolixo temporum tractu longa his furandæ veritatis patuerit occasio.'—Vincent. de Hæres., c. 39.

it to say, that, in coining and clipping, and washing the monuments of antiquity, they have been wanting to themselves.

[" Before the Council of Nice (as hath been observed by one,* who sometime was Pope himself) little respect to speak of was had to the Church of Rome. If this may be thought to prejudice the dignity of that Church, which would be held to have sat as Queen among the nations, from the very beginning of Christianity; you shall have a crafty merchant (Isidorus Mercator, I trow, they call him) that will help the matter by counterfeiting decretal epistles in the name of the primitive Bishops of Rome, and bringing in thirty of them in a row, as so many knights of the post, to bear witness of that great authority which the Church of Rome enjoyed before the Nicene Fathers were assembled. If the Nicene Fathers have not amplified the bounds of her jurisdiction in so large a manner as she desired, she hath had her well-willers that have supplied the Council's negligence in that behalf, and made canons for the purpose, in the name of the good Fathers, that never dreamed of such a business. If the power of judging all others will not content the Pope, unless he himself may be exempted from being judged by any other; another Council, as ancient at least as that of Nice, shall be suborned; wherein it shall be concluded, by the consent of two hundred and eighty-four imaginary Bishops, that 'no man may judge the first seat.' † And for failing, in an elder Council than that, consisting of three hundred buckram Bishops, of the very self-same making, the like note shall be sung: 'Quoniam prima sedes non judicabitur a quoquam:' 'The first seat must not be judged by any man.' ‡ Lastly, if the Pope do not think that the fulness of spiritual power is sufficient for his greatness, unless he may be also Lord paramount in temporalibus; he hath his followers ready at hand to frame a fair donation, in the name of Constantine the Emperor, whereby his Holiness shall be estated, not only in the city of Rome, but also in the seigniory of the whole West. It would require a volume to rehearse the names of those several tractates, which have been basely bred in the former days of darkness, and fathered upon the ancient Doctors of the Church, who, if they were now alive, would be deposed that they were never privy to their begetting.

[" Neither hath this corrupting humour stayed itself, in forging of whole Councils, and entire treatises of the ancient writers; but hath, like a canker, fretted away divers of their sound parts, and so altered their complexions, that they appear not to be the same men they were. To instance in the great question of transubstantiation: we were wont to read in the books attributed unto St. Ambrose, De Sacramentis, lib. iv., c. 4: 'Si ergo tanta vis est in sermone Domini Jesu, ut inciperent esse quæ non erant: quanto magis operatorius est, ut sint quæ erant, et in aliud commutentur?' 'If, therefore, there be so great force in the speech of our Lord Jesus, that the things which were not, begun to be;' (namely, at the first creation;) 'how much more is the same powerful to make, that things may still be that which they were, and yet be changed into another thing?' It is not unknown, how much those words, ut sint quæ erant, have troubled their brains, who maintain, that after the words of consecration, the elements of bread and wine 'be not that thing which they were:' and what devices they have found, to make the bread and wine in the sacrament to be like unto the beast in the Revelation, 'that was, and is not, and yet is.' (Rev. xvii. 8.) But that Gordian knot, which they with their skill could not so readily untie, their masters at Rome (Alexander-like) have now cut asunder; paring clean away, in their Roman edition, (which is also followed in that set out at Paris, anno 1603,) those words that so much troubled them, and letting the rest run smoothly after this manner: 'Quanto magis operatorius est, ut quæ erant, in aliud commutentur?' 'How much more is the speech of our Lord powerful to make, that those things which were, should be changed into another thing?'

[" The author of the imperfect work upon Matthew, Homil. xi., writeth thus: 'Si ergo hæc vasa sanctificata ad privatos usus transferre sic periculosum est, in quibus non est verum corpus Christi, sed mysterium corporis ejus continetur: quanto magis vasa corporis nostri, quæ sibi Deus ad habitaculum præparavit, non debemus locum dare diabolo agendi in eis quod vult?' 'If, therefore, it be so dangerous a matter to transfer unto private uses those holy vessels, in which the true body of Christ is not, but the mystery of his body is contained: how much more for the vessels of our body, which God hath prepared for himself to dwell in, ought not we to give a way unto the devil, to do in them what he pleaseth?' Those words ('in quibus non est verum corpus Christi, sed mysterium corporis ejus continetur:' 'in which the true body of Christ is not, but the mystery of his body is contained') did threaten to cut the very throat of the Papists' real presence; and therefore in good policy they thought it fit to cut their throat first, for doing any further hurt. Whereupon, in the editions of this work printed at Antwerp, apud Joannem Steelsium, anno 1537; at Paris, apud Joannem Roigny, anno 1543, and at Paris again, apud Audoenum Parvum, anno 1557, not one syllable of them is to be seen; though extant in the ancienter editions, one whereof is as old as the year 1487. And to the same purpose, in Homily xix., instead of 'sacrificium panis et vini,' 'the sacrifice of bread and wine,' (which we find in the old impressions,) these latter editions have chopped in 'sacrificium corporis et sanguinis Christi,' 'the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ.'

[" In the year 1608, there were published at Paris certain works of Fulbertus Bishop of Chartres, 'pertaining as well to the refuting of the heresies of this time,' (for so saith the inscription,) 'as to the clearing of the history of the French.'* Among those things that appertain to the confutation of the heresies of this time, there is one especially laid down in these words, folio 168: 'Nisi manducaveritis, inquit, carnem Filii hominis, et sanguinem biberitis, non habebitis vitam in vobis. Facinus vel flagitium videtur jubere. Figura ergo est, dicet hæreticus, præcipiens passioni Domini esse communicandum tantum, et suaviter atque utiliter recondendum in memoria, quod pro nobis caro ejus crucifixa et vulnerata sit.' 'Unless, saith Christ, ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye shall not have life in you. He seemeth to command an outrage or wickedness. It is therefore a figure, will the heretic say, requiring us only to communicate with the Lord's passion, and sweetly and profitably to lay up in our memory, that his flesh was crucified and wounded for us.' He that put in those [" * Æneæ Silvii Opera, Epist. 288. Basil, 1571.

[" † 'Nemo enim judicabit primam sedem.'—Concil. Rom. sub Sylvest., c. 20.

[" ‡ Concil. Sinuessan., circa fin.

[" * 'Quæ tam ad refutandas hæreses hujus temporis, quam ad Gallorum historiam pertinent.'

words ('dicet hæreticus') thought he had notably met with the heretics of this time; but was not aware, that thereby he made St. Augustine an heretic for company. For the heretic that speaketh thus, is even St. Augustine himself; whose very words these are, in his third book De Doctrinâ Christianâ, chapter xvi.* Which some belike having put the publisher in mind of, he was glad to put this among his errata, and to confess that these two words were not to be found in the manuscript copy which he had from Petavius; but telleth us not what we are to think of him, that for the countenancing of the Popish cause, ventured so shamefully to abuse St. Augustine.

["In the year 1616 a tome of ancient writers, that never saw the light before, was set forth at Ingoldstad by Petrus Steuartius; where, among other tractates, a certain Penitential, written by Rabanus, that famous Archbishop of Mentz, is to be seen. In chapter xxxiii. of that book, Rabanus, making answer unto an idle question, moved by Bishop Heribaldus, concerning the eucharist, (what should become of it, after it was consumed and sent into the draught, after the manner of other meats?) hath these words, initio p. 669: 'Nam quidam nuper de ipso sacramento corporis et sanguinis Domini non rite sentientes dixerunt: hoc ipsum corpus et sanguinem Domini, quod de Maria Virgine natum est, et in quo ipse Dominus passus est in cruce, et resurrexit de sepulchro; cui errori quantum potuimus, ad Egilum Abbatem scribentes, de corpore ipso quid vere credendum sit apperuimus.'† 'For some of late, not holding rightly of the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord, have said, this is the very body and blood of our Lord, which was born of the Virgin Mary, and in which our Lord himself suffered on the cross, and rose again from the grave; against which error, writing unto Abbat Egilus, according to our ability, we have declared, what is truly to be believed concerning Christ's body.' You see Rabanus's tongue is clipped here for telling tales; but how this came to pass, were worth the learning. Steuartius freeth himself from the fact, telling us in his margin, that here 'there was a blank in the manuscript copy;'‡ and we do easily believe him; for Possevine the Jesuit hath given us to understand, that manuscript books also are to be purged, as well as printed.§ But whence was this manuscript fetched, think you? 'Out of the famous monastery of Weingart,' saith Steuartius.‖ The Monks of Weingart, then, belike must answer the matter; and they, I dare say, upon examination, will take their oaths that it was no part of their intention to give any furtherance unto the cause of the Protestants hereby. If hereunto we add, that Heribaldus and Rabanus both are ranked among heretics, by Thomas Walden,¶ for holding the eucharist to be subject to digestion, &c., like other meats; the suspicion will be more vehement: whereunto yet I will adjoin one evidence more, that shall leave the matter past suspicion.

["In the libraries of my worthy friends Sir Robert Cotton (that noble Baronet, so renowned for his great care in collecting and preserving all antiquities) and Dr. Ward, the learned Master of Sidney College in Cambridge, I met with an ancient treatise of the sacrament, (beginning thus: 'Sicut ante nos quidam sapiens dixit, cujus sententiam probamus, licet nomen ignoremus,') which is the same with that in the Jesuits' College at Louvain, blindly fathered upon Berengarius.* The author of this treatise, having first twitted Heribaldus for propounding, and Rabanus for resolving, this question of the digestion, &c., of the eucharist, layeth down afterward the opinion of Paschasius Radbertus, (whose writing is yet extant,) 'Quod non alia plane sit caro quæ sumitur de altari, quam quæ nata est de Maria Virgine, et passa in cruce, et quæ resurrexit de sepulchro, quæque et pro mundi vita adhuc hodie offertur.' 'That the flesh which is received at the altar, is no other than that which was born of the Virgin Mary, suffered on the cross, rose again from the grave, and as yet is daily offered for the life of the world.' 'Contra quem,' saith he, 'satis argumentatur, et Rabanus in epistola ad Egilonem Abbatem,† et Ratrannus quidam libro composito ad Carolum Regem; dicentes aliam esse.' 'Against whom both Rabanus in his epistle to Abbat Egilo, and one Ratrannus in a book which he made to King Charles, argue largely; saying that it is another kind of flesh.' Whereby, what Rabanus's opinion was of this point, in his epistle to Abbat Egilo or Egilus, and consequently what that was which the Monks of Weingart could not endure in his Penitential, I trust is plain enough.

["I omit other corruptions of antiquity in this same question, which I have touched elsewhere;‡ only that of Bertram I may not pass over; wherein the dishonesty of these men, in handling the writings of the ancients, is laid open, even by the confession of their own mouths. Thus the case standeth. That Ratrannus, who joined with Rabanus in refuting the error of the carnal presence, at the first bringing in thereof by Paschasius Radbertus, is he who commonly is known by the name of Bertramus. The book which he wrote of this argument to Carolus Calvus, the Emperor, was forbidden to be read, by order from the Roman Inquisition, confirmed afterwards by the Council of Trent. The Divines of Douay, perceiving that the forbidding of the book did not keep men from reading it, but gave them rather occasion to seek more earnestly after it, thought it better policy that Bertram should be permitted to go abroad, but handled in such sort as other ancient writers, that made against them, were wont to be. 'Seeing, therefore,' say they, 'we bear with very many errors in other of the old Catholic writers, and extenuate them, excuse them, by inventing some device, oftentimes deny them, and feign some commodious sense for them when they are objected in disputations or conflicts with our adversaries: we do not see why Bertram may not deserve the same equity, and diligent revisal; lest the heretics cry out, that we burn and forbid such antiquity as maketh for them.'§ Mark this dealing well. The world must be borne in hand, that all the Fathers make for the Church of Rome against us in all our controversies. When we bring forth express testimonies of ["* Bibliothecæ Patrum, tom. ii., edit. Col., p. 44, b.

["† Vide Mabil. Acta Bened., sec. iv., pars. ii., p. 596.

["‡ 'Lacuna hic est in MS. exemplari.'

["§ 'Ad istos enim quoque purgatio pertinet.'—Possevin., Bibliothec. Select., lib. i., c. 12, p. 58. Romæ. 1593.

["‖ 'Ex MS. cod. celeberrimi Monasterii Weingartensis.'

["¶ Wald., tom. i., Doctrinal. in Prolog. ad Martinum V.

[" Idem, tom. ii., c. 19, 61.

["* Ant. Possevin. Apparat. sac. in Berengario Turon.

["† Al. Elgionem et Helgimonem, male. Neque enim alius hic intelligendus, quam Ægil. ille, cui in Fuldensis Abbatiæ regimine proxime successit ipse Rabanus.

["‡ De Christian. Eccl. Success. et Statu, vol. ii., pp. 58, 217. Edit. anno 1613.

["§ 'Quum igitur in Catholicis veteribus aliis plurimos feramus errores, et extenuemus, excusemus, excogitato commento persæpe negemus, et commodum iis sensum affingamus, dum opponuntur in disputationibus, aut in conflictionibus cum adversariis: non videmus, cur non eandem æquitatem et diligentem recognitionem mereatur Bertramus, ne hæretici ogganniant, nos antiquitatem pro ipsis facientem exurere et prohibere.'—Index Expurg. Belgic., p. 5. Edit. Antwerp, anno 1571.

the Fathers to the contrary, what must then be done? A good face must be put upon the matter, one device or other must be invented to elude the testimonies objected; and still it must be denied, that the Fathers make against the doctrine of the Papists. Bertram, for example, writeth thus: 'The things which differ one from another are not the same. The body of Christ which was dead, and rose again, and, being made immortal, now dieth not, (death no more having dominion over it,) is everlasting, and now not subject to suffering. But this which is celebrated in the Church is temporal, not everlasting; it is corruptible, not free from corruption.'* What device must they find out here? They must say this is meant of the accidents, or 'forms of the sacrament, which are corruptible; or of the use of the sacrament, which continueth only in this present world.'† But how will this shift serve the turn, when, as the whole drift of the discourse tendeth to prove, that the bread which is received by the mouth of the faithful in the sacrament is not that very body of Christ which died upon the cross, and rose again from death? 'Non male aut inconsulte omittantur igitur omnia hæc.' 'It were not amiss, therefore,' say our Popish censurers, 'nor unadvisedly done, that all these things should be left out.' "]

2. The Fathers have been corrupted in various places, by inserting words, and altering them to different senses.

[One of the most flagitious instance of this mal-treatment of the writings of the Fathers which has occurred in modern times, has been justly exposed by the Rev. R. T. Pope, in his valuable work entitled "Roman Misquotation: or, certain Passages from the Fathers adduced, &c., brought to the Test of the Originals, and their perverted Character demonstrated." Mr. Pope charges the Romish authors with having given garbled and erroneous quotations from Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, Augustine, Cyprian, Eusebius, Ambrose, Theodoret, and Justin Martyr, in very numerous instances; which accusations he triumphantly substantiates, and places the individuals guilty of these perversions in no enviable view. From this work we shall draw largely, in order to support our present position, that the writings of the Fathers have been corrupted by the insertion and abstraction of words, and various other alterations, by which they have been made to utter sentiments which they never held. We shall confine our references to the first name among the Fathers who are mentioned above.

["Thoroughly to ascertain the minds of the Fathers is beset with no ordinary difficulties. For example: spurious treatises, in order to procure for them a name, were often ascribed to the pens of distinguished Ecclesiastics.‡ Fathers, too, when their judgments became matured, sometimes retracted books which they had composed in early life.§ Ere the student, therefore, can enter satisfactorily on an examination of their pages, it must first be determined whether the volume, about to be perused, is the genuine production of its reputed author, and whether it contains his final opinions. Again: the manuscripts of the Fathers have, in numerous places, been corrupted through the ignorance and carelessness of transcribers, or through design; and since the introduction of the art of printing, some editions of their writings have been mutilated by Papal advocates, and the Expurgatory Indices of the Church of Rome.* Such facts as these are amply sufficient, therefore, to prove, that an accurate discovery, if attainable, of the opinions of the early theologians, can be effected only by very laborious research.†

["The most serious obstruction, however, to complete acquaintance with the ancient Christian authors, is presented in the copiousness of their works. 'One collection of the Fathers of the Latin Church, the Bibliotheca Patrum, consists of twenty-eight volumes in folio, exclusive of the Fathers of the Asiatic and African Churches, Chrysostom, Augustine, &c., which form a library in themselves.' It is obvious, that, a few rare cases excepted, life itself, though possessed of all necessary qualifications, is utterly incompetent to wade through such an extensive mass of ecclesiastical lore.

["On the other hand, it will be recollected, that the Church which pledges her members to understand 'the oracles of God' 'according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers,' arrogates to herself the attribute of infallibility. Whatever difficulties, therefore, oppose the procurement of such an exposition of Scripture by individual exertion, it may reasonably be concluded, that she has provided it for her disciples, if it is really to be found. Now, had a commentary been furnished by the Church of Rome, purporting to exhibit the harmony of the early Divines in their annotations on the sacred volume, the question, still, would need solution, Is the evidence of witnesses, who, it can be shown, have been tampered with, admissible? Strange, however, as the fact may appear, it is one not to be controverted,—such a compilation, prepared by her authority, and stamped with her IMPRIMATUR, is sought for in vain!‡ While, with bold plausibility, the Fathers are claimed as her own, the Church of Rome 'shuts up' the inquiries of her votaries to an interpretation of Scripture which does not exist; and, having induced them by lofty pretensions, to 'surrender judgment hoodwinked to a name,' substitutes, practically, her own dictates for 'the law and the testimony.'

["It may, perhaps, be urged in reply, that, if the Church of Rome has not, herself, proved her accordance with primitive Christianity, her champions have, on many occasions, cited passages from the Fathers in vindication of her doctrines. This fact is indisputable; but I would ask, whether doubts touching her agreement with antiquity will not be felt by her adherents, should it be ["* 'Quæ a se differunt, idem non sunt. Corpus Christi quod mortuum est, et resurrexit, et immortale factum jam non moritur, et mors illi ultra non dominabitur, æternum est, nec jam passibile. Hoc autem quod in ecclesia celebratur, temporale est, non æternum; corruptibile est, non incorruptum.'—Bertram de Corp. et Sang. Dom., sec. 76.

["† 'Secundum species sacramenti corruptibiles: aut de re ipsa et usu sacramenti, qui non contingit, nisi præsenti in seculo.'—Index Expurg., p. 7."—EDIT.]

["‡ See James's Treatise of the Corruption of Scripture, Councils, and Fathers by the Prelates, Pastors, and Pillars, of the Church of Rome, for Maintenance of Popery, pp. 108, 109. London, 1688. And Daillé, Du vrai Usage des Pères, lib. i., c. 3.

["§ For instance: Augustine's treatise,—'in quo retractantur libri quos scripsit nondum Episcopus, et quod scripsit Episcopus:'—'in which are reconsidered books that he composed before and after he became a Bishop.'—See Daillé, Du vrai, &c., lib. i., c. 7.

["* For a full and accurate account of the Indices, both Expurgatory and Prohibitory, the reader is referred to the Rev. Mr. Mendham's valuable work, entitled the Literary Policy of the Church of Rome. Second edit.

["† See an Explanation or Enlarging of the Ten Articles in the Supplication of Dr. James, lately exhibited to the Clergy of England. Oxford, 1625.

["‡ While, in despite of the expurgation their writings have undergone, the Fathers still testify against Papal theology; we need not feel surprise, that the Church of Rome should prefer their 'unanimous consent' being an object of implicit faith with her disciples, rather than attempt to present it in a tangible and authenticated form established to their conviction, that some of her distinguished advocates, when appealing to early Christian authors, have, in several instances, misquoted them? I, then, deliberately assert, that a volume, in no small repute, has, in support of Papal dogmas, imposed on the community garbled extracts from the writings of the Fathers.

[" The work against which I bring this charge, is entitled, 'The Faith of Catholics, confirmed by Scripture, and attested by the Fathers of the first five Centuries of the Church:' * and was compiled by the united labour of two Romish Ecclesiastics, the Rev. Messrs. Berington and Kirk. The book adverted to enunciates, in several propositions, the Creed of Rome; and contains a long introduction from the pen of Mr. Berington, some extracts from Scripture and Councils, and short biographical notices of the authors quoted; but, with these exceptions, consists of translated passages from the ancient theologians, verifications of particular clauses, in Greek and Latin, being occasionally given.

[" Now, it will be allowed that the rules of honourable citation are violated,—

[" 1. When a correct version, or, at least, the true import of the original, is not given; and,

[" 2. When the impression, sought to be conveyed by the extract, is greatly qualified, if not refuted, by the context.

[" Quotations, occurring in 'the Faith of Catholics,' shall be examined, which, either in one or both of these respects, involve the compilers in the guilt of misrepresentation.

[" The reader will naturally call for the evidence on which so serious an accusation rests: I proceed, therefore, to adduce it.

[" The passage, to which, in the first instance, I beg to call attention, is from Clement of Alexandria, and is thus given in 'the Faith of Catholics,' p. 13:—

[" 'Those who seek may find the truth, and clearly learn from the Scriptures themselves, in what manner heresies have gone astray; and, on the contrary, in what manner accurate knowledge, and the right doctrine, is to be found only in the truth (or the true) and ancient church. He ceases to be faithful to the Lord, who revolts against the received doctrines of the Church to embrace the opinions of heretics. They (the heretics) make use, indeed, of the Scriptures; but then they use not all the sacred books; those they use are corrupted; or they chiefly urge ambiguous passages. They corrupt those truths which agree with the inspired word, and were delivered by the holy Apostles and teachers, opposing the divine tradition by human doctrines, that they may establish heresy. But it is clear, from what has been said, that there is only one true Church, which is alone ancient; as there is but one God and one Lord.' —Clem. Alex. Opera, Strom., lib. vii., pp. 888—891, 896, 899. Edit., Potter. Oxonii, 1715.†

[" The preceding quotation calls for animadversion on two grounds. In the first place, it contains a clause unfaithfully rendered. Messrs. Berington and Kirk represent Clement as saying, 'Heretics make use, indeed, of the Scriptures;' while the original, interpreted literally, is, 'But if those who take part in heresies should DARE to make use of the prophetical Scriptures.'* This mistranslation of a simple clause cannot be regarded as of trivial character. A member of the Church of Rome, under the persuasion that a heretic and a disciple of the Reformation are one and the same, will readily extend to the advocates of the Bible, in the present day, the charges which Clement brings against the heretics of his time. Now, this, the natural leaning of those for whom 'the Faith of Catholics' was expressly intended,† derives confirmation from the statement, that 'heretics make use, indeed, of the Scriptures;' they who are in the habit of reading the word of truth, belonging, generally, to Protestant communions. On the other hand, a correct translation of the original would have raised an insuperable difficulty in the way of classing those who do 'make use of the Scriptures,' with men who, in truth, were afraid of the Bible. For, surely, the literal version, 'If those who follow after heresies, should DARE to make use of the prophetical Scriptures,' implies, that the persons alluded to shrunk from a perusal of the sacred volume, under the conviction that their doctrines could not bear examination by so searching a test. But it needs scarcely be said, that members of Reformed Churches do not exhibit any reluctance to appeal to Scripture, manifesting, as they do, the utmost willingness to submit their principles to be tried by 'the law and the testimony.' The substitution, therefore, of 'heretics make use, indeed, of the Scriptures,' for, 'if heretics should dare to make use of them,' is to be protested against, as not only violating the original, but removing the obstacle presented by it, against ranking the friends of Scripture with the heretics whom Clement condemns.

[" In the second place, it is to be remarked, that 'the Faith of Catholics' adduces the extract under review, in support of the authority of the Church of Rome.‡ Now, while the Papal Creed demands unreserved submission to her interpretations of the oracles of life,§ the context, as shall be proved, holds up the Bible itself as the grand test of religious opinion. This allegation I proceed to establish.

[" The length of reference, appended to the quotation, informs the reader, that it is not composed of consecutive sentences. In order, however, to its more accurate exa-[" * 'Και τολμησωσι προφητικαις χρησασθαι γραφαις και οι τας αιρεσεις μετιοντες.'—'Quod si Propheticis quoque Scripturis uti ausi fuerint qui sectantur hæreses,' &c.—Version in Oxford edition. 'Quod si Propheticis quoque Scripturis uti ausi fuerint qui persequuntur hæreses,' &c.—Clem. Oper. cur. Hervet., p. 741. Paris, 1612.

[" † 'The Faith of Catholics' is dedicated 'to the Catholics of the United Kingdom;' and Mr. Berington observes, in the Introduction, p. 1:—'For my own use, and for the use of others, I have often wished for such a compilation as I now present to my brethren of the Catholic communion.'

[" ‡ The quotation from Clement is placed in 'the Faith of Catholics,' under the head, 'The Authority of the Church;' which, according to Messrs. Berington and Kirk, signifies, it is almost needless to add, the authority of the Church of Rome. Indeed, wherever the expression 'the Church' occurs in the quotations which are to be examined, the compilers of 'the Faith of Catholics,' invariably assume it to be identical with the Church of Rome.

[" § 'Item sacram Scripturam juxta eum sensum quem tenuit et tenet Sancta Mater Ecclesia, cujus est judicare de vero sensu, et interpretatione sacrarum Scripturarum, admitto.'—Symb. Fidei in Bulla Pii IV. 'I also admit sacred Scripture according to that sense which holy Mother Church has held, and does hold; to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the sacred Scriptures.'—Creed of Pius IV.

mination, a few particulars may be noticed. The first section, ending 'true and ancient Church,' occurs in the second volume of Clement's Works, p. 888; the second, ending 'opinions of heretics,' in p. 890; the third, ending 'ambiguous passages,' in p. 891; at an interval of five pages is discovered the fourth section, ending 'heresy;' and, an advance of three additional pages having been made, the remainder is found in p. 899! Truly, the great extent of matter which has contributed to the passage, may, with good reason, awaken suspicion touching its entire correctness.*

["On the only page which intervenes between the first and second branches of the quotation, a position is laid down which recognises the exercise of private judgment in the perusal of holy writ:—

["'They who are prepared,' says Clement, 'to bestow labour on the most excellent subjects, will not desist from searching after the truth, until they shall receive demonstration from the Scriptures themselves.'† If the expression, 'until they shall receive demonstration from the Scriptures themselves,' do not imply the conviction of the judgment produced by the Bible itself, language has no meaning.

["The context of the second sentence, ending 'opinions of heretics,' is as follows:—

["'But, in my opinion, the lover of truth requires strength of mind; for those who take in hand concerns of vast importance, must, of necessity, very greatly err, if, having received the canon of the truth from the truth itself, they do not preserve it. But those who have arrived at that pitch, that they have fallen from the right way, are deceived in many particulars, and that justly, because they have not a power of discerning truth from falsehood, exercised in selecting, with accuracy, those things which are becoming. For, if they possessed it, they would obey the divine Scriptures. As, therefore, if any one be changed into a beast, like those who were infected with the poison of Circe, so he ceases to be a man of God, and faithful to the Lord, who revolts against ecclesiastical tradition, and has fallen into the opinions of human heresies.'‡

["* The Oxford edition, employed by the compilers, is in two volumes folio, each page consisting of one column in the original, and another containing a Latin version, with a few notes subjoined: I have made use of the same edition.

["† Αλλ' οἱ πονειν ἑτοιμοι επι τοις καλλιστοις, ου προτερον αποστησονται ζητουντες την αληθειαν, πριν αν την αποδειξιν απ' αυτων λαβωσι, των γραφων.' (P. 889.)

['Sed qui in rebus pulcherrimis laborem impendere sunt parati, non desistent prius quærere veritatem, quam ex ipsis scripturis acceperint demonstrationem.'

["‡ The second part of the quotation: (p. 890:) the original is as follows:—

['Δει δ'οιμαι τω της αληθειας εραστη, ψυχικης ευτονιας· σφαλλεσθαι γαρ αναγκη μεγιστα τους μεγιστοις εγχειρουντας πραγμασιν, ην μη τον κανονα της αληθειας παρ' αυτης λαβοντες εχωσι της αληθειας· οἱ τοιουτοι δε, ἁτε αποπεσοντες της ορθης ὁδου, και τοις πλειστοις των κατα μερος σφαλλονται, εικοτως, δια το μη εχειν αληθων, και ψευδων κριτηριον, συγγεγυμνασμενον ακριβως τα δεοντα αἱρεισθαι· ει γαρ εκεκτητο, ταις θειαις επειθοντο αν γραφαις· καθαπερ ουν ειτις εξ ανθρωπων θηριον γενοιτο παραπλησιως τοις ὑπο της Κιρκης φαρμαχθεισιν, οὑτως ανθρωπος ειναι του Θεου και πιστος τω Κυριω διαμενειν απολωλεκεν, ὁ αναλακτισας την εκκλησιαστικην παραδοσιν, και αποσκιρτησας εις δοξας αἱρεσεων ανθρωπινων.'

['Opus est autem ut opinor, amatori veritatis robore animi. Necesse enim labi in maximis, eos qui res maximas aggrediuntur, nisi regulam veritatis ab ipsa veritate acceptam tenuerint. Qui autem eo devenerunt, ut a recta via exciderint, merito etiam falluntur in plurimis singularibus, propterea quod non habeant verorum et falsorum judicium plane exercitatum, in iis quæ oportet eligendis. Si enim haberent, parerent scripturis divinis. Quemadmodum ergo si quis fiat bestia ex homine, similiter atque ii qui fuerant infecti venenis Circes: ita homo Dei esse, et Domino fidelis esse desiit, qui adversus ecclesiasticam recalcitravit traditionem, et in humanarum hæreseon desiluit opiniones.'

["* 'Gnostics indeed:' οι γνωστικοι. Clement employs the term 'Gnostic' in a good sense, in opposition to the heretics of that name. Γνωστικος is thus explained by Hederich: 'Endowed with the faculty of knowledge. Hence they were called Gnostics, who supposed that they had penetrated more deeply than others into the mysteries of God: and these were either orthodox Christians, as in the writings of Clement of Alexandria, or heretics, as in Epiphanius.'—Etn. In p. 894, our author makes use of the expression τω κατα αληθειαν γνωστικω, which the Latin version renders 'vero Gnostico,' 'the true Gnostic.'

["† 'Ὁ δε εκ τησδε της απατης πιαλινδρομησας, κατακουσας των γραφων, και τον ἑαυτου βιον επιστρεψας τη αληθεια, οιον εξ ανθρωπου θεος αποτελειται. Εχομεν γαρ την αρχην της διδασκαλιας τον Κυριον, δια τε των προφητων, δια τε του ευαγγελιου, και δια των μακαριων αποστολων, πολυτροπως και πολυμερως εξ αρχης εις τελος ηγουμενον της γνωσεως. Την αρχην δ' ειτις ετερον δεισθαι υπολαβοι, ουκετ' αν οντως αρχη φυλαχθειη. Ὁ μεν ουν εξ ἑαυτου πιστος, τη κυριακη γραφη τε και φωνη αξιοπιστος εικοτως αν δια του Κυριου προς την των ανθρωπων ευεργεσιαν ενεργουμενη. αμελει προς την των πραγματων ευρεσιν, αυτη χρωμεθα κριτηριω· το κρινομενον δε παν ετι απιστον πριν κριθηναι· ωστ' ουδ' αρχη το κρισεως δεομενον. Εικοτως τοινυν πιστει (891) περιβαλοντες αναποδεικτον την αρχην, εκ περιουσιας και τας αποδειξεις παρ' αυτης της αρχης περι της αρχης λαβοντες, φωνη Κυριου παιδευομεθα προς την επιγνωσιν της αληθειας. Οὐ γαρ απλως αποφαινομενοις ανθρωποις προσεχοιμεν, οις και ανταποφαινεσθαι επ' ισης εξεστιν. Ει δ' ουκ αρκει μονοι απλως ειπειν το δοξαν, αλλα πιστωσασθαι δει το λεχθεν, ου την εξ ανθρωπων αναμενουεν μαρτυριαν, αλλα τη του Κυριου φωνη πιστουμεθα το ζητουμενον· η πασων αποδειξεων εχεγγυωτερα, μαλλον δε, η μονη αποδειξις ουσα τυγχανει· καθ' την επιστημην οι μεν απογευσαμενοι μονον των γραφων, πιστοι· οἱ δε και προσωτερω χωρησαντες, ακριβεις γνωμονες

[" In immediate connexion with the foregoing extract, occurs the third sentence of the quotation, ending 'ambiguous passages.'

["'But, if those who take part in heresies, should dare to make use of the prophetical Scriptures, in the first place, they do not use them all, nor in an unmutilated form, nor as the body and context of the prophecy dictate; but, selecting ambiguous passages, they draw them to their own opinions, culling a few words here and there, not attending to their import, but misusing the naked expression itself.'*

["Clement adds:—

["'For you will find, that in almost all the passages which they adduce, they regard terms only, changing the signification, not knowing how they are spoken, nor using the selection which they bring forward, as their nature requires. But truth is not found in the alteration of meanings, (for thus they would overturn all true doctrine,) but in considering what is perfectly becoming, and suitable to, the Lord and Almighty God, and in again confirming each of those things which are demonstrated according to the Scriptures, from the like Scriptures themselves.'†

της αληθειας υπαρχουσιν, οἱ γνωστικοι· επει καν τοις κατα τον βιον εχουσι τι πλεον οἱ τεχνιται των ιδιωτων, και παρα τας κοινας εννοιας εκτυπουσι το βελτιον. Ουτως ουν και ἡμεις απ' αυτων περι αυτων των γραφων τελειως αποδεικνυντες εκ πιστεως πειθομεθα αποδεικτικως.'

['Qui autem ex hoc errore reversus obediit Scripturis, et vitam suam permisit veritati, Deus quodammodo ex homine efficitur. Principium enim doctrinæ habemus Dominum, qui et per Prophetas, et per Evangelium, et per beatos Apostolos, multifariam multisque modis a principio ad finem deducit cognitionis. Principium autem si quis alio opus habere existimaverit, non utique vere poterit manere principium. Qui est ergo ex seipso fidelis, ei merito fides habetur in Dominica scriptura et voce, quæ per Dominum operatur ad hominum beneficium. Ipsa autem tanquam criterio utimur ad res inveniendas. Quicquid autem judicatur, non creditur priusquam fuerit judicatum, quare nec est principium id quod opus habet judicio. Merito ergo cum fide comprehenderimus principium indemonstrabile, ex abundanti etiam ab ipso principio de principio demonstrationes sumentes, voce Domini erudimur ad agnitionem veritatis. Neque enim hominibus simpliciter enunciantibus fidem habeamus, quibus licet enunciare contrarium. Si autem non satis est simpliciter quod videtur dicere, sed insuper oportet probare quod dictum est tum non expectamus testimonium hominum, sed voce Domini probamus quod quæritur, quæ est magis fide digna quam quævis demonstratio: vel potius quæ est sola demonstratio, per quam scientiam, qui solum gustavere Scripturas, sunt fideles. Qui autem etiam ulterius processerunt, sunt perfecti indices veritatis; ii scilicet qui sunt Gnostici: quandoquidem etiam in iis quæ ad vitam pertinent, eos qui sunt rudes, superant artifices, et super communes notiones exprimunt id quod est melius. Sic ergo nos quoque ex ipsis de ipsis Scripturis perfecte demonstrantes, ex fide persuademus demonstrative.'

["* 'Καν τολμησωσι προφητικαις χρησασθαι γραφαις και οἱ τας αιρεσεις μετιοντες. πρωτον μεν, ου πασαις, επειτα, ου τελειαις, ουδε ως το σωμα και το ὑφος της προφητειας ὑπαγορευει· αλλ' εκλεγομενοι τα αμφιβολως ειρημενα, εις τας ιδιας μεταγουσι δοξας, ολιγας σποραδην απανθιζομενοι φωνας· ου το σημαινομενον απ' αυτων σκοπουντες, αλλ' αυτῃ ψιλῃ αποχρωμενοι τῃ λεξει.'

['Quod si propheticis quoque Scripturis uti ausi fuerint qui sectantur hæreses, primum quidem non omnibus, deinde non perfectis, neque ut dictat corpus et contextura prophetiæ: verum eligentes ea quæ dicta sunt ambigue, traducunt ad proprias opiniones, paucas voces sparsim carpentes, neque id considerantes quod ex ipsis significatur, sed ipsa nuda dictione utentes.'

["† 'Σχεδον γαρ εν πασιν οις προσφερονται ρητοις, εὑροις αν αυτους ὡς τοις ονομασι μονοις προσανεχουσι, τα σημαινομενα υπαλλαττοντες· ουθ' ὡς λεγονται γινωσκοντες, ουθ' ὡς εχειν πεφυκασι χρωμενοι αις και δη κομιζουσιν εκλογαις. Ἡ αληθεια δε, ουκ εν τω μετατιθεται τα σημαινομενα ευρισκεται· ούτω μεν γαρ ανατρεψουσι πασαν αληθη διδασκαλιαν· αλλ' εν τω διασκεψασθαι τι τω Κυριω και τω παντοκρατορι Θεω τελειως οικειον τε και πρεπον· καν τω βεβαιουν εκαστον των αποδεικνυμενων κατα τας γραφας, εξ αυτων παλιν των ομοιων γραφων.'

['Nam in omnibus fere quæ adducunt locis, ipsos sola intueri vidébis nomina, ut qui mutent significata, neque quemadmodum dicuntur cognoscant, neque iis quas afferunt allegationibus, ita, ut earum natura postulat, utantur. Veritas autem non invenitur in translatione significationum, (sic enim omnem veram everteret doctrinam,) sed in eo quod quis consideret quid Domino et omnipotenti Deo perfecte conveniat, et eum deceat, et in eo ut confirmet unumquodque ex iis quæ demonstrantur per Scripturas, ex ipsis rursus similibus Scripturis.'

["* 'Σχεδον απασαις ταις γραφαις εναργως μαχομενοι. (P. 891.)

['Cum omnibus fere scripturis evidenter pugnantes.'

["† 'Ενιοτε δε και τα ἑαυτων διελεγχομενοι αρνουνται δογματα, αντικρυς ὁμολογειν αιδουμενοι ἁ κατ' ιδιαν αυχουσι διδασκοντες ούτως. 'Ουτω γαρ κατα πασας εστιν ιδειν τας αἱρεσεις επιοντας αυτων τας μοχθηριας των δογματων. Επειδαν γαρ ανατρεπωνται προς ἡμων, δεικνυντων αυτους σαφως εναντιουμενους ταις γραφαις, δυοιν θατερον ὑπο των προεστωτων του δογματος εστι Θεασασθαι γινομενον· ἡ γαρ της ακολουθιας των σφετερων δογματων, ἡ της προφητειας αυτης, μαλλον δε της ἑαυτων ελπιδος καταφρονουσιν· αἱρουνται δε ἑκαστοτε το δοξαν αυτοις ὑπαρχειν εναργεστερον, ἡ το προς του Κυριου δια των προφητων ειρημενον, και ὑπο του Ευαγγελιου, προς ετι δε και των Αποστολων συμμαρτυρουμενον τε και βεβαιουμενον. 'Ορωντες ουν τον κινδυνον αυτοις ου περι ἑνος δογματος, αλλα περι το τας αἱρεσεις διατηρειν, ου την αληθειαν εξευρισκειν· τοις μεν γαρ εν μεσω και προχειρως εντυχουσι παρ' ἡμιν ὡς εντελων κατεφρονησαν· ὑπερβηναι δε σπουδασαντες το κοινον της πιστεως, εξεβησαν την αληθειαν. Μη γαρ μαθοντες τα της γνωσεως της Εκκλησιαστικης μυστηρια, μηδε χωρησαντες το μεγαλειον της αληθειας, μεχρι του βαθους των πραγματων κατελθειν απορραθυμησαντες, εξ επιπολης αναγνοντες, παρεπεμψαντο τας γραφας.' (P. 892.)

['Nonnunquam autem etiam cum convincuntur, sua negant dogmata, aperte confiteri erubescentes quæ se seorsum sic docere gloriantur. Id enim in omnibus hæresibus videre licet, si ipsorum dogmatum quis persequatur nequitias. Nam postquam a nobis eversi fuerint, ostendentibus ipsos aperte adversari Scripturis, duorum alterum ab iis qui tuentur aliquod dogma fieri videbimus: aut enim suorum dogmatum consequentiam, aut ipsam prophetiam, vel potius suam ipsorum spem despiciunt. Semper enim id potius sumunt, quod eis visum fuerit esse evidentius, quam quod dictum est a Domino per Prophetas, et ab Evangelio, quodque Apostolorum testimonio comprobatum est et confirmatum. Cum viderent ergo sibi imminere periculum, non de uno dogmate, sed de conservanda hæresi; non veritatem invenire (nam cum ea quæ sunt in medio posita et in promptu apud nos legerunt, tanquam vilia ea contempserunt) sed quod est commune in fide superare contendentes, excesserunt a veritate. Nam cum Ecclesiasticæ cognitionis non didicerint

[" A few lines after Clement proceeds to describe heretics, as 'manifestly fighting against all the Scriptures,'* and remarks:—

["'But sometimes, when refuted, they deny even their own dogmas, being ashamed to profess openly those things which apart they make boast of so teaching. For those who follow out the iniquity of the dogmas themselves, may observe this in all heresies. For, after they have been overthrown by us, showing that they clearly oppose the Scriptures, we may observe that one of two things is done by those who support a dogma: for they despise either the consequence of their dogmas, or the prophecy itself, or rather their own hope. But they always adopt that which appears to them more evident, rather than that which was spoken by the Lord through the Prophets, and from the Gospel, and moreover borne witness to and confirmed by the Apostles. When, therefore, they perceived, that not merely one dogma, but the very preservation of the heresy, was involved in danger,—having anxiously endeavoured, not to discover the truth, (for that which they find at hand among us, and readily, they contemn as of no value,) but to go beyond that which is common in the faith, they departed from the truth. For, neither having learned the mysteries of ecclesiastical knowledge, nor apprehended the majesty of the truth, having refused through sloth to descend to the depth of things, and having read superficially, they dismissed the Scriptures.'† (P. 892.)

[" A long interval divides the third and fourth sections of the quotation. In page 893, the following striking passage occurs :—

[" ' As wicked boys shut out the master, so also do these ' (the heretics) ' exclude the prophecies from their Church,* dreading them on account of reproof and admonition. They fabricate, indeed, as many lies as possible, that they may seem to act with reason in not admitting the Scriptures.' †

[" In p. 894, Clement observes :—

[" ' In the same manner as, should any one become the pupil of Demosthenes, he will be made an orator ; and of Chrysippus, a logician ; and of Aristotle, a naturalist ; and of Plato, a philosopher : so he who obeys the Lord, and follows the prophecy given by Him, is perfected after the image of his Master, being a God in the flesh. Such elevation those fail in attaining, who do not follow God wheresoever he leads ; (Rev. xiv. 4 ;) but He leads by the divinely-inspired Scriptures. It may also be remarked, that, notwithstanding the actions of men are innumerable, yet the causes of all sin are generally twofold, ignorance and weakness. Both, however, are in our own power, (John xv. 5,) men being willing neither to learn, nor to restrain desire. By the former of these, (ignorance,) they do not judge correctly ; by the latter, (weakness,) they are unable to carry sound principles into action ; for neither will the person who is deceived in his opinion be capable of right practice, although he may have full power to discharge his duty, were it properly understood by him ; neither, on the other hand, can he who possesses a sound judgment, approve himself free from censure, should he be impotent in deeds. Accordingly, therefore, two kinds of discipline are commended, useful for either sin : FOR THE ONE, KNOWLEDGE AND CLEAR DEMONSTRATION FROM THE TESTIMONY OF SCRIPTURE ; for the other, practice according to the word, instructed by faith and fear.' ‡

[" The fourth sentence, ending 'heresy,' occurs in page 896. It is immediately preceded by the following passage :—

[" ' If any individual admit of cure, able to bear the freedom of truth as fire or iron, cutting off, burning up their false opinions, let him submit the ears of the soul. But this will take place, if, under the strong power of indolence, they do not expel the truth, or, aiming at glory, endeavour to innovate. For they are slothful, who, when they may collect demonstrations consonant with the divine Scriptures from the Scriptures themselves, altogether neglect doing so, choosing that which ministers to their pleasures.'

[" Then comes the fourth sentence of the quotation :—

[" ' But they are actuated by a desire of glory, as many as wilfully elude, through divers argumentations, the things which agree with the inspired words, and were delivered by the blessed Apostles and teachers, opposing divine tradition by human doctrines, that they may establish heresy.'

[" It will be observed, that the 'divine tradition,' spoken of in the foregoing passage, 'agreed with the inspired words.' Our author proceeds :—

[" ' For, truly, among men of so great reputation in ecclesiastical knowledge, what remained to be said, for example, by Marcion, or Prodicus, (names of ancient heretics,) and like persons, who have not walked in the right way. For they could not excel in wisdom those who went before, so as to find out any thing in addition to what was in truth spoken by them. But it would be for their own interest, if they could learn the things which had been previously handed down.' *

mysteria, neque veritatis perceperint majestatem, ut qui in perscrutando rerum profundo fuerint socordes, et superficie tenus legerint, Scripturas valere jusserunt.'

[" * This exclusion of the Divine Records from 'the Church' of the heretics but ill accords with the mistranslation already noticed. 'They' (the heretics) 'make use indeed of the Scriptures.' And wherefore did the heretics shut out the inspired volume from their assemblies? Let Clement reply : 'On account of reproof and admonition.' (John iii. 19, 20.)

[" † ' Και καθαπερ τα πονηρα παιδια τον παιδαγωγον αποκλειει, ούτως ούτοι τας προφητειας ειργουσιν εαυτων της εκκλησιας, ύφορωμενοι δι' ελεγχον και νουθεσιαν. Αμελει παμπολλα συγκαττυουσι ψευσματα και πλασματα· ίνα δη ευλογως δοξωσι μη προσιεσθαι τας γραφας.' (P. 893.)

[' Et sicut improbi pueri excludunt pædagogum, ita etiam hi arcent prophetias a sua Ecclesia, suspectas eas habentes propter reprehensionem et admonitionem. Scilicet quam plurima consarciunt mendacia et figmenta, ut jure videantur non admittere Scripturas.'

[" ‡ On this last sentence, Hervet, who was Canon of Rheims, has the following note :—

[' As an antidote for weakness and impotence in action, frequent practice according to the word of God, is prescribed ; which faith and the fear of God teach, as schoolmasters. For the law, indeed, as Paul says, is a schoolmaster unto Christ : but our schoolmaster unto a virtuous life, is faith in Christ and the fear of God.'

[' Adversus imbecillitatem et agendi potentiam, data est frequens in agendo exercitatio ex verbo Dei, quam docet fides et timor Dei, tanquam pædagogi. Nam lex quidem est, ut ait Paulus, pædagogus ad Christum : ad vitam autem ex virtute agendam, tanquam pædagogus, nos ducit fides in Christum et timor Dei.'—Herveti in locum Commentarius.

[' The original is as follows : (p. 894 :)—

[' Ως δε, εαν προσχη τις.....Δημοσθενει, ρητορα αυτον ποιησει· και Χρυσιππω, διαλεκτικον· και Αριστοτελη, φυσικον· και φιλοσοφον. Πλατωνι· ούτως ό τω Κυριω πειθομενος, και τη δοθειση δι' αυτου κατακολουθησας προφητειᾳ, τελεως εκτελειται κατ' εικονα του διδασκαλου, εν σαρκι περιπολων Θεος. Αποπιπτουσιν ἀρα τουδε του ὑψους, οἱ μη ἑπομενοι Θεῳ, εαν ἡγηται· ἡγειται δε κατα τας θεοπνευστους γραφας. Μυριων γουν οντων κατ' αριθμον ἁ πρασσουσιν ανθρωποι, σχεδον δυο εισιν αρχαι πασης ἁμαρτιας, ανοια και ασθενεια· αμφω (p. 895) δε εφ' ἡμιν, των μητε εθελοντων μανθανειν, μητε αυ της επιθυμιας κρατειν. Τουτων δε δι' ἡν μεν, ου καλως κρινουσι· δι' ἡν δε, ουκ ισχυουσι τοις ὀρθως κριθεισιν· ουτε γαρ απατηθεις τις την γνωμην, δυνατ' αν ευ πραττειν, καν πανυ δυνατος η τα γνωσθεντα ποιειν· ουτε και κρινειν το δεον ισχυων, αμεμπτον ἑαυτον παρασχοιτ' αν εν τοις εργοις εξασθενων. Ακολουθως τοινυν δυο τῳ γενει και παιδειαι παραδιδονται προσφοροι ἑκατερα των ἁμαρτιων· τη μεν, ἡ γνωσις τε και ἡ της εκ των γραφων μαρτυριας εναργης αποδειξις· τη δε, ἡ κατα λογον ασκησις, εκ πιστεως τε και φοβου παιδαγωγουμενη.'

[' Quemadmodum autem si quis.....Demostheni se dederit instituendum, eum faciet oratorem ; et Chrysippo, dialecticum ; et Aristoteli, physicum ; et Platoni, philosophum : ita qui paret Domino, et per eum datam sequitur prophetiam, perfecte efficitur ad Magistri imaginem, Deus in carne versatur. Hanc ergo altitudinem minime assequuntur, qui non sequuntur Deum eos ducentem : ducit autem per Scripturas divinitus inspiratas. Et cum sint innumerabilia quæ fiunt ab hominibus, sunt utique duo cujusvis peccati principia, ignoratio et imbecillitas : est autem utrumque in nostra potestate, cum nec velimus discere, nec cupiditatem continere. Ex his autem, unum efficit ut non recte judicent ; alterum vero, ut non possint exequi quæ recte sunt judicata. Neque enim si quis fuerit deceptus in sententia, recte agere poterit, etiam si sit satis potens ut agat ea quæ fuerint cognita : neque qui potest id quod oportet judicare, se ab omni reprehensione alienum præbebit, si ad res gerendas sit impotens. Consequenter ergo duæ quoque genere disciplinæ traduntur utrique peccato utiles : illi quidem, cognitio, et ex Scripturarum testimonio evidens demonstratio : huic vero, quæ est secundum logon exercitatio, quæ per fidem et timorem instituitur.'

[" * ' Et δε τις ιασιμος τυγχανει, φερειν δυναμενος ὡς πυρ η σιδηρον της αληθειας την παῤῥησιαν αποτεμνουσαν, καιουσαν τας ψευδεις δοξας αυτων, ὑπεχετο τα ωτα της ψυχης. Εσται δε τουτο, εαν μη ῥαθυμειν επειγομενοι αποδιωθωνται την αληθειαν, η δοξης οριγνωμενοι, καινοτομειν βιαζονται· ῥαθυμουσι μεν γαρ οἱ, παρον τας οικειαις ταις θειαις γραφαις εξ αυτων των γραφων πυριζεσθαι αποδειξεις, το παραπαν

[" Clement proceeds :—

["' But the Gnostic, alone, having grown old in the Scriptures themselves, preserving the apostolical and ecclesiastical rectitude of dogmas, lives most correctly according to the Gospel, producing the demonstrations, as he may be desirous of finding them, from the Lord, from the law and the Prophets. For, in my opinion,' adds Clement, 'the life of the Gnostic is nothing more than words and deeds which accord with the tradition of the Lord.'*

["Other expressions in the context may require notice. In page 897, Clement remarks, 'It does not become us, as is usual with the heretics, to adulterate the truth, or to elude the rule of the church:' and again, he says of himself and his brethren, 'We enter by the tradition of the Lord,' but speaks of the heretics whom he is combating, as 'having cut open the door, and broken through, clandestinely, the wall of the church.' 'The ecclesiastical rule,' however, the Alexandrian Father had, in his sixth Stroma, defined as 'the concert and agreement of the law and the Prophets with the Testament delivered by the advent of the Lord:' and the inference is perfectly reasonable, that the church, whose boundaries Clement was anxious to defend against heretical aggression, was distinguished as well by the principle he himself enforced, as by the practice he exhibited: 'Let us not give heed,' he writes, 'to the bare declarations of men, who may equally avow the contrary doctrines. But if it be not sufficient merely to state an opinion, but be also necessary to prove what is alleged, then we do not wait for the testimony of men, but prove what is sought for, by the voice of the Lord.'*

["To draw this paper to a conclusion:—I undertook to show, that, in the context of the quotation, the supremacy of Scripture is inculcated. This thesis has, in fact, been already demonstrated by the extracts which have been given; but, to render it still more manifest, I shall group together a few of the sentiments they contain:—

["' They who are prepared,' writes Clement, 'to bestow labour on the most excellent subjects, will not desist from searching after the truth, until they shall receive demonstration from the Scriptures themselves.'†

["' This' (' the Lord's Scripture and voice') 'we use as a test for the discovery of matters.'‡

["'If it be not sufficient merely to state an opinion, but be also necessary to prove what is alleged, then we do not wait for the testimony of men, but prove what is sought for, by THE VOICE OF THE LORD, WHICH IS MORE WORTHY OF CREDIT THAN ANY DEMONSTRATION; OR RATHER, WHICH IS ALONE DEMONSTRATION.' §

["' Perfectly demonstrating from the Scriptures themselves concerning the Scriptures, we persuade from faith DEMONSTRATIVELY.'‖

["Once more:—

["' Two kinds of discipline are commended, useful for either sin: for the one' (ignorance) 'knowledge and clear demonstration from the testimony of Scripture.'¶

["Now, it is but reasonable to suppose, that the compilers of 'the Faith of Catholics' must have read the pages which intervene between the several sentences collected together in the quotation. Those pages, as has been shown, largely vindicate the paramount authority of the Bible. The conclusion, then, is inevitable: when Messrs. Berington and Kirk adduce the quotation to uphold a system which arrogates an exclusive and sovereign right to interpret Scripture, they knowingly inflict an act of gross and palpable injustice on the name of Clement.

["The entire review, therefore, demonstrates that, in the present instance, both the laws of honourable citation have been violated: the plain sense of an important clause has been misrepresented; and, while the passage is quoted in aid of a religion, at whose bar the convictions of individual mind and conscience must be surrendered, the whole tenor of the context is found to breathe the spirit of a man who regarded the Bible itself as the grand and ultimate standard of appeal."]

και ταις ἡδοναις αυτων συναιρουμενον εκλεγομενοι. Δοξης δε επιθυμουσιν, ὁσοι τα προσφυη τοις Θεοπνευστοις λογοις ὑπο των μακαριων αποστολων τε και διδασκαλων παραδιδομενα, ἑκοντες ειναι σοφιζονται, δι' ἑτερων παρεγχειρησεων ανθρωπειαις διδασκαλιαις ενισταμενοι θειᾳ παραδοσει, ὑπερ του την αἱρεσιν συστησασθαι. Τις γαρ ὡς αληθως εν τηλικουτοις ανδρασιν. κατα την εκκλησιαστικην λεγω γνωσιν, ὑπελειπετο λογος, Μαρκιωνος, φερε ειπειν, η Προδικου, και των ὁμοιων, την ορθην ου βαδισαντων ὁδον; ου γαρ αν ὑπερεβαλον σοφιᾳ τους εμπροσθεν ανδρας, ὡς προσεξευρειν τι τοις ὑπ' εκεινων αληθως ῥηθεισιν· αλλ' αγαπητον ἡν αυτοις, ει τα προπαραδεδομενα μαθειν ηδυνηθησαν. Ὁ γνωστικος αρα ἡμιν μονος εν αυταις καταγηρασας ταις γραφαις, την αποστολικην και εκκλησιαστικην σωζων ορθοτομιαν των δογματων, κατα το Ευαγγελιον ορθοτατα βιοι, τας αποδειξεις, ὡς αν επιζητησῃ ανευοισκειν, αναπεμπομενος ὑπο του Κυριου, απο τε νομου και προφητων. Ὁ βιος γαρ οιμαι του γνωστικου, ουδεν αλλο εστιν η εργα και λογοι τῃ του Κυριου ακολουθοι παραδοσει.'

['Si quis est autem medicabilis, qui tanquam ignem vel ferrum ferre possit libertatem veritatis, secantem et urentem falsas opiniones, præbeat aures animæ. Hoc autem fiet, si non otium et secordiam amplectentes extrudant veritatem, aut gloriam desiderantes, res novas moliantur. Sunt enim socordes, qui, cum liceat ex ipsis Scripturis, divinis Scripturis convenientes colligere demonstrationes, id omnino non faciunt, sed quod eorum voluptatibus suffragatur eligunt. Gloriæ autem tenentur desiderio, qui ea quæ conveniunt sermonibus divinitus inspiratis, tradita a beatis Apostolis et magistris, voluntarie eludunt, per alias argumentationes, humanis doctrinis resistentes divinæ traditioni, ut hæresin constituant. Nam inter eos viros qui tanti erant in ecclesiastica cognitione, quid restabat dicendum a Marcione, verbi gratia, aut Prodico, et similibus, qui non sunt ingressi recta via? Neque enim eos qui præcesserunt superare potuerunt sapientia, ut aliquid adinvenirent iis quæ ab illis vere dicta sunt: sed bene cum eis actum esset, si discere potuissent ea quæ prius sunt tradita. Solus ergo Gnosticus, cum in ipsis consenuerit Scripturis, apostolicam et ecclesiasticam servans dogmatum rectitudinem, rectissime vivit secundum Evangelium, et demonstrationes ita ut quærit invenit: ut qui emittatur a Domino, a lege, et a Prophetis. Num vita, ut opinor, Gnostici, nihil est aliud quam facta et verba quæ sequuntur traditionem Domini.'

["On the page which furnished the preceding extract, Clement thus comments on Matt. vii. 21: 'Why do you say, Lord, and do not the will of my Father? that is, the doctrine of the Saviour; which is to us spiritual meat, and drink that knows not thirst, the water of gnostic life.'

['Τι με λεγετε Κυριε, και ου ποιειτε το θελημα του Πατρος μου; τουτεστι την διδασκαλιαν του Σωτηρος, ἡτις εστι βρωμα ἡμιν πνευματικον, και πομα διψαν ουκ επισταμενον, ὑδωρ ζωης γνωστικης' (P. 896.)

['Quid mihi dicitis, Domine, et non facitis voluntatem Patris mei? hoc est, doctrinam Servatoris; quæ nobis cibus spiritalis, et potus qui nescit sitim; aqua vitæ gnosticæ.'

["* From the fact that, agreeably to Clement, 'the life of the Gnostic was nothing more than words and deeds which accord with the tradition of the Lord,'—while, at the same time, the Gnostic is represented, 'as having grown old in the Scriptures themselves, and living most correctly according to the Gospel,'—it is clear, that 'the tradition of the Lord,' mentioned in this passage, was, at least, not in opposition to the volume of inspiration. And a passage which has been already quoted, (p. 81,) demonstrates, that Clement was 'far from teaching his Gnostic to rely on unwritten tradition:'

['They who are prepared,' says the Alexandrian Father, 'to bestow labour on the most excellent subjects, will not desist from searching after the truth, until they shall RECEIVE DEMONSTRATION FROM THE SCRIPTURES THEMSELVES.'"]

[* See original in note † p. 81, col. 2. † Ibid., † p. 81, col. 1.
[‡ Ibid., † p. 81, col. 2. § Ibid., † p. 81, col. 2.
[‖ Ibid., † p. 81, col. 2. ¶ Ibid., ‡ p. 83, col. 1.]

3. The works of the Fathers are corrupted and mutilated by the Expurgatorial Indices of the Church of Rome. The King of Spain issued a commission to the Inquisitors to purge all Catholic authors; containing a clause, "that they should conceal the Expurgatory Index, neither circulating it, nor giving a copy of it to any." But, by the good providence of God, about thirteen years after, a copy of it was obtained and published by Johannes Pappus and Franciscus Junius; and as this fact came before the public against their will, they found it necessary to acknowledge it, and accordingly printed it. They revised the Indices of the Fathers' writings, as well as their own.

In Chrysostom's works, printed at Basil, from his first Homily on John, the Inquisitors blot out the words, "The church is not built on the man, but on the faith." In his sermon on Pentecost they erase the following, "There is no merit but what is given us by Christ." The same Father has suffered in many other places.

When Bertram had said "visibiliter," they make him say "invisibiliter;" and what they do to Bertram they do to others; and take occasion from their corrections of this divine, to form the following general rule of conduct respecting all ancient authors:—"In the old Catholic writers we suffer very many errors, and extenuate and excuse them; and finding out some commentary, we feign a convenient sense, when they are opposed in disputations." On this principle they have practised largely.

In the Spanish Index, by the command of Gaspar Quiroga, Archbishop of Toledo, and in that also of Sandoval, their obliterating mania has affected the Bibliotheca Patrum, collected by Binius, where not only the gloss upon St. Gregory of Neocæsarea, but the works of St. Anthony the Abbot, St. Melito, Mark the Hermit, Dorotheus, and divers others, have suffered. That the reader may be satisfied as to the manner of the proceeding, the doctrines and sayings blotted out are such as the following:—"We have learned to worship and venerate that nature only that is uncreated;" here solummodo, "only," is omitted. The following sentences have also been excluded:—"Prudence, and life, and piety make the Priest." "A wicked mind cannot be justified." "He that keeps not the commandments does not believe rightly." "Only the holy Trinity is properly incorporeal." "A spiritual prayer helps not an impure mind." Such precepts and sentiments must, in the estimation of these censors, be considered dangerous and heretical; and therefore, though the Fathers teach them, nevertheless, deleantur, "they must be erased."

In the Preface of Augustine, published at Venice, there are the following words:—"In quo præter locorum multorum restitutionem secundum collationem veterum exemplarium, curavimus removeri illa omnia quæ fidelium mentes hæretica pravitate possent inficere, aut a Catholicâ orthodoxâ fide deviare." "In which, besides the restitution of many places, by a collation of the ancient copies, we have taken care that all those things which could affect the minds of the faithful with heretical pravity, or would cause them to deviate from the Catholic orthodox faith, be taken away."

The following words are removed from the text and index of Cyril of Alexandria:—"Habitat Jesus per fidem in cordibus nostris." "Jesus dwells by faith in our hearts." These words are also used by St. Paul, (Eph. iii. 17,) and Cyril quotes them by a sicut scriptum est, "as it is written."

In Epiphanius* the words creaturam non adorare, "not to adore the creature," are erased from his text, which is, sancta Dei ecclesia creaturam non adorat.

That they purged the Indices of the Fathers' works is notorious; so much so, that they endeavoured to justify themselves in doing it. But time, however, would fail to point out the erasures and interpolations of the Church of Rome on the writings of these venerable men. Those who would desire to examine this subject with minuteness, must consult those authors who have treated it at large.†

The foregoing instances, instead of many others which might be adduced, will show how the Church of Rome has corrupted the witnesses and records of antiquity, in order that her errors and novelties might not be detected and condemned. Now if the Fathers were not against her, why employ these artifices? Their own Expurgatory Indices prove the truth of these accusations, and also that their cause positively requires such despicable subterfuges for its support. If this be the way in which they make men agree, no wonder they boast of unity! But the providence of God, which overrules all events, has, by his almighty power, torn from them, in spite of all their arts and machinations, this mask. It is, however, difficult to tell when and how their errors commenced, since they have undertaken to silence the tongues of those who could give the most accurate information. They have done this to their own canon law, and to the old glosses, in which there were many traces of the ancient and apostolical doctrine, over which the ravages of ancient heretics and interested persons had not as yet prevailed. This may be seen to a great extent in the censures upon those comments which were published by the command of Pope Gregory XIII., 1580. A unanimous consent of Fathers, obtained by such means as the Expurgatory Indices require, is of small use in promoting true Christian unity. And if a standard, thus formed, be the one by which the Church of Rome interprets Scripture, what can the world expect from her but error, confusion, and every evil work?

4. Many of the ancient Fathers taught false doctrines, and even heresies. Clemens Alexandrinus taught that Christ felt no hunger or thirst, but ate only to make demonstration of the verity of his human nature.‡ Hilary declared, that Christ, in his sufferings, had no sorrow. Origen, that the pains of hell would be only temporary. Cyprian inculcated rebaptization. Athenagoras condemned second marriages. John Damascene said that Christ prayed, not in reality, but only in appearance.

Justin Martyr, Papias, Apollinaris, Victorinus, Tertullian, Irenæus, Lactantius, and others, in the second and third centuries, defended the doctrine of the Chiliastæ, or Millenarians, who held that Christ, after the general judgment, would dwell a thousand years on the earth. Justin Martyr was so firm in this opinion, that he asserted that all true Christians believed this doctrine, and that those who denied it rejected the resurrection. Irenæus taught that man, at his creation, was imperfect. Clemens Alexandrinus and Justin declared that the angels fell and offended God, because they desired the company of women.

Clemens Alexandrinus, Anastasius Sinaita, Athanasius, Jerome, Ambrose, and others, asserted that "Christ descended into hell, and there preached to the detained, that they who would confess might be saved." Augustine affirmed that Christ did save some; but whether this extended to all the damned, he does not inform Euodius, who asked the question.

* In Epis. ad Rom., c. x., hæres. 69.

† Bishop Taylor's Dissuasive, &c., Works, vol. x., p. 135, et seq.

‡ Strom., lib. iii., vi.

Hilary, Jerome, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and Theophylact affirmed that it was not lawful for Christians, on any account whatever, to take an oath; nay, that it was "crimen gehennæ dignum," a crime worthy of perdition, or a damnable sin. Whether such was the doctrine of the Church of Rome at that time, we say not; but most certainly she teaches differently at the present day.*

5. The Council of Trent hath decreed many things contrary to the decisions of the Fathers. It is generally believed in the Church of Rome, that the Virgin Mary was born without original sin. Yet the Fathers denied this, or, at any rate, they taught a contrary doctrine. They did not believe in the dogma of transubstantiation; yet this is held as an article of faith in the Church of Rome. Augustine and two hundred and seventeen Bishops, with their successors for an age, denied and resisted appeals to the see of Rome; and yet the authority of so many Fathers is at present of no force there, since she has adopted the doctrine of the supremacy of the Pope.

The Councils of Florence and Trent teach the doctrine of purgatory; yet many of the Fathers dogmatically repudiated that fiction. Among those of the Greek Church we reckon Justin Martyr,† Irenæus,‡ Origen,§ Chrysostom,‖ Theodoret,¶ and Arethas Cæsariensis. That these Greeks did not teach the doctrine of purgatory is plain, from the great difficulty which the Latins had to bring them to subscribe to the acts of the Florentine Council, where the Latins displayed so much trickery to accomplish their purposes. Among the Latin Fathers were Tertullian,†† Ambrose,‡‡ Augustine,§§ Hilary,‖‖ Prudentius,¶¶ and Lactantius, who are known to be of opinion, that the souls of the saints are "in abditis receptaculis et exterioribus atriis," in hidden receptacles and exterior halls, where they anticipate the resurrection of their bodies, and the glorification of their souls; and though they believe them all to be happy, they enjoy not the beatific vision anterior to the resurrection.

6. The Fathers contradict each other in many things. Augustine did not judge the Fathers before his day to be infallible, when in many doctrines he widely differed from his predecessors; as appears in a question between himself and St. Jerome, respecting St. Peter and the second chapter to the Galatians; and when he was pressed with the authority of six or seven Greek Fathers, he replied, that he gave no such honour to any writers of books, as to think them not to have erred, but only to the Scriptures. He believed authors when they taught according to Scripture, not because they thought so, but because he found them giving utterance to truth. He appeals also to Jerome whether he were not of the same mind respecting his own productions.†††

The Fathers, on several occasions, maintained but little agreement among themselves respecting some principal and important matters. Theophilus, Epiphanius, Chrysostom, Augustine, Ruffin, and Jerome, being all Christians, Catholics, and Fathers, contended against one another with considerable animosity. The Greeks and Latins were divided about the unleavened bread, and the keeping of Easter, which certainly were not affairs of sufficient importance to justify contention. In their Councils, also, new Creeds and new Decrees were continually devised.

Theophilus called Epiphanius, a heresiarch. Gennadius said that Augustine was not far from being a heretic. Pope Boniface II. declared that Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, Augustine, and other Bishops in the Council of Africa, were spurred on, and inspired by the devil. Their dissensions led Erasmus to say, in his Preface to the Works of Jerome, that, during the time of the Fathers, true religion was in books rather than in the heart, and there were as many sundry creeds as there were professors of the faith. Hence the Heathen upbraid the Christians in the following terms:—"Ye Christians dissent among yourselves, and maintain so many sects, which, though they all claim the name of Christian, yet one of them curseth and condemneth another: therefore your religion is not true, nor has she her beginning or foundation in God."* Now we ask, if the Fathers are to be considered the standard of interpretation, what can we expect from them, in the way of explaining many points, when they themselves are so much divided?

7. The Fathers considered as INTERPRETERS of Scripture. Viewed merely as expositors of the word of God, they cannot possess the qualities ascribed to them by the Church of Rome. Some of their interpretations are contradictory to each other; and some at variance with the Romish faith. Heretical doctrines are taught by others; whilst it must not be forgotten that their best comments are on the side of Protestantism, and are directly opposed to those of the Papacy. As interpreters of Scripture they are greatly inferior to many modern commentators, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, but especially to the former.

8. Opinions of Catholics respecting the authority of the Fathers. As it regards the extent of the authority of these writers in Scripture interpretation, there is much diversity of sentiment even among Roman Catholic divines. Cardinal Cajetan, on Gen. i., says: "We must not reject a new sense of the Holy Scriptures because it differs from the ancient Doctors; but we must search more exactly the context of Scripture; and if it agree, praise God, who has not tied the exposition of the sacred Scriptures to the sense of the ancient Doctors." Maldonat, on Matt. xvi. 18, rejects all the expositions which the authors he had read, had given of these words, except Hilary: "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

Bellarmine employs the following remarkable language:—"It is one thing to interpret the law as a Doctor, and another thing as a Judge: for expounding as a Doctor, learning is required; as a Judge, authority. For the opinion of the Doctor is to be followed as far as reason persuades; that of the Judge from necessity. Wherefore, in their commentaries, Augustine and the other Fathers supply the place of teachers; but the Popes and Councils, of a Judge commissioned by God."† Baronius says:

* Bishop Taylor's Dissuasive, &c., Works, vol. x., pp. 313—325.
† Qu. 60, ad Christian. ‡ Lib. v. § Hom. 7, in Lev.
‖ Hom. 39, in 1 Cor. ¶ In c. xi., in Hebr.  In c. vi., Apoc.
†† Lib. iv., adversus Marc. ‡‡ Lib. ii., de Cain, c. ii.
§§ Epist. iii., ad Fortunatum. ‖‖ In Ps. 138.
¶¶ De Exequi. Defunct.
 Lib. vii., c. xxi. See also authorities quoted by Bishop Taylor, Works, vol. x., p. 154.
††† Ep. Aug. ad Hieron., 19: in the Works of Jerome, 97: and many other places.

* Clementis Alexandrini Opera, tom. i., Strom. lib. vii. Oxon., 1715.
[† "Aliud est interpretari legem more Doctoris, aliud more Judicis: ad explanationem more Doctoris requiritur eruditio: ad explicationem more Judicis requiritur auctoritas. Doctor enim non proponit sententiam suam sit necessario sequendam, sed solum qua-

"Although the most holy Fathers, whom, for their great learning, we rightly call the Doctors of the Church, were indeed, above others, imbued with the grace of the Holy Spirit, yet the Catholic Church does not always, in all things, follow their interpretation of the Scriptures." *

From Du Pin † we adduce the sentiments of two distinguished Roman divines. Ambrosius Catharinus, when laying down rules to know when the opinions of the Fathers may be followed, and when not: "We ought," says he, "in the first place carefully to examine whether all Catholic Doctors are agreed upon a question, or whether they are of different opinions. Secondly, whether they assert a thing occasionally, and support it only with probable reasons, or whether they propose it as an article of faith, grounded on the belief and practice of the ancient Church." Melchior Canus speaks thus concerning these primitive theologians: "The authority of two or three Fathers makes but a probable argument, even in things relating to religion and the faith. The sense of a majority is not a sufficient proof. Their unanimous consent would not be an infallible proof in matters which do not relate to the faith, but it would be so in any thing relating to the understanding of the Scriptures in matters of faith." ‡

In the Council of Trent there were different opinions entertained by the Doctors concerning the authority of the Fathers in Scripture interpretation. Some looked upon it as spiritual tyranny, to hinder the faithful from exercising their understandings in interpreting Scripture, and to oblige them to abide by the sole sense of the Fathers; and that men now ought not to be deprived of a liberty which produced such good effects in ancient times; and that it was better to imitate the ancients, who left the interpretation of Scripture at liberty. Others said, that popular license was worse than tyranny. Richard du Mans, a Franciscan, said, that the schoolmen had so well explained the doctrines of Scripture, that we need learn them no longer from Scripture; and that the Lutherans obtained advantage over none but those who studied the Bible. Such were the jarring sentiments entertained by the Doctors of the Church of Rome during the sittings of the Council of Trent. §

9. The unanimous consent. It is an immutable principle of the Church of Rome, that no rite, or doctrine, or interpretation of Scripture is from God, unless it have the unanimous consent of the Fathers. To establish this consent they must have authenticated copies of the Fathers, free from all additions and alterations. Then the thirty-five volumes folio, or even more, containing many thousand pages, must be consulted. Next it must be infallibly shown, in reference to any point in debate, that there is no error, contradiction, or doubtful sentiment in any of them, but a general agreement to all the peculiarities of Popery. The bare statement of such a mode of interpretation confutes itself.

10. Use of the testimony of the Fathers. Learned men are not united with regard to the degree of esteem that is due to the authors now mentioned and other ancient moralists. Some represent them as most excellent guides, while others place them in the lowest rank of instructers. Perhaps the following will comprise their just claims.

As historians of their times, their testimony is valuable in tracing the history of the church.

In their writings there are many sublime moral sentiments, well adapted to excite pious and religious affections; while, on the other hand, they abound with precepts of a foolish and unreasonable austerity, with unmeaning and scholastic dictates, with vague notions, and, what is yet worse, with decisions often absolutely false, and contrary to the precepts of Christ. Now, if by a bad or uncertain guide in morals one is meant who fluctuates in uncertainty, or falls frequently into error, while explaining the divine law, though he may often deliver useful instructions, then it must be acknowledged that this title belongs eminently to many of the Fathers.

In reference to doctrines, we must bring them to the standard of holy Scripture, receive what they teach agreeably thereto, and reject whatsoever is unsound in the dogmas they have taught. It is proper, however, to state, that as far as their authority is available, it is chiefly on the side of orthodox Protestantism, and against the doctrines and principles of the Church of Rome, on points wherein they differ.

As expositors of holy Scripture, though the Fathers are chargeable with great defects, they are possessed of some excellencies: nevertheless, in the interpretation of passages of Scripture in controversy between us and Rome, their entire authority is indisputably in our favour.

On the whole, to the new doctrine of the Council of Trent, which claims the unanimous consent of the Fathers in the interpretation of Scripture, very little weight can be ascribed. Some of them have been corrupted by the intermixtures of heretics; and others have been interpolated in certain places, by the insertion of words, which have given to them a different sense. These corruptions and interpolations took place previous to the times of Popery. Subsequently, when the Church of Rome found these Divines to be against her on those topics wherein she deviated from primitive Christianity, and wandered from sound Protestantism, she corrupted and mutilated their writings in order to destroy their testimony in favour of the latter, and to compel them to Romanize, that they might avow themselves in favour of Popery. Consequently, were the Fathers unanimous, or were they now in favour of Rome, it would prove of little service, unless it could be shown that the testimony adduced was not corrupted.

Furthermore, when we consider that many of the ancient Fathers taught false doctrines, and even heresies; that in many things they contradict each other, and are also contradicted by the Church of Rome; and that as moralists they are faulty or unsound; as doctrinal teachers they are frequently heretical, contradictory, or erroneous; and as interpreters, defective; we must infer that the value attached to them by the Council of Trent is far too great. Indeed, the Doctors of the Church of Rome, when they apply this rule of interpretation in theory, are compelled to modify it so as to render it useless; and when they attempt to reduce it to practice, they are forced tenus ratio suadet: et Judex proponit ut sequendam necessario. (Aliter accipimus glossas Bartholi et Baldi, aliter declarationem principis.) Augustinus igitur et cæteri Patres in commentariis fungebantur officio Doctorum; at Concilia et Pontifices funguntur officio Judicis a Deo sibi commisso."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Verbi Dei Interp., lib. iii., cap. x. Paris, 1608.]

[* "Nam sanctissimos Patres, quos Doctores ecclesiæ ob illorum sublimem eruditionem merito nominamus, quantumlibet ea Spiritus Sancti gratia præ cæteris imbutos esse liqueat, in interpretatione scripturarum non semper ac in omnibus Catholica Ecclesia sequitur. Sed sic dicta Spiritus Sancti charismata a Christo suæ ecclesiæ concessa esse dicuntur, ut ejus sint propria, nec penes alios qui foris sunt, inveniri queant."—Baronii Annales Eccles. 34, sec. 213. Col., 1609.]

† Ecclesiastical History, vol. iii., p. 683. Dublin, 1723.

‡ Idem, p. 697. § Idem, p. 421.

to abandon it as an unmeaning injunction. What, then, remains for us, but to receive the historical testimony of the Fathers with proper respect, and while we give to it its due weight, to bring all their doctrines and precepts to the standard of inspiration?

[Upon an impartial examination of this subject we conclude, that the use which ought to be made of the works of the primitive Fathers consists in adhering to whatever is excellent, and disregarding whatever is frivolous; no danger can be incurred by the judicious student, if he should meet with some scattered instances of weak argument, and unrestrained imagination: since there is the widest difference between a blind and implicit reverence for every work which is sanctioned by the name of antiquity, and a selection of those parts of its genuine productions which may be made conducive to solid improvement, and moral benefit. Such a line of discrimination is universally marked out in all departments of literature and science, to make them produce the desired ends. To reject the expositions of the Fathers when they reject the obvious and rational interpretation of Scripture, is a valuable and unerring rule, and an effectual security against being misled. The failings of a few ought not to involve the works of all in indiscriminate and uncandid condemnation. To abandon them because some proofs of visionary refinement are to be found, is equally unreasonable and unjust, as to censure the study of the Hebrew language on account of the forced constructions of Hutchinson, or to relinquish the researches of natural philosophy on perusing the fanciful theories of Cartesius. When, in the course of his researches, he finds that a great mind has in any instance deserted the dictates of sober reason for the phantoms of paradox, he will feel a sensation of regret similar to that which is excited on seeing the virtuous fall a sacrifice to the allurements of casual temptation. Comprehensive knowledge and splendid talents afford no constant security against the delusions of fancy, and the wiles of imposture. Origen gave way to the most chimerical expositions of Scripture; Tertullian embraced the preposterous reveries of the Montanists; and most of these ancient Divines abound with precepts which are austere and unreasonable, with dictates which are stoical and academical, and with notions which are vague and indeterminate. By one class of writers the Fathers have been unduly elevated, by others they have been depreciated. If any attempt has been made to raise them to the high rank of the Apostles, if it is asserted that they have been aided by divine inspiration similar to that with which those were honoured who wrote the sacred page, or if they are said to have been endowed above the common lot of mankind with infallibility, privileges and an authority are claimed for them which cannot be substantiated. We contend only, that they deserve our regard as witnesses of the opinions of their respective ages, as historians of the facts which were accessible to their inquiries, and as teachers whose piety and learning eminently distinguished them from all their contemporaries. Sharing the imperfections of other writers, they fairly claim the same indulgence. The faults imputed to them ought frequently to be imputed to the times in which they lived; when accuracy of research was often precluded by numerous obstacles, and when ardent zeal induced them to press every circumstance into their service which carried with it even the appearance of truth. If the plea of credulity deserves to be admitted as a ground of rejection, with equal, or perhaps superior, force does it operate against some of the most celebrated authors of Greece and Rome. But while judgment can discern the probability of facts, while it can appreciate the credit of witnesses, and discriminate the gradation of evidence, the faults of historians will be weighed against their excellencies, and those of them will unquestionably be entitled to high esteem whose veracity preponderates in the balance. From the Fathers, also, we learn with what unremitting care the holy Scriptures were preserved during successive ages. The quotations which abound in their works furnish strong and convincing proofs of the authenticity of the present copies. By them we are informed that these Scriptures were zealously appealed to and consulted by writers who were unanimous upon no other subject. Their authenticity was held to be indisputable. They were repeatedly made the arbiters of controversy, and the guides of faith and practice. Hence we estimate the veneration in which they were held, and the vigilance with which they were guarded; and from them also we derive the most perfect assurance and the strongest evidence that they have escaped unmutilated and uncorrupted from the tumult of controversy, the artifice of fraud, the hostility of Paganism, and the ravages of time.*]

CHAPTER VI.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT RULES COMPARED.

The two rules defined. 1. The Roman Catholic rule is the source of uncertainty; (1.) It is in Latin; (2.) Their traditions are uncertain, changeable, of no authority, and pernicious; (3.) Their Church is silent on many points to which they attach much importance; (4.) Their doctrine of intention produces uncertainty: 2. Their rule is impracticable in its application: 3. Their unwarrantable liberties with their rule prove its deficiency: (1.) She adds the Apocrypha; (2.) She takes away from the Decalogue; (3.) She adds new articles of faith: 4. The means resorted to for its support show its deficiency: 5. Their mode of determining controversies is contrary to Scripture: 6. Their rule requires faith in the doctrines of men: 7. It is ever varying: 8. It requires every man to be infallible: 9. Christ never established it: 10. Comparison of both rules.

THE Roman Catholic rule of faith is, the Scriptures, the Apocrypha, and oral and written traditions, as explained by a living infallible judge or oracle. This living infallible judge is, 1. According to some, the Pope. 2. According to others, a General Council. 3. Others consider the Pope and Council together to be the infallible guide. 4. Some place this in the Church, that is, in the Pope and Clergy. Such is the diversity of opinion among Romanists respecting the judge of controversy. When the things to be judged are brought to view, the confusion is still greater. Some confine infallibility to faith and morals, while others extend it to almost every thing. The following objections lie, in our opinion, against their rule of faith.

1. The Roman Catholic rule is the source of uncertainty, as will appear from these considerations.

(1.) Their authorized version of the Bible is in Latin, so also are the prayers and services of their Church. The other parts of their rule, namely, the Fathers, written traditions, decrees of Councils, and decisions of Popes, are also in Latin. Thus, by the adoption of a dead language, the door of knowledge is shut against the people.

(2.) Unwritten tradition, as we have seen, is attended with so many inconveniences and uncertainties, that their enumeration would be endless. We are almost tempted to suspect, that the placing this in the rule of faith was done for the express purpose of producing uncertainty in spiritual affairs, and of resolving all into the hands of the Clergy.

[* Kett's Bampton Lecture.]

(3.) The Church of Rome is silent upon many things which she deems important. Whether the mother of our Lord were born sinless, is not decided. Where the seat of infallibility is lodged, whether in the Pope, a Council, the Pope and Council, or the Church, is not determined. Many other points to which they attach considerable weight are left in the same state of uncertainty.

(4.) Their doctrine of intention is the source of painful hesitation. According to the Council of Trent,* the efficacy of the sacraments depends on the intention of the administrator. Some of these ordinances are necessary to salvation, and all of them requisite for certain states in life. Thus baptism, ordination, and the rest of their seven sacraments, may become invalid, for want of due intention in the Minister. Considering the number and prominent place given to the sacraments in the Church of Rome, and that the want of intention in the Priest renders them null, a world of uncertainty, by this means, mingles itself with the doctrines, morals, and institutions of that Church.

2. The Roman Catholic rule is impracticable in its application.

Their rule, in addition to the Scriptures, comprises about one hundred and thirty-five volumes folio, made up of the following works:—the Bulls of Popes are at least eight volumes folio; the Decretals, ten volumes folio; the Acts of Councils, thirty-one volumes folio; the Acta Sanctorum, or Doings of the Saints, are in fifty-one volumes folio. Add to these at least thirty-five volumes folio of Greek and Latin Fathers, in which is to be found that part of the rule called the Unanimous Consent; add to these one hundred and thirty-five volumes folio of unread and unexamined materials, the unlimited mass of unwritten traditions, which have floated down from the commencement of the Christian era to the present time in oral communication, or, in other words, by mere hearsay transmission: all these cumbrous additions made to the Holy Scriptures constitute the Roman Catholic rule.

Of this rule the Pope is judge. Of course he must understand the holy Bible, fully and infallibly. He must be minutely acquainted with these one hundred and thirty-five folio volumes. He must know thoroughly their unknowable contents; reconcile all their irreconcilable contradictions; be familiar with the various cases and wants of his flock; and then apply his rule of direction. The very enumeration of the different parts of this rule shows it to be an impracticable one, and therefore not what the Almighty gave for our direction.

3. The unwarrantable liberties taken with the word of God by Roman Catholics prove the deficiency of their rule.

(1.) She adds the Apocrypha and tradition.

(2.) She takes away from the Decalogue the second commandment, or so abridges it as to do away its force and meaning.

(3.) She adds new articles of faith to the word of God. The Creed of Pope Pius IV., sworn to by all Ecclesiastics, adds twelve new articles to the creed of Christians.

These additions on the one hand, and subtractions on the other, prove that the rule of faith adopted by the Church of Rome, changed as it has been by them, varies from the unchangeable standard which Christ gave to his church.

4. The MEANS resorted to by the Church of Rome, for the purpose of maintaining her rule, show that her standards are defective.

By her supreme, authoritative decision, the circulation and perusal of the Scriptures are restricted as follows:—No layman can read the word of God without a written license from the Bishop; and then it must be a Bible translated by a Roman Catholic, and accompanied with notes. The Priest who recommends, and the Bishop who licenses, are the only judges of a person's fitness to read the sacred book. If permitted to read, he is not allowed to think for himself, but as the Church directs. If he reads without license, he cannot get absolution till he delivers up his Bible; and all printers selling it without license forfeit the book, and undergo other penalties; and all this on the supposition, that reading the Scriptures is injurious to the great body of men.

A permanent Committee, styled the Congregation of the Index, has, by authority, charge of the press, and the power to prohibit the reading of any works which they disapprove.

Besides, Pope Clement VIII., in the year 1595, published a decree that all Catholic authors who wrote since 1515 should be corrected, so as not only to blot out doctrines not approved, but to add what were necessary. This process of excision has, as we have seen, been extended to the Fathers.

Where such means are adopted, what can we infer, but that there exists great deficiency in permanent and sound principles? Were it otherwise, there would be no need of prohibition against perusing, or of expurgations or additions to the word of God.

5. The Roman Catholic mode of DETERMINING DISPUTES is contrary to Scripture and the spirit of Christianity, and therefore cannot be the rule established by Christ.

In order to secure uniformity they distinguish between doctrines and opinions. Those points on which they are divided are called opinions. Those on which they agree are denominated doctrines. For instance: it is an article of faith that the Church is infallible. But where this infallibility is vested is a matter of opinion. As if it were of any use to possess infallibility, unless it were known where it lies, or what points come under its supervision. Innumerable instances of a similar kind might be given.

Their mode of settling disputes by coercion, prohibition, anathemas, the Inquisition, &c., carries with it ample confutation.

Now when the Catholic rule needs so many subtle distinctions and such schemes to support it, we have positive proof, either that it is not the standard given by Christ, or that it is glaringly corrupted and perverted from its original purity.*

6. Their rule requiring faith in the decisions and interpretations of fallible men is subversive of faith and religion, and produces infidelity.

Faith supposes knowledge, conviction, or evidence, and trust in the truth of God. Their rule requires blind submission to the sayings of fallible men. The collier's faith, already explained, is the perfection of Roman Catholic faith: "I believe whatsoever the Church teaches." This is taught, too, as a fundamental article of faith in the following words of Pope Pius's Creed :— "I admit the holy Scriptures, according to the sense which the holy Mother Church (whose right it is to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the sacred Scriptures) hath held and doth hold." Thus inquiry is prevented, knowledge is frustrated, and faith is overturned.

[* "Si quis dixerit, in ministris dum sacramenta conficiunt et conferunt non requiri intentionem saltem faciendi quod facit ecclesia; anathema sit."—Concil. Trid., sess. vii., can. 11.]

* See Breckenridge and Hughes, pp. 28, 109—113, Letters iv. and xiv., where the reader will find several authorities on the subject of persecution quoted at large.

As an anticipated result, infidelity, to a great extent, has overrun the Church of Rome. But the consideration of this is referred to another place.

7. The Roman Catholic rule is ever varying, or fluctuating, in consequence of its complicated character.

With them, either the Pope, or a Council, or both united, or the universal Church, is infallible. If the universal Church be the seat of infallibility, it is useless, to a great degree, as its decisions are difficult to be ascertained. If the Pope, then all must go to Rome, or live in uncertainty. If the Pope and Council be infallible, then two fallibles will make an infallible! No Council has sat for upward of two hundred and seventy years, and it is not likely that another will ever sit. Thus an inquirer is transferred from the Pope to the Council, and from the Council to the Pope, in the fruitless attempt to find out infallibility. And if he is amused by the word "church," he must settle down in a collier's faith, without having any proper idea of the term, or of the faith which he professes. He next may be transferred to traditions, and then to Fathers, and back again to Councils and Popes; and thus he may be diverted by mere phantoms all the days of his life.

8. Their rule would require all men to be infallible.

This has been already shown.

9. Christ never established the Roman Catholic rule.

If Christ ordained it, then he gave the Apocrypha by inspiration, as well as the Bible. He must also have ordained all their oral traditions, have given the unanimous consent, as a part of the rule, and appointed by name and title the Pope, or Council, or Church, they know not which, as the only infallible judge.

10. A brief comparison of the Protestant and Roman Catholic rules, will show the superiority of the one over the other.

It is proper to mention here, as was observed before, that private interpretation is not the Protestant rule of faith. The Bible alone is our infallible standard. The Bible is the rule, interpretation is the use of that rule. If men pervert it, God's word is not in fault. An examination of the Bible as a canon of faith, compared with the Roman Catholic rule, will present the former in an advantageous light.

One thing is worthy of notice, namely, that they admit both the authenticity and inspiration of the Scriptures. This is the only infallible rule. Romanists allow that of the Protestant to be inspired and infallible, though they say it needs the interpretation of their Church. Here, then, we have an acknowledgment, that ours, as far as it goes, is both inspired and infallible; and this cannot be said of theirs, for it has never been proved, and Protestants do not admit the inspiration and infallibility of the Roman Catholic rule. Yet Romanists after all, allow that ours is infallible.

Glance then at the Roman Catholic standard of faith. It embraces the Bible, Apocrypha, written and unwritten traditions, the unanimous consent of the Fathers, and interpretation of all by an infallible judge, who has not spoken for nearly three hundred years, and whose writings and interpretations make a library in two dead languages. The Bible is embraced in one volume of moderate size; while the tomes of their rule require the labour of more than a whole life to peruse and digest them.

But as we have in the foregoing chapters sufficiently discussed the Roman Catholic rule of faith, the reader is referred to them for satisfactory arguments, respecting its deficiency, and the superiority of that of the Protestants.

["Finally, let no man undervalue or despise his Protestant birthright. In these days, many seem to make light of it, both in practice and theory. Truth is fallen in the streets. Though God's word is truth, many say of it as Brutus, when dying, said of friendship, and as the hypocrites say of all virtue, 'It is but a name!' Strange that this should be said and thought only of the truths of God! In no other department of science is truth deemed unimportant. Men do not cease to value it, or to confide in it, because in all the sciences, as well as in religion, it is difficult to attain to, and different sentiments are held in regard to, it. The mechanic is well aware that, if not constructed on the true principles of his art, his machine will not work. The mathematician knows that, if not based on the true principles of his science, his conclusions cannot stand. The political economist allows that, if his legislation do not proceed upon true and sound data, it will produce only confusion and mischief in the social system. And why, then, in the name of common sense, shall it be thought that any view, or every view, or no view, of God's truth is alike good, useful, and safe; and that, in his religious principles, involving his eternal interest, a man may follow his own opinions, without regard, or in opposition, to the word of God, without either guilt or danger? Paul reckoned it the chiefest privilege of the Jewish people, that to them 'were committed the oracles of God:' and his estimate of their value was not surely mistaken or exaggerated. To us—who have these oracles in their completed form—they cannot surely be of inferior advantage. To us, as to them, they are a light from heaven, to illuminate our mind; a mould to form our character; an armoury to defend our virtue; a chart to direct our way through the land of our pilgrimage; the charter of our inheritance in the eternal city of our God. And can it be right or safe to slight this precious gift? No; we are not shut out by any authority or usurpation of men from the book of God. Let us see to it, that we do not shut out ourselves. If we maintain its authority as the rule of our faith, let us be careful to honour it as such. Let us study the rule, in reliance on God's promised Spirit; and in God's strength let us walk by it. What it teaches, let us believe; what it denies, let us renounce; what it forbids, let us flee; what it commands, let us follow. 'And as many as walk by this RULE, peace be upon them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God.'"*]

[* Rev. J. Henderson on The Rule of Faith.—EDIT.]

BOOK II.

ON THE SEVEN SACRAMENTS OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

CHAPTER I.

THE SACRAMENTS IN GENERAL.

[DOCTRINE OF THE SACRAMENTS, AS HELD BY THE PAPISTS, STATED. Creed of Pius IV. quoted. Decree of the Council of Florence. Council of Trent cited. Mode of treating the subject. —II. THE NAME, NATURE, AND DEFINITION OF A SACRAMENT. 1. The word sacrament defined: 2. Explanation of its several parts: 3. Points wherein Roman Catholics and Protestants differ and disagree.—III. THE NECESSITY OF THEIR INSTITUTION. 1. They make them absolutely necessary: 2. Their views are contrary to Scripture: 3. And confound faith and pervert morals.—IV. THE MATTER AND FORM OF THE SACRAMENTS. 1. These defined: 2. Form of consecration: 3. The sense of the words must be preserved: 4. The matter must be an object of sense.—V. NUMBER AND ORDER OF THE SACRAMENTS. 1. Their proofs from the number seven considered. They are derived: (1.) From Scripture; (2.) Tradition; (3.) Church authority; (4.) Prescription; (5.) Analogies from nature. Roman Catechism quoted: 2. Comparative excellencies of the sacraments: 3. There are only two sacraments in the Christian church.—VI. THE AUTHOR OF THEM.—VII. THEIR ADMINISTRATION. 1. Who is the Minister: 2. His faith: 3. His probity or sanctity. Wickedness no disqualification. This is an article of faith. The reasons which they give for this: 4. Solution of several moral questions. Whether a wicked man sins if he administers? What should he do who is about to administer, if he is conscious to himself of mortal sin? Whether he who sins mortally ought to preach? Is it lawful to receive sacraments from wicked ministers? 5. Solution of this last question. The Church of Rome tolerates and authorizes wicked men to administer sacraments: 6. The intention of the minister. Dens quoted.—VIII. THE RECEIVER OF SACRAMENTS. 1. Distinction between receiving a sacrament validly and fruitfully: 2. They substitute good intentions for reformation of life. Liebermann quoted.—IX. THE EFFECTS OF THE SACRAMENTS. 1. They confer grace: 2. The graces which they confer: 3. The manner in which they confer grace. Distinction between conferring grace ex opere operato and ex opere operantis. Of grace conferred ex opere operato. Whether they confer grace morally or physically. The Thomists and Scotists. Character or the secondary effects: 4. Definition and nature of character: 5. Their proofs for character considered: (1.) Scripture proofs; (2.) Tradition; (3.) Councils: 6. Baptism, confirmation, and orders confer grace: 7. Several questions concerning character: 8. Arguments against character.—X. CEREMONIES AND SACRAMENTALS. 1. These described: 2. Their uses: 3. Their effects: 4. Use of the Latin tongue.—XI. ARGUMENTS AGAINST THEIR VIEWS OF SACRAMENTS. 1. Their doctrine on this head exalts improperly the priesthood: 2. Is replete with danger to men's souls: 3. The moral character of the administrator is injurious: 4. They employ their sacraments as incantations.

I. DOCTRINE of the sacraments as held by the Papists, stated.

A general view of the seven sacraments of the Church of Rome, will be necessary before we proceed to examine them individually. The following is the authoritative decision of the Creed of Pope Pius IV. on this subject: —"I also profess that there are truly and properly seven sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and necessary for the salvation of mankind, though not all for every one; to wit, baptism, confirmation, eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony; and that they confer grace; and that of these, baptism, confirmation, and orders cannot be reiterated without sacrilege. And I also receive and admit the received and approved ceremonies of the Catholic Church, used in the solemn administration of all the aforesaid sacraments." *

The following is the Decree of the Council of Florence, held under Eugenius IV., in 1442, on the same subject: —"The sacraments of the new law are seven; namely, baptism, confirmation, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony; which differ much from the sacraments of the old law. For these do not cause grace, but represent it as about to be given by the passion of Christ: but the sacraments of the new law contain grace, and confer it on those who worthily receive them. The first five of these are ordained for the spiritual perfection of each man in himself; the last two for the government and multiplication of the whole Church. By baptism we are spiritually born again; by confirmation we are increased in grace and strengthened in faith; but being renewed and strengthened, we are nourished by the divine aliment of the eucharist. If by any sin we incur sickness of mind, by penitence we are spiritually healed; also spiritually and bodily, as may be proper for the soul, by extreme unction. By orders the Church is governed and spiritually multiplied; by matrimony she is bodily increased. All these sacraments are perfected by three things, namely, by things as to the matter, by words as to the form, and by the person of the administrator who confers the sacrament, with the intention of doing what the Church does; of which, if any be wanting, the sacrament is not perfected. Among these sacraments there are three, baptism, confirmation, and orders, which impress indelibly on the soul a character, that is, a certain spiritual sign, distinguishing him from others. Hence they are not repeated on the same person. But the other four do not impress a character, and admit of reiteration." †

* "Profiteor quoque septem esse vere et proprie sacramenta novæ legis, a Jesu Christo Domino nostro instituta, atque ad salutem humani generis, licet non omnia singulis necessaria; scilicet, baptismum, confirmationem, eucharistiam, pœnitentiam, extremam unctionem, ordinem, et matrimonium; illaque gratiam conferre; et ex his baptismum, confirmationem, et ordinem, sine sacrilegio reiterari non posse. Receptos quoque et approbatos ecclesiæ catholicæ ritus, in supra dictorum omnium sacramentorum solemni administratione, recipio et admitto."—Canones et Decreta Concilii Tridentini. App.

† "Novæ legis septem sunt sacramenta; videlicet, baptismus, confirmatio, eucharistia, pœnitentia, extrema unctio, ordo, et matrimonium. Quæ multum a sacramentis differunt antiquæ legis. Illa enim non causabant gratiam, sed eam solum per passionem Christi dandam esse figurabant: hæc vero nostra et continent gratiam, et ipsam digne suscipientibus conferunt. Horum quinque prima ad spiritualem unius cujusque hominis in seipso perfectionem; duo ultima, ad totius ecclesiæ regimen, multiplicationemque ordinata sunt. Per baptismum enim spiritualiter renascimur: per confirmationem augemur in gratia, et roboramur in fide: renati autem et roborati, nutrimur divina eucharistiæ alimonia. Quod si per peccatum ægritudinem incurrimus animæ, per pœnitentiam spiritualiter sanamur: spiritualiter etiam et corporaliter, prout animæ expedit, per extremam unctionem: per ordinem vero ecclesia gubernatur et multiplicatur spiritualiter: per matrimonium corporaliter augetur. Hæc omnia sacramenta tribus perficiuntur, videlicet, rebus tamquam materia, verbis tamquam forma, et persona ministri conferentis sacramentum cum intentione faciendi quod facit ecclesia: quorum si

The Council of Trent, in its seventh session, held March 3d, 1547, has the following Decree and Canons, concerning the sacraments in general:—

DECREE CONCERNING THE SACRAMENTS.—PREFACE.

"In order to complete the exposition of the wholesome doctrine of justification, published in the last session, by the unanimous consent of the Fathers, it hath been deemed proper to treat of the holy sacraments of the Church, by which all true righteousness is at first imparted, then increased, and afterwards restored, if lost. For which cause the sacred, holy, œcumenical, and general Council of Trent, lawfully assembled, &c., abiding by the doctrine of the sacred Scriptures, the tradition of the Apostles, and the uniform consent of other Councils, and of the Fathers, hath resolved to frame and decree these following canons, in order to expel and extirpate the errors and heresies respecting the most holy sacraments which have appeared in these times—partly the revival of heresies long ago condemned by our ancestors, partly new inventions—and have proved highly detrimental to the purity of the Catholic Church and the salvation of souls. The remaining canons, necessary to the completion of the work, will be published hereafter, by the help of God.

"Canon 1. Whoever shall affirm that the sacraments of the new law were not all instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, or that they are more or fewer than seven; namely, baptism, confirmation, eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony; or that any of these is not truly and properly a sacrament; let him be accursed.

"2. Whoever shall affirm that the sacraments of the new law only differ from those of the old law, in that their ceremonies and external rites are different; let him be accursed.

"3. Whoever shall affirm that these seven sacraments are in such sense equal that no one of them is in any respect more honourable than another; let him be accursed.

"4. Whoever shall affirm that the sacraments of the new law are not necessary to salvation, but superfluous; or that men may obtain the grace of justification by faith only, without these sacraments; (although it is granted that they are not all necessary to every individual;) let him be accursed.

"5. Whoever shall affirm that the sacraments were instituted solely for the purpose of strengthening our faith; let him be accursed.

"6. Whoever shall affirm that the sacraments of the new law do not contain the grace which they signify, or that they do not confer that grace on those who place no obstacle in its way, as if they were only the external signs of grace or righteousness received by faith, and marks of Christian profession, whereby the faithful are distinguished from unbelievers; let him be accursed.

"7. Whoever shall affirm that grace is not always conferred by these sacraments, and upon all persons, as far as God is concerned, if they be rightly received, but that it is only bestowed sometimes, and on some persons; let him be accursed.

"8. Whoever shall affirm that grace is not conferred by these sacraments of the new law, by their own power, (ex opere operato,) but that faith in the divine promise is all that is necessary to obtain grace; let him be accursed.

"9. Whoever shall affirm that a character, that is, a certain spiritual and indelible mark, is not impressed on the soul by the three sacraments baptism, confirmation, and orders, for which reason they cannot be repeated; let him be accursed.

"10. Whoever shall affirm that all Christians have power to preach the word and administer all the sacraments; let him be accursed.

"11. Whoever shall affirm that when Ministers perform and confer a sacrament, it is not necessary that they should, at least, have the intention to do what the Church does; let him be accursed.

"12. Whoever shall affirm that a Minister who is in a state of mortal sin does not perform or confer a sacrament, although he observes every thing that is essential to the performance and bestowment thereof; let him be accursed.

"13. Whoever shall affirm that the received and approved rites of the Catholic Church, commonly used in the solemn administration of the sacraments, may be despised or omitted without sin, by the Minister, at his pleasure; or that any Pastor of a church may change them for others; let him be accursed."*

aliquod desit, non perficitur sacramentum. Inter hæc sacramenta tria sunt, baptismus, confirmatio, et ordo, quæ characterem, id est, spirituale quoddam signum a cæteris distinctivum, imprimunt in anima indelebile. Unde in eadem persona non reiterantur. Reliqua vero quatuor characterem non imprimunt, et reiterationem admittunt."—Decretum Concil. Florent; Labb. Concilia, tom. xiii., p. 534. Paris, 1672.

* "Ad consummationem salutaris de justificatione doctrinæ, quæ in præcedenti proxima sessione uno omnium patrum consensu promulgata fuit; consentaneum visum est de sanctissimis ecclesiæ sacramentis agere, per quæ omnis vera justitia vel incipit, vel cœpta augetur, vel amissa reparatur. Propterea sacro-sancta œcumenica et generalis Tridentina Synodus in Spiritu Sancto legitime congregata, præsidentibus in ea eisdem apostolicæ sedis legatis, ad errores eliminandos, et extirpandas hæreses, quæ circa sanctissima ipsa sacramenta hac nostra tempestate, tum de damnatis olim a patribus nostris hæresibus suscitatæ, tum etiam de novo adinventæ sunt quæ Catholicæ Ecclesiæ puritati, et animarum saluti magnopere officiunt, sanctarum Scripturarum doctrinæ, Apostolicis traditionibus, atque aliorum Conciliorum et Patrum consensui inhærendo, hos præsentes canones statuendos, et decernendos censuit; reliquos, qui supersunt ad cœpti operis perfectionem, deinceps, divino Spiritu adjuvante, editura."—Concil. Trid., sess. 7. Decretum de Sacramentis. Proœmium.

"Canon 1. Si quis dixerit, sacramenta novæ legis non fuisse omnia a Jesu Christo, Domino nostro, instituta; aut esse plura vel pauciora quam septem, videlicet, baptismum, confirmationem, eucharistiam, pœnitentiam, extremam unctionem, ordinem, et matrimonium; aut etiam aliquod horum septem non esse vere et proprie sacramentum; anathema sit.

"2. Si quis dixerit, ea ipsa novæ legis sacramenta a sacramentis antiquæ legis non differre, nisi quia cæremoniæ sunt aliæ, et alii ritus externi; anathema sit.

"3. Si quis dixerit, hæc septem sacramenta ita esse inter se paria, ut nulla ratione aliud sit alio dignius; anathema sit.

"4. Si quis dixerit, sacramenta novæ legis non esse ad salutem necessaria, sed superflua; et sine eis, aut eorum voto per solam fidem homines a Deo gratiam justificationis adipisci; licet omnia singulis necessaria non sint; anathema sit.

"5. Si quis dixerit, hæc sacramenta propter solam fidem nutriendam instituta fuisse; anathema sit.

"6. Si quis dixerit, sacramenta novæ legis non continere gratiam, quam significant, aut gratiam ipsam non ponentibus, obicem non conferre, quasi signa tantum externa sint acceptæ per fidem gratiæ vel justitiæ, et notæ quædam Christianæ professionis, quibus apud homines discernuntur fideles ab infidelibus; anathema sit.

"7. Si quis dixerit, non dari gratiam per hujusmodi sacramenta semper, et omnibus, quantum est ex parte Dei, etiam si rite ea suscipiant, sed aliquando, et aliquibus; anathema sit.

"8. Si quis dixerit, per ipsa novæ legis sacramenta ex opere operato non conferri gratiam, sed solam fidem divinæ promissionis ad gratiam consequendam sufficere; anathema sit.

"9. Si quis dixerit, in tribus sacramentis, baptismo scilicet, confirmatione, et ordine, non imprimi characterem in anima, hoc est signum quoddam spirituale, et indelebile, unde ea iterari non possunt anathema sit.

Neither the foregoing Decrees nor Canons contain any definition of a sacrament. This deficiency is supplied by the Catechism, and given below; from which we learn that they attribute to their sacraments the power of signifying sanctity and justice, and of imparting both to the receiver. The administration of the sacraments in the Church of Rome is admirably adapted to exalt the sacerdotal order, which is a leading principle among them. The religion of the New Testament consists of faith and holiness: "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God;" and "faith purifieth the heart." Here is beautiful simplicity; but how complex is the religion of Rome!

After quoting the decisions of the Councils, and therefore the standard authorities of the Roman Church, on the sacraments, we proceed to enter into those minutiæ of discussion, by which their views will be more fully known to the reader, and the propriety and force of our objections and arguments more clearly manifested. Following the divisions of their most acute theologians, as Dens, Collet, Bailly, Liebermann, Ferraris, &c., we shall bring to view the following points concerning the seven sacraments of the Church of Rome:—1. The name, nature, and definition of a sacrament. 2. Their necessity and existence. 3. Matter and form. 4. The number. 5. The author of them. 6. The administrator or minister. 7. The receiver or subject. 8. Efficacy or effects. 9. Ceremonies and sacramentals.

II. The name, nature, and definition of a sacrament.

1. The Latin word, sacramentum, "sacrament," is employed by Latin writers to signify an oath or obligation, such as soldiers receive. The Latin Fathers meant by the word any sacred thing which lies concealed, and it is employed by them with considerable range of meaning.

The Catechism of the Council of Trent defines a sacrament as follows:—"Sacramentum est res sensibus subjecta quæ ex Dei institutione sanctitatis et justitiæ tum significandæ tum efficiendæ vim habet." "A sacrament is a thing subject to the senses; and possessing, by divine institution, at once the power of signifying sanctity and justice, and of imparting both to the receiver."*

[Mr. Donovan, Professor, &c., in Maynooth College, observes, in his translation of this official document: "The faithful, therefore, are to be informed that the word 'sacrament' is differently understood by sacred and profane writers; and to point out its different acceptations will be found pertinent to our present purpose. By some it has been used to express the obligation which arises from an oath, pledging to the performance of some service; and hence the oath by which soldiers promise military service to the State, has been called 'a military sacrament.' Amongst profane writers, this seems to have been the most ordinary meaning of the word. But by the Latin Fathers, who have written on theological subjects, the word 'sacrament' is used to signify a sacred thing which lies concealed. The Greeks, to express the same idea, made use of the word 'mystery.' This we understand to be the meaning of the word, when, in the Epistle to the Ephesians, it is said, 'That he might make known to us the mystery' (sacramentum) 'of his will;' and to Timothy, 'Great is the mystery' (sacramentum) 'of godliness;' and in the Book of Wisdom, 'They knew not the secrets' (sacramenta) 'of God.' In these, and many other passages, the word 'sacrament,' it will be perceived, signifies nothing more than a holy thing that lies concealed. The Latin Fathers, therefore, deemed the word no inappropriate term to express a sensible sign, which, at once, communicates grace to the soul of the receiver, and declares, and, as it were, places before the eyes, the grace which it communicates. St. Gregory, however, is of opinion that it is called a 'sacrament,' because, through its instrumentality, the divine power secretly operates our salvation, under the veil of sensible things.

["Let it not, however, be supposed that the word 'sacrament' is of recent ecclesiastical usage. Whoever peruses the writings of St. Jerome, and St. Augustine, will at once perceive, that ancient ecclesiastical writers made frequent use of the word 'sacrament,' and sometimes also of the word 'symbol,' or 'mystical or sacred sign,' to designate that of which we here speak. Thus much will suffice in explanation of the word 'sacrament;' and, indeed, what we have said applies equally to the sacraments of the old law; but superseded as they have been by the Gospel law and grace, instruction regarding them were superfluous.

["Besides the meaning of the word, which alone has hitherto engaged our attention, the nature and efficacy of that which it expresses demand our particular inquiry; and the faithful must be taught what constitutes a sacrament. That the sacraments are amongst the means of attaining righteousness and salvation, cannot be questioned; but of the many definitions, each of them sufficiently appropriate, which may serve to explain the nature of a sacrament, there is none more comprehensive, none more perspicuous, than that of St. Augustine; a definition which has since been adopted by all scholastic writers: 'A sacrament,' says he, 'is a sign of a sacred thing;' or, in other words of the same import, 'A sacrament is a visible sign of an invisible grace, instituted for our justification.'* "]

Dens defines it thus: "Signum rei sacræ in quantum est sanctificans homines, id est, ceremonia sacra, externa divinitus instituta ad hominum sanctificationem, et frequentanda a populo Dei." "It is a sign of a sacred thing which sanctifies men; that is, an outward sacred ceremony, divinely instituted to promote the holiness of men, and to be frequently used by the people of God."†

2. From their theologians we collect the following explanations of the several parts of the foregoing definitions.

A sacrament, they say, is called signum, a "sign" or "symbol," because it leads us into the knowledge of something else; for instance, in baptism, exterior ablution represents internal purity.

It is called a sensible sign, because men are moved to "10. Si quis dixerit, Christianos omnes in verbo, et omnibus sacramentis administrandis habere potestatem; anathema sit.

"11. Si quis dixerit, in Ministris, dum sacramenta conficiunt, et conferunt, non requiri intentionem saltem faciendi quod facit Ecclesia; anathema sit.

"12. Si quis dixerit, Ministrum in peccato mortali existentem, modo omnia essentialia, quæ ad sacramentum conficiendum, aut conferendum pertinent, servaverit, non conficere, aut conferre sacramentum; anathema sit.

"13. Si quis dixerit, receptos et approbatos Ecclesiæ Catholicæ ritus, in solemni sacramentorum administratione adhiberi consuetos, aut contemni, aut sine peccato a Ministris pro libito omitti, aut in novos alios per quemcumque ecclesiarum pastorem mutari posse; anathema sit."—Canones et Decreta Concilii Trid. Sess. Sept. Edit. fol. Romæ, 1564.

* Cat. Conc. Trid., De Sacramentis, pars ii., sec. 10.

["* D. Aug., de Civ. Dei., lib. x., c. v., et Epist. 2."] the consideration of spiritual things by no other than corporeal or sensible objects.

† Dens Theologia. De. Sac. in genere, tom. v., No. 2, p. 67 Dublin, 1832.

It is called permanent, because, by the appointment of God, it is to endure as long as religion exists.

It is said to be divinely instituted, because God, who is the sole author of religion and grace, is also the author of the sacraments.

A sacrament is said to signify and produce sanctity in man, by which he becomes righteous. The sacraments of the old law, they say, represent the inward grace to be given by the passion of Christ; but those of the new law both represent and produce this interior grace.

3. Protestants, in common with the Church of England in her Catechism, believe that a sacrament is "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained by Christ himself, as a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof. How many parts are there in a sacrament? Two; the outward and visible sign, and the inward spiritual grace."

The Socinians, or Unitarians, believe that a sacrament is nothing more than a naked and simple sign or mark by which Christians are distinguished from all others. Though this is correct, as far as it goes, it is nevertheless faulty, because it does not go far enough, in not comprehending the reception of grace as the great object to be attained by the instrumentality of the sacraments.

In several things Protestants and Romanists are agreed respecting these institutions. Both acknowledge that the sacraments are outward signs of spiritual graces; that there should be an agreement or fitness between the sign and the thing signified; and that they ought to be instituted by divine authority.

In many points pertaining to the sacraments Roman Catholics and Protestants differ. (1.) On the authority of their institution, which we affirm to be derived from Christ only, and proved from Scripture. (2.) In their form and matter. (3.) In their instrumental or ministerial cause. (4.) In their use and end. And, (5.) In their number.

According to the Roman Catholic definition of a sacrament, it will be impossible to place some of those which she calls by that name among them. For instance: in their sacrament of penance there is no external visible sign; there being only the application of a general promise by a special ceremony. The form of absolution, and the confession of the penitent, constitute, according to them, the outward sign; but this represents the subject in so ridiculous a light, as to lead them to place the sign sometimes in one thing and sometimes in another.* It could easily be shown that in other sacraments of their Church the necessary and essential component parts of such ordinances are wanting.

III. Necessity of their institution.

1. They maintain that sacraments are not in their nature absolutely necessary for salvation, as the power of God is not restricted to them, for he could save men by other means; but that there is a necessity of congruity or fitness, so that men through these may obtain a meetness or preparation for heaven. These three sacraments are absolutely necessary, they tell us, inasmuch as they are instituted by God. Baptism is necessary to all; penance to those who fall after baptism; and orders simply necessary to the whole Church. By the term "necessary," they mean that without which a man cannot be saved. Destitute of the other sacraments, men may be saved, provided there be no negligence or contempt. Bellarmine, in conformity to the fourth Canon of the Council of Trent on the sacraments, declares, that they are more necessary than faith. "Whoever shall affirm that the sacraments of the new law are not necessary to salvation, but superfluous, or that men may obtain the grace of justification by faith only, without these sacraments; (although it is granted that they are not all necessary to every individual;) let him be accursed."

2. This obviously contradicts the Scripture. Our Saviour saith, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." (Mark xvi. 16.) He does not say, he that is not baptized, but, he that believeth not. Therefore faith is more necessary than baptism. St. Paul also teaches plainly, that "a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law." (Rom. iii. 28.)

3. Such importance as the Roman Catholics attach to the administration and reception of their sacraments tends much toward the weakening, the perplexity, and the destruction of their faith, as well as to the perversion of morals. The confidence of man, by this undue stress being placed on mere sacraments, is fixed more on the creature than on God; while the evil is greatly augmented, when some of these sacraments, with parts of others, are not only without foundation in Scripture, but directly opposed to it.

IV. The matter and form of the sacraments.

1. Every sacrament consists, say they, of matter and of form, which constitute the essential parts of which it is composed, and without which there can be none. The matter embraces outward things; such as water in baptism, chrism in confirmation, and oil in extreme unction. The form comprehends the words used in consecration or in administration.

2. Their sacraments are not all consecrated by the same words of institution, but by a certain form of speech to be used over the elements. For instance: the following words are repeated over the bread,—This is my body; and over the wine,—This cup is the New Testament; and in baptism these,—In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. These are the forms of the sacrament, the words of consecration, which are spoken in a strange tongue, without farther invocation of the name of God, or giving of thanks, and are considered necessary to the very essence of a sacrament. We Protestants readily allow that the word to bless (1 Cor. x. 16) signifies to sanctify or to consecrate; but that is not done by a magical and unintelligible muttering of words over the elements, but by the whole action, according to the institution of Christ, in distributing, receiving, and giving of thanks. This appears from the words which follow those above referred to: The bread which we break, the cup which we drink, &c. We rehearse not the words of institution as some secret charm said over the bread and wine to convert their substance, but to declare what they are to us by Christ's institution, the symbols of his body and his blood. It is not the utterance of a few words in a strange tongue, after the manner of enchanters, that has the power to consecrate; but the understanding, hearing, and believing the institution of Christ, calling upon the name of God, and offering thanksgiving before him.

3. They allow that the words of institution may be altered substantially by altering the sense, and then the sacrament is imperfect or destroyed; or the change may be accidental, when the syllables or words are changed, but the sense remains the same, yet the sacrament is not destroyed: though he sins who alters. That no substantial change ought to be made, either by an individual or the Church, must be granted by all. But that a verbal change may be made, we have unequivocal testimony from the words of the institution of the eucharist, as employed by the Evangelists and St. Paul. (Compare Matt. xxvi. 27, 28; Luke xxii. 19; 1 Cor. xi. 24.) The Church of Rome is, however, singularly guilty of making serious additions, subtractions, and alterations in the sacraments. In administering it to the people, she takes away one part of the eucharist, namely, the wine; and when she does use it, she mingles it with water. A change or omission of words may not alter the sense; but a change in things, or in the elements employed, must materially affect the institution.

* See Gerhard, De Pœniten., sect. xxiii.

4. In the matter of the sacrament, they hold it unnecessary that it be a visible object, but only such as comes under the cognizance of the senses; for instance, as the ears, &c.; in the sacrament of penance, they have no material form, but the sound of the words. It will, therefore, be difficult to show that such can be a sensible symbol, representing an inward grace. But it would indeed be an almost endless task to specify all the errors of Romanists, in the administration of these rites.

V. Number and order of the sacraments.

1. The Council of Trent affirms that they are neither fewer nor more than seven, and they pronounce all accursed who hold the contrary. It will not only be amusing, but also instructive to the reader, to see what arguments and authorities are employed by the Church of Rome to establish seven sacraments. She argues from Scripture, tradition, church authority, prescription, analogies of nature, &c.

(1.) Scripture. The following is a literal translation of Peter Dens, the author of a Text-book on Divinity used in most Roman Catholic schools:—"The number seven is also insinuated in various places of Scripture; thus in Prov. ix. it is said: Wisdom, which is Christ, hath built her house, that is, the Church, and hath cut out her seven pillars, to wit, the seven sacraments, which as so many pillars sustain the Church. Thus in like manner, in Exod. xxv., by the seven lights which were in one candlestick this is insinuated; for the seven sacraments are, as it were, so many lights which illuminate the Church." *

The Roman Catechism is content with saying that the seven sacraments can be proved from Scripture, without quoting any passage for that purpose.† The various Councils say the same thing, and generally with the same silence respecting the Scripture texts. Such scriptural authority as that which Dens gives is frequently adduced; and in quoting it we recognise its confutation in its absurdity. They do, however, sometimes quote Scripture; and we have an instance of this in Bailly,* who quotes the following Scripture authority for the sacraments peculiar to the Church of Rome: For penance, John xx. 22, 23; for extreme unction, James v. 14; for orders as a sacrament, 2 Tim. i. 6; for marriage as a sacrament, Eph. v. 31, 32. It will not fail to appear to the intelligent reader, that the Scripture authority for Popish sacraments is very slight indeed.

(2.) Traditions of the Fathers. The testimony on this head will be found where each sacrament is treated in its order. We can only at present say, that antiquity furnishes no justification whatever in extending the number of sacraments to seven.

(3.) Authoritative definitions of Councils, or the authority of the Church. That the Councils do affirm that the Scriptures teach that there are seven sacraments, we readily allow. There is, however, no passage of Scripture, properly interpreted, that teaches this, as we have already remarked; and the Council of Trent could find no such text, though her Divines pretend to prove that the seven sacraments were instituted by the authority of Jesus Christ. In support of the number of seven, nothing can be adduced but uncertain tradition and fanciful analogies. It was argued, for instance, that seven is a perfect number, since there are seven days in the week, seven excellent virtues, seven deadly sins, seven planets, &c. †

But Liebermann, a modern Roman Divine, who must have seen that this reasoning was invalid, maintains that the authority of the Church or Council is of itself sufficient, seeing she is infallible in her decisions. On the first canon of the Council of Trent on the sacraments, (de Sacramentis,) he founds the following sweeping argument:—"This declaration of the General Council should suffice, according to the strict laws of method. For we have proved in our Catholic Demonstration that there is only one true church of Christ; that she was called catholic by the consent of all; that she was governed by the Holy Spirit; that the deposite of faith was intrusted to her, and to her it belonged to decide controversies of faith by HER INFALLIBLE DECISION."‡ Thus they argue in the vicious circle; for when Scripture fails them, they run to the authority of the Church; and when the latter appears to be unsound, they fly back to Scripture. So by frequently changing their ground, they keep up appearances.

(4.) Prescription. Their argument here is, that because their Church now holds the seven sacraments, this number was always held. The reader will at once discover that this is but a miserable evasion. Those who would see all that can be said on this topic may consult Bailly.§

(5.) Natural analogies. From that which is supposed to exist between natural and spiritual life, Thomas Aquinas argued that there were seven sacraments. The Florentine Fathers, in their Decree of Eugenius IV., employ the same emblems. The Roman Catechism, with great plausibility, follows en suite, whose edition of the supposed analogy we give, with some abridgment, after Bailly. The following is the celebrated scheme:—"In order to exist, to preserve existence, to contribute to his own and the public good, seven things seem necessary to man: (i.) To be born. (ii.) To

* "Insinuatur etiam septenarius ille numerus per varia Scripturæ loca: sic Prov. ix. dicitur Sapientia, quæ est Christus, ædificasse sibi domum, id est, Ecclesiam, et excidisse columnas septem, nimirum septem sacramenta, quæ totidem veluti columnæ sustentant Ecclesiam.

"Sic similiter Exodi xxv. per septem lucernas, quæ erant in uno candelabro, hoc insinuatur: septem enim sacramenta totidem velut lucernæ sunt, quæ Ecclesiam illuminant."—Dens Theologia, De Numero Sacramentorum, tom. v., No. 46, p. 140. See also Bellarmine, lib. ii., cap. xxvi.; and the Rhemish Annotator on the Apocalypse, sect. iii., for several such specimens.

† "Catholicæ igitur Ecclesiæ sacramenta, quemadmodum ex Scripturis probatur, et Patrum traditione ad nos pervenit, et Conciliorum testatur auctoritas, septenario numero definita sunt."—Cat. Conc. Trid., De Sacramentis, sect. xviii.

* Tract. de Sacr., tom. iii., c. ii., prop. iv., p. 224.

† See Sarpi, lib. ii., p. 219. Fol. London, 1676.

‡ Institutiones Theol., tom. iv., part i., p. 153. Moguntiæ, 1827.

§ De Sacramentis, tom. iii., c. ii., prop. iv., p. 225.

grow. (iii.) To be nurtured. (iv.) To be cured, when sick. (v.) When weak, to be strengthened. (vi.) As far as regards the public weal, to have magistrates invested with authority to govern. (vii.) And, finally, to perpetuate himself and his species by legitimate offspring. Analogous, then, as all these things obviously are to that life by which the soul lives to God, we discover in them a reason to account for the number of the sacraments. (i.) Baptism is the gate to all the other sacraments, by which we are born again to Christ. (ii.) Confirmation, by which we grow up and are strengthened in the grace of God. (iii.) The eucharist, the true bread from heaven, which nourishes our souls to eternal life. (iv.) Penance, by which the soul that has caught the contagion of sin is restored to spiritual life. (v.) Extreme unction, which obliterates the traces of sin, and invigorates the powers of the soul. (vi.) Holy orders, which give power to perpetuate in the Church the public administration of the sacraments, and the exercise of all the sacred functions of the ministry. (vii.) Matrimony, a sacrament instituted for the legitimate and holy union of man and woman, for the conservation of the human race and the education of children."* Such are the reasonings which Rome puts in the place of Scripture authority.

2. They maintain that all the sacraments are not of equal dignity, necessity, or signification. Three of the sacraments, namely, baptism, the eucharist, and orders, are considered superior to the others. Baptism is absolutely necessary, as it is the only means of regeneration, or is regeneration itself. The necessity of penance is relative; for it is necessary only for those who sin mortally after baptism. Orders too, though not necessary to each of the faithful, are of absolute and general necessity to the Church. But the eucharist, for holiness, and for the number and greatness of its mysteries, is eminently superior to all the rest. "The other sacraments then first possess the power of sanctifying only when any one uses them; but in the eucharist there exists the author of sanctity before they are used."† "In this sacrament Christ himself is contained substantially; in the others only a certain instrumental virtue derived from Christ."‡ Such is the comparative estimation in which they hold the sacraments.§

The Douay Doctors (Annotations on Exod. xvi.) set forth the eminence of the eucharist by comparing it in twelve several points with manna, in all of which miracles are introduced.‖ Nevertheless, the distinguished Origen saw none of these characteristics in manna; and his interpretation is surely to be preferred to the conceits of the Douay theologians, though that is fanciful enough.¶

3. Now there are three things which seem obviously to belong to every sacrament: (1.) That their symbols signify, in a lively manner, the spiritual things which they represent. (2.) They must be instituted by Christ. (3.) The sacraments of the Gospel should succeed those of the law. Hence we infer that there are only two sacraments belonging to Christianity, namely, baptism and the Lord's supper.

(1.) These two only are signs of heavenly things, and seals and pledges thereof: The remission of sins is represented in baptism; (Acts ii. 38;) and the death of Christ is exhibited in the eucharist. (1 Cor. xi. 26.) No one of the other sacraments in the Church of Rome possesses similar claims.

(2.) The Lord Jesus commanded these two institutions only to be used perpetually in his church. He himself employed many other ceremonies, such as lifting up of hands, the tempering of clay and spittle, imposition of hands, and anointing with oil; but he never enjoined the observance of these on his disciples.

(3.) The sacraments of the New succeed those of the Old Testament; as baptism takes the place of circumcision, and the eucharist that of the passover. But the Romanists cannot show any institutions under the old law which their sacraments of confirmation, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony have superseded.

There are other arguments which are directed against these five sacraments just mentioned; which will be noticed when each is brought under special consideration.

VI. The author of the sacraments.

Roman Catholics maintain that neither the Apostles formerly, nor the Church in the present day, has any authority to institute sacraments; that this power is vested only in her living Head, and that the Apostles, in proclaiming the sacraments, merely announced what Christ had commanded. They refuse to be guided, also, by the express words of Scripture, and resort to tradition, which they term the unwritten word of God. As a specimen of the reasoning which they employ, we shall quote the arguments by which they attempt to prove that their sacraments were instituted by Christ. They strongly affirm that Christ did institute them, but endeavour to prove this, without producing the words of institution, from the written record.

Liebermann, one of their modern Divines, in attempting to prove that Christ instituted them, quotes for authority the Council of Trent:* "If any one shall say that the sacraments of the new law were not all instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ.....let him be accursed." And this arrogant assumption of the Council,

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, translated by Donovan, p. 147, et seq. Dublin, 1829. Bailly, De Sacram., tom. iii., c. ii., prop. iv., pp. 226, 227.

[† "Reliqua sacramenta tunc primum sanctificandi vim habent, cum quis illis utitur, at in eucharistia ipse sanctitatis auctor ante usum est."—Con. Trid., sess. xiii., c. iii.

[‡ "In hoc sacramento contineatur ipse Christus substantialiter, in aliis tantum virtus quædam instrumentalis a Christo participata."—Dens Theol., tom. v., No. 47, p. 142.]

§ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 148, et seq.

‖ See Willet Hexapla in Exodum, in loc., and his Synopsis Papismi, p. 554, et seq.

¶ The passage in Origen is Hom. 7, c. vi., In Exodum, tom. v., p. 415 of his Works.

[* Probat I. Pars. Expressa est Concilii Trid. definitio. Sess. vii., Can. i. Siquis dixerit, sacramenta novæ legis non fuisse a Jesu Christo Domino nostro instituta; anathema sit. Concilii decreto suffragantur. (1.) Scripturæ. Id enim palam profitetur Apostolus cum ad Corinth. ita scribit, Epist. i., cap. iv. Sic nos existimet homo ut ministros Christi, et dispensatores mysteriorum Dei. Ergo non instituendi sacramenta, sed ministrandi et dispensandi potestatem acceperunt Apostoli. (2.) Traditio. Constans enim hæc Ecclesiæ persuasio fuit, omnia sacramenta sibi a Christo tradita fuisse, neque posse aliquid circa numerum aut substantiam sacramentorum immutari. Auctor sacramentorum quis est (ait S. Ambros. a) nisi Dominus Jesus? et S. August. de vera Religione, cap. xvii. Ab ipsa Dei sapientia, homine assumpto, pauca sacramenta saluberrime constituta esse dicit. Item Epist. 108, b, ad Januarium; Tenere te volo, Dominum Jesum leni jugo suo nos subdidisse et sarcinæ levi: unde sacramentis numero paucissimis, observatione facillimis, significatione præstantissimis, societatem novi populi colligavit. (3.) Ratio, quæ ubi semel naturam sacramentorum definitionemque cognoverit, facili negotio intelliget nullum sine divina ordinatione sacramentum esse novæ legis; quoniam cum externo illo signo, quod sacramentum dicitur, conjuncta debet esse gratiæ promissio, cujus certam fidem facere humana auctoritas non potest; neque pro arbitrio quibus volet ceremoniis alligare, ac velut obsignare, quod unius est Christi."—Liebermann Instit. Theol., tom. iv., lib. vi., pars i., cap. iii., art. 1. De Auctore Sacramentorum. Mogunt. 1836.]

though no Scripture authority is quoted, is supported by the following arguments:—1. Scripture. For this is openly professed by the Apostle when writing to the Corinthians. He says: "Let a man so account of us, as of the Ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God." (1 Cor. iv. 1.) 2. Tradition. For it was the constant persuasion of the Church that all the sacraments were (tradita) delivered by tradition from Christ, and that nothing respecting their number or substance could be changed. 3. Reason; which, when once it understands the nature and definition of a sacrament, acknowledges that no sacrament is ordained without divine appointment. From the foregoing, it is plain that tradition, not the written word, constitutes the divine authority on which Romanists found the institution of their sacraments. And therefore, after all, they support their peculiar sacraments not by Scripture, but by tradition. Dens, Bailly, Collet, the Roman Catechism, as well as Liebermann and their greatest Divines, defend the institution of their sacraments by the same process of reasoning. Nevertheless there are some of their theologians, such as Hugo and Peter Lombard, who deny the assertion that all their sacraments were instituted by Christ.

The following is the principal argument by which they vindicate their position:—"Baptism and the eucharist were instituted without express Scripture warrant, because, at the time of their institution, the New Testament was not written." To which we reply, 1. The traditions of our Saviour to the Apostles, concerning these two sacraments, were afterward written and expressly set down in Scripture. But the Roman Catholic traditions, not being committed to writing, are with propriety suspected. 2. The institution of the Roman sacraments not being so recorded by the Apostles, must be resolved into church authority or tradition.

St. Paul saith, speaking of the eucharist, "I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you." (1 Cor. xi. 23.) Wherefore no sacrament ought to be delivered to the Church but such as has been received from Christ; and what is received of Christ cannot be proved to have come from him, unless it be so declared in the written word.

Hence the Fathers ascribed the institution of the sacraments to Christ alone. So Cyprian: "The great High Priest himself is the institutor and author of the sacrament."*

VII. The Minister or administrator of the sacraments.

What is said on this head by Roman Catholic Divines is usually arranged under the following divisions; namely, the person, faith, probity, and intention of the administrator. With some little extension, we propose to follow the same method.

1. The person of the Minister; or, who is authorized to administer sacraments in the Church of Rome?

By the Minister is here understood one who consecrates and administers the sacraments to the people. The administrators are ordinary and extraordinary. The ordinary Ministers are those who, by common law and received usage, administer the sacraments. The extraordinary are those who by concession, in cases of necessity, may administer. In the absence of the Priest, a layman or woman may baptize, whether wicked or righteous, whether Catholic or heretic, Jew or infidel, provided he or she intends to do what the Church does. Marriage also, under peculiar circumstances, may be performed by lay persons.

It is a point warmly disputed between their theologians whether angels as well as men may not administer sacraments. Liebermann * contends that angels cannot administer sacraments. Collet † contends for the same. In treating on the point, that man, ordinarily, is the Minister, he introduces the following objection:—"The devil can administer sacraments, as well as the members of the devil, such as Judas and wicked Priests; but," &c. To this he gives the following reply:—"Wicked Priests do not cease to be Ministers of Christ after they were once consecrated to the ministry; but devils were never consecrated to be Ministers of Christ." Aquinas maintains that God may commit the administration of sacraments to angels. And Dens, after quoting him with approbation, says: "We read in certain histories of saints, that they received the sacrament of the eucharist from an angel. The same could be done by a departed soul." ‡ If the spirits of just men or angels may administer sacraments, so also may the spirits of wicked men or devils do the same. Because the wickedness of the administrator, according to Roman Catholic theology, does not disqualify persons for administering the sacraments.

If there be a unanimous consent among the Fathers on this point, the same cannot be said respecting the Roman Catholic Divines. Chrysostom, in his treatise concerning the priesthood, observes, when treating on this very point: "Those who inhabit the earth receive this power, which God gave to neither angels nor archangels: for it is not said to them, 'Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.'" (Matt. xvi. 19.) §

2. The faith of the administrator.

That faith is not absolutely required to constitute a valid administration of the sacraments, is taught by the Church of Rome. The Council of Trent decrees: "Whoever shall affirm that baptism, when administered by heretics, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, with the intention of doing what the Church does, is not true baptism; let him be accursed." ‖ Thus heretics or schismatics may lawfully baptize: and, according to their best authors and standards, the infidelity of the administrator is no barrier in the way of valid administration. ¶

3. The probity or sanctity of the Minister.

Wickedness on the part of the Minister, according to the doctrine of the Church of Rome, does not disqualify him from administering any of the sacraments. The Roman Catechism speaks thus on this point: "Representing as he does, in the discharge of his sacred functions, not his own, but the person of Christ, the Minister of the sacraments, be he good or bad, validly consecrates and

* "Ipse Summus Sacerdos sui est sacramenti institutor et auctor."—Cypr., Serm. de Ablut. Pedum. See also Ambros., lib. iv., De Sacram., c. iv., tom. iv. August, De Vera Relig., c. xvii. Id. Epist. 108, c. liv.

* Liebermann, ut supra De Persona Ministri, tom. iv., lib. vi., p. 166.

† Collet. Instit. Theol., tom. iv., De Ministro Sacram., p. 19.

‡ Dens Theol., vol. v., De Ministro Sacram., No. 33, p. 114.

§ "Qui terram incolunt.....potestatem acceperunt, quam neque angelis, neque archangelis dedit Deus: neque enim illis dictum est, Quæcunque ligaveritis," &c.—De Sacerdotio, lib. iii.

‖ "Si quis dixerit, baptismum, qui etiam datur ab hæreticis in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, cum intentione faciendi quod facit Ecclesia, non esse verum baptismum; anathema sit."—Sess. vii., Can. iv.

¶ Those who wish to see this question fully discussed, may consult Collet. Instit. Theol. tom. iv.; De Fide Ministri, p. 33. Edit. Lugd., 1768. Bailly, Theologia, tom. iii.; An fides in Ministris Sacrament. requiratur, c. vi., p. 270.

confers the sacraments; provided he make use of the matter and form instituted by Christ, and always observed in the Catholic Church, and intends to do what the Church does in their administration."* The Council of Trent declares: "Whoever shall affirm that a Minister who is in a STATE OF MORTAL SIN does not perform or confer a sacrament, although he observes every thing that is essential to the performance and bestowment thereof; let him be accursed."† The same Council, speaking on the part of the sacrament of penance which relates to priestly absolution, called in the Canon the power of loosing, has the following:—"Whoever shall affirm, that Priests living in mortal sin have not the power of binding and loosing.....let him be accursed."‡ Observe, the wickedness of the administrator does not arise from an occasional lapse into scandalous sin, or from his being taken by surprise. The Minister is supposed to be an habitual sinner, as well as a notorious one. This is clear from the words of the Council, which say, in a STATE of mortal sin, and, LIVING in mortal sin. His life and condition, or state, is therefore that of a flagrant, notorious sinner. And as mortal sins are mentioned, he may be guilty of fornication, murder, theft, drunkenness, &c., and yet his ministrations are deemed valid.

And that such may continue to administer sacraments is an article of faith. Propositio est de fide. The proposition is an article of faith, says Bailly; and so say all their Divines. And whoever denies it is held accursed by the Council of Trent.

The following are the reasons which their Divines give for tolerating the administration of sacraments by wicked Priests.

(1.) The sacraments rightly administered by heretics or Protestants are valid: but heretics are sinners, as well as those who sacrilegiously administer sacraments.

(2.) It is argued from Augustine, who saith: "What is given by Paul, and what is given by Peter, belongs to Christ; and if it were given by Judas, it belonged to Christ.....I do not fear an adulterer, a drunkard, a murderer, because I confide in the dove, by whom it is said to me, This is he who baptizeth."§ The reason of this is, that the sacraments have their efficacy from Christ, and Ministers officiate only in his name and in his place.

(3.) Tradition. It is affirmed that this establishes the point.

(4.) The decision of the Council of Trent.

(5.) If the virtue of the sacraments depended on the probity of the administrator, no one could know whether he were truly baptized or not.

4. Several moral questions are solved by the Roman Catholic casuists connected with this subject, a consideration of which may not be improper. We shall state these in their own words, and give their own solutions, reserving to ourselves, however, liberty for observation.

[* "XXIII. Ministri malitia efficientiam sacramentorum non impedit. Atque hi quidem Ministri quoniam in sacra illa functione non suam, sed Christi personam gerunt; ea re fit ut, sive boni sive mali sint, modo ea forma et materia utantur quam ex Christi instituto semper Ecclesia Catholica servavit, idque facere proponant, quod Ecclesia in ea administratione facit; vere sacramenta conficiant et conferant."—Cat. Conc. Trid., De Sacramentis.]

† "Si quis dixerit, Ministrum in peccato mortali existentem, modo omnia essentialia, quæ ad sacramentum conficiendum, aut conferendum pertinent, servaverit, non conficere, aut conferre sacramentum; anathema sit."—Sess. vii., Can. xii.

‡ "Si quis dixerit, Sacerdotes, qui in peccato mortali sunt, potestatem ligandi et solvendi non habere; anathema sit."—Sess. xiv., Can. x.

§ Tract. 5, in Joan. 18.

Question 1. Whether a wicked man, being in orders, sins if he administers?

They all allow that he sins mortally; and the Catechism, p. 151, says that such sins "bring eternal death and everlasting perdition on him who dares to administer them with hands stained with the defilement of sin." Nevertheless, it is surprising that, after all, these notorious offenders are permitted to administer sacraments during their lives, without censure or deprivation. And when, in some few cases, censure is administered or deprivation takes place, it is not in consequence of the wickedness of the Minister, but because he disregards the order of the Church. Again: the casuistic manner in which their Divines treat this subject shows that whatever may be their occasional denunciations against wicked Clergymen, they may continue during life in a course of habitual and flagrant sin, without either church censure or deposition.

Dens affirms, "that every one who administers sacraments in mortal sin does not sin mortally."* His reasons are, (i.) A Minister may be excused who is ignorant that he is in such a state, or who does it without reflection. (ii.) When he administers in case of necessity. (iii.) When he baptizes as a lay person does. Nevertheless Dens maintains that a Priest who is in a state of mortal sin cannot administer the eucharist, or absolve in the sacrament of penance, without committing mortal sin.

Question 2. What should be done by him who is about to administer, if he is conscious to himself of mortal sin?

According to their manual, he ought not to administer sacraments, unless he first confess sacramentally, if a Confessor be within reach; but without such an opportunity, he should excite contrition.† As far as the administration of the eucharist is concerned, this has been decided by the Council of Trent.‡

* Dens Theologia, tom. v.; De Sacram., No. 35, p. 117.

[† "Respondetur cum Manuali nostro: 'Itaque si Sacerdos peccati mortalis, quod absit, sibi conscius, aut de eo probabiliter dubius fuerit, ad sacramentorum administrationem non accedet, nisi prius sacramentaliter confiteatur, si confessarium ullatenus habere valeat; sin minus, contritionem excitarit.'"—Idem, tom. v., No. 37, p. 122.]

[‡ "Si non decet ad sacras ullas functiones quempiam accedere, nisi sancte; certe quo magis sanctitas et divinitas cœlestis hujus sacramenti viro Christiano comperta est, eo diligentius cavere ille debet ne absque magna reverentia et sanctitate ad id percipiendum accedat, præsertim cum illa plena formidinis verba apud Apostolum legamus: Qui manducat et bibit indigne, judicium sibi manducat et bibit, non dijudicans corpus Domini. Quare communicare volenti revocandum est in memoriam ejus præceptum: Probet autem seipsum homo. Ecclesiastica autem consuetudo declarat, eam probationem necessariam esse, ut nullus sibi conscius peccati mortalis, quantum vis sibi contritus videatur, absque præmissa sacramentali confessione ad sacram eucharistiam accedere debeat. Quod a Christianis omnibus, etiam ab iis Sacerdotibus, quibus ex officio incubuerit celebrare, hæc sancta Synodus perpetuo servandum esse decrevit, modo non desit illis copia confessoris; quod si, necessitate urgente, Sacerdos absque prævia confessione celebraverit, quamprimum confiteatur.

["If it is not fitting to engage in any sacred duty but in a holy manner, the Christian will clearly perceive, that the surpassing purity and divinity of this heavenly sacrament require him the more diligently to take heed that he do not attempt to receive it without great reverence and sanctity, especially when those fearful words of the Apostle are considered, 'He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord.' (1 Cor. xi. 29.) Wherefore he who wishes to communicate must be reminded of the precept, 'Let a man prove himself.' (1 Cor. xi. 28.) Now the custom of the Church declares this preparation to be necessary; that no one who is conscious of mortal sin, however contrite he may think himself to be, should venture to receive the holy eucharist, without previous sacramental confession. Which custom this holy Council decrees to be strictly observed by all Christians, and even by the Priests, whose office it is to administer the sacrament, unless there happens to be no Con-

In regard to the other sacraments, in solving the question, "whether he can administer before he confesses his sin to another Priest and receives absolution from him," Dens gives the following answer:—"The question," says he, "may be considered, (i.) Speculatively: whether, for instance, the Church or Christ hath instituted it, and it must be answered negatively; hence if any one can have security respecting the remission of sins without confession, he needs not to confess. (ii.) Or it may be answered practically; and then it seems to be said plainly, that sacramental confession is not to be omitted by him, at his pleasure, in so weighty a case. The reason of this is, that such a Minister is bound to be preserved in a state of grace; therefore he is obliged to exhibit moral diligence; but this includes the ordinary medium by which he can obtain sanctifying grace, that is, the sacrament of penance is this medium; therefore he is compelled to observe it."*

Thus, speculatively, the man needs not confess; but, viewing it in a practical light, confession is enjoined. Now if it be considered, that in many or most cases, Priests have not opportunity to confess; that in theory it may be omitted; and that the restraints of penance are consistent with a course of flagrant and habitual sin; the conclusion must be obvious, that a course of open and systematic immorality is tolerated, and even practically encouraged, among the Clergy of the Church of Rome.

Question 3. Whether he who sins mortally ought to preach?

The following is the reply of Peter Dens:—"Some hold that he sins grievously, whether his sin be hidden or public. Nevertheless, many more properly suppose, that if the sin be secret, though he preach unworthily, he does not transgress by committing a new mortal sin, which may especially be said, provided he preach with a zeal of charity for the edification of his neighbour. Because preaching is not a sacramental act, nor does a secret mortal sin appear to be grievously repugnant to the decency, sanctity, or end of his ministry.

"But if such a Preacher should be an open sinner, then commonly they hold that he sins grievously on account of the scandal. Because the preaching of the Gospel, by this means, comes into contempt, and also produces a disrespect of other Ministers, whom the vulgar are inclined to suspect of similar crimes."†

Thus, according to the foregoing solution, which is the one generally received, a man may preach during life and continue in a state of secret sin, or even in a course of public transgression, provided the moral sense of the public will allow such flagrant wickedness, which is generally the case in Roman Catholic countries. Our casuist makes no reference whatever to the reformation of the transgressor, nor to any probable deposition from the ministry in case of conviction: therefore as these Gospel remedies are neither mentioned nor proposed, the conclusion is legitimate, that Rome tolerates, and therefore authorizes, wicked men to preach the Gospel. She neither insists on their reformation, nor deposes them on account of their sins.

Question 4. Is it lawful to receive sacraments from wicked Ministers?

Dens says, that "the question is not instituted concerning a Minister who invalidly ministers, or of one who, from conjecture and vain rumours only, is esteemed bad, but of one who is bad by obvious design; whence it is not sufficient that the Minister may have sinned yesterday, because to-day it may be supposed that he has amended."* He also adds the following fourfold distinctions respecting the character of bad Ministers:—"(1.) One is tolerated, another not tolerated. (2.) One tolerated is held, from his office, to administer sacraments; another is not thus held. (3.) One is said to be bad only because he is a sinner; another also by censure. (4.) One is said to be unprepared, another prepared, to administer the sacraments; as, for instance, he is placed in the confessional chair."† He also informs us that he who is tolerated by the Church ought to be received by the faithful; but he who is not thus tolerated must be shunned. Yet no one should be shunned or rejected, except he who is specially denounced and condemned by the decision of the Church.

5. With such premises as the foregoing, the Divines proceed to answer the question stated above, "Whether the faithful may receive the sacraments from wicked or bad Ministers?"

Dens premises, that, "seeing a sacrament is a thing good in itself, which can be lawfully approved; and as the spiritual utility of the receiver cannot be prevented, although he may previously know the sin of the Minister who unworthily ministers; hence the entire solution depends on the justice of the cause which he hath for requesting the sacrament from a bad man; hence if the cause is just, then such a petition is lawful. Hence the following solutions:—

"(1.) In case of extreme necessity, (as when any one is about to die without baptism or penitence,) it is lawful to request and receive the sacrament of baptism or penance from a wicked Minister, although not tolerated, if other Ministers are absent. So the Council of Trent declares, that all Priests, in such cases of necessity, may absolve penitents from all sins and censures.‡ This permission, however, does not refer to the other sacraments.

fessor at hand. If, therefore, through necessity, the Priest solemnizes the sacrament without previous confession, let him confess as soon as possible."—Conc. Trid., sess. xiii., cap. vii.]

[* "Hanc quæstionem vel considerari speculativè, an scilicet Ecclesia vel Christus ita statuerit, et resp. negat.: unde si quis securitatem habere posset de remissione peccati citra confessionem, nihil eum urgeret confiteri. Vel practicè: et tunc omnino dicendum videtur, per se sub gravi esse præmittendam confessionem sacramentalem. Hujus ratio est, quod talis Minister teneatur ad statum gratiæ; ergo tenetur moralem diligentiam adhibere; sed hæc includit medium ordinarium, ut gratiam sanctificantem obtineat, quod est sacramentum pœnitentiæ: ergo ad hoc tenetur."—Dens Theologia, tom. v., No. 37, p. 122.]

[† "Quidam tenent, illum graviter peccare, sive peccatum ejus occultum sit, sive publicum.

["Plerique tamen existimant communius, quod, si peccatum sit occultum, licet prædicet indignus, non peccet novo peccato mortali; quod saltem dicendum videtur, si cum zelo charitatis et proximi ædificatione concionetur: quia concio non est actio sacramentalis, nec peccatum mortale occultum videtur graviter repugnare decentiæ, sanctitati, vel fini istius ministerii. Si autem talis Concionator foret peccator publicus, tunc communiter tenent, illum graviter peccare ratione scandali; quia inde veniret in contemptum prædicatio Evangelii, et in vilipendium etiam aliorum Ministrorum in quibus similia apprehendere vulgo proclive est."—Idem, tom. v., No. 36, pp. 121, 122.]

[* "Prænotandum, quæstionem non institui de Ministro qui invalide est ministraturus, vel qui malus habetur ex conjecturis et vanis rumoribus tantum, sed debet de ejus malitia moraliter certo constare: unde non sufficeret, quod Minister, v. g., heri mortaliter peccaverit; quia hodie supponi debet emendatus."—Idem, tom. v., No. 38, p. 124.]

[† "(1.) Alius est toleratus, alius non toleratus. (2.) Toleratus alius tenetur ex officio sacramenta ministrare, alius non sic tenetur. (3.) Alius dicitur malus solum quia peccator, alius etiam per censuram. (4.) Alius dicitur non paratus, alius paratus ad sacramenta ministranda, ut, v. g., confessarius in sede confessionali expositus."—Idem.]

‡ Sess. xiv., c. 7.

"(2.) It is not lawful to ask the sacraments from a bad but tolerated Minister, on whom it is not incumbent to administer sacraments, if he be not fully prepared, unless necessity urges it; and this necessity ought to be esteemed greater when he is impeded by censure or otherwise than when he is simply bad.

"(3.) That sacraments may be lawfully received from a bad, tolerated Minister, who from his office is bound to administer, not only the necessity of the sacraments, but certain other minor reasons, go to prove."*

Many more such questions could be selected from the Romish Divines, to show to what subterfuges they will fly in order to maintain the validity of the ministrations of wicked men. There is a sense in which all must allow, that the official acts of the Clergy of approved standing, and not deposed, should be held lawful and valid: which is the case previous to proof being adduced of the guilt of an offender, or before he can be lawfully deprived according to Scripture. But when an ecclesiastical hierarchy tolerates and authorizes wicked men to preach and administer sacraments, she is guilty of heinous wickedness. Such guilt we charge upon this Church. The sin of the Minister is overlooked; and, consequently, the people may be expected to follow the example of their Priest. This delinquency is notorious among them: it is of such long standing, and has been tolerated by such subtle, casuistical expositions, that the crime is now sanctioned and established by the Church of Rome; so that abandoned administrators and wicked recipients of the sacraments, who live and die in sin, make up a large portion of the members and Clergy of this apostate community.

6. The intention of the administrator.

The Council of Trent, in imitation of that of Florence, publishes the following canon:—"Whoever shall affirm that when Ministers perform and confer a sacrament, it is not necessary that they should have at least the intention to do what the Church does; let him be accursed."† The Roman Catechism, page 150, as formerly quoted, inculcates the same doctrine.

"Intention," says Dens, "is the act of the will referring to an end: whence the necessary intention in the Minister consists in the act of his will whereby he wills the external act of the sacrament, under the profession of doing what the Church does. The intention is distinguished into actual, virtual, habitual, and interpretative.

"(1.) An habitual intention is not sufficient to the perfecting of a sacrament, because this does not suffice for performing a human act; nay, it is properly no intention.

"(2.) Nor is an interpretative intention enough; for though, from the preceding volition, the sacramental act can be as voluntary as an effect in a cause, yet here it is not now exercised by the Minister as by a rational agent.

"(3.) But the actual intention suffices, seeing it is the best. Although it is not necessary, yet the Minister should study to obtain it.

"(4.) But a virtual intention is sufficient, which, by the force of the preceding act, flows into the following one; and hence it is sufficient to the human act. Hence he who formally goes to the baptistery, the confessional, the altar, &c., about to minister, validly baptizes, absolves, consecrates, &c., although during the time of his ministry he is distracted."* From the same author we select the following outlines of the doctrine of intention, as a continued explanation of the subject.

He says the object of the intention of doing what the Church does may be fourfold, whence also the intention is fourfold; namely, "(i.) The intention of doing merely an act of external ceremony, as it were formally undertaken, without any personal will of solemnizing a sacrament, or of doing what the Church does. This intention is usually called merely external. (ii.) The intention can be, not only of externally performing the outward rite, but also inwardly, and in the mind, of doing generally what the Church doeth, whatever, in the mean time, the Minister may think concerning the Church itself. This intention is called internal. (iii.) The intention of administering a sacrament of the true name, as the Roman Church does. (iv.) The intention of conferring sacramental effects."

"What intention of these four is required and is sufficient for the validity of a sacrament?

"Answer. In the first place, the fourth is not required; but the intention, though with the will of not conferring the effect, is sufficient, by which, simply and generally, he wills to do what the Church does; for the effect does not refer to the essence of the sacrament.

"Hence, though heretics (Protestants) deny that grace is conferred by the sacraments, they nevertheless validly baptize.

"So also a Pagan, although he does not believe that baptism can effect any thing, baptizes, nevertheless, validly, provided he observe the form of the Church.

[* "Utrum sacramenta petere liceat a malo Ministro? R. Cum sacramentum sit res per se bona, quæ licite præstari potest; et sicut utilitas spiritualis suscipientis, etiam prævideatur peccatum Ministri indigne ministraturi: hinc tota resolutio pendet a justitia causæ, quam habet suscipiens et sic petens sacramentum a malo Ministro; unde si adsit justa causa, tunc talis petitio licita est, eodem modo quo cum justa causa licet petere juramentum a juraturo per falsos Deos, et mutuum ab eo, qui non est daturus nisi sub usura.

["Et hinc resolvuntur sequentia.

["III. 1. In casu necessitatis extremæ (ut dum quis sine baptismo aut pœnitentia moreretur) licitum est sacramentum baptismi et pœnitentiæ a Ministro malo, etiam non tolerato, petere et recipere, si absit alius. Unde Conc. Trid., sess. xiv., cap. vii., De Pœnitentia, declarat, tunc omnes Sacerdotes quoslibet pœnitentes a quibusvis peccatis et censuris absolvere posse.

["2. A Ministro malo, sed tolerato, cui non incumbit sacramenta ministrare, signanter, si non sic paratus, sacramenta petere non licet, nisi urgeat necessitas: et hæc quidem gravior esse debet, si Minister per censuram aliterve impeditus sit, quam dum est simpliciter malus.

["3. Ut licite sacramenta petantur a Ministro malo tolerato, qui ex officio tenetur ad sacramentorum administrationem non tantum sufficit necessitas sacramentorum, quæ non sunt libertatis, sed etiam sufficiunt necessitates quædam minores; imo rationabilis causa, v. g., quod parochianus sacramenta pro more Christiano suscipere velit."—Dens Theologia, tom. v., No. 38, pp. 125, et seq.]

† Vide supra. Sess. vii., Can. xi.

[* "Qualis requiritur intentio ex parte subjecti seu Ministri? R. Notandum, quod intentio sit actus voluntatis tendentis in finem: unde intentio necessaria in Ministro consistit in actu ejus voluntatis, quo vult actionem externam sacramenti sub ratione faciendi quod facit Ecclesia. Intentio autem illa ex parte subjecti distingui potest quadruplex; scilicet actualis seu formalis, virtualis, habitualis et interpretativa.

["Intentio habitualis ad perfectionem sacramenti non est sufficiens: quia hæc non sufficit ad actum humanum, imo proprie non est intentio.

["Nec etiam sufficit interpretativa; quamvis enim ex voluntate præcedenti actio sacramentalis sic possit esse voluntaria ut effectus in causa, tamen hic et nunc non exercetur a Ministro ut ab agente rationali. Intentio vero actualis certo sufficit, cum sit optima. Hæc, licet non sit necessaria, studiose tamen ad illam conari debet Minister.

["Sufficit ergo, et ut minus requiritur intentio virtualis: quia hæc dicitur virtualis, quæ vi actualis præcedentis influit in actum, et proinde sufficit ad actum humanum.

["Unde ille, qui advertenter ivit ad baptisterium, confessionale, altare, &c., ministraturus, valide baptizat, absolvit, consecrat, &c., licet tempore ministerii distractus foret."—Dens Theologia, tom. v., No. 39, pp. 128, 129.]

"The mere external intention is not sufficient, but the internal one is also required, or that the Minister should exhibit the external act, intending thereby, although not distinctly, to administer a sacrament, or to do what the Church does." *

"A general, implied, and confused intention is enough, when it sufficiently determines to do those things externally which belong to the sacramental action. Hence St. Thomas says: 'Although he who does not believe baptism to be a sacrament, or to have any spiritual virtue, does not intend, while he baptizes, to confer a sacrament, —nevertheless, intending, at the same time, to do what the Church does, though he may consider that to be nothing; and because the Church does something, so, of consequence, he intends to do obscurely the same, though not explicitly.'"

"In like manner, it is not required that the Minister should explicitly do what the Church of Rome does; but it is sufficient that he simply and generally wills to do what Christ instituted, or what the true Church does, whatever his opinion may be concerning her. This is declared by the practice of the Papal hierarchy which ratifies the baptism of heretics.

"But what if he should have two opposing intentions; for instance, a heretic baptizes, intending to do what Christ instituted, or what HIS Church does, but not what the Church of Rome does?—Answer. Such a one, morally speaking, baptizes validly."

"Is a right or direct intention required in the Minister for the perfection of the sacrament?—Answer. Provided the intention is esteemed direct or right in respect of the sacrament, or if there be only an implied intention of administering that ordinance, it will be valid, although the ulterior intention is not right. Whence St. Thomas saith, 'If a Priest intend to baptize a certain female that he may abuse her, or if he intend to make the body of Christ that he may use it in order to poison, and because the former intention did not depend on the latter, hence it follows that the perversity of such an intention does not destroy the verity of the institution: but the Minister sins grievously by such an intention.'"

"Whether the intention of the Minister ought to be determined as to a certain person or matter?—Answer, affirmatively, as appears from the very forms of the sacraments. Thus, by 'I baptize thee,' 'I absolve thee,' a certain and determinate person is designated.....Hence in the Roman Missal, where on the 'defects of the mass,' sec. 7, it reads thus: 'If any one has before him eleven wafers, and intends to consecrate only ten, not determining what ten he intends, in these cases he does not consecrate, because the intention is required.'"

"What if any one supposes that there are only ten wafers and there were eleven, or that he held only one when he held two?—Answer. All will be regularly consecrated; because he hath the intention of consecrating that which was formally placed before him, or his intention is simply carried toward the present matter." *

The preceding quotations from Dens will give the student some idea what distinctions and arguments are to be found in Roman Catholic systems of divinity. This author is remarkably systematic in his arrangement, and clear in his style; and embraces more circumstantially the various points of distinction, than any other writer. From him we have given the leading views entertained in the Church of Rome respecting the doctrine of intention. Those who would learn more, should consult Bailly,† Collet,‡ Ferraris,§ and others.

[* "Quotupliciter distingui potest objectum intentionis faciendi quod facit Ecclesia?

["R. Quadrupliciter: unde et talis intentio etiam est quadruplex. Intentio faciendi mere actionem externæ cæremoniæ, quasi materialiter sumptæ, sine ulla voluntate personali faciendi sacramentum, vel quod facit Ecclesia: unde hæc vocari solet intentio mere externa. Intentio potest esse non tantum exterius faciendi ritum externum, sed etiam intus et animo faciendi generatim quod facit Ecclesia, quidquid interim Minister sentiat de ipsa Ecclesia. Hæc intentio dicitur interna.

["Intentio faciendi veri nominis sacramentum ut facit Ecclesia Romana. Intentio conferendi effectus sacramentales.

["Quænam intentio ex quatuor præfatis requiritur et sufficit ad valorem sacramenti?

["R. Imprimis non requiritur quarta, sed sufficit, etiam cum voluntate non conferendi effectum, intentio, qua simpliciter ac generatim vult facere quod facit Ecclesia; effectus enim non spectat ad essentiam sacramenti, sed illud, quantum est de se, necessario consequitur.

["Hinc quamvis hæretici negent, per sacramenta conferri gratiam, valide tamen baptizant, &c.

["Sic etiam Paganus, licet non credat baptismum aliquid operari posse, baptizat tamen valide: modo formam Ecclesiæ, &c.

["An sufficit prima, seu intentio mere externa, licet in animo dicat Minister: nolo conficere sacramentum?

["R. Negative: sed insuper requiritur interna, sive ut Minister actum externum ponat, intendens per illum, saltem implicite, facere sacramentum, seu quod facit Ecclesia."—Dens Theologia, tom. v., No. 40, p. 130, et seq.]

[* "An ad perfectionem sacramenti requiritur intentio particularis, seu explicita et expressa faciendi sacramentum, vel faciendi quod facit Ecclesia Romana?

["R. Negative: sed sufficit intentio generalis implicita et confusa, sufficienter determinans ea, quæ exterius aguntur, ad esse sacramentale.

["Hinc S. Thom., in iv. dist. vi., quæst. 1, art. 3, quæstiuncula 2 ad 1, dicit: 'Quamvis ille qui non credit baptismum esse sacramentum, aut habere aliquam spiritualem virtutem, non intendit, dum baptizat, conferre sacramentum; tamen intendit facere quandoque quod facit Ecclesia, etsi illud reputet nihil esse: et quia Ecclesia aliquid facit, ideo ex consequenti et implicite intendit aliquid facere quamvis non explicite.'

["Similiter non requiritur, ut Minister explicite intendat facere quod facit Ecclesia Romana; sed sufficit ut simpliciter et generatim velit facere quod Christus instituit, vel quod facit vera Ecclesia, quæcumque illius sit sententia de Ecclesia: ut declarat praxis Ecclesiæ ratum habentis baptisma hæreticorum.

["Sed quid, si haberet duas intentiones repugnantes; v. g., hæreticus baptizat intendens facere quod Christus instituit, aut quod facit sua Ecclesia, sed non quod facit Ecclesia Romana?

["R. Talis moraliter loquendo valide baptizabit.

["An ad perfectionem sacramenti requiritur in Ministro intentio recta?

["R. Modo habeatur recta intentio respectu sacramenti, sive intentio saltem implicita faciendi sacramentum, validum erit sacramentum, licet ulterior intentio recta non sit: unde docet S. Thom. hac quæst. 64, art. 10, in corp.: 'Si Sacerdos intendat aliquam feminam baptizare ut abutatur ea, vel si intendat conficere corpus Christi ut eo ad veneficia utatur: et quia prius non dependet a posteriore, inde est quod talis intentionis perversitas veritatem sacramenti non tollit, sed ipse Minister ex tali intentione graviter peccat.

["An intentio Ministri debet esse determinata quoad certam personam vel materiam?

["R. Affirmative, ut patet ex ipsis formis sacramentorum: sic per Ego te baptizo, Ego te absolvo, certa et determinata persona designatur, et in forma eucharistiæ pronomen hoc designat determinatam materiam consecrandam.

["Hinc in Missali Romano, ubi de defectibus missæ, 7, sic legitur: 'Si quis habeat coram se undecim hostias, et intendat consecrare solum decem, non determinans quas decem intendit, non consecrat in his casibus, quia requiritur intentio.'

["Quid si quis putet, tantum esse decem hostias, et essent undecim, vel se tenere unicam, et tenet duas?

["R. Omnes regulariter erunt consecratæ; quia habet intentionem consecrandi id, quod ante se positum est, sive ejus intentio fertur simpliciter in materiam præsentem."—Idem, tom. v., No. 41, pp. 132—134.]

† Bailly Theologia De Sacram., tom. iii., c. vi., art. iv., p. 293, et seq.

‡ Collet. Inst. Theol. De Sacram., tom. iv., sec. iii., De Intentione Ministri, p. 53, et seq.

§ Ferraris on the word Intentio.

Perhaps it is unnecessary to trouble our readers with many remarks on the doctrine of intention, as they will easily perceive the absurdities connected with and growing out of this dogma of the Church of Rome.* [Suffice it to say, that a more false and ridiculous opinion could not be held:—"1. It supposeth that the defect of intention, which is a sin of the Minister, is the cause of an eternal loss to him that is ignorant of it, and who does not in the least partake of that sin; which is manifestly contrary, not only to the law of nature, but also to the disposal of divine justice, which will not permit the penalty of sin to reach any but the author, or those that are abettors by consenting to it. 2. It overthrows the notion of the ministry, in making the sacrament to depend on the power of the Minister, without whose intention it cannot have its validity. The ministry differs in this from the authority of Jesus Christ; that Jesus Christ hath instituted the sacraments to be celebrated in his church, and to signify the graces we receive by partaking of them. The sacraments, therefore, consist of these two parts: the one is the doing the actions prescribed; the other is to express the sense of those actions; both which are performed by the Ministers, to whom Jesus Christ hath committed the dispensation of the sacraments. Now if the validity of the sacrament depends on any other thing, namely, the intention of the Minister, it will follow, that the Minister, besides his dispensation, is master of the sacrament; forasmuch as the sacrament cannot be valid without him, that is, it cannot be a sacrament. It is a very strange conceit, that Jesus Christ should have ordained a Minister, who by his ordination can wholly overthrow the design, and make void the institution of our Saviour: for the thing is not impossible, and it may naturally be supposed, yea, it might so happen, that all Priests, if it were only to show their liberty, might resolve to have no intention; and if so, what would become of the sacraments which our Lord hath instituted?

["3. This doctrine of the necessity of intention, doth overturn and manifestly destroy the nature of those sacred signs; which being so by the institution of our Saviour, they do not derive their virtue from the authority or the action of the Minister: on the contrary, it is certain that the action of the Minister derives all its authority from the institution. We call the sacraments, in conformity to the ancients, a visible word. Now, forasmuch as the words have their signification independently of him that makes use of them, and in virtue of a use formerly established, it is apparent that we cannot make the validity of the sacraments depend on the intention of the Minister, without thereby destroying the nature of them. 4. It manifestly opposeth the common sense and judgment of all Christians. When we have seen an infant baptized, and with the ordinary ceremonies received in the Church, all that have been present say, and suppose they have all the reason in the world so to do, that a child hath been baptized. The Church of Rome itself, doth it not go on this ground, establishing her jurisdiction over persons on this account, and thinks herself to have right to punish the party as an apostate, in case he leaves the Roman religion for to embrace Mahometanism, or to list himself among Protestants? Now can a stranger piece of folly be conceived than this proposition, namely, such an one has been baptized in the presence of such witnesses, in case it be true, that besides the ceremony administered, the intention of the Minister be required to make it a true and valid baptism? Or can any proceeding be more unjust than that of the Inquisition, in condemning such a person, and burning him for an apostate?

["Let us also consider that chaos of doubts and uncertainties, into which the necessity of the Minister's intention doth necessarily cast all Christians, without leaving any imaginable means to be freed therefrom. It is a sure maxim delivered by the Holy Spirit himself, that none knows the heart of man, but the heart of man, and the Deity who takes to himself this title, the Searcher of the heart. How then is it possible for me ever to be assured that I have been baptized, that I have been confirmed, that I have had absolution of my sins, that I have partaken of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, that I have really received any orders, that I have the power of baptizing, of consecrating, of absolving, of ordaining Ministers, that I am lawfully married, that I have received extreme unction; if I must believe that none of these actions can be truly done without the intention of the Minister of the sacraments, which is absolutely unknown to me, and of which I have no way to assure myself? The Papists ordinarily object to some Protestants for an absurdity, from which they cannot free themselves,—the idea of the Church upon the hypothesis of election. Their ground is this: that it is the greatest absurdity imaginable, to make the Church, which is a visible body, to depend on a decree of eternal election, which is a will hid in God, and is not revealed. But in truth we may upbraid to them, with much more justice, their notion of the necessity of intention, by which means all the great concerns of their Church are left so uncertain and fantastic, that nothing can be imagined more vain, or that smells more rank of delusion. For upon this supposal, we have no assurance of any object of our religion, all depending on this secret intention, which is altogether uncertain. A man cannot be a Priest, if he have not been baptized; he cannot be a Bishop, if before he have not been a Priest; he cannot be a Pope, if he have not been a Bishop or Priest; he cannot be the subject of infallibility, he cannot decide any thing sovereignly and without appeal, if he be not a Christian and a Priest before. This necessity of intention works as many miracles of uncertainty, to the subversion of the certainty of religion, as transubstantiation doth to the destruction of sense, reason, and faith. I will not make the displeasing parallel here, it is sufficient to point out the thing to the judicious reader, who may make his reflections thereupon."*]

VIII. The receiver or subject of a sacrament.

1. Their Divines make a distinction between the qualifications necessary for the validity of a sacrament, and those required in order to realize its effects or fruits.

Children or insane persons are not required to manifest any dispositions as necessary to qualify them for the reception of sacraments, or the participation of their fruits: hence the question is concerning those who possess reason.

The disposition in the receiver necessary for the validity of a sacrament. In reference to the eucharist, the will is required in the reception of this sacrament in order to its

* See an extensive investigation of this subject by Gerhard, De Sacram., pp. 232—249, who gives twelve reasons against this doctrine, traces it to its origin, gives the opinions of the Fathers, refutes the Popish arguments, and also examines the opinions of the Council of Trent, Loci Theologici, tom. iv.

[* Gibson's Preservative against Popery, vol. ii., fol., tit. vii., chap. i., pp. 38, 39.]

effect, but not to its validity, because the sacrament exists independently of any intention, as it consists in a permanent thing. But in the other sacraments the internal intention is necessary to their validity.

The disposition for obtaining the fruit of a sacrament. If it be the sacrament of the dead, (baptism or penance,) a state of grace is not required, but contrition suffices. In him who receives a sacrament of the living, a state of grace of itself is necessary, so that he who is conscious to himself of mortal sin is previously held to confession in order to receive the eucharist. The same is also true, at least practically, of the other sacraments.*

2. The good INTENTION of the receiver appears, according to the practice of the Church of Rome, to be a substitute for the abandonment of sin, and the practice of righteousness. In baptism they are regenerated. In penance, by professing good intentions, without forsaking sin, or doing the will of God, the sinner receives remission of the past, and proceeds to contract a fresh load to be again remitted. Thus good intentions are, or may be, put in the place of reformation of life, and purity of morals, till the sinner becomes an habitual transgressor, and is confirmed in his evil habits by the tolerance and privilege which the Church affords.

To show how little value is placed in connecting moral character with the administration of sacraments, or the sanctity of religion, we will quote from Liebermann, one of their latest Divines.

"Do you inquire whether it be lawful to receive the sacraments from wicked Ministers?

"Answer. 1. In cases of necessity, baptism or sacramental absolution may be received from Ministers, though notoriously wicked, and not even tolerated by the Church. Hence the Council of Trent declares, that there is no reservation of cases in the article of death, and a penitent may be absolved by any Priest.

"2. When a case of necessity does not interfere, it is unlawful to receive the sacraments from him who has been excommunicated by a special and express sentence, or by him who is a notorious striker of the Clergy.

"3. When there is a just cause for asking the reception of a sacrament, a person may request and receive it from the parish Priest, to whom the administration of the sacraments officially belongs, or from any other prepared Priest, although he may be wicked, if he be tolerated by the Church. Because every person may use his own right, although, without his intention, it may afford an occasion to a wicked Minister of still greater wickedness. Yet when there is a sufficient number of Ministers, the law of charity demands that we seek not the sacraments from him whom we know to be contaminated with wicked acts."†

From the foregoing we perceive that baptism and absolution are allowed to be received from notoriously wicked men, though professedly they may not be tolerated as such by the Church. This is a fearful profanation of the sacraments, and must awfully encourage and give licence to sin.

Whoever is officially permitted to administer the sacraments may administer them, though ever so wicked, and the people are bound to receive them from his hands. Two fearful heresies are here embraced: 1. The Church has a right to authorize wicked men to be Ministers; and, 2. The people are compelled to receive the sacraments from them. What enormities can be greater than these?

IX. The effects of the sacraments.

Roman Catholic theologians divide the effects of the sacraments into two: namely, the primary effect, which is habitual or sanctifying grace; and the secondary effect, which is character, and belongs only to baptism, confirmation, and orders. The general effect of all the sacraments is sanctifying grace, while the particular effect of some is character. We shall consider first the general effects of the sacraments, and afterwards the particular one.

The general effect of all the sacraments, which is called grace.

1. The sacraments produce grace. That grace is called first, or primary, by their Divines, which does not suppose any habitual grace existing in the subject; or it is that which makes a man just who was formerly unjust. That is called second or secondary grace which supposes another pre-existent grace, increases it, or which renders a just man more just. The sacraments of the dead (baptism and penance) are said, per se, or from their primary institution, to cause first grace; but the sacraments of the living, which are the other five, cause secondary grace, per se, because they were first instituted for those who already spiritually live by grace, or because they were appointed to confer this second grace. They may also per accidens confer primary grace. For instance: a person in good faith may receive the eucharist, invincibly, or not very culpably ignorant, that he is in a state of mortal sin; only at the same time he has an emotion of imperfect contrition, which emotion, with the sacrament of penance, justifies him. The same reason holds good for other sacraments of the living, but especially for that of extreme unction.*

* Dens Theologia, tom. v., de Sacram., Nos. 44, 45.

[† "Quæres, an liceat sacramenta recipere a malis Ministris? Resp. 1. In causa necessitatis baptismus aut sacramentalis absolutio peti potest a Ministris etiam notorie malis, et ab Ecclesia non toleratis. Unde Trident. declarat: Nullam esse in articulo mortis casuum reservationem, et a quolibet Sacerdote pœnitentem absolvi posse. 2. Ubi causa necessitatis non subest, sacramenta recipere non licet ab eo, qui speciali et expressa sententia fuerit excommunicatus, aut notorius Clerici percussor sit. Ita Martin V. in Bulla, Ad evitanda Scandala, in Concilio Constant. edita. 3. A parocho, cui sacramentorum administratio ex officio incumbit, aut ab alio Sacerdote parato, quamvis perversus ille sit, si sit ab Ecclesia toleratus, sacramenta petere licet et accipere, quando justa adest ea petendi ratio: quilibet enim jure suo uti potest, etsi præter intentionem Ministro improbo gravioris sceleris occasionem præbeat. Quodsi tamen copia habeatur alterius Ministri, lex charitatis postulat ut ab eo sacramenta non petamus, quem sceleribus contaminatum novimus."—Liebermanni Oper., tom. iv., lib. vi. De Sacramentis, pars i., art. iii., prop. iii., p. 187.]

[* "Quid intelligitur per gratiam sanctificantem primam? Illa, quæ aliam habitualem non supponit in subjecto, cui infunditur; seu quæ ex injusto facit justum. Quænam dicitur gratia sanctificans secunda? Quæ supponit aliam præexistentem, et illam auget; seu quæ de justo facit justiorem. Quænam sacramenta causant gratiam primam, quænam secundam? Sacramenta mortuorum, scilicet baptismus et pœnitentia, per se, seu ex primaria sua institutione, causant gratiam primam; sacramenta vero vivorum, quæ sunt reliqua quinque, per se causant gratiam secundam. Quare baptismus et pœnitentia vocantur sacramenta mortuorum? Quia per se et directe sunt instituta pro illis, qui privati gratia per peccatum, spiritualiter mortui sunt, sive quia per se primo instituta sunt ad conferendam gratiam primam: adeoque suscipi possunt ab iis, qui sunt in statu seu reatu peccati mortalis. Quare illa sacramenta dicuntur conferre gratiam primam per se? Quia per accidens conferre possunt gratiam secundam; possunt enim etiam suscipi a justo: ut dum perfecte contritus suscipit sacramentum baptismi vel pœnitentiæ, item dum quis in sacramento pœnitentiæ, non habet confitenda nisi venialia, vel peccatum jam ante remissum. Quare cætera quinque dicuntur sacramenta vivorum? Quia per se primo instituta sunt pro iis, qui jam spiritualiter vivunt per gratiam, sive quia per se ordinata sunt ad conferendam gratiam secundam: hinc per se suscipi debent in statu gratiæ. Dicuntur etiam illa conferre gratiam secun-

2. What graces do the sacraments confer?

We shall, as elsewhere, give the Roman Catholic view of this topic, and make such observations as may be necessary to present the subject clearly to our readers.

(1.) Sanctifying grace is said to be the effect of all the sacraments.

(2.) They say each sacrament confers grace peculiar to itself, because each is appointed to an end peculiar to itself, so that it has the special effect of conferring grace subservient to that end. This distinction is called by the Divines "sacramental grace." For instance: according to them, baptism bestows regenerating grace, as it confers the first spiritual grace, which blots out all guilt and punishment. The grace of confirmation is strengthening, and augmentative of the grace of regeneration. In the eucharist the sanctifying grace nourishes spiritual life, and unites man to God by fervent acts of virtue. The grace of penance repairs the soul by a kind of spiritual healing and resuscitation. Extreme unction is more especially sanative of the soul. The grace of orders is ministrative; and that of matrimony unites man and wife, and restrains concupiscence.*

The foregoing order of sacramental graces has the advantage of a regular systematic arrangement. It will, however, not fail to occur to those who are versed in the holy Scriptures, that the arrangement is altogether an artificial one; and although it may captivate and lead the ignorant astray, such distinctions are not to be found in Scripture, and the scheme is grossly at variance with those unsophisticated doctrines of the Gospel, which teach repentance toward God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ, as the means of regeneration, and point us to the sanctifying influences of the Spirit by which men are purified, and to a life of active faith by which they show forth the praises of him who hath called them out of darkness into light. But the blight of Popery is, that it cannot allow that any man should receive immediately from God, in the use of divinely-appointed means, the remission of sins, and grace to help in time of need, unless such blessings be communicated through the Clergy, and in such a manner as to place the Priests in the stead of God, by considering them the sole and authorized dispensers of his grace.

(3.) The sacraments distinguished numerically, as they express it, such as two baptisms, produce equal grace in persons equally well disposed, and unequal grace in subjects unequally disposed. But the sacraments specifically considered, as baptism and the eucharist, produce unequal graces. So the Council of Trent says that "each one receives, by baptism, justice, or righteousness, or justification, according to his own proper disposition." The Council also declares: "Whoever shall affirm that these seven sacraments are in such sense equal, that no one of them is in any respect more honourable than another; let him be accursed." *

This doctrine does not appear consistent with another point of their divinity already considered, namely, that the ministrations of a wicked Priest, are as valid and as efficient as those of a pious man!

(4.) It is a question with them respecting the grace, and the manner of its communication, which is conferred on those who receive the sacraments only by desire. The Council of Trent teaches that they may be received in this manner, and produce proper fruits in those who are rightly disposed; while several Divines maintain, that sacraments thus received do not impress a character; that they do not confer grace ex opere operato, by their own power, but only ex opere operantis, in consequence of the good disposition of the receiver.† ["As regards the use of this holy sacrament, our Fathers have rightly and wisely distinguished three ways of receiving it. They have taught that some receive it only sacramentally, as sinners; others receive it only spiritually, namely, those who, eating with desire the heavenly bread presented to them, enjoy its fruit and use, through lively faith working by charity. A third class receive it both sacramentally and spiritually: these are those who so examine and prepare themselves beforehand, that they come to this divine table adorned with the nuptial garment." ‡]

3. The manner in which the sacraments confer grace.

(1.) They say the sacraments not only signify, but also contain and confer grace, as instruments of God's appointment. As to the manner, however, in which this is done, much dispute has existed in the Church of Rome. Some contend that the sacraments confer grace ex opere operato, while others maintain that they produce grace ex opere operantis. It is also much disputed whether the sacraments operate physically or morally. Some explanation of the foregoing technical terms may be proper, as they are very evasive indices of thought when considered in their detached form.

dam per se: quia per accidens possunt conferre gratiam primam: quia omnia sacramenta significant et conferunt gratiam non ponentibus obicem; atqui dum quis, v. g., in peccato mortali existens, cujus inculpabiliter conscientiam non habet, accedit ad sacramentum eucharistiæ, non videtur ponere obicem: ergo talis tunc recipit gratiam, non secundam, cum sit in statu peccati mortalis: ergo primam. Da aliquos casus in quibus sacramentum vivorum confert per accidens gratiam primam. Casus esse potest jam mox dictus, dum quis bona fide suscipit eucharistiam, invincibiliter aut saltem citra gravem culpam ignorans, se esse in statu peccati mortalis: modo tunc simul adsit imperfectæ contritionis motus, qui cum sacramento pœnitentiæ justificaret. Eadem est ratio de aliis sacramentis vivorum; ordinis scilicet et matrimonii. Hæc interim specialiter vera sunt de sacramento extremæ unctionis: quia hoc tanquam completivum sacramenti pœnitentiæ directius quam alia sacramenta vivorum remittere potest peccata, prout patet ex verbis Epist. Jacobi: 'Si in peccatis sit, remittentur ei.'"—Dens Theologia, tom. v., De Sacram., No. 21, p. 94.]

[* "In BAPTISMO est gratia habitualis, quatenus est regenerativa, et ut tribuit homini primum esse spirituale, delensque omnem culpam et pœnam. In sacramento CONFIRMATIONIS gratia habitualis, seu ejus augmentum, est roborativa et augmentativa regenerationis. In EUCHARISTIA gratia sanctificans est nutritiva vitæ spiritualis, et unitiva hominis cum Deo per ferventiores virtutum actus. Sacramenti PŒNITENTIÆ gratia habitualis est reparativa per modum spiritualis sanationis et resuscitationis. EXTREMÆ UNCTIONIS gratia habitualis est plenius sanativa animæ. Sacramenti ORDINIS habitualis gratia est in ordine ad functiones sacras ex officio et rite peragendas. Denique sacramenti MATRIMONII gratia habitualis est unitiva animorum, et refrœnativa concupiscentiæ carnis."—Idem, Theol., tom. v., No. 22, pp. 96, 97.]

[* "Si quis dixerit, hæc septem sacramenta ita esse inter se paria, ut nulla ratione aliud sit alio dignius; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid., sess. vii., can. 3.]

[† "Sacramenta imprimentia characterem, solo voto suscepta, characterem non operari: alias enim catechumenus per contritionem perfectam cum voto baptismi justificatus, postmodum non deberet nec posset baptizari; cum ratione characteris impressi sacramentum sit initerabile. Deinde sacramenta tantum in voto suscepta non conferunt quoque gratiam illam sanctificantem virtutes et dona, tanquam effectus ex opere operato."—Dens Theol., tom. v., No. 24, p. 99.]

[‡ "Quoad ad usum autem recte et sapienter patres nostri tres rationes hoc sanctum sacramentum accipiendi distinxerunt. Quosdam enim docuerunt sacramentaliter dumtaxat id sumere, ut peccatores: alios tantum spiritualiter, illos nimirum, qui voto propositum illum cœlestem panem edentes, fide viva, quæ per dilectionem operatur, fructum ejus et utilitatem sentiunt. Tertios porro sacramentaliter simul et spiritualiter; hi autem sunt qui ita se prius probant et instruunt, ut vestem nuptialem induti ad divinam hanc mensam accedant."—Conc. Trid., sess. xiii., cap. viii.]

Dens says that it is one thing to cause grace ex opere operantis, another, ex opere operato, and yet another, as conditio sine qua non.* He also adds, it is one thing to confer grace ex opere operato physically, another, only morally.

"To cause grace ex opere operantis, is to cause it from the merit of the operator, whether Minister or receiver, or from the peculiar value of the work as it proceeds from the operator, that is, from the exemplary devotion of the Minister.

"To cause grace ex opere operato, is to cause it, not from the merits of the Minister or the receiver, but from the power and influence of the work or sacramental action, which is, by divine institution, employed in effecting in the receiver (provided every hinderance be out of the way) that which it signifies" †

Bailly says: "To produce grace ex opere operato, is to confer it by the power of the external act instituted by Christ, provided there is no hinderance. But to produce grace ex opere operantis, is to confer it on account of the merit and dispositions of the receiver or Minister."‡

Ferraris, on the word sacramentum, defines these difficult and evasive phrases as follows:—"For the sacraments to cause grace ex opere operato, is to confer it by the power of the sacramental action itself, exhibited to the receiver, considered according to the dignity and efficacy which the action hath from Christ's institution, without any respect or dependence on the merits of him who exercises the action. And it is said ex opere operato, because, on account of the infallible divine promise, the grace is conferred on account of the merits of Christ, and the virtue of his passion, which are now a completed work. On the contrary, to cause grace ex opere operantis, is to confer grace only on account of the merit and disposition of him who exercises such an action; and it is called ex opere operantis, because the grace is conferred on account of the proper merits, devotion, and virtuous acts of the person who ministers or who receives." §

(2.) Of grace conferred by the sacraments, EX OPERE OPERATO.

The Council of Trent declares: "Whoever shall affirm that grace is not conferred by these sacraments of the new law, by their own power, ex opere operato, but that faith in the divine promise is all that is necessary to obtain grace; let him be accursed."* The Catechism says: "In the sacraments exists the power of the Omnipotent, effectuating that which the natural elements cannot of themselves accomplish." † It is not easy to say what the exact sense of the Council of Trent, in the foregoing canon, is. In the sixth it is declared, that "the sacraments confer the grace which they signify on those who place no obstacles in their way." ‡ The seventh canon says that "grace is always conferred by these sacraments, and upon all persons, as far as God is concerned, if they be rightly received;" § but in the sixth canon it is asserted, that the sacraments confer grace by their own power, or ex opere operato. Hence it is really difficult to say what is actually taught by the Church of Rome on this point; nevertheless it is laid down as an article of faith, it is de fide, as their Divines say. The numerous opinions which have been entertained, as well as the hot contentions which have been raised among the theologians on this topic, show that the Council left this article of faith undefined, and couched in such barbarous technical phraseology as her most sapient sons have not been able to explain. This is manifest from the various sentiments and discordant views that are admitted and ranged under another scholastic distinction, and recognised in the words morally and physically. Hence the inquiry,

(3.) Do the sacraments confer grace morally or physically?

This question divided the Doctors of the Church of Rome into two great sects, the Thomists and Scotists, the former of which believed that grace was conferred physically by the sacraments, while the latter maintained that they produced this effect morally. The Thomists were so called after the celebrated Thomas Aquinas, and the Scotists from John Duns, who on account of his country was generally known by the name Duns Scotus, Duns the Scotchman, or the Scot. With the Thomists are to be ranked Dens and others of considerable name; and the Scotists include among their adherents the names of Bonaventura, Richardus, Alensis, Ameolus, Vasquez, Bailly, Collet, Ferraris, &c.

The followers of Thomas Aquinas maintain that "the sacraments possess a physical causality, as the instruments of the divine omnipotence, and truly and properly concur toward the production of their effects in the mind by a supernatural virtue from the principal agent, communicated to and united with it in the manner of a transient action: and also that such a causality is more conformable to the declarations of Scripture, and demonstrates more fully the dignity of the sacrament, and the efficacy of the divine omnipotence and of the merits of Christ. Besides, they say this is also more conformable to the sentiments of Councils and Fathers, who, as they explain

[* "Quod aliud sit causare gratiam 'ex opere operantis,' aliud 'ex opere operato,' et aliud tanquam 'conditio sine qua non.' Aliud est conferre gratiam ex opere operato physice aliud tantum moraliter."—Dens Theol., tom. v., No. 17, p. 89.]

[† "Quid est causare gratiam 'ex opere operantis?' Est causare gratiam ex merito operantis, vel Ministri, vel suscipientis, seu intuitu operis, quatenus egreditur ab operante, v. g., ex singulari devotione Ministri, &c. Quid est causare gratiam 'ex opere operato?' Est causare gratiam, non ex meritis Ministri, vel suscipientis, sed ex vi seu ratione operis, seu actionis sacramentalis, quæ ex divina institutione exercetur, efficiendo in suscipiente (secluso tamen obice) id quod significat."—Idem.]

[‡ "Operari autem gratiam ex opere operato, ut loquitur Concilium Trident., est eam conferre vi operis externi a Christo instituti, modo nullus sit obex. Operari autem ex opere operantis est eam conferre ex merito et dispositionibus suscipientis aut Ministri."—Bailly, Theol., tom. iii., De Sacram., cap. v., art. i., p. 248.]

[§ "Sacramenta autem causare gratiam ex opere operato est conferre gratiam ex vi ipsius actionis sacramentalis, exhibitæ suscipienti, consideratæ scilicet secundum dignitatem et efficaciam quam habet ex institutione facta a Christo, sine ullo respectu vel dependentia ad merita vel dignitatem illius qui eam actionem exercet. Et dicitur ex opere operato, quia ob infallibilem promissionem divinam ea gratia confertur ex meritis Christi, ac virtute passionis suæ, quæ jam sunt opus operatum. E contra causare gratiam ex opere operantis est solum ratione meriti et dispositionis illius, qui talem actionem exercet, conferre gratiam; et dicitur ex opere operantis, quia ea gratia confertur propter propria merita, devotionem actusque virtuosos ipsius hominis operantis, sive ut Ministri, sive ut suscipientis."—L. Ferraris, Prompta Biblioth., in Sacrament., art. ii., sect. 9.]

[* "Si quis dixerit, per ipsa novæ legis sacramenta ex opere operato non conferri gratiam, sed solam fidem divinæ permissionis ad gratiam consequendam sufficere; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid., sess. vii., can. 8.]

[† "Omnipotentis Dei virtutem in sacramentis inesse, qua id efficiant, quod sua vi res ipsæ naturales præstare non possunt."—Cat. Conc. Trid., pars ii., De Sacramentis, sect. 26.]

[‡ "Si quis dixerit, sacramenta novæ legis non continere gratiam, quam significant, aut gratiam ipsam non ponentibus obicem non conferre, &c.; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid., sess. vii., can. 6.]

[§ "Si quis dixerit, non dari gratiam per hujusmodi sacramenta semper, et omnibus quantum est ex parte Dei, etiam si rite ea suscipiant, sed aliquando, et aliquibus; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid., sess. vii., can. 7.]

the causality of the sacraments, use various similitudes, which undoubtedly designate a causality more than moral."*

The Scotists teach that "the sacraments do not cause grace physically, but morally; that is, they do not produce grace as physical causes do, but as moral causes; inasmuch as they efficaciously move God to produce the grace which they signify, and which God himself promises infallibly to give, as often as they are rightly administered and worthily received.....The reason is, because the mode of operation follows the mode of existence. But the sacraments, as sacraments, are something moral, depending solely on the institution of Christ, from which, and from the merits of Christ, they possess their entire force and efficacy of causation; so that their manner of operation is not physical, but moral," &c.†

Such are the jarring sentiments among Roman Catholic Divines. It will, however, be unnecessary for us to consider the arguments which each party employs, as the bare recital of their doctrines will be sufficient to convince any careful observer of their futility. A few remarks, however, may be made.

The Scriptures ascribe our justification to faith. (Rom. i. 17; iii. 28; iv. 3; x. 10; John iii. 18.) These do not agree with the Romish doctrine concerning the sacraments, to which the Papists ascribe an operation which makes faith void. Besides, instead of directing fallen man immediately to God through Christ, they introduce the sacraments, whether acting morally or physically, which are either put in the place of the Redeemer, or made blasphemously to interfere with the renewing and sanctifying influences of the Spirit of God.

CHARACTER, or the secondary effect of the sacraments.

In considering this topic we shall, First, Give the Roman Catholic definition of the thing. Secondly, Consider their proofs for its existence. Thirdly, Advert to the three sacraments which are said to confer it. Fourthly, Notice several questions concerning it. And, Lastly, Examine objections to it.

4. Definition and nature of character. There are various definitions given by the Divines. Ferraris defines it thus: "Character is a spiritual, indelible sign, impressed on the soul on the reception of an initerable sacrament, signifying a certain spiritual power acquired by that sacrament."* Bailly defines it to be "a spiritual and indelible sign, impressed on the soul, by which it happens that the sacraments which impress this character cannot be repeated."†

The Councils of Florence and of Trent give the following definitions of sacramental character. The latter says: "Whoever shall affirm that a character, that is, a certain spiritual and indelible mark, is not impressed on the soul by the three sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and orders, for which reason they cannot be reiterated; let him be accursed."‡ The Council of Florence says: "Among these sacraments there are three, baptism, confirmation, and orders, which impress on the soul a character, that is, a certain spiritual indelible sign, which distinguishes them from others; whence in the same person they are not reiterated. The other four do not impress a character, and admit of reiteration."§

Among Roman Catholic theologians there is a great variety of opinion respecting the nature of this character, mark, or sign. Durandus‖ teaches that it is a mere extrinsic denomination. Scotus calls it a real relation others call it a patible quality; others a habit. The Council of Trent calls it a spiritual indelible sign impressed on the mind; and as this decision is infallible, it must for ever settle the question among Roman Catholics.

Character does not consist, says Collet, in the initerability of a sacrament; because character, from which initerability flows, is one thing, and initerability, which flows from character, is another thing.¶ He furthermore states that character is not a mere extrinsic denomination, in contradiction to Durandus, because, (1.) It is a mark indelibly fixed in the mind, affecting it inwardly, which cannot be said of any thing extrinsic. (2.) As character is indelible, because it is preserved even in the reprobate, who have no extrinsic deputation or mark. (3.) The Council of Trent places it in the soul.

Ferraris says, that character is not a pure relation of [* "Salva autem fide, inter Catholicos disputatur, an sacramenta novæ legis conferant suos effectus physicè, an tantum moraliter. Quidam tenent causalitatem physicam, et sese explicant, quod sacramenta, tanquam divinæ omnipotentiæ instrumenta, vere et realiter concurrant ad productionem effectuum in anima, per virtutem supernaturalem a principali agente sibi communicatam, et per modum actionis transeuntis sibi unitam."—(Dens Theologia, tom. v., No. 17.) "Quia talis causalitas conformior est locutionibus sacræ Scripturæ numero superiori allegatis; magisque demonstrat sacramentorum dignitatem et efficaciam omnipotentiæ divinæ ac meritorum Christi. Deinde conformior est locutionibus Conciliorum et SS. Patrum, qui, ut sacramentorum novæ legis causalitatem explicent, variis utuntur similitudinibus, quæ certo causalitatem plus quam moralem designant."—Dens Theologia, tom. v., De Sac., No. 19, p. 92.]

[† "Sacramenta non causant gratiam physice, sed moraliter; id est, sacramenta non producunt gratiam ut causæ physicæ, sed ut causæ morales, quatenus efficaciter movent Deum ad producendam gratiam, quam significant et quam ipsemet Deus statuit dare infallibiliter, quotiescumque rite conficerentur, et digne sumerentur. (Sic Scotus in 4 dist., 1 quæst., 3 et 5, cum omnibus suis Scotistis, S. Bonaventura, Richardus, Alensis, Aureolus, Vasquez, et plurimi alii contra Thomistas et alios.) Et ratio est, quia modus operandi sequitur modum essendi; sacramenta autem ut sacramenta sunt quid morale, cum dependeat solum ex institutione Christi, a qua et meritis ejusdem Christi Domini totam suam vim atque efficaciam causandi habent, adeoque et illorum modus operandi erit moralis, et non physicus."—L. Ferraris, Prompta Biblioth., in Sac., art. ii., sect. 32.]

* "Character est signum spirituale indelebile animæ impressum in susceptione sacramenti initerabilis, significans potestatem quamdam spiritualem eo sacramento acquisitam."—L. Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, in Sacramentum, art. ii., sect. 35.

[† "Character sacramentalis definitur signum spirituale et indelebile, in anima impressum, quo fit ut sacramenta quæ hunc characterem imprimunt iterari non possint."—Bailly Theolog., tom. iii., De Sacram., cap. v., art. v., p. 264.]

[‡ "Si quis dixerit, in tribus sacramentis, baptismo scilicet, confirmatione, et ordine, non imprimi characterem in anima, hoc est, signum quoddam spirituale, et indelebile, unde ea iterari non possunt; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid., sess. vii., can. 9.]

§ "Inter hæc sacramenta tria sunt, baptismus, confirmatio, et ordo, quæ characterem, id est, spirituale quoddam signum a ceteris distinctivum, imprimunt in anima indelebile; unde in eadem persona non reiterantur; reliqua vero quatuor characterem non imprimunt, et reiterationem admittunt."—Conc. Floren., sess. ultim., in Decret. Eugen. IV., sect. v.; Labbe, Concilia, tom. xiii., p. 535. See also Ferraris, in Sacramentum, art. ii., sect. 5.

‖ Dist. iv., quest. iv.

[¶ "Character non consistit in sacramenti initerabilitate. Ergo aliud est character unde fluit initerabilitas; aliud initerabilitas, quæ fluit e charactere. Character non est mera denominatio extrinseca, est contra Durandum. Character est signum animæ indelebiliter impressum, eamque proin afficiens interius: atqui denominatio pure extrinseca non afficit mentem interius; quia alioqui non esset extrinseca. Character adeo indelebilis est, ut in ipsis etiam reprobis perseveret: atqui nulli in reprobis manet deputatio extrinseca ad sacras functiones. Definiit Synodus Trid. contra novatores characterem esse aliquid animæ impressum."—Collet, Inst. Theol., tom iv., De Sacramentis, cap. v., art. ii., sect. ii., con. ii.]

[ "Character non est pura relatio rationis, aut denominatio extrinseca. Character neque est relatio realis, sed entitas absoluta. Character sacramentalis non subjectatur in anima sub ratione for-reason, or an extrinsic denomination. Neither is it a real relation; but an absolute entity. It is not placed in the mind under any formal reason of the soul. It is therefore under the formal reason of the will. The Thomists, in opposition to the opinion of the Scotists, who place it in the will, maintain that it hath its seat in the intellect. Ferraris, who takes the side of the Scotists here, argues, "that the sign of obligation ought to be placed in that power on which the obligation is laid; but the obligation of the soul to Christ, which is contracted by baptism, &c., is placed in the will, and not in the intellect; when the intellect, as a necessary power, and determined to one thing, is not capable of obeying precept or taking obligation; then because character ought to be placed in that power which moves all the other powers, and moves to the acts for which all the sacraments were conferred, and this power must be the will, the supreme governor of all the other powers."*

Again: "Character," says Collet, "is a real entity, to which is annexed a multiplex relation. It is a form or mark indelibly impressed, sealing the obligation of keeping the law, assimilating the faithful to one another who are impressed with the same mark, and remaining on the glorified as an ornament. These things can only apply to a real entity, and not to a pure relation, the whole power of which is to refer one thing to another.....This character, as a permanent quality, affecting properly its subject, and determining it to something supernatural, can be reduced to a habit."†

Thus some place character in an external denomination, others in a real relationship; some in an absolute entity, and others in the initerability of the sacrament itself.

Protestants allow and maintain that baptism may be distinguished from the eucharist in being administered to the same person only once, whereas the eucharist may be administered often; the reason for this is not any such character as that which Roman Catholics maintain, but may be found in the divine institution, and in the proper nature and end of the sacraments themselves.

Besides, though we are ready to acknowledge that the internal grace of Christ, which might be designated, in a sober sense, a spiritual mark or character impressed on the soul, may also be conferred by the Spirit of God, in the administration of the sacraments, nevertheless, we believe this spiritual energy does not accompany one sacrament to the exclusion of the other.

Bellarmine‡ supports the eight following propositions in treating on character:—(1.) That it is a certain spiritual mark impressed on the soul in some sacraments. (2.) It is not a relation, but an absolute quality. (3.) It hath three offices; namely, it fits us for divine worship, it conforms us to Christ, and distinguishes us from others. (4.) It exists in the soul only as in its subject. (5.) It is indelible. (6.) It is impressed only in three sacraments. (7.) The sacraments of the old law did not impress a character. (8.) No character was created in Christ.

5. Let us now see how Roman Catholics prove their doctrine of character. It is placed among their articles of faith; and no proof but that of direct, unequivocal Scripture authority will avail. We are told that it is insinuated in the Scriptures, confirmed by the Fathers, defined and established by the Councils,* and therefore ought to be admitted as a dogma, or article of faith. We proceed in the examination of their authorities.

(1.) Scripture proofs. The following texts are quoted to support the doctrine of the indelible character: "Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts." (2 Cor. i. 21, 22.) "In whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise." (Eph. i. 13, &c.)

Some quote similar texts to prove, that, in baptism and confirmation this character is impressed: but in the sacrament of orders, their Divines are utterly unable to establish the doctrine on any authority whatever.

(2.) Tradition. The doctrine which was insinuated in Scripture is said to be confirmed by tradition, as being primarily of more authority than Scripture itself. So Liebermann,† declaring that Scripture was not wanting which could (commode) conveniently be employed to prove the point, says, "accedente imprimis traditionis auctoritate," the authority of tradition first of all agreeing. And, after quoting Eph. i. 13, iv. 30, and 2 Cor. i. 21, also observes: "Verum gravissimum pondus, ut diximus, in Ecclesiæ traditione est:" But the greatest weight, as we have said, is in the tradition of the Church. Much might be stated here, to show that the authority from the ancient Fathers for the Popish indelible character is as slight as that which can be derived from Scripture.‡ The sentiment of Liebermann is that of the Church, though a different one is sometimes taught by other Divines.

(3.) The Councils. The testimony of these has been given already in our quotations from the decisions of Trent and Florence. To Romanists they are considered infallible: to Protestants they go for nothing.

6. Baptism, confirmation, and orders alone are said to impress a character, in consequence of which they cannot be repeated. Reasons for this are given by Ferraris: "(1.) The reason is not a priori, but the will of Christ the Lord so instituting, which sufficiently appears to us mali animæ. Character igitur subjectatur in anima sub ratione formali voluntatis."—Ferraris, Prompt. Biblioth. Sacramentum, art. ii., sect. 36—38.]

[* "In ea potentia poni debet signum obligationis, in qua ponitur obligatio; obligatio autem animæ ad Christum, quæ contrahitur per baptismum, &c., ponitur in voluntate, et non in intellectu; cum intellectus, utpote potentia necessaria et ad unum determinata, non sit capax præcepti vel obligationis, adeoque, &c. Tum quia character debet poni in illa potentia, quæ omnes alias potentias movet et dirigit ad actiones, ad quas conferuntur sacramenta; hoc autem competit voluntati, instar reginæ omnibus potentiis imperanti, adeoque," &c.—Ferraris, ut supra.]

[† "Character est ens reale, cui tamen annexa est multiplex relatio. Character concipitur tanquam forma indelebiliter impressa, sigillans obligationem servandæ legis, fideles fidelibus eadem nota insignitis assimilans, in beatis remanens ad ornatum, &c. Atqui hæc enti reali competunt, non autem puræ relationi, cujus totum munus est unum ad aliud referre. Cæterum character, utpote qualitas permanens, subjectum suum bene afficiens, illudque ad aliquod supernaturale determinans, revocare potest ad habitum."—Collet, Inst. Theol., tom. iv., ut supra.]

[‡ "Prima. Signum aliquod spirituale animæ imprimitur in quibusdam sacramentis, quod character appellatur. Secunda. Character non est relatio, sed absoluta qualitas. Tertia. Character tria habet officia, aptum facere ad cultum divinum, configurare Christo, et distinguere ab illis. Quarta. Character sacramentalis in sola anima est, tanquam in subjecto. Quinta. Character indelebilis est. Sexta. Tria solum sacramenta imprimunt characterem; baptismus, confirmatio, ordo. Septima. Nec circumcisio, nec ullum sacramentum veteris legis imprimebat characterem in anima. Octava. Nullus in Christo character fuit creatus."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iii., De Sac., lib. ii., cap. xix. Fol. edit. Paris, 1608.] See Gerhard Loci Theolog., De Sacramentis, tom. iv., p. 679, et seq. Jenæ, 1614.

* "Illud dogma admitti debet, quod et in Scripturis insinuatum, et confirmatum a traditione, tandem definitum est ab Ecclesia."—Collet, De Sacram., c. v., art ii.

† Inst. Theol., tom. iv., lib. vi., pars i., cap. iv., art. ii., prop. 1.

‡ See their quotations in Collet, Bailly, and Liebermann.

from perpetual tradition and authority of the Church. But the reason of congruity is taken from Scotus, in 4, dist. 6, quæst. 10, because, as in civil polity, three grades only are determined and special: First, when a man is admitted into the family of the Prince. Secondly, when he is constituted a soldier to defend the republic. Thirdly, when he is made an officer of the Prince. So there are only three grades, determined and special, impressing dignity or character, found in ecclesiastical polity. The first, when any one is received into the family of Christ, which is in baptism. The second, when he becomes a soldier of Christ, for the defence of the Christian faith, which is in confirmation. The third, when any one is constituted a leader, as one of the magistracy of Christ, and dispenser of the mysteries of God, which is in orders."* Here we have an instance of an article of faith attempted to be established, not by the authority of Scripture, but by tradition, and the opinion of Scotus.

(2.) They inform us, these sacraments cannot be reiterated. That orders is repeated in the Roman Church, is plain from their numerous and successive ordinations employed in the different grades of ministerial office, as recognised by their Church. The principal reasons why baptism is not to be repeated are the two following:—first, because baptism conferred by heretics is valid; and, secondly, because the character is impressed as fixed and indelible, and therefore the sacrament needs no repetition. But the Protestants argue, that it is not to be repeated because Christ does not command it, the nature of baptism does not need it, and its end would not be promoted by such reiteration.

(3.) They teach, that if the sacraments which cannot be iterated were received with an obstacle, they produce grace when the obstacle is removed. The Council of Trent is referred to in support of this view.

7. Several questions concerning character have been proposed and answered by the theologians, some of which will tend to explain still farther the doctrine under consideration.

"Question 2. Whether a character is impressed on him who, without right dispositions, receives a sacrament?—Answer, affirmatively. For we will show in the sequel that sacraments conferred in heresy are ratified and not to be repeated, although they do not confer the Holy Spirit."

"Question 3. How does it happen that character may be received by the wicked, although they do not receive grace; and why does it inhere permanently in the mind, although sanctifying grace may be lost?—Answer to the first. This can be done, because character does not depend on the dispositions of the receivers, like grace; so it can be reckoned among those graces gratuitously given which can be bestowed on wicked men.—Answer to the second. Grace can be lost, because it depends on free-will, which is flexible toward evil, and because it hath something contrary to itself, namely, sin, by which it is expelled. But character depends on the will of God, who instituted it that it should be permanent in the mind, and has nothing contrary by which it can be blotted out."

"Question 4. Whether character can be blotted out?—Answer 1. It can be erased by God, when it was instituted by him. 2. Especially in this life it cannot be erased, as is plain from what has been said. 3. Nor can it be erased after this life, but it is to continue to the glory of the good and the ignominy of the wicked."*

8. Objections against the doctrine of character.

(1.) Roman Catholics cannot explain what character is, nor why there are only three sacraments which produce that effect, nor from whence that property of character arises which, as they assert, cannot be erased.

(2.) They argue in a circle: they say that character is impressed by some of the sacraments, because these cannot be reiterated; and that they cannot be reiterated, because they produce character.

(3.) The ancient Doctors of the Church did not understand by the term character that which the Council of Trent calls by that name. Hence among the Divines of Rome there is great discrepancy in opinion; they are also equally at variance with the Fathers. There are jarring sentiments among their Doctors respecting character itself, in regard to what pertains thereto, as we have already observed. But as the Council of Trent made this point an article of faith, the opinion of the ancient Doctors must be made to agree with this dogma; and the present race of Divines are not allowed to teach any thing different from the infallible decisions of that Council. Hence Bailly, after mentioning that the sentiment of Durandus was unsound, says, that "after the Council of Trent, it was not lawful to defend that sentiment."†

X. The ceremonies and sacramentals of the sacraments.

1. We proceed to take into consideration the ceremonies which are connected with the sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church, as furnished by Bailly, Dens, and Collet, their acknowledged theologians, in their concluding chapters on the seven sacraments.

"By ceremonies here," says Bailly, "are to be understood the external acts of religion, which were instituted by Christ, his Apostles, or the Church, for the honour ["Quæres, 2. Utrum character imprimatur in eo qui sine debitis dispositionibus sacramentum suscipit?

[* "Ratio a priori non est, nisi voluntas Christi Domini ita instituentis, quæ nobis sufficienter constat ex perpetua traditione et auctoritate Ecclesiæ. Ratio autem congruentiæ desumitur, ex Scoto in 4, dist. 6, quæst. 10, quia sicut in politia civili, tres tantum sunt gradus determinati et speciales: Primus, scilicet, dum admittitur quis in familiam Principis. Secundus, cum constituitur miles ad defendendam rempublicam. Tertius, dum constituitur officialis Principis. Ita tres solum gradus determinati et speciales, adeoque dignitatem aut characterem imprimentes, reperiuntur in politia ecclesiastica. Primus scilicet, dum quis recipitur in familiam Christi, quod fit in baptismo. Secundus, dum fit Christi miles ad defensionem fidei Christianæ, quod fit in confirmatione. Tertius, dum constituitur dux, aut unus ex magistratu familiæ Christi, et dispensator mysteriorum Dei, quod fit in ordine."—Ferraris, Prompt. Biblioth. Sacrament., art. ii., sec. 34.]

["R. affirmative. Ostendemus enim in decursu rata esse nec iterari debere sacramenta in hæresi collata, quamvis non conferant Spiritum Sanctum.

["Quæres, 3. Quomodo fieri possit ut character ab impiis recipiatur, licet ii gratiam non suscipiant; et cur in anima permaneter inhæreat, licet gratia sanctificans amittatur?

["R. ad I. Illud fieri, quia character non pendet a dispositionibus suscipientium, sicut gratia; ideoque recenseri debet inter gratias gratis datas quæ scelestis viris concedi possunt.

["R. ad II. Gratiam amitti posse, quia pendet a libero arbitrio, quod ad malum flexibile est, et quia habet aliquid sibi contrarium, nempe peccatum, quo expellitur. Character vero pendet a voluntate Dei, qui eum instituit ut esset in anima permanens, nihilque habet contrarium quo deleatur.

["Quæres, 4. Utrum character possit deleri?

["R. 1. Eum posse a Deo deleri, cum ab eo fuerit institutus. 2. Saltem in hac vita eum non esse delendum, ut constat ex jam dictis. 3. Nec illum post hanc vitam deletum iri, sed perseveraturum ad gloriam bonorum et malorum ignominiam."—Bailly, Theologia, tom. iii.; De Sacramentis, c. v., art. v., p. 268.]

† Post Concilium Tridentinum, non licet eam sententiam defendere.—Idem, p. 267.

of God, reverence of the sacraments, and to excite the piety of the people. If they are referred to the sacraments, they are called 'sacramental rites.' If they are referred to the worship of God in general, and ordained to the sanctification of man without a sacrament, as prayer in consecrated churches, blessed bread, &c., they are called 'sacramentals,' because they have a kind of likeness to the sacraments." *

Their theologians have been accustomed to divide their sacramentals into six, comprehended in the following :—

"Orans, tinctus, edens, confessus, dans, benedicens."

This barbarous and inelegant verse may be translated as follows : "Praying, aspersed, eating, confessed, giving, blessing."

By prayer is meant the daily supplications of the faithful, especially those contained in the Lord's Prayer. By aspersion is understood the sprinkling of holy water. Eating alludes to the blessed bread, which is also called eulogy by the Divines. The confession refers to the public one which is made at the eucharist, or to that at the beginning of the mass. The word dans, "giving," denotes the distribution of alms. The term blessing expresses the blessing of the Bishop, or consecrated Abbot. They maintain that the Church has power to institute new ceremonies, and consequently to annul or change those already in use. The Latin tongue is also made use of in administering their sacraments, none other being allowed.

2. The use of ceremonies, in the estimation of Romanists, is very great. Their Divines teach that they contribute to the dignity and reverence of the sacraments, and that they promote the instruction and devotional habits of the people. All this might pass with little cause for objection; but their employment leads to superstitious purposes, and they are put in the place of charms and incantations. Take the following testimony of Dens, who inculcates nothing more than what all teach on this topic. Speaking of the use of forms and ceremonies, he says: "They are calculated to repress the power of the devil, lest he should prevent the sacramental effect, or hinder the recipient from obtaining the full benefit of the institution. This result is specially accomplished when the Minister performs those rites with great devotion and fervour of spirit, particularly in the prayers and benedictions." †

3. The effects of sacramentals are numerous. We give the following from Bailly :—"What are the effects of sacramentals ?—Answer. (1.) They do not confer sanctifying grace ex opere operato ; for this is peculiar to the sacraments alone. (2.) Ex opere operantis, they remit venial sins, and produce other effects, both spiritual and corporeal, even actual graces, such as remission of temporal punishment, restraining temptations, producing health. (3.) They can also ex opere operantis remit mortal sins and bring sanctifying grace, but mediately only, as, by virtue of the prayers of the Church, they furnish aid by which acts of faith and charity are called forth. Such acts of faith immediately dispose to the reception of justice, whether in a sacrament or without the sacrament. (4.) Nevertheless, they do not infallibly produce these effects when the divine promise does not ensure them ; for God can deprive the sacramentals of these effects, if his divine wisdom should judge that to be just and right." * The reader will at once perceive that the foregoing sentiments, almost universally held by the Clergy of the Church of Rome, and received by the laity with implicit confidence, present their ceremonies and sacramentals in the light of what are little better than charms or spells.

4. The use of the Latin language in the administration of the sacraments presents also no small objection to the Church of Rome. This is plainly contrary to Scripture, (1 Cor. xiv.,) which teaches that religious instructions are to be communicated in such a manner as to be understood by the hearers. The scriptural reason too, that the edification of the people is one great object contemplated in all devotional services, proves that the use of the Latin tongue in such ministrations cannot be the vehicle of instruction. The consequence is, that those who depend upon this mode of information remain fearfully ignorant of the "first principles of the doctrine of Christ." †

XI. Objections against the Roman Catholic views of the sacraments. These, in a considerable degree, have been produced : we shall therefore content ourselves with observing :—

1. The Romish doctrines of the sacraments unduly exalt the priesthood. As their administration is the prerogative of that class of men, it is calculated to elevate to an immoderate height their order. This is, however, the leading principle with them. In the New Testament the Ministers of religion are represented as humble, and as the servants of the church. But in the lofty attitude which the Popish hierarchy assumes in the administration of the sacraments in the Church of Rome, they are represented as subordinate deities, and placed in a superhuman relation to their flocks.

2. The doctrine which teaches that the sacraments confer grace, is replete with infinite danger to the soul. Well may the reproof which the Prophet administered to Israel be applied to this Church : "They have forsaken the fountain of living waters, and have hewn out to themselves cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water." Entire reliance on God is weakened, and trust in the arm of flesh is promoted. The Almighty is represented as relying upon man and on ceremonies in the bestowment of his grace, and the people are diverted

[* "Per ceremonias hic intelliguntur actus externi religionis, qui ad Dei honorem, sacramentorum reverentiam et ad pietatem populi, excitandam sive a Christo, sive ab Apostolis, sive ab Ecclesia instituti sunt. Si referantur ad sacramenta, dicuntur ritus sacramentales. Si referantur ad cultum Dei in genere, et ordinentur ad sanctificationem hominis extra sacramentum, ut oratio in ecclesiis consecratis facta, panis benedictus, &c., dicuntur sacramentalia, eo quod similitudinem quandam cum sacramentis habeant."—Bailly Theol., tom. iii. ; De Cerem. Sac., c. viii., p. 316.]

[† "Ad vim dæmonis reprimendam, ne effectum sacramentalem impediat, seu et plenius hic effectus a suscipiente percipiatur, et firmius conservetur. Ad hoc facit, si Minister illos ritus, præcipue in orationibus et benedictionibus consistentes, magna devotione et spiritus fervore peragat."—Dens Theologia, tom. v.; De Sacramentis, No. 48, p. 145.]

[* "Quinam sint sacramentalium effectus? R. 1. Non conferunt gratiam sanctificantem ex opere operato ; hoc enim sacramentis proprium est. 2. Ex opere operantis remittunt peccata venialia, aliosque producunt effectus aut spirituales aut corporeos, ut sunt gratiæ actuales, remissio pœnæ temporalis, tentationum compressio, sanitatis operatio. 3. Possunt etiam ex opere operantis remittere peccata lethifera et producere gratiam sanctificantem, sed mediate tantum, quatenus scilicet virtute orationum Ecclesiæ impetrant auxilia quibus eliciuntur charitatis et contritionis actus, qui ad justitiam recipiendam sive in sacramento, sive extra sacramentum proxime disponunt. 4. Non tamen illos effectus producunt infallibiliter, cum divina non sit ea de re promissio, Deusque possit sacramentalia illis effectibus privare, si divina ejus sapientia illud justum et utile judicaverit."—Bailly Theologia, tom. iii. ; Idem, c. viii., qu. 5.]

[† The practice adopted by the Church of Rome of performing divine service in an unknown tongue, will receive ample consideration in a subsequent part of the work.]

from its source, and are led to depend on human means rather than upon the divine mercy and faithfulness.

3. The doctrine respecting the moral character of the administrator of the sacraments has a most pernicious effect. That men who are habitually and scandalously wicked are tolerated and authorized to administer these ordinances, opens the door to iniquity, and corrupts the fountains of morality. When the leaders of the people may be wicked, and yet valid administrators, their example will not fail soon to affect the laity. For if the Clergy may administer in holy things, and be at the same time flagrantly wicked, the laity are taught that they may receive the sacraments when defiled by sin without much danger to their spiritual interests. Such, we regret to say, is the fact, not in theory merely, but also in practice.

4. The sacraments in the Church of Rome are employed as charms and incantations rather than as useful and appointed means of grace, and as institutions of Christ. They are used as amulets, rather than as signs of grace, or means of obtaining it. The bad effects of which perversion have been manifest in the moral delinquency of numerous members of the Church of Rome.

["The Church of Rome has corrupted the sacraments of divine institution. In the administration of rites, which derive their authority and obligation from the will of Jesus Christ, the supreme Legislator of the Church, it is of the highest importance to ascertain the meaning of his own injunctions; to bring to the interpretation of that meaning, only those principles which his truth supplies; to adhere, as far as existing circumstances allow, to the letter of his commands; and, above all, to consider the spirit and practical design of all his appointments. We are not at liberty to alter and innovate, according to our inclinations and prejudices, when it can be clearly ascertained what was the will and intention of our Lord. And it may be confidently asserted, that all that is essential to the acceptable observance of any sacred rite, may be ascertained from the language of the institute itself, and the inspired record of its observance in the apostolic churches.

["It should also be remembered that the Apostles, the inspired guides of the first churches, have uniformly represented the Christian dispensation as distinguished from the Mosaic economy by the simplicity of its institutions. St. Paul, especially, discovers the greatest anxiety and solicitude on this subject, and employs the language of strong remonstrance and dissuasion, for the very purpose of counteracting the natural tendency of the Jewish and Gentile converts to observe some parts of the abolished ceremonial of the former dispensation. 'After ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain.' 'If ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why are ye subject to ordinances, (touch not; taste not; handle not; which are all to perish with the using;) after the commandments and doctrines of men?' (Gal. iv. 9—11; Col. ii. 20—22.) It is not so much the particular subject of these protests, as the principle involved in them, which, we conceive, deserves our special attention. They are directly opposed to what was characteristic of the legal economy,—its numerous and complicated ceremonies. Whatever local and temporary objects might be accomplished by such ceremonies, their obligation had expired:—another order of things had commenced,—a 'kingdom not of this world,'—a 'pure and undefiled religion,'—an intellectual and spiritual dispensation,—one that was pre-eminently a 'reasonable service,' in all its requirements and institutions.

["The law was composed of shadows, and symbols, and types; but the Gospel exhibits facts and doctrines. It contains, indeed, an explicit account of two ordinances of a symbolical nature; but how contrasted with the minuteness and detail of the Mosaic ceremonies are the accounts of these institutions! There is a generality—a comprehensiveness—a latitude of meaning in the one, that we might expect to find in the institution of rites, designed to be of universal obligation, and every where practicable. Had the language been employed to those minute specifications which distinguished the legal code, it might have suited one particular class or nation; but it might have been incapable of application to the circumstances of other nations. And where the great 'Author of our faith' has made no requisitions, and imposed no ceremonies, shall we bow to human authority, and forsake apostolic precedent?

["When Jesus Christ appointed the eucharist, he commanded his disciples to 'break bread, and eat it, and to drink wine in remembrance of him,' to 'show forth his death till he should come' the second time, to accomplish all the purposes of his mercy; but this sacred rite has been corrupted by the pompous ceremonies and fascinating splendour of the sacrifice of the mass: and hence the awful process of mysterious iniquity, gradually vitiating the simplicity and intention of that institution, till, with senseless adoration, the Church of Rome has taught her children to bow before the corruptible elements of consecrated bread and wine, and to believe that, by their incantations, they have been converted into the very body and blood, soul and divinity, of the incarnate Saviour.

["Two observations shall close this chapter. The first respects the danger of departing from the simplicity of Christian institutions, as they are detailed and enjoined in the New Testament. Every instance of departure involves in it a principle, which prepares the way for still wider deviations. I am aware that some recorded observances were evidently local and temporary, arising out of the state and manners of society at the period of their adoption. But such as were designed to be of universal and perpetual obligation, are every where practicable, and are adapted to the condition and circumstances of the Christian church in all ages. It may be assumed, as an indisputable axiom in scriptural church-polity, that every thing essential to the constitution and administration of the church of Christ, is clearly and intelligibly revealed; and that to impose, by human authority, what is not thus revealed, is an usurpation of the sacred prerogatives of HIM who describes the church as HIS kingdom, and says, 'CALL NO MAN MASTER ON EARTH; ONE IS YOUR MASTER, EVEN CHRIST.'

["The second observation respects the necessity of ascertaining whether or not we possess that 'inward and spiritual grace,' of which the Christian sacraments are the 'outward and visible signs.' It is to be feared that thousands, while they disclaim the corruptions of Popery, retain some portion of its spirit, and indulge in fatal security respecting their spiritual and eternal state, because of their sacramental observances, and their external relation to the Christian church! They have been baptized,—they partake of the Lord's supper,—they go through the circuit of outward services, and they hope all will be 'well with them.' 'Be not deceived!' 'Except a man be born again,—born from above,—born of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.' The administration of rites, even of divine institution, will never, by its own inherent efficacy, purify the moral nature, and render any man 'meet to be a partaker of the heavenly inheritance;' the understanding must be divinely enlightened, the heart renewed, the affections supremely directed to spiritual and heavenly objects, the habits and conduct regulated by the laws of God,—before he can 'enter the kingdom' of glory in the future world, or be, on scriptural principles, a true subject of that kingdom in the present state. Mankind must become 'new creatures in Christ Jesus' before they can enjoy the blessings of the 'great salvation.' 'Neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but—A NEW CREATURE.' What the institutions of the Mosaic economy could never effect, the less splendid and imposing services of the Christian dispensation will not impart by their own efficacy; and to be satisfied with 'bodily service, will profit little!' 'Marvel not that I say unto you, Ye must be born again.' Then will God be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness!"*]

CHAPTER II.

BAPTISM.

I. 1. THE DOCTRINE STATED: 2. Council of Florence: 3. Council of Trent.—II. THE MATTER OF BAPTISM. 1. Division of it into proximate and remote: 2. Chrism or oil used: 3. Directions respecting the matter: 4. The proximate matter: 5. The remote matter: 6. Whether baptism performed by deadly ablution be valid. Dens cited.—III. THE FORM OF BAPTISM.—IV. THE MINISTER OF BAPTISM. Any person, male or female, may baptize.—V. THE SUBJECT OF BAPTISM. 1. The baptism of adults; (1.) They must be baptized voluntarily; (2.) Must have faith; (3.) Must be penitent: 2. Baptism of insane persons: 3. Baptism of children. Roman Catechism quoted: 4. Baptism of abortives: 5. Compulsory baptism; (1.) Children without the consent of their parents; (2.) Also the children of captives; (3.) Of Jews and heretics; (4.) All baptized persons are claimed as members of the Roman Catholic Church, are subject to her authority, and must be compelled to submit thereto. Council of Trent quoted. Benedict XIV. cited. Dens quoted; (5.) All Roman Catholics are bound to believe in, and use compulsion in the promotion of, their religion; (6.) The example of the Church of Rome accords with this theory: 6. The baptism of monsters.—VI. THE NECESSITY OF BAPTISM. 1. They make it necessary to salvation. Council of Trent cited. Roman Catechism quoted. Bishop Hay. Dens: 2. They teach the damnation of all unbaptized infants: 3. Baptism by desire or by martyrdom: 4. Ten arguments against their doctrine on this point.—VII. THE EFFECTS OF BAPTISM. 1. Enumeration of its effects: 2. The fiction or hinderance to baptism: 3. Arguments against their views of the effects of baptism.—VIII. THE CEREMONIES OF BAPTISM. 1. They have many ceremonies: 2. Some precede baptism: 3. Others accompany it: 4. And others follow its administration: 5. The importance which they attach to them: 6. Arguments against them.

I. 1. HAVING treated on the sacraments in general, we now proceed to consider each of them in order; and in the first place BAPTISM, which stands primarily on the list of Roman Catholic sacraments, because the Papacy recognise in it "the origin of spiritual life, and the door of entrance into the Church, and by which the right is acquired of partaking of the other sacraments."* They consider baptism to be a sacrament of regeneration by water in the word, by which its subjects are actually justified and regenerated.

2. The Council of Florence defines and explains baptism as follows:—"Holy baptism possesses the first place among the sacraments, because it is the door of spiritual life: for by it we become members of Christ, and of the body of the Church. And since by the first man death hath entered into the world, we cannot (as saith the truth) enter into the kingdom of heaven, unless we are born again of water and the Holy Spirit. The matter of this sacrament is true natural water; nor is it any difference whether cold or hot. But the form is: 'I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.' Nor do we deny but that also by these words, 'Let this servant of Christ be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' or, 'This person is baptized by my hands, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' true baptism is effected; the principal cause from which baptism hath its virtue being the holy Trinity; and the officiating Minister, if the act is expressed, and exercised by him with the invocation of the holy Trinity, perfects the sacrament. The Minister of this sacrament is a Priest, to whose office it belongs to baptize. But in case of necessity, not only a Priest or Deacon, but also a layman or woman, nay, even a Pagan or heretic, can baptize, while he observes the form of the Church, and intends to do what the Church doeth. The effect of this sacrament is the remission of all original and actual guilt; also of all punishment which is due for any guilt. Besides, to the baptized there is no satisfaction enjoined for past sins; but those who die before they commit any sin arrive immediately in the kingdom of heaven and to the vision of God."†

The following are the canons of the Council of Trent concerning baptism:—

"Canon 1. Whoever shall affirm that the baptism of John had the same virtue as the baptism of Christ; let him be accursed.

"2. Whoever shall affirm that real and natural water is not necessary to baptism, and therefore that those words of our Lord Jesus Christ, 'Unless a man be born again of water and the Holy Ghost,' (John iii. 5,) are to be figuratively interpreted; let him be accursed.

[* "Fletcher's Lectures on the Roman Catholic Religion."]

[* "Est origo vitæ spiritualis, et janua qua in Ecclesiam intratur, et jus ad cætera sacramenta acquiritur."—Dens Theol., tom. v., De Baptismo Proœmium.]

† "Primum omnium sacramentorum locum tenet sanctum baptisma, quod vitæ spiritualis janua est; per ipsum enim membra Christi, ac de corpore efficimur Ecclesiæ. Et cum per primum hominem mors introierit in universos; nisi ex aqua et Spiritu S. renascimur, non possumus (ut inquit veritas) in regnum cœlorum introire. Materia hujus sacramenti est aqua vera et naturalis; nec refert, frigida sit, an calida. Forma autem est: Ego te baptizo in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti. Non tamen negamus, quin et per illa verba, Baptizetur talis servus Christi in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, vel, Baptizatur manibus meis talis, in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, verum perficiatur baptisma: quoniam cum principalis causa, ex qua baptismus virtutem habet, sit SS. Trinitas, instrumentalis autem sit Minister, qui tradit exterius sacramentum si exprimitur actus, qui per ipsum exercetur Ministrum, cum SS. Trinitas invocatione, perficitur sacramentum. Minister hujus sacramenti est Sacerdos, cui ex officio competit baptizare. In causa [casu?] autem necessitatis non solum Sacerdos vel Diaconus sed etiam laicus vel mulier, imo etiam Paganus et hæreticus, baptizare potest, dummodo formam servet Ecclesiæ, et facere intendat quod facit Ecclesia. Hujus sacramenti effectus est remissio omnis culpæ originalis et actualis; omnis quoque pœnæ, quæ pro ipsa culpa debetur. Propterea baptizatis nulla pro peccatis præteritis injungenda est satisfactio; sed morientes antequam culpam aliquam committant, statim ad regnum cœlorum et Dei visionem perveniunt."—Concil. Flor., Decret. Eugenii, P. IV., ad Armenor., Labbe, Concilia, tom. xiii.

"3. Whoever shall affirm that the true doctrine of the sacrament of baptism is not in the Roman Church, which is the mother and mistress of all churches; let him be accursed.

"4. Whoever shall affirm that baptism, when administered by heretics, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, with the intention to do what the Church does, is not true baptism; let him be accursed.

"5. Whoever shall affirm that baptism is indifferent, that is, not necessary to salvation; let him be accursed.

"6. Whoever shall affirm that a baptized person cannot lose grace, even if he wishes to do so, how grievously soever he may sin, unless, indeed, he becomes an infidel; let him be accursed.

"7. Whoever shall affirm that the baptized are by their baptism brought under obligation to faith only, and not to the observance of the whole law of Christ; let him be accursed.

"8. Whoever shall affirm that the baptized are free from all the precepts of holy Church, either written or delivered by tradition, so that they are not obliged to observe them, unless they will submit to them of their own accord; let him be accursed.

"9. Whoever shall affirm that men are so to call to mind the baptism they have received, as to understand that all vows made after baptism are null and void, by virtue of the promise made in that baptism; as if by such vows any injury were done to the faith which they professed, or to their baptism itself; let him be accursed.

"10. Whoever shall affirm that all sins committed after baptism are forgiven or become venial, solely by the remembrance of that baptism, or faith therein; let him be accursed.

"11. Whoever shall affirm that baptism, truly and regularly administered, is to be repeated when a man is brought to repentance, who has denied the faith of Christ, after the manner of the infidels; let him be accursed.

"12. Whoever shall affirm that no one ought to be baptized but at the age at which Christ was baptized, or in the article of death; let him be accursed.

"13. Whoever shall affirm that children are not to be reckoned among the faithful by the reception of baptism, because they do not actually believe; and therefore that they are to be rebaptized when they come to years of discretion; or that, since they cannot personally believe, it is better to omit their baptism than that they should be baptized only in the faith of the Church; let him be accursed.

"14. Whoever shall affirm that, when these baptized children grow up, they are to be asked whether they will confirm the promises made by their godfathers in their name at their baptism; and that, if they say they will not, they are to be left to their own choice, and not to be compelled in the mean time to lead a Christian life by any other punishment than exclusion from the eucharist and the other sacraments, until they repent; let him be accursed." *

* "Canon 1. Si quis dixerit, baptismum Joannis habuisse eamdem vim cum baptismo Christi; anathema sit.

"2. Si quis dixerit, aquam veram et naturalem non esse de necessitate baptismi, atque ideo verba illa Domini nostri Jesu Christi, 'Nisi quis renatus fuerit ex aqua et Spiritu Sancto,' ad metaphoram aliquam detorserit; anathema sit.

"3. Si quis dixerit, in Ecclesia Romana, quæ omnium ecclesiarum mater est, et magistra, non esse veram de baptismi sacramento doctrinam; anathema sit.

"4. Si quis dixerit, baptismum, qui etiam datur ab hæreticis in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, cum intentione faciendi quod facit Ecclesia, non esse verum baptismum; anathema sit.

"5. Si quis dixerit, baptismum liberum esse hoc est, non necessarium ad salutem; anathema sit.

"6. Si quis dixerit, baptizatum non posse, etiamsi velit, gratiam amittere, quantumcumque peccet, nisi nolit credere; anathema sit.

"7. Si quis dixerit, baptizatos per baptismum ipsum, solius tantum fidei debitores fieri, non autem universæ legis Christi servandæ; anathema sit.

"8. Si quis dixerit, baptizatos liberos esse ab omnibus sanctæ Ecclesiæ præceptis, quæ vel scripta vel tradita sunt, ita ut ea observare non teneantur, nisi se sua sponte illis submittere voluerint; anathema sit.

"9. Si quis dixerit, ita revocandos esse homines ad baptismi suscepti memoriam, ut vota omnia, quæ post baptismum fiunt, vi promissionis in baptismo ipso jam factæ, irrita esse intelligant, quasi per ea, et fidei, quam professi sunt, detrahatur, et ipsi baptismo; anathema sit.

"10. Si quis dixerit, peccata omnia, quæ post baptismum fiunt, sola recordatione, et fide suscepti baptismi vel dimitti, vel venialia, fieri; anathema sit.

"11. Si quis dixerit, verum et rite collatum baptismum iterandum esse illi, qui apud infideles fidem Christi negaverit, cum ad pœnitentiam convertitur; anathema sit.

"12. Si quis dixerit, neminem esse baptizandum, nisi ea ætate, qua Christus baptizatus est, vel in ipso mortis articulo; anathema sit.

"13. Si quis dixerit, parvulos, eo quod actum credendi non habent, suscepto baptismo inter fideles computandos non esse, ac propterea, cum ad annos discretionis pervenirent, esse rebaptizandos; aut præstare omitti eorum baptisma, quam eos non actu proprio credentes baptizari in sola fide Ecclesiæ; anathema sit.

"14. Si quis dixerit, hujusmodi parvulos baptizatos, cum adoleverint, interrogandos esse, an ratum habere velint, quod patrini eorum nomine, dum baptizarentur, polliciti sunt; et ubi se nolle responderint, suo esse arbitrio relinquendos, nec alia interim pœna ad Christianam vitam cogendos, nisi ut ab eucharistiæ aliorumque sacramentorum perceptione arceantur, donec resipiscant; anathema sit."—Concil. Trident., sess. vii., De Baptismo.

II. The matter of baptism.

1. The matter of baptism is divided by Divines into the proximate and remote. The remote is that which is employed in the administration of baptism, as water. The proximate is the application of water by way of ablution.

The matter or element is any sort of water, whether sea-water, river-water, rain-water, water from a pond, well, or fountain, turbid or pure; and baptism administered by natural water is valid as to the matter. But baptism is invalid when conferred by mud, wine, milk, oil, or any liquid which hath more of any mixture than of water. In this Romanists and Protestants are agreed.

Some, however, contend that blessed water is necessary, while others say its use is indifferent.

2. But though natural water is necessary to the validity of baptism, and its use is an article of faith, according to the second canon of the Council of Trent, which requires real and natural water as necessary to salvation, yet they have undertaken to add ointment or chrism. The Roman Catechism says,* "Although, in case of necessity, simple water, unmixed with any other ingredient, is sufficient for the matter of baptism; yet when administered in public, with solemn ceremonies, the Catholic Church, guided by apostolic tradition, the more fully to express its efficacy, has uniformly observed the practice of adding holy chrism. And although it may be doubted whether this or that water be genuine, such as the sacrament requires, it can never be matter of doubt that the proper and the only matter of baptism is natural water."† Here it appears from the Catechism

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, translated by Donovan, p. 161.

[† "Illud vero animadvertendum est quamvis aqua simplex, quæ nihil aliud admixtum habet, materia apta sit ad hoc sacramentum and Council, both infallible, that the only matter of baptism is natural water, that real and natural water is necessary to salvation, and that its use is an article of faith; nevertheless the same Council and Catechism teach that the Church has uniformly added chrism or oil, and that this addition to water is such, that water must not ordinarily be used without it, except in cases of necessity, that is, in cases where a layman or woman baptizes, whether Christian or infidel, Pagan or heretic. The authority, too, by which this addition is made to the matter of this sacrament is, not Scripture, but apostolic tradition, or, in other words, superstitious custom. The Ministers of their Church are bound to use blessed water, or water mixed with oil, and blessed on the eve of Pentecost; and he who does otherwise is said to sin grievously.*

3. Dens gives the following directions respecting the matter of baptism:—"(1.) That every minister of baptism, under pain of mortal sin, ought to use certain matter. (2.) If certain matter is wanting, and necessity requires it, he can and ought to use doubtful matter, preferring, however, the less doubtful. (3.) If a child thus baptized with doubtful matter survive, it is to be afterward rebaptized conditionally in certain matter. (4.) But to use matter certainly insufficient (as wine, oil, &c.) is useless and unlawful, whatever necessity urges."†

The same author, in the same No., observes, from the Roman ritual, that baptism, in order not only to be valid, but also lawful, should be administered as follows:—"(1.) Water ought to be used from the baptismal font; and this obligation is certainly of great weight in solemn baptism. (2.) Braunman says the same respecting baptism administered privately; whence a Minister called to baptize in a case of equal necessity ought to bring a flask of water from the sacred font, or he should command it to be brought. (3.) A case of urgent necessity is to be excepted, or when baptism is to be administered by a midwife, &c. (4.) Water of the sacred font ought to be preserved clean, so as not to be mixed with too much chrism, or tinged in any manner: hence a child infected with a contagious disease ought not to be baptized over the font, but to one side of it, by water taken from the font. (5.) If the water of the font is frozen, or too cold, it may be warmed by the hands, or mixed, though in a greater quantity, with warm common water. (6.) If the water of the sacred font be so diminished that a scarcity is feared, other common water may be mixed with it, but in a less quantity. If it be corrupt, or is deficient in any manner, new water may be (ritè) ritually poured in and blessed."*

4. The proximate matter of baptism is the application of the remote matter, or it is the act of ablution of the body. This may be done by immersion, sprinkling, or pouring, according to the doctrine of the Church; and each way is considered valid baptism. But, as a matter of discipline, sprinkling, or rather pouring, is now generally employed in the Roman Church. They use, however, a trine or threefold affusion, pronouncing on the first the name of the Father, at the second the name of the Son, and at the third the name of the Holy Ghost.

5. Concerning the employment of doubtful matter, the quantity of water used, the part of the body with which the water must come in contact, and the baptism of unborn infants, their Divines have delivered many curious doctrines and practices, some of which may be noticed here. The following are some of their distinctions:—(1.) He sins mortally who in solemn baptism uses any other than blessed water from the sacred font. (2.) He sins mortally who, when he can obtain valid, employs other matter, at his own option; because, without urgent necessity, he risks the salvation of an infant. (3.) He commits the mortal sin of sacrilege who uses impure or turbid water without great necessity. (4.) In such case the administrator is bound to use even doubtful matter in order to prevent the eternal damnation of the recipient. (5.) And "in other cases of emergency, when water cannot be poured or ablution be made on the head, or on any other important part of the body, then the infant must and ought to be washed or baptized on any, even the most insignificant part; yea, on the hair of the head, nails, umbilicus, placenta; nay, if the midwife be skilled.....she could pour water on the body of the infant, or in whatever possible manner the body of the dying infant may be touched or washed with two drops of water, or even with one; because every possible method of relief must be employed to rescue the soul of the infant, which is in imminent danger of losing eternal life."† But the instances which Roman Catholic Divines quote as examples of this practice are so grossly conficiendum, quoties scilicet baptismi ministrandi necessitas incidat: tamen ex Apostolorum traditione semper in Catholica Ecclesia observatum esse, ut cum solemnibus ceremoniis baptismus conficitur, sacram etiam chrisma addatur, quo baptismi effectum magis declarari perspicuum est docendus quoque erit populus. Etsi aliquando incertum esse potest, utrum hæc an illa vera aqua sit qualem sacramenti perfectio requirat; hoc tamen pro certo habendum esse, nunquam ex alia materia, quam ex aquæ naturalis liquore, baptismi sacramentum ulla ratione confici posse."—Cat. Conc. Trid., De Bapt. Sac., sect. xi.]

[* "Unum hic addemus, nempe ab iis qui domi, urgente necessitate, baptizant, adhibendam esse aquam benedictam quantum fieri potest. In baptismo solemni, licet id necessarium non sit ad sacramenti validitatem, tenentur Ecclesiæ ministri aquam adhibere chrismate permixtam eodemque anno in pervigilio Paschatis aut Pentecostes benedictam, juxta id Basilii. Lib. de Spiritu S.: Benedicimus aquam baptismatis et oleum unctionis. Qui secus fecerit, graviter peccat, juxta Dianam, Pontasium," &c.—Bailly Theol., tom. iii., De Baptismo, cap. iv., prop. i.]

[† "1. Quemlibet ministrum baptismi sub mortalis [peccati pœna] uti debere materia certa, per se loquendo. 2. Si materia certa desit et necessitas urgeat, potest et debet adhibere materiam dubiam, præeligendo semper minus dubiam. 3. Si proles taliter in materia dubia baptizata postea supervivat, rebaptizanda est sub conditione in materia certa. 4. Uti autem materia certo insufficiente, (ut vino, oleo, &c.,) quæcumque urgeat necessitas, inutile est et illicitum."—Dens Theol., tom. v., De Bapt., No. 4, p. 153.]

[* "1. Debet adhiberi aqua ex fonte baptismali; hæcque obligatio certo est gravis pro baptismo solemni. 2. Idem dicit Braunman de baptismo privatim administrato: unde Minister ad similem necessitatem vocatus lagenulam aquæ de sacro fonte conferat, vel quæri jubeat. 3. Excipitur tamen urgens necessitas, vel si baptismus esset administrandus per obstetricem, &c. 4. Aqua sacri fontis servari debet munda; ideoque non nimium chrismatis misceatur, nec alio modo inficiatur: unde proles morbo contagioso infecta non supra fontem, sed aqua de fonte sumpta baptizari debet extra fontem. 5. Si aqua fontis sit congelata, vel nimium frigida, manibus calefiat, vel misceatur (sed in majore quantitate) cum aqua communi calefacta. 6. Si aqua sacri fontis tam imminuta sit, ut timeatur defectus, alia communis admisceri potest, in minore tamen quantitate. Si corrupta sit vel aliquo modo defecerit, in fontem rite mundatum nova infundatur, et benedicatur."—Dens Theol., tom. v., De Bapt., No. 4, p. 154.]

[† "Quod in necessitate, quando non potest infundi aqua, seu fieri ablutio in capite, vel alia parte principali corporis, possit et debeat ablui seu baptizari infans in quacunque tandem minima parte corporis, etiam in solis capillis, in unguibus, in secundinis vel umbilico, etiam totaliter in utero matris existens, si obstetrix sit adeo perita, ut manu intra matris uterum super infantis corpus possit aquam perfundere, vel alio quovis modo possibili corpus infantis mox perituri duabus guttis aquæ, vel etiam una sola gutta possit attingi et ablui, quia periclitanti animæ infantis de salute æterna succurrendum est omni possibili modo."—Ferraris Baptismus, art. ii., sect. 18. See cases similar to the foregoing mentioned by Dens, Theol., tom. v., De Bapt., No. 7, where he quotes from the Roman ritual.

immodest, shocking, and superstitious, that we cannot follow them into this forbidden path. (6.) It is also a question much debated among them whether baptism performed per ablutionem occisivam, "by deadly or occisive ablution," is valid. This question has been treated formally by Dens in answer to the question, "Is baptism validly conferred by occisive ablution?" from whom we make the following extract.

"Answer. Ablution can be occisive in two ways. One by reason of the matter, as if an infant were baptized with hot or poisoned water: such ablution suffices to the validity of the baptism, because there is a true moral ablution. The other kind of ablution is called occisive of itself, or by reason of the action, as if any one would throw a child into a well or stream without hope of its emerging. This action is certainly unlawful.

"But it is controverted, whether this suffices to the validity of baptism, if at the same time the form is used with the intention of baptizing.

"Answer. The whole reason of doubt consists in this, whether such a casting into the river can be called a true ablution, and consequently the proximate matter instituted by Christ. Suarez, Wiggers, Neesen, Pauwels, Van Roy, Boudart, &c., defend the affirmative opinion, because the conditions of ablution appear to be preserved, when ablution does not necessarily require emersion. For instance, say they, suppose you see a pious mother throwing into a well her dying child, which cannot be baptized through want of water, it will be inferred that she threw it with the design of baptizing it; and thus, from the circumstances, this projection is determined to be a moral ablution, as it ought to be.

"Scotus and the Scotists, Daelman, Preingué, &c., hold the contrary. The principal reason of these is, that Christ instituted for the proximate matter of baptism, not any kind of ablution, but the usual moral ablution, or what is and may be called ablution according to the common sense of mankind. But he who thus flings the infant is not said, according to the common sense of mankind, to design to wash, but to kill." *

When such ridiculous and absurd topics are gravely treated by their ablest theologians, and so much stress is laid on the form of baptism, and so little reference made to the renovating influences of the Holy Spirit, it is not marvellous that erroneous ideas should prevail, and demoralizing practices be employed, in the Church of Rome.

[* "An valide confertur baptismus per ablutionem occisivam? 1. R. Dupliciter potest esse occisiva: una ratione materiæ, ut si infans aqua ferventi aut venenata baptizetur; et talis ablutio sufficit ad valorem baptismi, quia vera equidem manet ablutio moralis, &c. Alia dicitur occisiva de se, seu ratione actionis, ut si quis projiciat puerum in puteum vel flumen sine spe emergendi. Hæc actio certo est illicita. Sed controvertitur, an sufficiat ad valorem baptismi, si simul cum intentione baptizandi proferatur forma. 2. R. Tota ratio dubii consistit in eo, an talis projectio in flumen possit dici vera ablutio, et consequenter materia proxima a Christo instituta. 3. Sententiam affirmativam tuentur Suarez, Wiggers, Neesen, Pauwels, Van Roy, Boudart, &c., quia videntur salvari conditiones ablutionis, cum ablutio non requirat necessario emersionem: et ideo, (dicunt,) v. g., videntes piam matrem projicientem in puteum prolem morientem, quam sciunt non esse baptizatam defectu aquæ, censebunt et dicent, illam projicere ad baptizandum; et sic ex circumstantiis hæc projectio determinatur ut sit et dicatur moralis ablutio. 4. Contrarium tenet Scotus et Scotistæ, Daelman, Preingue, &c.; horum præcipua ratio est, quod Christus pro materia proxima baptismi instituerit, non quamcumque ablutionem, sed ablutionem usualem et moralem, seu quæ sit et dicatur ablutio secundum humanum et communem sensum; atqui qui sic projicit infantem, juxta communem et humanum sensum non dicitur velle abluere, sed occidere: Ergo," &c.—Dens Theol., tom. v., De Bapt., No. 8, pp. 158, 159. Vide latius Henno. Theologia, tom. vii., De Bapt. Disp. ii., p. 262, et seq.]

But the bare recital of such unscriptural and inconsistent sentiments and practices will be their confutation in every unbiassed and intelligent mind.

III. The form of baptism.

On this point Roman Catholics and Protestants agree. Both allow that no other form can be used than that prescribed by our Saviour, namely, to baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and also that it is not lawful to change this form as many heretics have done, so as to leave out any, one or more, of the three Persons in the Trinity, or inclusively to understand the three by naming only one.

The Greeks use the following form:—"Let this thy servant be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The reason for this was to shun and refute the error of certain persons among them who ascribed the principal cause of the virtue of baptism to the administrator. The Latin Church professes to acknowledge the validity of baptism among the Greeks, as she does that of Protestants with every other kind of heretics.

IV. The minister or administrator of baptism.

Bishops and Priests, by right of office, baptize in the Church of Rome; and Deacons, also, by permission of the Bishop or Priest, may baptize.*

"Those who may administer baptism in case of necessity, but without its solemn ceremonies, hold the third and last place; and in this class are included all, even the laity, men and women, to whatever sect they may belong. This power extends, in case of necessity, even to Jews, infidels, and heretics; provided, however, they intend to do what the Catholic Church does in that act of her ministry." †

"Let not the faithful, however, imagine that this office is given promiscuously to all, so as to supersede the propriety of observing a certain order among those who administer baptism: when a man is present, a woman—when a Clerk, a layman—when a Priest, a simple Clerk—should not administer this sacrament. Midwives, however, when accustomed to its administration, are not to be found fault with if sometimes, when a man is present who is unacquainted with the manner of its administration, they perform what may otherwise appear to belong more properly to men."‡

The Council of Trent has the following canon on this point:—"Whoever shall affirm that baptism, when administered by heretics, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, with the intention of doing what the Church does, is not true baptism; let him be accursed." §

The reader will perceive that laymen or women, whether Christians or Jews, infidels or heretics, of whatever sect, whether wicked or righteous, may baptize. The absurdity of this must be so apparent to every one, that it will be useless to make it the subject of sober comment. The reason given for such unscriptural latitude is, to prevent the damnation of infants; believing as they do that every child dying without baptism will be excluded from heaven.

Besides, however wicked the administrator may be, his depravity does not, in their estimation, disqualify him from administering the rite. This topic was sufficiently discussed when we took a survey of their sacraments in general.

* Catechism of Council of Trent, by Donovan, p. 167. Edit. 1829.
† Idem, pp. 167, 168. ‡ Idem, p. 168.
§ Vide supra, p. 112.

V. The subjects of baptism.

The points on which Romanists and Protestants differ, in regard to the subjects of baptism, may be ranged under the following heads:—1. The baptism of adults. 2. Of insane, mad, dumb, &c., persons. 3. Of infants. 4. Of abortives. 5. Of compulsory baptism. 6. Of the baptism of monsters. A brief notice of each will assist us to develope the peculiar doctrines and usages of the Roman Catholics respecting baptism.

1. The baptism of adults.

By an adult, says Dens, is here understood one who at some time had the use of reason; because persons perpetually and fully insane are to be ranked with infants, in whom no disposition is required. In adults, one disposition is sufficient to receive baptism validly, another is necessary to receive it validly and fruitfully.* The proper dispositions necessary for baptism are free-will, faith, and penitence.†

(1.) Romanists maintain that adults must receive baptism voluntarily; and yet they so explain this, that compulsory baptism may also be practised.

The Catechism of the Council of Trent says: "The faithful are also to be instructed in the necessary dispositions for baptism, that in the first place they must desire and purpose to receive it; for as in baptism we die to sin and engage to live a new life, it is fit that it be administered to those only who receive it of their own free-will and accord, and is to be forced upon none. Hence we learn from holy tradition that it has been the invariable practice of the Church to administer baptism to no individual without previously asking him if he were willing to receive it."‡

Ferraris says: "The first condition is voluntary consent, because God is unwilling that any one should be introduced into his family against his will."§

The same author, after asserting that, for the validly receiving of baptism, a voluntary assent, whether actual, virtual, or habitual, is sufficient, adds: "Nay, for validly receiving baptism, any voluntary consent is sufficient, although it is mixed with an involuntary one, extorted by force or fear in any manner, or designed for a perverse end; as, for instance, to accomplish a flagitious deed, to obtain the favour of a Prince, or some temporal gain. So Innocent III. hath precisely defined, 'He who is violently attracted by terrors and punishment, and, lest he should receive detriment, receives the sacrament of baptism, such a one (as he who feignedly accedes to baptism) receives the character, the impress of Christianity; and such also is he who, as it were, conditionally willing, although not absolutely, is FORCED to the observance of the Christian faith.' In which sense, says the Pontiff, ought to be understood the Decree of the fourth Toletan Council, in the Canon concerning the Jews, where it is said, 'But those who are forced to come over to Christianity, it is necessary that they should be obliged, by compulsion or necessity, to retain the faith which they have received, lest the name of God be blasphemed, and the faith which they have professed be esteemed vile and contemptible.' Hence St. Thomas saith, 'But if this coaction by threats or stripes is such as that the baptized would rather choose baptism than to suffer such things; then he receives the sacrament, but not the advantage of the sacrament.' Baptism is to be conferred on a dying person, destitute of the use of his senses, when there is one witness, though an infidel, who affirms that the dying man asked for baptism; and this is for a reason similar to that in the case where there is an obligation of absolving a person who lived in sin to the last, but who gave no signs of repentance, except that one witness testified that some were manifested. The reason is the same in both cases; nay, it is greater in the baptized person; for in baptism, the acts of receiving it are not the matter of the sacrament, as in confession. Wherefore, since all the Doctors affirm that a penitent can be absolved, when one witness affirms that he gave signs of grief; they are bound to hold that an adult can be baptized, when one witness affirms that he desired baptism."*

From the preceding quotations we learn, that the Roman Catechism teaches, that those who receive baptism must do so of their own free will and accord; that baptism is not to be forced upon any; and that such is the practice of the Latin Church;—Ferraris, too, declares that baptism must be received voluntarily; but then he recalls himself, and produces authorities to show, that any kind of voluntary assent is sufficient, although it be accompanied with much involuntary consent, extorted from the catechumen by force or fear, or for purposes, however vile; and hence this doctrine of a voluntary, runs entirely into a compulsory, baptism. Hence we have another specimen of the accommodating character of Roman Catholic divinity, which can suit itself, to a great extent, to all consciences, and to every class of persons, whether righteous, wicked, or hypocritical. We shall have opportunity, at a future period, to bring before our readers the authoritative decisions of the Church of Rome in favour of compulsory baptism. They may, however, at present judge how far this nominal condition of voluntary consent, in order to receive baptism, is counteracted by force or compulsion, when such practice is absolutely necessary to promote the extension of that ecclesiastical hierarchy. They will also discover how far this deceptive conduct is

[* "Adultus hic intelligitur qui aliquando rationis usum habuit; quia perpetuo et plene amentes comparantur infantibus, in quibus nulla requiritur dispositio. Ulterius notandum, quod in adultis alia requiratur dispositio ad valorem baptismi, alia ad suspiciendum valide et fructuose."—Dens Theol., tom. v., De Bapt., No. 27.]

† Catechism of Council of Trent, p. 176. See also Ferraris, Baptismus, art. v., sect. 24—35.

‡ Catechism of Council of Trent, p. 175.

§ Prima (conditio) est consensus voluntarius, quia Deus neminem invitum vult suæ familiæ adscribi.—Ferraris, Baptismus, art. v., sect. 25.

* "Immo sufficit ad valide recipiendum baptismum quilibet consensus voluntarius, licet cum involuntario mixtus sit, videlicet vi aut metu quocunque extortus, seu præstitus ob perversum finem; v. g., propter flagitium patrandum, propter Principis favorem, vel lucrum temporale consequendum, cit. cap. Majores, ubi Innoc. III. sic præcise definit: Is, qui terroribus atque suppliciis violenter attrahitur, et ne detrimentum incurrat baptismi suscipit sacramentum, talis (sicut et is qui ficte ad baptismum accedit) characterem suscipit Christianitatis impressum: et ipse tamquam conditionaliter volens licet absolute non velit, cogendus est ad observantiam fidei Christianæ; in quo casu, dicit Pontifex, debet intelligi decretum Concil. Toletani IV., cap. 56, in Canone de Judæis 5, dist. 45, ubi sic dicitur: Qui autem ad Christianitatem coacti sunt venire.....oportet, ut fidem, quam etiam vi vel necessitate susceperunt, tenere cogantur, ne nomen Domini blasphemetur, et fides quam susceperunt vilis et contemptibilis habeatur. Unde S. Thom., in 4, dist. 6, q. 1., art. 2, quæst. 3, in corpore, sic concludit: Si autem sit coactio inducens sicut minis, vel flagellis, ita quod baptizatus potius eligat baptismum suscipere, quam talia pati; tunc suscipit sacramentum, sed non rem sacramenti. Dandus est baptismus moribundo sensibus destituto, quando unicus testis, etiam infidelis, affirmat, eum petiisse baptismum; eodem modo quo adest obligatio absolvendi publicum peccatorem in extremis degentem, qui signa doloris ostendere non potest, unico tantum teste testimonium ferente ea manifestasse; est enim par ratio in utroque casu, immo major in baptizando, nam in baptismo actus suscipientis illum non sunt materia sacramenti, sicut in confessione. Quapropter omnes Doctores affirmantes posse pœnitentem absolvi, testificante alio, signa doloris manifestasse, tenentur fateri posse adultum baptizari, teste affirmante, baptismum ab illo postulatum fuisse."—Ferraris, Baptismus, art. v., sect. 30.

calculated to promote the interests of pure and undefiled religion.

(2.) The second condition, in order to receive baptism, is faith. "Besides a wish to be baptized, in order to obtain the grace of the sacrament, faith, for the same reason, is also necessary."*

(3.) The third disposition necessary in adults, who, with original sin, are also guilty of some personal mortal sin, is penitence, or grief for sins committed. This is an article of faith. "Another necessary condition is compunction for past sins, and a fixed determination to refrain from their future commission: should any one dare to approach the baptismal font, a slave to vicious habits, he should be instantly repelled; for what so obstructive to the grace and virtue of baptism as the obdurate impenitence of those who are resolved to persevere in the indulgence of their unhallowed passions?"† If this salutary doctrine were faithfully and with diligence inculcated in the Latin Church, it would be well for Christianity and the world; but, alas! it is entirely disregarded among those who love sin, in which they continue without any serious apprehensions of eternal perdition. Let the following testimony be considered in proof:—

The Council of Trent, as explained by the Latin Doctors,‡ teaches that attrition, or imperfect contrition, is sufficient in order to receive baptism. "Now, in order to obtain grace and righteousness, penance was always necessary for all men who had defiled themselves with mortal sin, even for those who sought to be washed in the sacrament of baptism."§ Again: the Council says, "When, perceiving that they are sinners, and moved by that fear of divine justice with which they are salutarily smitten, they are, by the consideration of God's mercy, encouraged in hope, and trusting that he will be propitious to them for Christ's sake, they begin to love him as the fountain of all righteousness, and, consequently, regard sin with certain hatred and abhorrence; namely, with that penitence which must necessarily exist before baptism; and, finally, they resolve to receive baptism, to begin a new life, and to keep the divine commandments."‖

Divines maintain that the Council teaches that barely to begin to love God, or to have attrition, or imperfect contrition, is sufficient, and that charity or the love of God is unnecessary; nay, that it ought not or cannot exist, non debet esse charitas.* Here a distinction is made between the repentance that precedes baptism, and that which follows it; whereas the Scripture requires all sin, without any exception whatever, to be repented of and abandoned.

The Church of Rome teaches further, that no external confession of sin is required from those who are about to be baptized; or, in other words, that sacramental confession, as in the sacrament of penance, in such cases is neither necessary nor proper;†—that "faith, and grief for sins are not necessary to receive baptism validly, but only to receive it fruitfully, to wit, with the effect of grace. Whence if any adult, without an act of faith and grief for sins committed should receive baptism, he receives it validly, because he receives the character; not, however, fruitfully, because he does not receive the grace and other effects flowing from it. But when the disqualification (fictio) ceases, that is, when the act of faith and grief takes place, then he receives the grace and other effects, without the reiteration of baptism, by the power of the past baptism received without faith and grief for sin; because an irreiterable sacrament cannot be destitute of its fruit when the disqualification of the receiver ceases; that is, when faith and grief for sin come into existence. In like manner heretics (Protestants) who are baptized in their heresy receive valid baptism, and on the receding of their disqualification, that is, on the abjuration of their heresy by their conversion to the true faith, receive immediately grace and the influence of the Holy Spirit."‡

According to this doctrine of the Roman Church, the scriptural qualification for baptism may be dispensed with for the present, or postponed to a more convenient season; and yet the sinner may be acting in conformity

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 176.

† Idem, ibid.

[‡ "Tertia dispositio necessaria in adultis, qui cum originali habent etiam aliquod peccatum mortale personale, est pœnitentia, seu dolor peccatorum commissorum, est de fide ex Act. Apost. (c. ii., 38.) Pœnitentiam agite et baptizetur unusquisque vestrum in remissionem peccatorem, et in Conc. Trid., sess. vi., c. 6, et sess. xiv., c. 1: qui dolor peccatorum sufficit, quod sit attritio supernaturalis, ut docet Scotus, in dist. iv., quæst. 5, et Doctores communiter cum S. Thoma qu. 68. art. 4, et qu. 79, art. 3. Dispositiones adultorum, qui sacra lavacro mergi exoptant, traduntur a Trident., sess. vi., c. vi."—Ferraris, Baptismus, art. v., sec. 27.]

§ "Fuit quidem pœnitentia universis hominibus, qui se mortali aliquo peccato inquinassent, quovis tempore ad gratiam et justitiam assequendam necessaria, illis etiam qui baptismi sacramento ablui petivissent."—Concil. Trid., sess. xiv., c. 1.

‖ "Et dum peccatores se esse intelligentes, a divinæ justitiæ timore, quo utiliter concutiuntur, ad considerandam Dei misericordiam se convertendo, in spem eriguntur, fidentes Deum sibi propter Christum propitium fore; illumque tamquam omnis justitiæ fontem, diligere incipiunt; ac propterea moventur adversus peccata per odium aliquod et detestationem, hoc est, per eam pœnitentiam quam ante baptismum agi oportet, denique dum proponunt suscipere baptismum, inchoare novam vitam, et servare divina mandata."—Idem, sess. vi., c 6.

[* "Qualis debet esse ille actus amoris seu contritionis? R. Non debet esse charitas, sive contritio perfecta: quia cap. seq. dicit idem Concilium: Hanc dispositionem seu preparationem justificatio ipsa consequitur, nempe per baptismum."—Dens Theologia, tom. v.; De Bapt., No. 27, p. 187.]

[† "An baptismo præmitti debet confessio sacramentalis? R. negative: quia peccata ante baptismum commissa non sunt materia sacramenti pœnitentiæ; admittit tamen S. Thom. confessionem utiliter fieri, non quidem ad absolutionem, sed ad humiliationem, instructionem, &c., prout olim practicatum legitur, non tantum apud Tertullianum De Baptismo, sed et in Actis Apostolorum: hæc tamen peccatorum confessio verisimilius non erat particularis, sed generalis et publica."—Idem, p. 138.

["Non requiritur tamen in ipsis baptizandis exterior peccatorum confessio, ut docet S. Bonaventura, tom. iv., dist. 16, pars i., art. 1, quæst. 2, et S. Ambrosius, De Sac., lib. iii., c. 2, his verbis: Etiamsi non confiteatur (exterius) peccatum qui venit ad baptismum, tamen hoc ipso implet confessionem omnium peccatorum, quod baptizari petit, ut justificetur, hoc est, ut a culpa ad gratiam redeat. Et S. Thom., quest. 68, art. 6. Duplex est peccatorum confessio: una interior, quæ fit Deo, et talis confessio peccatorum requiritur ante baptismum, ut scilicet homo sua peccata recogitans de eis doleat, non enim potest inchoare novam vitam, nisi pœniteat veteris vitæ. Alia est peccatorum confessio exterior, quæ fit Sacerdoti, et talis confessio non requiritur ante baptismum, quia pertinet ad sacramentum pœnitentiæ."—Ferraris, Baptismus, art. v., sec. 22.]

‡ "Fides et dolor de peccatis, non requiruntur ad recipiendum baptismum valide, sed solum ad recipiendum fructuose, nempe cum effectu gratiæ; unde si quis adultus sine actu fidei et doloris de peccatis commissis baptismum susciperet, valide eum susciperet, quia characterem reciperet, non tamen fructuose, quia non reciperet gratiam et cæteros effectus ex illa pendentes.....Recedente vero fictione, id est, posito actu fidei et doloris, tum gratiam et cæteros effectus reciperet absque reiteratione baptismi ex vi præteriti baptismi recepti sine fide et dolore de peccatis, quia sacramentum irreiterabile non debet carere suo fructu, recedente fictione recipientis, id est, adveniente vera fide, et vero dolore de peccatis commissis..... Et idem de hæreticis, qui baptizati in hæresi, recipiunt valide baptismum; et recedente fictione, id est, abjurata hæresi, per conversionem ad veram fidem, recipiunt statim gratiam et virtutem Spiritus Sancti."—Idem, art. v., sect. 31—34.

to what he supposes to be the right way of salvation. It is true he may be told that he ought to repent now. But this will have but little influence with those who are as ignorant as the majority of the Roman Catholics are; because, when convenience suits, they may make up what is wanting. The moral effect of this on the multitude is far from being salutary.

2. The baptism of insane, mad, or dumb persons.

The Roman Catechism gives the following directions on this subject:—"Insane persons who are favoured with lucid intervals, and during these intervals express no wish to be baptized, are not to be admitted to baptism, unless in extreme cases when death is apprehended. In such cases, if, previously to their insanity, they gave intimation of a wish to be baptized, the sacrament is to be administered; without such indication previously given, they are not to be admitted to baptism; and the same rule is to be followed with regard to persons in a state of lethargy. But if they never enjoyed the use of reason, the authority and practice of the Church decide that they are to be baptized in the faith of the Church, on the same principle that children are baptized before they come to the use of reason."*

Such a use of baptism may well comport with the idea, that it is employed merely as a charm, or spell, or incantation; but by no means with the sentiment that it is an ordinance of Christ, a representation of grace, and a means of receiving it. Those who would see more on this point must consult the theologians respecting the baptism of insane, mad, dumb, deaf, and idiotic persons.†

3. The baptism of children or infants.

The Latin Church teaches, in common with the greater part of Protestants, that children ought to be baptized; though the reasons which induce them are very different. The one class of Christians believe that without baptism no person can be saved; the other maintain that it cannot be neglected without great danger to the cause of religion, and even to salvation.

The Roman Catechism on this point teaches as follows:—"That the law of baptism, as established by our Lord, extends to all, insomuch that, unless they are regenerated through the grace of baptism, be their parents Christians or infidels, they are born to eternal misery and everlasting destruction."—"That this law extends, not only to adults, but also to infants; and that the Church has received this its interpretation from apostolic tradition, is confirmed by the authority and strengthened by the concurrent testimonies of the Fathers."—"If, then, through the transgression of Adam, children inherit the stain of primeval guilt, is there not still stronger reason to conclude that the efficacious merits of Christ the Lord must impart to them that justice and those graces which will give them a title to reign in eternal life? This happy consummation baptism alone can accomplish."‡ Again: "The faithful are earnestly to be exhorted to take care that their children be brought to the church as soon as it can be done with safety, to receive solemn baptism: infants, unless baptized, cannot enter heaven; and hence we may well conceive how deep the enormity of their guilt who, through negligence, suffer them to remain without the grace of the sacrament longer than necessity may require; particularly at an age so tender as to be exposed to numberless dangers of death."*

From the foregoing we perceive that the Romanists believe that all little children must be shut out of heaven who have not been baptized. The damnation of infants will be particularly considered in a future page. What here will occupy our attention is their doctrine respecting the baptism of infants, as it conducts them to the most superstitious and degrading practices in reference to the administration of baptism to sickly children, to abortives, and to those whose mothers die in cases of difficult parturition.

In cases where newly-born infants are sickly or about to die, Roman Catholics make great haste to baptize them before death, lest, for want of baptism, they be excluded from the kingdom of heaven. Consequently, without waiting to have this sacrament administered by a proper person, and in a suitable place, accompanied with what they deem important ceremonies, any person, whether male or female, young or old, righteous or wicked, Christian, Jew, Pagan, or infidel, may baptize. The most unseemly haste is made in order to preserve the expiring infant from destruction, by administering baptism even in an irregular manner. Many instances might be given, were it necessary.

The baptism of mature infants, whose mothers die in parturition, has occupied to a perplexing degree the attention of the ablest theologians of the Romish Church. Believing that unbaptized infants cannot enter heaven, they have been much embarrassed with the case of children who may die in the birth. The methods proposed and practised are so inhuman, though prompted by piety and superstition, that we cannot detail them. They recommend recourse to surgical operations when no other plan will succeed, of which they employ many. Accoucheurs are sometimes called upon to exercise their art to save unborn children from perdition by administering baptism. Ministers of parishes are also specially instructed to make themselves so far acquainted with surgery, as to become the operators in cases where it is certain the parent will die, so that their offspring may be preserved, at least long enough to be baptized. The instructions given in instances of this nature are such as forbid our presenting them to our readers. Indeed we cannot, in justice to our own sense of modesty or that of our readers, give even the original Latin of such documents as are to be found in Roman Catholic books on this topic. The most revolting parts of the science of obstetrics are more fitting for their perusal than the instructions respecting these cases, which abound in the standard theological works of Popery. But as the Papists have transgressed the injunction of Scripture by discussing topics which ought not to be spoken of, we cannot follow them in such forbidden track; and, therefore, shall only refer to some of the works and places where this subject is treated in form.†

4. The baptism of abortives.

Whether the baptism of abortives can be said to be a

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 175.
† See Collet de Bapt., c. vi., art. i., p. 173.
Dens de Bapt., No. 26.
Ferraris in Bapt., art. v., sect. 30.
Liebermann de Subjecto Bapt., tom. iv., pars i., p. 334.
Bailly de Bapt., tom. iii., prop. ii., p. 466.
‡ Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 171, 173

* Idem, p. 173.
† Collet, Instit. Theol. Scholast., tom. iv., De Bapt., cap. vi., art. i., concl. 2, p. 220. Edit. Lugduni, 1768.
Bailly, Theol. Dogmat. et Moralis, tom. iii., De Bapt., cap. vii., prop. ii., qu. 1, 2, pp. 377, 378. Edit. Lugduni, 1841.
Dens Theol. Moral. et Dogmat., tom. v., De Bapt., Nos. 23 and 24, p. 180, et seq. Dublin, 1832.
Lieberman. Inst. Theol., tom. iv., pars ii., cap. i., art. 2, sect. 3, p. 242, et seq. Mogunt, 1836.

doctrine of the Church of Rome may be questioned, if we consult her principal authorities; nevertheless, it seems to grow out of their system, and is extensively practised among them. Dens, in his body of divinity, teaches that abortive children are to be baptized at every stage of their growth, even from conception to maturity. In one department of his Tract on Baptism, entitled "De Baptizando Fœtu Abortivo," the most revolting directions are given, with which we cannot stain our pages.* At the end of this Tract he gives a long dissertation De Baptizandis Aborti is, in which he argues in the most immodest manner imaginable. When doubts are entertained as to the fitness of the subject for baptism, the following clause is introduced into the form of administration: Si es capax, If thou art capable of baptism. Those who are able conscientiously to peruse the portions referred to, will find some gross specimens of superstition, as well as abundant proofs of a religion prostrate at the feet of sensuality and vice, and of a Clergy awfully degraded and corrupt.

5. Compulsory baptism, and assumed subjection of all baptized persons to the authority and laws of the Church of Rome.

Adults are generally required to receive baptism as a voluntary act.

(1.) It is different with respect to children, who may, according to their doctrine, be baptized in some cases without the consent of their parents.

The following from Dens will present the doctrine of the Church of Rome in its received light:—

"Can children be lawfully baptized without the knowledge or consent of their parents?

"It is to be remarked, (i.) That the question is not concerning the validity of this baptism, because it is certain that the will and intention of the parents are not necessary for this purpose.

"(ii.) Adult persons, or those having the use of reason, if they consent, can lawfully be baptized, although their parents are unwilling; because every individual, in things pertaining to salvation, may avail himself of this privilege.

"The question, therefore, is concerning the progeny which have not the use of reason.

"Answer. If the parents are baptized, whether they are heretics or Catholics, their children may lawfully be baptized without their consent; because the parents, by virtue of their own baptism, and their infants, by virtue of their nativity from their baptized parents, are SUBJECTS (SUBDITI) of the Church. But in cases in which the parents are heretics, (that is, Protestants,) schismatics, &c., their baptized offspring ought to be separated from the parents, lest they should be perverted. Nevertheless, though the Church could make the separation without injury to the parents, this could not often be done, for several reasons, or at least not without great inconveniences: hence it is not often expedient to baptize such offspring.

(2.) "If the parents are infidels or not baptized, and they are despotically subject to a Catholic Prince, as slaves or persons taken in war, then also in that case their infants may be baptized without the consent of their parents; because in this case the parents may be deprived of their children without injury, as the Prince comes into the place of the parents.

"But if infidels are only politically subjected to a Catholic Prince, then it is commonly said, with St. Thomas, against the Scotists, that they are unlawfully baptized without the knowledge or consent of their parents, excepting those cases mentioned below; namely,—

"(i.) If an infant is in danger of death; for there the reason of profaning the sacrament has no moral existence.

"(ii.) Persons always deranged may be baptized without their consent.

"(iii.) Adult persons consenting, as was said above.

"(iv.) Infants can be baptized if taken away from their parents, whether justly or unjustly, when there is no hope of their return to them.

"(v.) If one of their parents consent to the baptism of their offspring, though the other may dissent; the more rational will is to be preferred."*

(3.) We quote the following testimony from Ferraris, which he supports by ample ecclesiastical authority:— "Infants of unbelievers, or of those never, or but recently, baptized, can validly be submitted to the ordinance without the consent of their parents. The reason is, because no proper disposition is required in them in order to a valid baptism. Nor does the opposition of their parents form any proper obstacle; because they are not baptized in the faith of their parents, but in the faith of the whole Church, and according to the will of Christ.....The children of infidels already baptized, that is, of heretics, or apostates from the faith, may be baptized not only validly, but lawfully, without the consent of their parents, if their ecclesiastical superiors so order it. This is said to be certain, because heretics are subjected to the jurisdiction of the Church; whence it is so, that the Church, for the preservation of the faith, can compel the parents by punishments, and can deprive them of their children and baptize them."†

* Dens Theol., tom. v., De Bapt., No. 25, p. 184.

[* "An pueri licite baptizentur, insciis vel invitis parentibus?

["Notandum, 1. Quæstionem non esse de validitate istius baptismi; quia certum est, ad hoc non requiri voluntatem vel intentionem, &c., parentum.

["2. Proles adultæ, sive ratione utentes, si in baptismum consentiant, possunt licite baptizari quantumvis inviti sint parentes: quia unusquisque in rebus ad salutem pertinentibus est sui juris.

["Quæstio igitur est de prolibus necdum ratione utentibus.

["R. Si parentes sint baptizati, sive sint hæretici, sive sint Catholici, licite illæ proles baptizantur, ipsis invitis: quia illi parentes ratione baptismi suscepti (et ipsi infantes ratione nativitatis ex parentibus baptizatis) sunt subditi Ecclesiæ. In casu tamen quo parentes sunt hæretici, schismatici, &c., deberent proles baptizatæ separari a parentibus, ne postmodum pervertantur: quia tamen sæpe illa separatio (licet hanc Ecclesia facere posset sine parentum injuria) ob alias causas non potest fieri, vel non sine maximis incommodis, hinc sæpius non expedit tales proles baptizare.

["Si parentes sint infideles, seu non baptizati, qui Principi Catholico subjiciuntur despotice, (ut sunt mancipia, vel bello capti,) tunc etiam licet eorum infantes baptizare ipsis invitis: quia in casu sine injuria possunt illis privari parentes, in quorum locum succedit Princeps.

["Si autem politice tantum illi infideles subjiciantur Principi Catholico, tunc dicitur communiter cum S. Thoma, contra Scotistas, quod illicite baptizentur, parentibus insciis vel invitis; exceptis tamen casibus quibusdam infra ponendis.

["(1.) Si infans sit in periculo mortis; tunc enim moraliter non militat ratio profanationis sacramenti, &c.

["(2.) Baptizari possunt perpetuo amentes.

["(3.) Adulti consentientes, ut supra dictum est.

["(4.) Baptizari potest infans ita a parentum custodia abstractus (sive juste, sive injuste) ut non sit spes reditus ad illos.

["(5.) Si alteruter parentum consentiat in baptismum prolis, quamvis alter dissentiat; attenditur enim tunc ad voluntatem magis rationabilem."—Dens Theologia, tom. v., No. 22, pp. 178, 179.]

† "Filii parvuli quorumcunque infidelium, sive nunquam baptizatorum, sive jam baptizatorum, possunt valide baptizari invitis parentibus; et ratio est, quia ad valorem baptismi ex parte infantium non requiritur propria dispositio. Neque obstat suorum parentum contradictio, quia infantes non baptizantur in fide suorum parentum, sed in fide totius Ecclesiæ, ac secundum voluntatem Christi. Filii

It would be an almost endless task to quote all our authorities on this head. The sentiments of the Romish Divines would fill volumes; we must, therefore, refer the theological student, desirous of more information, to the works mentioned below, where the subject is treated at large.*

The children of Jews, when in danger of death, or when exposed or forsaken by their parents, may be baptized without the knowledge or consent of their parents.†

(4.) In the fourth canon of the Council of Trent on baptism, already quoted, it is asserted that baptism administered by heretics, or Protestants, is true baptism. This, at first view, may appear liberal; but the evident intention of it is, to claim all baptized Protestants, whether children or adults, as members of the Church of Rome, and as subject to her authority and laws, so that they might be compelled by penal enactments to submit implicitly to her domination. This must appear unquestionable to any who shall examine the subject.

The thirteenth canon of the Council of Trent on baptism declares that children are to be reckoned among the faithful by the reception of baptism; or, in other words, they are considered members of the Church of Rome whensoever they are baptized, no matter whether heretic or schismatic, Jew, Turk, or infidel, administer the rite. This is conspicuous in the fourth canon. The eighth and ninth canons affirm, that baptized persons are bound by all the precepts of the Church of Rome, whether written or traditional; that they are obliged to observe them, whether willing or unwilling; and also, that when they grow up to maturity, they are not to be left to their own choice, but are to be COMPELLED to lead a Christian life, by PUNISHMENTS, besides exclusion from the eucharist and the other sacraments. The canons place this beyond all doubt.

"Can. 8. Whoever shall affirm that the baptized are free from all the precepts of the holy Church, either written or delivered by tradition, so that they are not obliged to observe them unless they will submit to them of their own accord; let him be accursed."

"Can. 14. Whoever shall affirm that when these baptized children grow up they are to be asked whether they will confirm the promises made by their godfathers in their name at their baptism; and that if they say they will not, they are to be left to their own choice, and not to be compelled in the mean time to lead a Christian life, by any other punishment than exclusion from the eucharist and the rest of the sacraments, until they repent; let him be accursed."

Benedict XIV., in his Constitutions, teaches that baptized heretics, or Protestants, are members of the Roman Church, and subject to her authority and laws. In his Constitution concerning the validity of marriage between a Jewish man and an heretical woman, we find the following:—

"Hence this also is ascertained, that he who receives baptism from a heretic becomes, by virtue thereof, a MEMBER of the Catholic Church; for the private error of the baptizer cannot deprive the person of this felicity, if he confer the sacrament in the faith of the true Church, and preserve its institutions in those things which belong to the validity of baptism. Suarez confirms this with great ability in his defence of the Catholic faith against the errors of the English sect, where he proves that every baptized person is a member of the Church; adding this also, that if a heretic, as often happens, baptizes an infant who is unable to exercise an act of faith, there is no impediment to the child receiving a habit of faith with baptism."

"We have also fully ascertained that those baptized by heretics, if they come to that age in which they can of themselves distinguish good from evil, but adhere to the errors of their baptizer, are to be repelled from the unity of the Church, and be deprived of those benefits which members enjoy; but they are not to be freed from its authority or its laws, as Gonzalez has wisely shown."*

The following extract from Dens corresponds with the sentiments of Benedict:—

"Are infidels and heretics obliged by laws?

"Answer 1. All these are obliged by the eternal and natural law, also by positive divine laws.

"2. Infidels or unbaptized persons are not held by the positive laws of the Church: hence the Apostle saith, 'What have I to do to judge those who are without? (1 Cor. v. 12.)

"3. Heretics, schismatics, apostates, and all such as are baptized, are subject to the laws of the Church which concern them: because by baptism they become subject to the Church, nor are they released from her laws any more than rebellious subjects against a Prince are released from the laws of the Prince.

"Do heretics sin when they do not observe the fasts and feasts appointed by the Church?

"Answer, in the affirmative; unless for some cause, for instance, ignorance, they may be excused.

"Objection 1. Heretics are not in the Church; therefore they are not subject to the Church.

"Answer. The antecedent should be noted. Heretics are not in the Church, as it regards the union of charity and the communion of saints. That they are not in the Church as it regards subjection to it, is denied; for by baptism they become subject to the Church, and they remain personally subject thereto, wherever they are.

parvuli infidelium jam baptizatorum, id est, hæreticorum, seu apostatarum a fide, nedum valide, sed etiam licite possunt baptizari, invitis parentibus, si ita velint legitimi superiores ecclesiastici. Dicitur hoc esse certum, quia hæretici Ecclesiæ jurisdictioni subjecti sunt, unde sicut Ecclesia potest ipsos parentes cogere pœnis ad servandam fidem, ita potest, ab ipsis filios eripere, et baptizare."—Ferraris in Baptismum, art. v., sect. 11—13.

* Dens Theol., tom. v., No. 22, p. 178, et seq.
Bailly Theol., tom. iii., cap. vii., prop. 3, p. 379, et seq.
Collet Inst. Theol., tom. iv., cap. vi., concl. 2, p. 220, et seq.
Liebermann Inst. Theol., tom. iv., lib. vi., pars ii., art. 2, sect. 3, p. 242, et seq.
Henno Theol., tom. vii., tract. ii., disput. iv., p. 296, et seq.
Ligorio Theol., tom. iv., lib. vi.; tract ii., cap. i., dubium iv., p. 95, et seq.
Ferraris Prompta Biblioth. in Baptismum, art. v., sect. 11 ad 23, 44 ad 52.
S. S. D. N. Benedict XIV. Bullarium, tom. ii., vol. v., No. 28.

† Benedict XIV. Bullar., tom. ii., vol. v., De Bapt. Judæorum, sect. 8, 9, pp. 14, 18. 12mo. Mechliniæ, 1826.

* "Deinde id etiam compertum est, eum qui baptisma ab hæretico rite suscepit, illius vi Ecclesiæ Catholicæ membrum effici; privatus siquidem baptizantis error hac eum felicitate privare nequit, si sacramentum conferat in fide veræ Ecclesiæ, atque ejus instituta servet in his, quæ pertinent ad validitatem baptismi. Egregie hoc confirmat Suarez in sua fidei Catholicæ defensione contra errores sectæ Anglicanæ, lib. i., c. xxiv., ubi probat baptizatum Ecclesiæ membrum fieri; hoc etiam addens, quod si hæreticus, ut sæpius accidit, infantem lustret impotem ad fidei actum eliciendum, hoc impedimento non est, quo minus ille habitum fidei cum baptismo accipiat."

"Postremo, exploratum habemus, ab hæreticis baptizatos, si ad eam ætatem venerint, in qua bona a malis dispicere per se possint, atque erroribus baptizantis adhæreant, illos quidem ab Ecclesiæ unitate repelli, iisque bonis orbari omnibus, quibus fruuntur in Ecclesia versantes, non tamen ab ejus auctoritate et legibus liberari; ut sapienter Gonzalez disserit."—Benedic. XIV. Bullar., tom. iii., constit. ii., lec. 13, 14, vol. vii., p. 24. Edit. 12mo. Mechliniæ, 1827.

"Objection 2. The Church seems to have relaxed her laws in respect to heretics: because in urging the observance of laws no good effect can follow, but more sins and offences against God; therefore, &c.

"Answer. The antecedent is denied. The contrary appears to be the mind of the universal Church: and as it regards their sins, the Church merely permits them for higher reasons, lest she might appear to favour heresy, by the open scandal of the faithful; while heretics, from their pertinacity, obtain this advantage, and are freed from the burden of the laws, to which the faithful are subject. Hence a relaxation in this case would favour all bad Christians."*

(5.) The above quotations from the Divines and recognised authorities of the Church of Rome, show that the principle of compulsion is intimately associated with the sacrament of baptism, whether received voluntarily by the subject, or administered by force. Now it is confessed by all, that a canon of a General Council approved by the Pope—that is, a rule of faith delivered to the people, under the fearful sanction of a pontifical anathema—leaves no alternative to a Roman Catholic, but to embrace the doctrine it contains, or to be excluded from his Church by excommunication. This is clear from a fundamental principle, declared to be an article of the Creed of Pope Pius IV.: "I also profess and undoubtedly receive all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons and General Councils, particularly by the holy Council of Trent." By one of the canons promulgated by this Council, every Papist is bound to believe, that all persons baptized may be compelled by bitter punishment to be Christians, or, what is the same in Roman Catholic divinity, spiritual subjects of the Pope. It is, indeed, curious to witness the Council of Trent, which passed that law, preparing for the extension of its claims, by a somewhat unexpected stroke of liberality. In the fourth canon on baptism, there is a curse pronounced upon any who should say that baptism in the name of the Trinity, conferred by a heretic, with the intention of doing what the Church intends to do in that sacrament, is not valid. In the eighth and fourteenth canons, compulsion by punishment is enjoined, in order to subjugate all baptized persons to the dominion of the Pope.

The late Charles Butler, Esq., the author of the Book of the Roman Catholic Church, observes: "It is most true that [the Papists] believe the doctrines of their Church to be unchangeable; and that it is a tenet of their creed, that what their faith ever has been, such it was from the beginning, such it now is, and such it will ever be." Let them therefore choose between this consistency of doctrine, and the practice of their Church. The Council of Trent, the decrees of which are obligatory above all others, has converted the sacrament of baptism into an indelible brand of slavery; so that whoever has received these waters of regeneration, so called, is under the dominion of a communion which declares that there is no other church of Christ on earth. She claims her slaves wherever they may be found; declares them to be subject to her laws, both written and traditional; and, by her infallible decisions, inflicts upon them cruel and unmitigated punishments till they shall acknowledge her authority, and bend their necks to her yoke. Such is, has been, and will ever be, the doctrine of this apostate Church; such is the belief of her true and sincere members; such the spirit which actuates her, and which, by every possible means, she has disseminated among her members. The individual who denies this doctrine is devoted to destruction by the Romish hierarchy. The principles of religious tyranny, supported by persecution, appear to be a necessary appendage to true Roman Catholicism: he that revolts at the idea of compelling belief by corporeal punishment is at once severed from all communion with Rome.

(6.) What a striking commentary on these canons of the Council of Trent have we in the example of the Church of Rome in her schemes for converting nations and individuals to her faith, and in preserving them in its unity, by the revolting tortures of the Inquisition! Refractory sons of the Papal hierarchy, born under her spiritual dominion, and Protestants baptized out of her pale, have alike suffered from her relentless and sanguinary spirit. Nothing but her want of power, and the ascendency of Protestantism, compel the Church of Rome to hold her obnoxious ordinances in abeyance; although the assumed divine authority and inspiration of such decrees must for ever be asserted by those who sincerely embrace the Roman Catholic faith. Reason and humanity have been alike constrained to yield to the dicta of a Church which enjoins the use of coercive measures to enforce submission to her authority.

Did our limits permit, we might give examples under the following heads:—(i.) Compulsory baptism of mancipia, "slaves," at the will of their Princes. (ii.) Compulsory baptism of "persons taken in war," bello capti. (iii.) Baptism of Jewish and infidel children. (iv.) The baptism of heretics, or Protestants, as a plea to subjugate them.

6. The baptism of monsters.

The Protestant will doubtless be surprised to find a section of this import connected with the subject of baptism. But the doctrine, that every unbaptized child must necessarily be excluded from heaven, leads them to the superstitious, or rather the useless and sacrilegious, administration of the rite. This is illustrated in their notions concerning the baptism of monsters, which we give by a reference to one of their distinguished theologians.

* "An infideles et hæretici obligantur legibus?

"R. 1. Omnes illi obligantur lege æterna et naturali, item legibus positivis divinis.

"R. 2. Infideles, seu non baptizati, legibus positivis Ecclesiæ non tenentur; quia non sunt Ecclesiæ subditi: hinc dicit Apostolus, 1 ad Cor. cap. v., ver. 12: Quid mihi de iis, qui foris sunt, judicare?

"R. 3. Hæretici, schismatici, apostatæ, et similes omnes baptizati, obligantur legibus Ecclesiæ, quæ ipsos concernunt: quia per baptismum Ecclesiæ subditi facti sunt: neque magis a legibus ejus solvuntur, quam subditi contra legitimum Principem rebelles, a legibus Principis.

"An ergo hæretici peccant, dum non observant jejunia et festa ab Ecclesia statuta?

"R. Affirmative: nisi per causam aliquam, v. g., ignorantiam, excusentur.

"Obj. 1. Hæretici non sunt in Ecclesia: ergo non sunt subditi Ecclesiæ.

"R. Dist. ant.: hæretici non sunt in Ecclesia, quantum ad unionem charitatis et communionis sanctorun, conc. ant.: non sunt in Ecclesia, quoad subjectionem, neg. ant.: etenim per baptisma facti sunt subditi Ecclesiæ, et manent personaliter Ecclesiæ subjecti, ubicunque fuerint.

"Obj. 2. Ecclesia videtur relaxare leges suas respectu hæreticorum: quia urgendo observantiam legum, nullum bonum effectum expectare potest, sed magis peccata illorum et offensas Dei; ergo, &c.

"R. Neg. ant.: contrarium patet ex mente universæ Ecclesiæ; ad peccata autem illorum Ecclesia se habet mere permissive ob altiores rationes, ne scilicet cum aperto scandalo fidelium favere videatur hæresi, dum hæretici ex pertinacia sua obtinerent commodum, et liberarentur ab oneribus legum, quibus fideles subjiciuntur. Deinde eadem ratio relaxandi militaret pro omnibus malis Christianis."—Dens de Legibus, tom. ii., No. 27, p. 288.

"A monster, says our pastoral manual, according to the Roman ritual, which hath not the human form, cannot be baptized; but the decision concerning this must especially be taken from the shape of the head, which is the seat of reason and of the senses; hence if the head be human, or is near the human form, it must be baptized; but if this be doubtful, it should be baptized conditionally, 'If thou art a man;' and so if the head be that of a beast, and the other members human, the ceremony ought to be performed subject to this restriction.

"Although the rituals commonly prescribe that a monster is not to be baptized which hath not the human form, yet in modern times even that is called in question by many Physicians and Divines, whether these monsters are destitute of a rational soul.

"Finally, it may be considered in the following manner respecting monsters, when it is doubtful whether it may be one or more than one person. If it hath one head and one breast, it is certain it is only one man, although it may have, for example, three hands, feet, &c.; hence in that case it is simply to be baptized as one individual. Or it is clear there are two men, if it hath two heads and distinct breasts, although other parts are not double; and in this case they are separately to be baptized; but if there is danger of death, they may be baptized by saying, 'I baptize you.' Or if there is a doubt whether there is one or more than one, as if it hath two heads and breasts not well joined, in that case one is to be absolutely baptized, and the other conditionally, 'If thou art not baptized.' The same is to be observed, if it hath two heads and one breast, or the contrary." *

The student who is desirous of following the mazes of error yet farther, may consult the works referred to in the margin, in which he will not fail to find, that when the "more sure word of prophecy" is abandoned for a human and fallible guide, the wanderer will speedily be conducted into the regions of darkness, superstition, and death.†

VI. The necessity of baptism.

1. We have observed that the Roman Church teaches that baptism is indispensably necessary to salvation; so that all children, whether of Jews, heretics, Pagans, or Papists, who die unbaptized, are excluded from heaven; and that adults cannot be saved without baptism, either in desire or in fact.

The Council of Trent declares: "Whoever shall affirm that baptism is indifferent, (liberum, 'free,' or 'a matter of choice,') that is, not necessary to salvation; let him be accursed."* Again, concerning original sin, the Council declares: "Whoever shall affirm that newly-born infants, even though sprung from baptized parents, ought not to be baptized; or shall say that, though they are baptized for the remission of sins, yet they derive not from Adam that original guilt which must be expiated in the laver of regeneration, in order to obtain eternal life; let him be accursed."†

In the fifth canon of the same session, the Council says: "Whoever shall deny that the guilt of original sin is remitted by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, bestowed in baptism; or shall affirm that that wherein sin truly and properly consists is not wholly rooted up, but is only cut down, or not imputed; let him be accursed."‡

In these decisions of the Council it is asserted that baptism is necessary to salvation; that newly-born infants are baptized for the remission of sins; that original guilt is expiated in the laver of regeneration, in order to obtain eternal life; and that the guilt of original sin is remitted by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is bestowed in baptism.

On this point we select the following from the Catechism of the Church:—"Baptism washes away the stains of sin."§ "The law of baptism extends to all, insomuch that, unless they are regenerated through the grace of baptism, be their parents Christians or infidels, they are born to eternal misery, and everlasting destruction."‖ "If, then, through the transgression of Adam, children inherit the stain of primeval guilt, is there not still stronger reason to conclude that the efficacious merits of Christ the Lord must impart to them that justice and those graces which will give them a title to reign in eternal life? This happy consummation BAPTISM ALONE CAN ACCOMPLISH."¶ "Infants, unless baptized, cannot enter heaven." "The salutary waters of baptism not only wash away all the stains of past sins, but also enrich the soul with divine grace, which enables the Christian to avoid sin for the future, and to preserve the invaluable treasures of righteousness and innocence." "Such is the admirable efficacy of this sacrament as to remit original sin and actual guilt, however enormous."†† "In baptism not only is sin forgiven, but with it all the punishment due to sin is remitted by a merciful God."‡‡ These declarations are sufficiently definite to show at once the doctrine which is taught in the standard Catechism of the Church of Rome, and which all her Clergy are compelled to teach and her people to receive.

[* "Monstrum, dicit pastorale nostrum, conformiter ad ritualia Roman., quod humanam speciem non habet, baptizari non debet; judicium autem hujusmodi rei potissimum ex capite (quod est rationis et sensuum sedes) capiendum est: proinde, si caput sit humanum, aut humano propius, baptizetur: si sit dubium, baptizetur sub conditione, Si tu es homo: et ita si caput esset ferinum, et reliqua membra humana, sub conditione baptizari deberet.

["Quamquam ritualia communiter præscribant non esse baptizandum monstrum, quod humanam speciem non habet; illud tamen hodie dum a compluribus Medicis et Theologis in dubium revocatur, an monstra illa careant anima rationali.

["Ulterius circa monstra observandum, dubium subinde esse, sintne unus, an plures homines.—Si habeat unum caput et unum pectus, certum est, tantum unum esse hominem, quamvis habeat, v. g., tres manus, pedes, &c.; unde tunc simpliciter baptizetur.—Vel est perspicuum, esse duos homines, ut si habeat duo capita et pectora distincta, licet cætera non sint duplicata; et tunc separatim baptizentur; si autem periculum mortis immineat, simul abluantur dicendo, Ego vos baptizo, &c.—Vel est dubium, an unus vel plures homines sint, ut si habeat duo capita et pectora non bene distincta; et tunc unus absolute baptizetur, et alter sub conditione, Si non es baptizatus. Idem est, si habeat duo capita et unum pectus, vel e contra."—Dens Theologia, tom. v., No. 26, pp. 185, 186.

† Dens Theologia ut supra.

Ferraris Prompta Biblioth., Baptismus, art. v., sec. 5 ad 10.

Collet Inst. Theol., tom. iv., c. vi., conclus. 2, p. 223. Edit. Lugd., 1768.

Bailly Theologia, tom. iii.; De Bapt., c. vii., art. i., prop. 2, p. 378. Edit., 1841.

Ligorio Theologia Moralis, tom. iv., lib. vi., tract. ii., sec. 125.

* Conc. Trid., sess. vii., can. 5.

† "Si quis parvulos recentes ab uteris matrum baptizandos negat, etiam si fuerint a baptizatis parentibus orti; aut dicit in remissionem quidem peccatorum eos baptizari, sed nihil ex Adam trahere originalis peccati, quod regenerationis lavacro necesse sit expiari ad vitam æternam consequendam; anathema sit."—Concil. Trid., sess. v.; Decret. de Peccato originali, can. 4.

‡ "Si quis per Jesu Christi Domini nostri gratiam, quæ in baptismate confertur, reatum originalis peccati remitti negat; aut etiam asserit non tolli totum id, quod veram et propriam peccati rationem habet; sed illud dicit tantum radi, aut non imputari; anathema sit."—Idem, can. 5.

§ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 161.

‖ Idem, pp. 171, 172. ¶ Idem, p. 173.

 Idem, p. 174. †† Idem, p. 177. ‡‡ Idem, p. 180.

The explanations of several Romish Divines on the necessity of baptism will even more fully explain and exhibit the doctrines of that Church on this subject.

In the first place we quote from the Sincere Christian, by Bishop Hay: "Question. Is baptism necessary for our salvation?—Answer. It is doubtless the most necessary of all the sacraments, because without it we are incapable of receiving any other sacrament, and because it is ordained by Jesus Christ as the only means for receiving the first grace of justification, by which alone we can be delivered from original sin, and partake of the merits of Christ's sufferings, so as to become members of his body."* He adds, in a following page: "If a young child were put to death for the sake of Christ, this would be to it the baptism of blood, and carry it to heaven; but except in this case, as such infants are incapable of having the desire of baptism, with the other necessary dispositions, if they are not actually baptized with water, they cannot go to heaven." †

We translate from Dens, concerning "the necessity of baptism to salvation." "It is to be premised," says he, "that a thing may be necessary to salvation in a twofold sense; namely, the necessity of the medium, and the necessity of precept.

"The former arises from the consideration of the medium as absolutely necessary to salvation, so that, for want of it, salvation cannot be obtained by an innocent or guilty person. But the latter arises from the precept imposed, without the observance of which salvation cannot be obtained; if through impotency or invincible ignorance, or any other excusable reasons, the precept cannot be fulfilled.

"Is baptism necessary for salvation to all, by a necessity of the medium?—Answer. Assuredly: for instance, to adults in fact or in desire; to children in fact, except in the case of martyrdom; but persons always insane are to be ranked with children. So the Church and the holy Fathers always taught from this place of John iii. 5: 'Except a man be born again of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.'

"Is it also necessary by the necessity of precept?—Answer. Assuredly: as is clear from the precept of Christ, 'Go and teach all nations, baptizing them,' &c.; (Matt. xxviii. 19;) where, as the precept of baptizing is given to the Apostles, so the precept of receiving baptism is given to others. Hence the necessity of the precept arises spontaneously from the necessity of the medium; and in like manner from the necessity of the baptismal character, as a man is thereby incorporated into the Church, and becomes capable of receiving the other sacraments.

"Whom does that precept concern?—Answer. Adult persons capable of observing the precept, as well themselves as others, for whom, either from justice or charity, they are bound to procure baptism, as parents, Pastors," &c. ‡ The reader will at once perceive that Dens refers to the practice of involuntary baptism, and the subjection of all the baptized to the laws and constitutions of the Romish Church.* Numerous quotations of the same import might be given, were it necessary, or had we sufficient space to contain them.

2. From the foregoing it is seen that children, unless baptized, are shut out of heaven, and perish. Some sternly urge their baptism, whether by Jew or Christian, Roman Catholic or heretic, on the ground of their liability to perdition without the rite. Others are in doubt. Hence the language of Bishop Hay: "What becomes of young children who die without baptism? As for what becomes of such unbaptized children, Divines are divided in their opinions about it; some say one thing, some another; but as God Almighty has not been pleased to reveal it to his Church, we know nothing for certain respecting it." † In opposition, however, to the testimony of this Popish Prelate, the Scripture expressly says, that of such is the kingdom of heaven; and many other texts of Scripture, as well as arguments derived from revelation, might be adduced to show that all children are saved through our Lord Jesus Christ, by the regeneration and sanctification of God's Holy Spirit.

Besides, whether God has revealed to the Church of Rome, which the Bishop calls God's Church, any thing on this topic or not, it is certain that she teaches most unequivocally the damnation of unbaptized children as an infallible doctrine; and declares, on the authority of the Council of Trent, that baptism in the case of children is absolutely necessary to salvation. In her Catechism, an infallible standard, too, she teaches that without baptism CHILDREN ARE BORN TO ETERNAL MISERY AND EVERLASTING DESTRUCTION; that baptism alone can impart to them that righteousness, and those graces, which will give them a title to reign in eternal life; that infants, unless baptized, cannot enter heaven. Who, then, can doubt what the Church of Rome inculcates on this point, when her infallible decrees, especially those of Trent, and her authoritative Catechism, are at once so explicit and decided?

3. Adult persons must receive baptism, either in fact or in desire, in order to obtain justification. The Council of Trent says, "Without the laver of regeneration, or its desire, no justification can be obtained." ‡ They teach, however, that there are two ways in which a man may be justified and saved without actually receiving the sacrament of baptism. The first is, that of an infidel

* Vol. i., chap. xx., sec. ii., p. 406.

† Idem, p. 409.

[‡ "Prænotandum aliquid dupliciter dici necessarium ad salutem, scilicet, necessitate medii, et necessitate præcepti. Prior oritur ex ratione medii absolute necessarii ad salutem, ita ut defectu illius medii, sive culpabili, sive inculpabili, salus obtineri non possit: necessitas autem præcepti oritur ex præcepto imposito, sine cujus tamen impletione salus non potest obtineri; puta si per impotentiam vel ignorantiam invincibilem, vel alias rationes excusantes, præceptum illud non adimpleatur.

["An baptismus omnibus ad salutem est necessarius necessitate medii?—R. Affirmative; scilicet, adultis in re vel in voto; parvulis in re, excepto casu martyrii; parvulis autem annumerantur perpetuo amentes. Ita Ecclesia et SS. Patres semper intellexerunt ex illo loco, Joan. c. iii., v. 5, Nisi quis renatus fuerit ex aqua et Spiritu Sancto, non potest introire in regnum Dei. Vide Trid., sess. vi., c. 4.

["An etiam necessarius est necessitate præcepti?—R. Affirmative: ut constat ex præcepto Christi, (Matt. xxviii. 19,) Euntes docete omnes gentes, baptizantes eos, &c.; ubi sicut datur Apostolis præceptum baptizandi, ita aliis datur præceptum suscipiendi baptismum: deinde necessitas præcepti sponte resultat ex necessitate medii; item ex necessitate characteris baptismalis, ut homo incorporetur Ecclesiæ ac capax fiat aliorum sacramentorum.

["Quosnam afficit illud preceptum?—R. Adultos præcepti capaces afficit, tum quoad seipsos, tum quoad alios, quibus sive ex justitia sive ex charitate tenentur baptismum procurare, ut sunt Parentes, Pastores," &c.—Dens Theologia, tom. v., De Bapt., No. 18, p. 173.]

[* "Hæretici, schismatici, apostatæ, et similes omnes baptizati, obligantur legibus Ecclesiæ, quæ ipsos concernunt; quia per baptismum Ecclesiæ subditi facti sunt; neque magis a legibus ejus solvuntur, quam subditi contra legitimum Principem rebelles a legibus Principis."—Idem, tom. ii., De Legibus, No. 27, p. 289.]

† Sincere Christian, vol. i., p. 409.

‡ "Sine lavacro regenerationis, aut ejus voto fieri, non potest justificatio."—Concil. Trid., sess. vi., c. 4. Idem, Declarat., sess. vii., can. 4.

who may become acquainted with Christianity and embrace it, and yet be in circumstances which preclude the opportunity of baptism: his desire of receiving the rite would supply the place of actual baptism, and, dying in that situation, he would certainly be saved. Secondly, that of a person suffering martyrdom for the faith of Christ before he had been able to receive baptism: this fact would supply its place. In the latter case the person is said to be baptized in his own blood; in the former, to have been *baptized in desire.

4. In opposition to the rigid doctrine of the Church of Rome concerning the absolute necessity of baptism, the following observations are made:—

(1.) The principal text which is brought to support this doctrine does not substantiate it; namely, "Unless a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." (John iii. 5.) The term "water" seems to be used to represent the operation of the Spirit, as fire is also employed in another place: "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." (Matt. iii. 11.) It is acknowledged that baptism is necessary, but not more so than the other positive institution. Both are necessary as helps and means of grace; but not so necessary as that without them it were impossible to be saved, when no neglect or contempt is manifested.

(2.) The exceptions which are made to this necessity actually overturn their exposition of the passage. These are martyrdom and perfect contrition. If our Saviour spoke of baptism in the Roman Catholic sense, there is therefore no privilege for martyrs, inasmuch as all must be baptized in order to be saved. Nor can satisfaction or penance avail if this notion be true, and consequently the thief on the cross cannot be among the saved, as he was not baptized. These two exceptions, therefore, namely, martyrdom and perfect contrition, nullify their explication of John iii. 5.

(3.) Children, at least of pious parents, are represented as being in a state, even before baptism, which is inconsistent with a state of damnation. They are within the covenant, and to them also belongs the promise. The Lord saith, "I will be thy God, and the God of thy seed." (Gen. xvii. 7.) And St. Paul saith that the children of the faithful are holy, that is, proper, or fit, to be devoted to God. (1 Cor. vii. 14.) If, then, children are in covenant with God, and holy, how can they perish, though they may die unbaptized?

(4.) Circumcision was as necessary to the Israelites as baptism is to us: but the children which died before the eighth day, or anterior to circumcision, perished not. David said respecting his child who died on the seventh day, "I shall go to him, he cannot return to me;" (2 Sam. xii. 18, 23;) fully believing that the child would be saved, though uncircumcised. It is generally acknowledged that those children whom Herod slew were uncircumcised; nevertheless they are counted innocents, and therefore saved. Consequently, children dying unbaptized are not, on that account, doomed to perdition.

(5.) The Holy Spirit may be given before baptism; therefore the gift of eternal life does not depend upon it. Cornelius and his friends received the Holy Spirit before they were baptized. (Acts x. 47.)

(6.) If all children dying without baptism are lost, then it will follow that an infinite number of children perish without their fault; which is absurd in the extreme.

* Sincere Christian, vol. i., chap. xx., p. 408.

(7.) It will not avail to affirm that some of the Fathers, as Origen, Nazianzen, Hierome, with others, believed that infants dying without baptism could not be saved. Because, (i.) Many of them inculcated the necessity of the eucharist for children in order to their salvation, as well as baptism; and why do they not follow the Fathers in the one as well as in the other opinion? (ii.) Augustine, Fulgentius, and Gregory held that infants dying unbaptized descended to the place of the damned, and that they are punished with a sense of pain; but the Romanists generally believe that they are not punished with a sense of pain, but merely with a sense of loss; so that, after all, they do not follow the judgment of the Fathers.

(8.) The baptism of infants, among the ancient Christians, was usually performed at Easter and Pentecost; now it is not likely that such a custom would obtain, if the want of baptism perilled their eternal salvation.

(9.) The present doctrine of the Church of Rome is the heresy of the Hierarchites, who denied that children went to heaven.

(10.) Finally, some Roman Catholics believe that infants dying without baptism are saved. This was the opinion of Gerson and Gabriel.

VII. The effects of baptism.

1. The Catechism of the Council of Trent enumerates the following seven effects of baptism:*—

(1.) The remission of all sin, original and actual. "Such is the admirable efficacy of this sacrament, as to remit original sin and actual guilt, however enormous; that concupiscence, or the fuel of sin, however, remains, but it does not constitute sin. It is the effect of sin, and is nothing more than an appetite of the soul in itself repugnant to reason. If unaccompanied with the consent of the will, or unattended with neglect on our part, it differs essentially from the nature of sin."

(2.) The remission of the punishment due to sin. "But in baptism, not only is sin forgiven, but with it all the punishment due to sin is remitted by a merciful God." Hence they teach that no penance is due or inflicted for sins committed before baptism.

(3.) It bestows invaluable privileges, such as justification and adoption. "By virtue of this sacrament, we are not only delivered from what are justly deemed the greatest of all evils, but are also enriched with invaluable good. Our souls are replenished with divine grace, by which, rendered just and children of God, we are made coheirs to the inheritance of eternal life. But grace, according to the definition of the Council of Trent,—a definition to which, under pain of anathema, we are bound to defer,—not only remits sin, but is also a divine quality inherent in the soul, and, as it were, a brilliant light that effaces all those stains which obscure the lustre of the soul, and invests it with increased brightness and beauty." Here grace is put in the place of God who justifies, as well as in the place of the Holy Spirit who sanctifies.

(4.) Abundance of virtues. "The progress of grace in the soul is also accompanied by a most splendid train of virtues."

(5.) Union with Christ. "By baptism we are also united to Christ, as members to their head."

(6.) Character. "By baptism, we are sealed with a character that can never be defaced from the soul."

(7.) It opens heaven. "It opens the portals of heaven, which sin had closed against our admission."

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 179, et seq.

The Catechism states that the fruits of baptism, as it regards the efficacy of the sacrament, are common to all; but that they vary in proportion to the disposition of the recipient. The Romanist Divines are also much divided in opinion respecting fictitious baptism, that is, baptism when there is some hinderance or disqualification in the person to be baptized.

2. Dens divides the fiction or hinderance (fictio sive obex) into essential and accidental. When the disqualification is essential, or when there is a want of intention, that will render baptism null or invalid from the commencement; then every effect of baptism is wanting, and such a person must be baptized anew. But if the hinderance be accidental, that is, a want of disposition or of proper moral qualifications in the receiver, the baptism is considered informal, yet valid, but unfruitful, and wanting in its effects. It is much disputed whether an impediment of this kind prevents the infusion of the virtues of faith and hope.* But when the hinderance is removed, baptism is then said to produce its proper effects, namely, pardon of sins, &c., so that the present disposition, as it were, coalesces with the baptism formerly received, validly, but without its fruits. Some curious questions, however, are discussed respecting those who are unfit subjects of baptism.

3. In the following particulars we may scripturally object to the doctrine of the Church of Rome in reference to the effects of this rite:

(1.) Faith is made void, by substituting baptism in its place. From the quotations which we have made from the standard and infallible authorities of this Church, this will appear evident to all who have carefully read the Scriptures, and have studied their contents.

(2.) Baptism usurps the place of regeneration by the Holy Ghost. This is doing despite to the Spirit of grace, which alone renovates man. It is true, the baptism of the Holy One is sometimes, in their writings, distinguished from baptism by water; but there is such a prominency given to the latter, and so much stress laid on the mere ordinance, that the majority of the Roman Catholics have no correct views of the renewal of the Holy Spirit, or of a change of heart by his divine influences.

(3.) The mere ceremony of baptism, as performed according to the ritual of the Romish Church, is the principal object kept in view in their baptism. The result is, that they chiefly rest in the form, without regarding the thing signified.

VIII. The ceremonies of baptism.

1. The Roman Catholics have introduced a multitude of ceremonies into this sacrament, a brief description of which will be necessary in order to give a correct view of their manner and object in its administration.

They say, that although these ceremonies are not absolutely necessary, they are of great importance, and challenge deep veneration. They affirm also that they were instituted by the Apostles, and contribute to the devout and holy administration of the rite. The ceremonies and prayers used in the baptismal service are reduced to three heads by the Roman Catechism, whence we take the following description, except in some points where other authorities are adduced. The first comprehends such as are used before coming to the baptismal font; the second, such as are observed there; and the third, those which immediately follow its administration.*

2. First, The rites and ceremonies which precede coming to the baptismal font.

(1.) Baptismal water. This is blessed on the eve of Easter and of Pentecost, except in cases of necessity. "In blessing these waters a lighted torch is put into the font, to represent the fire of divine love which is communicated to the soul by baptism, and the light of good example, which all who are baptized ought to give; and holy oil and chrism are mixed with the water, to represent the spiritual union of the soul with God, by the grace received in baptism."† The reason of this is, because the baptism of Christ is "with the Holy Ghost and with fire." (Matt. iii. 11.)

(2.) Presentation of the candidate at the Church door. "The person to be baptized is brought or conducted to the door of the church, and is forbidden to enter, as unworthy to be admitted into the house of God, until he has cast off the yoke of the most degrading servitude of Satan, devoted himself unreservedly to Christ, and pledged his fidelity to the just sovereignty of the Lord Jesus."‡

(3.) Catechetical instructions. The Priest then asks what he demands of the Church; and having received the answer, he first instructs him catechetically in the doctrines of the Christian faith, of which a profession is to be made in baptism.§

(4.) The exorcism. This consists of words of sacred and religious import, and of prayers; the design of which is to expel the devil, and weaken and crush his power. The Priest breathes upon him, and says, Depart from me, thou unclean spirit, and give place to the Holy Ghost the Comforter. Many signs of the cross are made during this ceremony. To the exorcism are added several other ceremonies.‖

(5.) Salt. The Priest puts a little blessed salt into the person's mouth, saying, Receive the salt of wisdom; may it be unto thee a propitiation unto life everlasting! This is designed to import, that by the doctrines of faith, and by the gift of grace, he shall be delivered from the corruption of sin, shall experience a relish for good works, and shall be nurtured with the food of divine wisdom.

[This ceremony is taken from a command of God in the old law, which says, "Whatsoever sacrifice thou offerest thou shalt season it with salt;" (Lev. ii. 13;) because salt is an emblem of wisdom or discretion, without which none of our performances are agreeable to God. And Christ himself says, "Have salt in you;" meaning

[* "Duplex est fictio sive obex, nempe, essentialis et accidentalis: accidentalis autem subdividitur in positivam seu voluntariam, et negativam seu involuntariam. Q. Quid facit fictio circa baptismum? R. Fictio essentialis, sive intentionis, reddit baptismum nullum et invalidum, ut dictum est initio; (No. 27;) unde impedit quemcumque baptismi effectum: et sic talis debet de novo postea baptizari. Si autem fictio sit tantum accidentalis, seu dispositionis, (sive voluntaria sive involuntaria,) baptismus erit informis, seu validus, sed infructuosus: unde, cum validus sit, imprimetur character; sed impeditur effectus gratiæ, prout hæc (No. 29) intelligitur secundum quadruplicem effectum. Disputatur tamen, an hæc fictio accidentalis impediat infusionem virtutum fidei et spei: de aliis autem virtutibus non est quæstio, cum juxta communem sententiam nunquam separentur a gratia sanctificante et charitate."—Dens Theologia, tom. v., No. 30, p. 192.]

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 187, 188.

† Hay, Sincere Christian, vol. i., p. 411.

‡ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 188.

§ Idem.

‖ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 189. Sincere Christian, vol. i., p. 411.

that heavenly wisdom, of which he says, "Be ye therefore wise as serpents and simple as doves." (Douay version.) This ceremony therefore denotes that by baptism we are solemnly dedicated and consecrated to God, as a sacrifice and oblation to his holy will; and that we ought ever after to preserve our souls from the corruption of sin by the salt of heavenly wisdom, by which alone we ought to regulate our whole life and conversation.*]

(6.) The sign of the cross. His forehead, eyes, breast, shoulders, and ears are signed with the sign of the cross.†

[He makes the sign of the cross upon his forehead and upon his breast, because God ordered all those that belonged to him to have the mark Thau (ת) "set upon their foreheads," (Ezek. ix. 4,) which is "the seal of the living God," (Rev. vii. 2,) and denotes that the person who receives it begins now to be one of the flock of Jesus Christ, and will, by the sacrament of baptism, soon be admitted to his fold, according to the word of our Saviour, "Other sheep I have who are not of this fold, them also must I bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd." (John x. 16.) Now, this sacred sign is planted on the forehead, to show, that after baptism we should never be ashamed of the cross of Christ, nor afraid to profess his doctrine; and it is planted on the breast, near the heart, to show that we should love the cross of Christ, and cheerfully submit to bear whatever portion of it he shall afterwards be pleased to lay upon us: being assured, that if we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him.‡]

(7.) The spittle. The Priest recites another exorcism, touching with a little spittle the ears and nostrils of the person to be baptized, and saying, Ephphatha, that is, Be thou opened into an odour of sweetness; but be thou put to flight, O devil, for the judgment of God will be at hand.

["This ceremony is taken from the example of Jesus Christ, who, when they had brought to him one that was deaf and dumb—taking him aside from the multitude, he put his fingers into his ears, and spitting he touched his tongue, and said to him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened; and immediately his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spoke right;—and by it is signified, that as Jesus Christ by this ceremony cured the deaf and dumb man, so by the grace of baptism, the ears of our soul are opened to hear the word of God, and the inspirations of his Holy Spirit; and that, obeying his holy will, manifested to us by this means, we become an odour of sweetness, and acceptable sacrifice well-pleasing to God, and likewise, by our good example, a good odour of Christ in them that are saved and in them that perish."§]

3. Secondly, The ceremonies which accompany baptism.

(1.) The renunciation. When the person to be baptized approaches the baptismal font, in three summary obligations he is expected to renounce Satan, his works, and pomps, in answer to the following interrogations:—Hast thou renounced Satan?—and all his works?—and all his pomps? to each of which he or his sponsor replies in the affirmative.

(2.) The oil of catechumens. He is next anointed with holy oil on the breast and between the shoulders by the Priest, who makes the sign of the cross, saying, I anoint thee with the oil of salvation, in Christ Jesus our Lord, that thou mayest have life everlasting.

["This ceremony is taken from the example of what God did in the old law, where he commanded, that all those things which immediately regarded his service, and were to be sanctified for that end, and consecrated, should be anointed with holy oil, as is declared in the book of Exodus, xl. 9, et seq. Now, the outward unction with oil, is an emblem of the inward grace of the Holy Ghost, which sanctifies the soul; for as oil gives light, warms, cures wounds, and strengthens weak parts, so the grace of the Holy Ghost enlightens the understanding, inflames the heart, cures the wounds of the soul, and strengthens its weakness. Hence of our Saviour it is said, 'God anointed him with the Holy Ghost;' and St. John said to his disciples, 'Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things.' This ceremony, therefore, signifies that the person to be baptized, having renounced the devil, and undertaken to fight manfully against him, will receive a plenteous grace from the Holy Ghost in baptism, to direct him in this warfare, to assist him and strengthen him to resist all his spiritual enemies; and, at the same time, is consecrated to God by this holy unction for this purpose. He is therefore anointed on the breast, to show that this grace will fortify him with great courage and resolution; and between the shoulders, to show that the grace of baptism will sweeten the yoke of Christ, and make the burden of his commands light, easy, and even delightful to him."*]

(3.) The profession of faith. The Priest then interrogates him on the several articles of the Creed; and on receiving a satisfactory answer, he is baptized.

(4.) Voluntary assent. The Catechism says here: "As man, by yielding the assent of his will to the wicked suggestions of Satan, fell under a just sentence of condemnation, so God will have none enrolled in the number of his soldiers but those whose service is voluntary, that by a willing obedience to his commands they may obtain eternal salvation."† The Council of Trent, however, with singular inconsistency, teaches the compulsory baptism and submission of heretics to the Church of Rome.

4. Thirdly. The ceremonies which follow the administration of baptism.

(1.) The oil of chrism. The Priest anoints with chrism the crown of his head, thus giving him to understand, that from the moment of his baptism he is united as a member to Christ, his Head, and ingrafted on his body; and that he is therefore called a Christian from Christ, as Christ is so called from chrism.‡ It is also said, that this anointing is "in imitation of the anointing of kings and priests by God's command in the old law; and signifies that royal priesthood to which we are raised by baptism." According to the words of St. Paul, "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood," &c.

(2.) The white garment. The Priest puts a white garment on the person baptized, saying, "Receive this garment, which mayest thou carry unstained before the judgment-seat of our Lord Jesus Christ, that thou mayest have eternal life. Amen." Instead of a white garment, infants receive a white kerchief, accompanied with the same words. "According to the doctrine of the holy Fathers, this symbol signifies the glory of the resurrection

[* Sincere Christian, vol. i., p. 412.]
† Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 189.
[‡ Sincere Christian, vol. i., p. 412.]
[§ Idem, p. 414.]

[* Idem, p. 415.]
† Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 191.
‡ Idem, p. 191.

to which we are born by baptism, the brightness and beauty with which the soul, when purified from the stains of sin, is invested, and the innocence and integrity which the person who has received baptism should preserve through life."*

(3.) The burning light; which is then put into his hand, as an emblem of the light of a good example, "to signify that faith received in baptism, and inflamed by charity, is to be fed and augmented by the exercise of good works."†

(4.) The name. This is taken from the catalogue of saints, that this similarity might stimulate to the imitation of the virtues, and to the attainment of the holiness, of the individual whose name he bears.

5. The rites and ceremonies prescribed in the Roman ritual are not to be omitted, or hastily supplied by others. This was expressly ordained by Benedict in his Constitutions.‡ He also strenuously enjoins the use of all the sacramentals of baptism, especially spittle, salt, and insufflation. § Nevertheless Clement XII. conceded to the Missionaries of the East Indies, in Madura, Massura, &c., that in case of necessity, provided the faith be safe, spittle might be omitted, and the insufflations might be used privately or secretly.‖ A Priest who omits any of them is guilty of mortal sin, unless great necessity interferes.

6. Against these Popish ceremonies we assert,

(1.) It is contrary to the genius of the Gospel that there should be such types, shadows, and significations brought into the service of God as these which they have connected with the administration of baptism. As we have one body, which is Christ, all such shadows ought to be abolished.

(2.) Roman Catholics consider these sacramentals, such as oil, salt, spittle, and breathing on, not only as seals, but as possessing the power of conferring sacred things. The Holy Spirit is not confined to these external signs, (for the Spirit operates as He listeth, John iii.,) which they say are endowed with power to give wisdom, strength, &c., against the wiles of the devil; for St. Paul declares, "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds." (2 Cor. x. 4.)

(3.) These ceremonies were not used in the original institution of baptism, nor practised by the primitive administrators. At the baptism of Christ they were not employed. He did not communicate them to his Apostles, neither did they adopt them. "Can any man forbid water that these may not be baptized?" (Acts x. 47.) He does not call for oil, salt, or spittle, or any such thing, but for water only.

(4.) Scripture is perverted most grossly, by Roman Catholic writers, in so expounding it as to authorize or justify the use of these ceremonies.*

[From what has been said on this subject it will be seen, that "the Romanists, agreeably to their superstitious opinion as to the efficacy of sacraments, consider baptism administered by a Priest having a good intention, as of itself applying the merits of Christ to the person baptized. According to them, baptism is absolutely necessary to salvation; and they therefore admit its validity when administered to a dying child by any person present, should there be no Priest at hand. From this view of its efficacy arises their distinction between sins committed before and after baptism. The hereditary corruption of our nature, and all actual sins committed before baptism, are said to be entirely removed by it; so that if the most abandoned person were to receive it for the first time in the article of death, all his sins would be washed away. But all sins committed after baptism, and the infusion of that grace which is conveyed by the sacrament, must be expiated by penance. In this notion of regeneration, or the washing away of original sin by baptism, the Roman Church followed Augustine; but as he was a predestinarian, he was obliged to invent a distinction between those who are regenerated, and those who are predestinated to eternal life; so that, according to him, although all the baptized are freed from that corruption which is entailed upon mankind by Adam's lapse, and experience a renovation of mind, none continue to walk in that state but the predestinated. The Lutheran Church also places the efficacy of this sacrament in regeneration, by which faith is actually conveyed to the soul of an infant. The Church of England in her baptismal services has not departed entirely from the terms used by the Romish Church, from which she separated. She speaks of those who are by nature 'born in sin,' being made by baptism 'the children of grace,' which are, however, words of equivocal import; and she gives thanks to God, 'that it hath pleased him to regenerate this infant with his Holy Spirit,' probably using the term 'regeneration' in the same large sense as several

* Catechism of Council of Trent, pp. 191, 192.

[† Dr. Rock informs us that, "among the other ceremonies which were practised immediately after baptism had been administered, St. Gregory Nazianzen, who flourished about the year 372, enumerates that of a lighted taper being carried by the neophyte. 'The lamps,' he says, in his fortieth Oration on the Baptized, 'which, immediately after baptism, thou shalt light, are emblems of those lamps of faith with which radiant souls shall hasten forth to meet the Bridegroom.' When personages of high distinction were baptized with public solemnity, the custom of bearing lights was observed with extraordinary magnificence. An instance is recorded in the splendid ceremonial which accompanied the administration of this sacrament to the younger Theodosius. 'After the Emperor had been baptized, and had issued from the church, another opportunity was afforded to behold the splendour and magnificent apparel of those who were invested with the public magistracy. Every one was robed with white, so that the whole assembly appeared covered as it were with snow. The patricians, illustrious personages, and the several dignitaries, with lines of military, preceded, bearing wax tapers in their hands: so that the stars themselves might have been imagined to have appeared upon the earth.' (Baronii Annal., 401.)

["The employment of lights on this occasion was most appropriate. The glowing taper was a symbol beautifully expressive of the actual illumination of the recently baptized person, beamed upon him by the Holy Spirit, and called to his remembrance that admonition of the Saviour: 'Let your light,' &c. 'Deinde cereus ardens in manum traditur, qui ostendit fidem charitate inflammatam, quam in baptismo accepit, bonorum operum studio alendam atque augendam esse.' (Cat. Conc. Trid., De Bapt., sect. lxi.)"—Rock's Hierurgia, pp. 582, 583.]

[‡ "Videant, autem, ne forte inanes aut leves timendi causæ illæ sint, quæ passim afferuntur pro omittendis in baptismatis administratione ceremoniis a rituali Romano præscriptis; quas etiam, quum ex veris gravibusque causis prætermitti contingat, primo quoque tempore suppleri curabunt; neque enim sine gravi peccato negliguntur tam magni ponderis tantæque antiquitatis ritus, atque ad reverentiam sacramento conciliandam maxime necessarii."—Benedict. XIV. Bullar., tom. i.; Const. 89, sect. 19, vol. ii., p. 180.]

[§ "Et a sacramentorum administratione exordium sumentes districte prohibemus, ne in baptizandis tam pueris, quam adultis cujuscumque sexus et conditionis, omittantur sacramentalia, sed omnia palam adhibeantur et signantur, saliva, sal, et insufflatio, quæ ex apostolica traditione Catholica Ecclesia recepit, ac ob recondita in his sacris ceremoniis Divinæ erga nos bonitatis mysteria, sancte et inviolabiliter custodivit; Decreto Sanctæ Universalis Romanæ Inquisitionis de anno 1656, pro signis facto, ob diversas rationes et circumstantias, minime obstante."—Benedict. XIV. Bullar., tom. i.; Const. 107, sect. 3., vol. ii., p. 373.]

‖ Benedict. XIV. Bullar., tom. i.; Decret. Clement. XII., sect. 14, 31, 32, vol. ii., pp. 389, 415, 416.

* Specimens of which may be seen in the Catechism of the Council of Trent; and also in the Sincere Christian, vol. i., p. 410.

of the ancient Fathers, and not in its modern theological interpretation, which is more strict. However this be, a controversy has long existed in the English Church, as to the real opinion of her founders on this point; one part of the Clergy holding the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, and the absolute necessity of baptism unto salvation; the other taking different views not only of the doctrine of Scripture, but also of the import of various expressions found in the Articles, Catechisms, and Offices of the Church itself."

[" The Apostle Peter expresses in a particular and most forcible manner the nature of Christian baptism: 'Not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ.' Now whether we take the word επερωτημα, rendered in our translation 'answer,' for a demand or requirement; or for the answer to a question or questions; or in the sense of stipulation; the general import of the passage is nearly the same. If the first, then the meaning of the Apostle is, that baptism is not the putting away the filth of the flesh, not a mere external ceremony, but a rite which demands or requires something of us, in order to the attainment of a good conscience. What that is, we learn from the words of our Lord;—it is faith in Christ: 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved;' which faith is the reliance of a penitent upon the atonement of the Saviour, who thus submits with all gratitude and truth to the terms of the evangelical covenant. If we take the second sense, we must lay aside the notion of some lexicographers and commentators, who think that there is an allusion to the ancient practice of demanding of the candidates for baptism, whether they renounced their sins, and the service of Satan, with other questions of the same import; for, ancient as these questions may be, they are probably not so ancient as the time of the Apostle. We know, however, from the instance of Philip and the eunuch, that there was an explicit requirement of faith, and as explicit an answer or confession. And Philip said, 'If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest;' and he answered, 'I believe that Jesus is the Son of God.' Every administration of baptism, indeed, implied this demand; and baptism, if we understand St. Peter to refer to this circumstance, was such an answer to the interrogations of the administrator, as expressed a true and evangelical faith. If we take the third rendering, of 'stipulation,' which has less to support it critically than either of the others, still, as the profession of faith was a condition of baptism, that profession had the full force of a formal stipulation, since all true faith in Christ requires an entire subjection to him, as Lord, as well as Saviour."*

[On the principle thus stated, Protestant evangelical Missionaries invariably proceed, in the admission of members within the pale of the Christian church. They simultaneously follow the practice of the primitive days, as exemplified in the Catecheses of Cyril, and admit none to baptism save those who have been previously instructed in the doctrines of the Gospel, and of whose sincerity they entertain a reasonable persuasion, assuring them, with Cyril of old, that if they be dissemblers before God, their mere baptismal washing will be unattended with any beneficial inward effects.†

[Dr. Wiseman frequently refers to the amazing success which attends the labours of the Romish Missionaries among the Heathen, in the immense number of converts whom they annually baptize and admit into the Church of Rome. In his Lectures, he lays down the principle upon which they are authorized to act, but which is, we hesitate not to say, decidedly at variance with the words of Christ and with the practice of the early Church. The Priests of the Propaganda first catch their converts, next baptize them: and then, after baptism, not before, as was the arrangement in Cyril's time, give them such instruction as they think good; the converts themselves, meanwhile, when they have heard prayers put up to the Virgin and the saints, and when they have seen the knee bent before tawdry images of the same holy personages, find no very violent change in stepping from Paganism to Popery, whatever those strenuous theistical iconoclasts, the Mahommetans, may think of the matter.*

[Dr. Wiseman must now speak for himself, and our readers shall witness the painful complacency with which he challenges the Missionaries of the Reformed Church to adopt, if they dare, the plan of apostate Rome, and in which the celebrated Professor singularly contradicts Cyril, Augustine, and Jerome, and other venerable worthies of the primitive Church, by unblushingly declaring that the ancient arrangement was to baptize FIRST, and to teach AFTERWARD.

[" We read (says Dr. Wiseman) of three or five thousand souls being converted in one day, and admitted into the Church, through baptism. Does this fact possibly allow us to imagine, that they were all instructed in the detailed mysteries of religion? By baptism, it was understood that they were received into perfect community with the faithful; and can we therefore suppose that all those whom the Apostles at once baptized, had time to go through the minute examination of all the doctrines presented to their acceptance? The very words of Scripture itself are at variance with such a supposition, because it speaks of these conversions as having been instantaneous. But there must have been some compendious principle, some ground on which they were received into Christianity, which involved their acceptance, when taught, of whatever would be explained by those who had converted them; there must have been a summary and complete confession of faith exacted from them, which guaranteed their subsequent adhesion to every doctrine that should be taught; otherwise it would have been but a profanation of the solemn rite and sacrament of baptism, to admit men within the pale of the Christian church, and yet leave them the option of retiring again from it, should they not be able to satisfy themselves that each of its doctrines was true. Now, imagine what you please, make what hypothesis you like, you can give no adequate solution, short of supposing implicit reliance in the teaching of the Pastors of the Church, which, in matters of religion, amounts to a belief in the infallibility of the teaching power: you must conclude it was understood, that whatever doctrines should afterwards be placed before them by their instructers, they were willing to receive. And, in fact, we do find this to have been the case in practice: because, when the Apostles subsequently made decrees, and published laws regarding the practice of the Church, when they came to decisions on matters of belief and discipline, all the faithful submitted to those decrees; all the faithful reverenced them not only as teachers but as superiors, to whose authority they were obliged to bow. This admission explains at once the difficulty, and shows the principle on which the early converts were admitted into the Church. It was upon the understanding, and upon a sufficient pledge given, that they were ready to embrace the doctrines of Christianity, not because they had minutely and individually examined them, but because, satisfied of their first step being right,—the belief in an authority vested in the Apostles, they were willing, and should be obliged, to receive implicitly whatever might afterwards come from their mouths.

[* Watson's Theol. Institutes, Works, vol. xii., pp. 222, 235.
[† Cyrilli Opera, cat. procem., p. i.—iii., cat. i., p. 2, cat. iii., p. 16.

[* Faber on the Doctrine of Transubstantiation, introd. cxxx.

["Apply this to the two rules of faith: and suppose a Missionary arriving in a foreign country, where the name of Christ was not known, and advancing as his fundamental rule, that it was necessary for all men to read the Bible, and for each one to satisfy his own mind, on all that he should believe. I ask you, not if you think it possible that thousands could be said to be properly converted by one discourse, under such a principle, but whether, if the Missionary conscientiously believed and taught this principle, he could, in one day, admit those thousands, by the baptismal rite, into the religion of Christ? Would he be satisfied that he had made true converts, who would not go back from the faith once received? I am sure any one conversant with the practice of modern Missions, will be satisfied that no Missionary, except one from the (Roman) Catholic Church, would receive persons so slightly instructed into its bosom, or be satisfied that they would persevere in the religion they had adopted. But they can do it at this day, and they have done it in every age; for St. Francis Xavier, like the Apostles, converted and baptized his thousands in one day, who remained steadfast in the faith and law of Christ. And all may be so admitted at once into the (Roman) Catholic religion, who give up their belief in their own individual judgment, and adopt the principle, that whatever the (Roman) Catholic Church shall teach them, must be true." *

[What the Apostles, who were divinely inspired, and who could employ the mighty influence of miracles, and who seem often to have possessed the faculty of reading the heart, might do in baptizing converts without any lengthened previous catechetical instruction, can be no rule for those who are very differently circumstanced.

[So, with all respect to Dr. Wiseman, judged the early Catholic Church: and accordingly she admitted none to baptism in the compendious mode practised, as we learn from that gentleman, by the Romish Missionaries; but, on the contrary, she painfully instructed her already partially trained catechumens, during the forty days before their baptism, in all the grand truths and mysteries of the Gospel, that so, as Cyprian speaks, they might be able at the font to give, to the legitimate interrogation, the answer of a good conscience.]

CHAPTER III.

CONFIRMATION.

I. Statement of the Doctrine. Council of Trent cited.—II. Nature and Institution of Confirmation. 1. Its nature: 2. Its sacramental character: 3. Its institution.—III. Its Matter.—IV. Its Form.—V. The Minister.—VI. Its Subject.—VII. Its Effects. 1. Whether it confers grace: 2. Whether it impresses a character: 3. Of its necessity.—VIII. Its Ceremonies.—IX. Confutation of Confirmation as a Sacrament. 1. Not supported by Acts viii. 17: 2. Nor appointed by Christ: 3. The operations of the Spirit not confined to it: 4. Absurdity of the ceremonies.

[* Wiseman's Lectures on the Doctrines and Practices of the Catholic Church, vol. i., pp. 131—133.]

I. The doctrine stated.

The Council of Trent passed the following canons on confirmation:—

"Can. 1. Whoever shall affirm that the confirmation of the baptized is a trifling ceremony, and not a true and proper sacrament; or that formerly it was nothing more than a kind of catechising, in which the neighbouring young persons explained the reasons of their faith before the Church; let him be accursed.

"Can. 2. Whoever shall affirm that they offend the Holy Spirit who attribute any virtue to the said chrism of confirmation; let him be accursed.

"Can. 3. Whoever shall affirm that the usual administrator of confirmation is not the Bishop only, but any ordinary Priest; let him be accursed."*

Let us consider,—

II. The nature and institution of confirmation.

1. It is called "confirmation," because it professes to confirm and perfect those who duly receive it. It is thus defined: "A sacrament instituted by Christ the Lord, by which the Holy Spirit is given to the baptized, constantly and intrepidly to profess the faith of Christ."

According to the Roman Catechism, confirmation differs from baptism in the following manner: "As by the grace of baptism we are begotten to newness of life, and by that of confirmation grow to full maturity, 'having put away the things of a child,' (1 Cor. xiii. 11,) we can hence sufficiently comprehend that the same difference which in the natural order exists between birth and growth, exists also in the supernatural between baptism, which regenerates, and confirmation, which imparts full growth and perfect spiritual strength."†

2. In proof that confirmation is a sacrament, decrees of Councils, tradition, and Scripture are adduced.

The decrees of Councils cannot be admitted as authoritative by Protestants; and Roman Catholics never did and never can prove their decisions to be infallible. The following texts of Scripture are adduced:—"Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost." (Acts viii. 17.) "And when Paul laid his hands on them the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied." (Acts xix. 6.) He who carefully considers these passages will easily perceive that they do not teach the sacrament of confirmation, as held in the Roman Church. Therefore a particular examination of them is unnecessary.

3. The Roman Catechism asserts that Christ instituted this sacrament. "He (the Pastor) will accordingly inform them, that not only was it instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, but, as St. Fabian, Bishop of Rome, testifies, the chrism and the words used in its administration were also appointed by him; a fact of easy proof to those who believe confirmation to be a sacrament,

* "Canon 1. Si quis dixerit, confirmationem baptizatorum otiosam cæremoniam esse, et non potius verum et proprium sacramentum; aut olim nihil aliud fuisse, quam catechesim quamdam, qua adolescentiæ proximi fidei suæ rationem coram Ecclesia exponebant; anathema sit.

"Canon 2. Si quis dixerit, injurios esse Spiritui Sancto eos qui sacro confirmationis chrismati virtutem aliquam tribuunt; anathema sit.

"Canon 3. Si quis dixerit, sanctæ confirmationis ordinarium ministrum non esse solum Episcopum, sed quemvis simplicem Sacerdotem; anathema sit."—Concil. Trid., sess. vii.

† Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 195.

for all the sacred mysteries are beyond the power of man, and could have been instituted by God alone."* Here the sophistry of this authoritative Catechism is manifest, in adducing the proof, that this sacrament was instituted by Christ, from the credulity of the ignorant!—it may indeed be a fact satisfactorily tested by those who believe confirmation to be a sacrament! Certainly there is no Scripture warrant to show that it is one. Hence among Romanists there is great diversity of opinion respecting the time when the institution took place, some referring it to a Council, others to the last supper, and others to the time between the resurrection and ascension.†

III. The matter of confirmation.

This is chrism, a compound substance, made of oil of olives and balsam, and afterwards consecrated by a Bishop. This, they say, represents the manifold graces of the Holy Spirit, and the excellency of the sacrament. "That such is its matter, the Church and her Councils have uniformly taught, and the same doctrine has been handed down to us by St. Denis, and by many other Fathers of authority too great to be questioned, particularly by Pope Fabian, who testifies that the Apostles received the composition of chrism from our Lord, and transmitted it to us: that this its solemn consecration is in accordance with the instructions of our Lord, when, at his last supper, he committed to his Apostles the manner of making chrism, we learn from Pope Fabian." ‡ What proves fatal, however, to this authority is, that the letter ascribed to Pope Fabian has been found to be a forgery, and is acknowledged as such by Dens, who says: "This epistle of Fabian is now, among learned men, esteemed as supposititious and apocryphal, as also the other decretal letters before Pope Siricius." Thus the principal support upon which this fabricated statement of the authors of the Catechism rests is a forged letter ascribed to this Pope.

The ointment is to be put on the front of the person in form of the sign of the cross.

IV. The form of confirmation.

This consists of the following words:—"I sign thee with the sign of the cross, and I confirm thee with the chrism of salvation, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The Catechism says, "There are three things that demand particular attention; the divine power which, as a primary cause, operates in the sacrament; the spiritual strength which it imparts to the faithful unto salvation; and, lastly, the sign impressed on him who is to engage in the warfare of Christ."* Prayer and imposition of hands accompany the form, or are component parts thereof.

V. The Minister.

Bishops alone are the ordinary Ministers of confirmation; but Priests, by delegation, may also confer it.

VI. Subjects of confirmation.

"Confirmation may be administered to all as soon as they have been baptized; but until children shall have reached the use of reason, its administration is inexpedient. If not postponed to the age of twelve, it should therefore be deferred until at least the age of seven."† It is not to be administered to the dying, yet it may be conferred upon insane persons. For the valid reception of this sacrament, the intention of merely receiving it is sufficient. But to receive it profitably, a state of grace is necessary, together with devotion and proper instruction. Previous prayer is also required.

VII. Effects of confirmation.

[1. "Confirmation, unless some obstacle be opposed by the receiver, imparts new grace. We have already shown, that it is the property of these sacred and mystic signs, at once to indicate and produce grace; and as we cannot imagine grace and sin to co-exist in the soul, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that it also remits sin. Besides these properties, common alike to this and the other sacraments, it is the peculiar characteristic of confirmation to perfect the grace of baptism; those who are initiated into the Christian religion, share, as it were, the tenderness and infirmity of new-born infants; but they afterwards gather strength from the sacrament of chrism, to combat the assaults of the world, the flesh, and the devil, and are confirmed in faith to confess and glorify the name of our Lord Jesus Christ."‡]

Dens informs us that this grace is strengthening and comforting, having annexed to it the abundance of virtues and the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit; because in this sacrament the Holy Spirit, or the plenitude of grace, is especially given; not that greater grace cannot be given, but because this is a full complement, perfecting man in grace to that degree, that in consequence he can be called, and properly is, a perfect Christian. §

2. This sacrament is also said to impress a character, so that it cannot be reiterated.

3. How far this sacrament is necessary to salvation, is a point not well defined by the Roman Catholic Church. All acknowledge that it is not absolutely necessary, as baptism, penance, &c.; but they differ considerably respecting the degree of necessity, as any one will perceive by consulting Dens on the necessity of confirma-[† "Sacramentum confirmationis, æque ac alia sacramenta, esse a Christo Domino institutum, deducitur ex Conc. Trid., sess. vii., can. 1, de Sacramentis in Genere. Vide hic S. Thom., art. i., ad 1, et num. 32, de Sacramentis in Genere, ubi simul probatur, illam institutionem esse immediate a Christo factam. Unde nunc plane cessat contraria quorundam antiquorum hypothesis, quasi vel Apostoli, vel Patres in Concilio Meldensi, Spiritu Sancto inspirante, hoc sacramentum instituerint: ut etiam putavit S. Bonaventura, secutus Magistrum suum Alexandrum Alensem.

* Idem, p. 196.

["Quando Christus Dominus instituit hoc sacramentum?—R. Duplex circa hoc præcipue est opinio: quidam, ex epistola 2 Fabiani Papæ ad Episcopos Orientales institutum dicunt in ultima cœna; in cujus rei memoriam (inquiunt) Ecclesia adhuc quotannis eadem die novum chrisma conficere et benedicere, vetusque comburere solet. Sed cum hæc S. Fabiani epistola apud eruditos nunc habeatur tanquam supposititia et apocrypha; (uti et aliæ decretales litteræ ante Syricium Papam;) ideo institutum dicunt alii inter Christi resurrectionem et ascensionem, dum per quadraginta dies cum Apostolis conversatus illis loquebatur de regno Dei, et multa de Spiritu S. prædixit, quibus diebus (inquit S. Leo Papa Sermone i. de Ascensione) magna confirmata sacramenta, magna sunt revelata mysteria."—Dens Theologia, tom. v.; De Confirm., No. 3, p. 233.

‡ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 197.

* Idem, p. 199. † Idem, p. 202. ‡ Idem, p. 203.

[§ "Quinam sunt effectus hujus sacramenti?—1. Primus effectus est gratia sanctificans, per se secunda, et per accidens prima, cui in initio Ecclesiæ sæpe conjungebatur donum miraculosum linguarum. Est autem illa gratia roborativa et confortativa, annexam habens abundantiam virtutum et septem donorum Spiritus Sancti, de quibus Isaias cap. xi., ver. 2, 3, et ideo in hoc sacramento dari dicitur specialiter Spiritus Sanctus, seu gratiæ plenitudo; non quasi major dari non possit, sed quia est ultimum complementum, hominem taliter in gratia perficiens, ut ab illa vocari possit, et sufficienter sit, perfectus Christianus.

["Specialiter autem virtutes augentur fidei et fortitudinis.

["2 Secundus effectus est sacramentalis gratia, seu actualis, suo tempore danda, dum scilicet occasio se offeret, ad fidem, corde, ore, et opere strenue et constanter profitendam, ad vincendas contra fidem tentationes, ac adversa quælibet pro fide patienter toleranda.

["3. Tertius effectus est character, ratione cujus hoc sacramentum est initerabile."—Dens Theologia, tom. v.; De Confirm., No. 10, p. 243.]

tion.* He says it is not requisite by a necessity of the medium; and yet, from the decisions of the Council of Trent, and the fact that it is made a sacrament, we are led to suppose that it must be of great importance, especially as the gift of the Holy Spirit appears to be confined to the administration of this ordinance.

It is disputed also whether confirmation be requisite by a necessity of precept, obligatory PER SE and directly. Some deny this; others affirm and declare that the obligation is both divine and ecclesiastical, and binding under a heavy penalty. This last seems to be received by many.

VIII. The ceremonies of confirmation.

The following are the most prominent:—

1. Those to be confirmed, before they come to the sacrament, are required to wash their forehead.†

2. The males are placed in one part of the church, and the females in another. The males are first confirmed, and then the females, unless the Bishop order it otherwise. ‡

3. Unction of the forehead. The Bishop, with his hand raised, on the head of the person to be confirmed, advokes the Holy Spirit, and at the same time anoints the forehead with the blessed chrism, saying, "I sign thee with the sign of the cross," &c.§ "In this sacrament," says the Catechism, "the Holy Spirit pours himself into the souls of the faithful, and imparts to them increased strength and courage, to enable them, in the spiritual contest, to fight manfully, and to resist successfully, their most implacable foes." They are therefore told, that henceforward "they are not to be deterred by fear or shame, feelings of which the countenance is the principal index, from the open confession of the name of Christ."‖

4. The sign of the cross.¶ The unction is made in the form of a cross, to teach that no Christian should glory save in the cross of Christ; it being the mark by which the Christian is distinguished from all others, as the soldier is distinguished by his peculiar military badges, and which should be impressed upon the forehead, the most dignified and conspicuous part of the human form.

5. The gentle blow on the cheek. The person confirmed receives this from the hand of the Bishop, to remind him, according to the Catechism, that, as a courageous champion, he should be prepared to brave, with unconquered resolution, all adversities for the name of Christ.* The Council of Senon, in 1524, says, that "by this percussion the confirmed person is enabled to preserve the memory of the event, lest he should be confirmed a second time." Others suppose the blow on the cheek is nothing more than a sign of peace given to the confirmed by the Bishop. It is acknowledged, that in ancient times this was not in use, and some Bishops now omit it altogether.†

6. The kiss of peace. "He receives the kiss of peace to give him to understand that he has been blessed with the fulness of divine grace, and with that peace which surpasseth all understanding."‡

7. Why administered at Pentecost. "Because the Apostles were then strengthened and confirmed by the power of the Holy Ghost; and also to remind the faithful, by the recollection of that supernatural event, of the number and magnitude of the mysteries contained in that sacred unction."§

8. The person confirmed has one godfather, if a boy, and one godmother, if a girl; of whom the same things are required as of those in baptism.

9. The name of the person is sometimes changed, and frequently a new one is added from the calendar of saints.

10. The head of the confirmed person is bound round with a linen bandage, which in some places remained for seven days, in others, for twenty-four hours. Now in many diocesses this is omitted; but, immediately after confirmation, the front is wiped by the Priests. ‖

IX. Confutation of confirmation as a sacrament.

Did the Church of Rome observe the rite of confirmation as a formal ceremony to initiate members into her community, we should then have no controversy with her on the subject; but as she attaches to it sacramental qualities, and therefore gives it a new character, we must oppose it as unsound and unscriptural.

1. The following is the principal passage of Scripture on which she institutes the sacrament of confirmation:—"Then laid they hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost." (Acts viii. 17.) That there is no ground for the sacrament of confirmation in this passage of Scripture will appear from the following considerations:—(1.) There is reference to the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, such as the gift of tongues, of prophesying, healing, &c., which were bestowed on the disciples, of which gift the imposition of hands was a sign: but it is impossible to ground an ordinary and perpetual sacra-

[* "An et quomodo confirmatio est necessaria ad salutem?—1. Imprimis non est necessaria necessitate medii; ut patet in infantibus baptizatis, qui ante confirmationem moriuntur. 2. Dubium non est de necessitate præcepti, quasi negativi; graviter scilicet prohibentis contemptum hujus sacramenti. 3. Nec etiam dubium est, quin possit quis etiam sub gravi teneri per accidens ad hujus sacramenti susceptionem, v. g., ratione scandali vitandi, ratione periculi aliquin succumbendi tentationi contra fidem, v. g., tempore persecutionis, &c. 4. Quæstio igitur superest, an confirmatio sit necessaria necessitate præcepti per se et directe obligantis?—R. Quidam negant, ut Suarez, Billuart, &c.: alii non nisi obligant sub levi, ut tenet Sylvius: alii vero (ut Juenin, Tournelly, Daelman, Pauwels, &c.) agnoscant præceptum divinum et ecclesiasticum, obligans sub gravi."—Dens Theol., tom. v., De Confirm., No. 11, p. 244.]

[† "Antequam ad sacramentum accedant, frontem abluere jubentur, ex Conc. Mediol. V., sub. S. Carolo."—Bailly Theol., tom. iv.; De Confirm., c. viii., p. 61.]

[‡ "Mares ab una parte, ab altera feminæ, in Ecclesia sistere debent, et quod veteris ritus est, primum mares, deinde feminæ, genibus flexis, confirmentur, nisi aliquando aliter Episcopus censuerit. Ita in eodem Conc. legitur."—Idem, ibid.]

[§ "Episcopus, levata manu super confirmandos, ut ait sacramentarium S. Greg., advocat Spiritum S., tum vero illorum frontem inungit chrismate benedicto, dicens, Signo te signo, &c.; quem ritum esssentialem esse constat ex antea dictis."—Idem, ibid.]

‖ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 205.

[¶ "Unctio fit per modum crucis, ut significetur non esse homini Christiano gloriandum nisi in cruce D. N. J. C., cur autem in fronte fiat superius expositum est."—Bailly Theol., tom. iv.; De Confirm., c. viii.]

 Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 205.

* Idem, ibid.

[† "Levem postea alapam in maxilla confirmati infligit Episcopus, ut ea percussione, inquit Conc. Senon., 1524, memoriam habeat se fuisse confirmatum, ne iterum confirmetur: vel, juxta Catechismum Romanum, ut meminerit se tanquam fortem athletam paratum esse oportere omnia adversa, omnes contumelias, invicto animo pro Christi nomine perferre. Alii volunt ejusmodi alapam nihil esse aliud quam signum pacis ab Episcopo confirmatis datæ. Perantiquus non est ille ritus, cum nec in sacramentario S. Greg., nec apud Veteres mentio illius occurrat, nuncque a pluribus Episcopis omittitur."—Bailly Theol., tom. iv.; De Confirm., c. viii., p. 62.]

‡ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p 205.

§ Idem.

[‖ "Frons confirmati, peracto unctionis ritu, non multis abhinc annis, vitta linea circumligabatur, quæ certis in locis per septem dies, alibi vero per viginti quatuor horas tantum, deferebatur; nunc in multis diœcesibus nulla adhibetur fascia; sed statim post confirmationem frons abstergitur a Sacerdotibus."—Bailly Theol., tom. iv.; De Confirm., c. viii.]

ment on an extraordinary example; and that there were such visible graces of the Spirit is manifest, because Simon Magus saw that the Holy Ghost was given to them by the laying on of hands. (2.) The Holy Ghost was obtained by their prayers, (verse 15,) and not only by that imposition. (3.) To make a sacrament, it is not sufficient to have a visible sign, to show some spiritual grace bestowed; for then the spittle and clay which Christ used must also be sacraments; for here are outward signs, and some effect followed; yet because there was no institution of Christ, nor any commandment to use them, neither these nor the imposition of hands can be considered a sacrament. (4.) The extraordinary gifts which the Apostles bestowed have now ceased; the ceremony, therefore, has also ceased. In short, Romanists are bound to show similar miraculous signs, even as the Apostles did, in order to prove their position; and until they can show these, we shall reject unhesitatingly their sacrament of confirmation.

2. Every sacrament must have its appointment from Christ, and must consist of an outward sign, and of words of institution. But this ordinance of the Papists is utterly destitute of such authority. The sign which they use is oil. Their words of consecration are, "I sign thee with the sign of the cross, anoint thee with the chrism of health, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." But none of these have their institution from Christ or his Apostles. We read, indeed, that the latter used imposition of hands, but never chrism or oil. Indeed, this superstitious device was not then in use, having been brought in long after by Sylvester, who is reported by Damasus to have been the inventor of chrism.

The Scripture, besides this extraordinary imposition of hands used by the Apostles, makes mention of another as appertaining to the sacrament of baptism; as we learn from the words of the Apostle, "The doctrine of baptism and of laying on of hands." (Heb. vi. 2.) This external rite seems to have been connected with baptism, and not a separate sacrament from it. So Tertullian speaks of the unction which was common in his days: "Having come out of the bath, we are anointed thoroughly with a blessed unction, according to the ancient rule by which they were wont to be anointed for the priesthood, with oil out of an horn." *

The following text has been quoted in favour of the unction of confirmation:—"It is God which confirmeth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us." (2 Cor. i. 21.) But this is too gross an interpretation of the passage to confine it to their anointing, seeing the Apostle explains it in the following verse:—"He hath sealed us, and given us the earnest of his Spirit in our hearts." Besides, the Holy Ghost is represented as given without any chrism. (Acts viii. 17, 19; x. 44.)

3. They speak of and treat injuriously the Holy Spirit in confining his operations to their confirmation, which, they say, has power to confer grace. But the Scripture represents the operation of the Spirit by the emblem of wind, "which bloweth where it listeth," (John iii. 8,) and therefore not confined to mere ceremonies.

4. We have already seen what kind of ceremonies they use, such as breathing on the pot of chrism, saluting it in these words, Ave, sanctum chrisma, "Hail, holy chrism;" the kiss; the blow on the face; the forehead bound round, &c. On these we briefly remark, (1.) That some of them are ridiculous, as the breathing on the oil, the striking of the party confirmed. (2.) One of them is idolatrous,—that of saluting the oil. (3.) All of them are superstitious, being mystical significations which have no countenance from the Gospel.

["From all which together it is evident, that since by the Holy Ghost in the text is meant the miraculous gifts of it, such as the gift of tongues, of prophesying, of miracles, and the like; and the Church of Rome neither can nor does pretend to confer such extraordinary power by her sacrament of confirmation, there are no footsteps of her sacramental grace of confirmation here, nor any reason for her to ground that sacrament upon this text.

["But let us again suppose, that by the Apostle's imposition of hands here, was conferred only the ordinary gift of sanctifying grace; yet this will not prove such imposition of hands to be a sacrament, except they of the Church of Rome can show, that Christ did command and institute such a ceremony of imposition of hands for such a purpose. And this is what Bellarmine did undertake in the third place to show, for this sacrament of confirmation. But instead of a text, he only falls to concluding, that the Apostles would not have used such imposition of hands, if they had not had their Lord's command for it.

["But this is concluding without using premises, and this is begging the question; for as to the rite of blessing by imposition of hands, the Apostles needed no more a command from our Saviour for that than for kneeling at their prayers, both the one and the other being the frequent and known practice of the nation of the Jews, to whom the Apostles did belong, and therefore requiring no commands for the use of them.

["Before we can, then, grant to Bellarmine, or to the Church of Rome, that confirmation is a sacrament, they must prove that it was instituted by Christ, which Bellarmine is not able to do; that it hath an outward visible sign appointed and set apart for it, which he was not able to do; and, lastly, that it had a power of conferring sanctifying grace to the person confirmed, which Bellarmine is no more able to prove than either of the other two. We are sure the texts he hath brought have been far enough from doing it for him.

["Bellarmine hath two more texts which do not so much concern the proving confirmation to be a sacrament, as that chrism was the matter of it. Certainly Bellarmine did look upon his own privilege to be very great, or his adversaries' memories and judgments to be very small, that he can so formally in one part of a book set himself to prove, that imposition of hands was the matter of the sacrament of confirmation, and allege Scripture for it; and in another part of the same book, and within seven chapters of the former, set himself as formally to prove, that chrism made of oil of olives and balsam, was the matter of that sacrament, and allege Scripture, too, for the proof of this; the first of his texts for which is, 2 Cor. i. 21, 22: 'Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God, who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.'

["From this place Bellarmine gathers, that by the anointing mentioned here, is either meant the outward ceremony of anointing used in confirmation, or an allusion is made to it: but to give a brief answer to this, Bellarmine supposes what he should prove; he supposes there was then such a sacrament as confirmation, but he should have proved it; he supposes, that anointing with chrism was used then in this confirmation, but he should have proved this too. Without this he hath no foundation, either for his outward ceremony of anointing in this place, or for an allusion to it. The text itself is serviceable for no such purposes, the whole purport of it being, that God hath given his Holy Spirit, which is metaphorically called 'the unction from above,' to those disciples, for to strengthen and confirm them in all holiness.

* "Egressi de lavacro perunguimur benedicta unctione de pristina disciplina, qua ungi oleo de cornu in sacerdotiam solebant," &c.—Tertull. Opera, De Baptismo, cap. vii.

["His other place is 1 John ii. 27: 'But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you; but as the same anointing teacheth you all things, and is truth, and is no lie; and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him.' This text, falling in so directly with the other, needs but a word to answer it. Nothing is more plain than by unction here, is meant the Holy Spirit of God, which is here said to abide in them, to teach them, and to be truth itself.

["Can Bellarmine affirm any of these things concerning his chrism of oil of olives and balsam? Does it abide in the faithful inwardly? Does the oil teach them that are confirmed all things? or is the oil of confirmation truth itself? To avoid the imputation of trifling as much as Bellarmine did in producing these texts, we shall not spend any more words about them. But we must not forget the author of the Touchstone of the Reformed Gospel, who has another text for confirmation in reserve.

["It is Heb. vi. 1; where laying on of hands is reckoned as a principle of the doctrine of Christ; and he tells us that by laying on of hands here, is meant confirmation. But this should have been proved as well as said; for, as to the laying on of hands mentioned here, it is altogether disputed among commentators, whereunto it does belong; whether to imposition of hands in ordination of Pastors; or to that imposition in reconciling of penitents to the Church; or to the imposition of hands on the sick; or to that used by the Apostles for conferring the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost; or for that imposition of hands which from apostolical institution was used by the Bishops in ratifying and confirming that baptism to be perfect, which had been administered by Priests or Deacons; or, lastly, for that imposition used to persons newly married. When the author of the Touchstone, or any friend for him, hath determined which of the several impositions is meant here, it will be time enough to offer him another answer to this place.

["Upon the whole, then, the reader cannot but see how little reason the Church of Rome had to make a sacrament of confirmation; and to what odd shifts Cardinal Bellarmine was put, to make some sort of a plea for her. He was forced, in order to the having any show of benefit from Acts viii. 17, to deny the matter of confirmation now in use in his Church; and, by urging that imposition of hands was the matter of that sacrament, to prove upon his own Church that she was guilty of a grievous sacrilege in altering and changing the matter of that sacrament. However, after all his shifts and his pains herein, there is not one syllable in Scripture for the Romish sacrament of confirmation. There is no institution of this sacrament to be met with there; not the least mention of their chrism there; nor any promise set down there of a sanctifying grace annexed to this sacrament. Every one of these requisites is owned by Bellarmine himself, to be necessary to the advancing any rite to the being of a sacrament: since, then, every one of these is wanting to this pretended sacrament, we ought to conclude, that there is no Scripture which proves confirmation to be a sacrament."*]

CHAPTER IV.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

I. STATEMENT OF THE DOCTRINE. 1. The American Catechism quoted: 2. Council of Trent cited: 3. The Roman Catechism quoted: 4. Analysis of it: 5. Absurdity of the doctrine.—II. CONFUTATION OF THE DOCTRINE. 1. It has no ground in Scripture in general, nor in the words of institution in particular. First. Their sense of the words supposes things impossible and contradictory; Secondly. The Protestant sense shown to be correct, by nine arguments: 2. It is contrary to several texts of Scripture: 3. It contradicts our senses: 4. It is contrary to reason, and involves the plainest contradictions and absurdities: 5. It involves absolute impossibilities: 6. It is a distinguishing article of their Church: 7. It is impious and blasphemous in itself, and tends to impiety, blasphemy, and superstition; (1.) It involves eating human flesh; (2.) And the Divinity; (3.) This considered profane even by Heathens; (4.) And by Mohammedans; (5.) And Jews; (6.) The Fathers ridicule the Heathen for worshipping such deities as can be eaten; (7.) Anecdote of a lady and a Priest; (8.) Roman Catholic authors quoted.—III. THEIR ARGUMENTS FOR TRANSUBSTANTIATION STATED AND ANSWERED. 1. They say that, "previous to the institution, bread had never been taken as a sign of our Lord's body:" 2. The sixth chapter of John considered. Thirteen arguments against their exposition. The proper exposition: 3. Their argument from the secret discipline of the early Church: 4. And from the language of the ancient Liturgies, and the early ecclesiastical writers: 5. They say their doctrine is no more mysterious than that of the Trinity. Four points of difference traced between the two doctrines: 6. They say it is a mystery: 7. That God can do all things: 8. That it is a speculative point.—IV. THE TESTIMONY OF THE FATHERS. 1. Eight premises introductory to their testimony: 2. Their testimony; (1.) Ignatius; (2.) Irenæus; (3.) Tertullian; (4.) Justin Martyr; (5.) Origen; (6.) Clemens Alexandrinus; (7.) Cyprian; (8.) Eusebius; (9.) Ephrem, Patriarch of Constantinople; (10.) Macarius; (11.) Augustine, (12.) Cyril of Jerusalem; (13.) Jerome; (14.) Gregory Nazianzen; (15.) Ambrose; (16.) Chrysostom; (17.) Theodoret; (18.) Gelasius; (19.) Facundus and others: 3. Concluding remark on their testimony.—V. RISE, PROGRESS, AND ESTABLISHMENT OF THE DOCTRINE. 1. The excessive figures of the Fathers gave occasion to originate it. Specimens from Justin Martyr and Cyril of Jerusalem: 2. But it seems to have taken its rise from the Eutychian heresy: 3. Sentiment of the Seventh General Council in 754: 4. Progress in the ninth century; Paschasius; Stercorianism: 5. State of the question in the tenth century: 6. Opposed by Berenger in 1045, and toward the conclusion of the eleventh century. Indistinct views concerning the doctrine. Testimony of Aelfrick: 7. It was not properly established in the twelfth century: 8. Innocent III. uttered the opinion now embraced in the Church of Rome, and caused it to pass the Lateran Council in 1215. Authoritatively established at Trent in 1551.

I. 1. As heretofore, we shall also state the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this point in the words of their acknowledged standards. The Catechism of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States of America, published with the approbation of the Most Rev. Archbishop Marechal, teaches as follows on this article of their faith:—"Q. What is the holy eucharist? A. It is a sacrament, which contains THE BODY and BLOOD, THE SOUL and DIVINITY of Jesus Christ, under the forms and appearances of bread and wine. Q. Is it not bread and wine which is first put upon the altar for the celebration of the mass? A. Yes; it is always bread and wine till the Priest pronounces the words of consecration during the mass. Q. What happens by these words? A. The bread is changed into the body of Jesus Christ, and the wine into his blood. Q. What is this change called? A. It is called 'transubstantiation;' that is to say, a change of one substance into another." This is the doctrine taught to every Roman Catholic child, and we refer the reader to the whole of the article in the Catechism. We have already quoted Pope Pius's Creed, to the seventh and eighth articles of which we again refer the reader.

[* Gibson's Preservative against Popery, fol., vol. ii., Tit. vii., chap. i., pp. 22, 23.]

2. For the purpose of giving a more full view of this doctrine, we quote the Council of Trent, whose decisions on this, as on well as other points of Roman Catholic faith, are supremely authoritative. The following canons were passed at the thirteenth session of the Council :—

"Canon (1.) Whosoever shall deny, that in the most holy sacrament of the eucharist there are truly, really, and substantially contained the body and the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, together with his soul and divinity, and consequently Christ entire; but shall affirm that he is present therein only in a sign and figure, or by his power; let him be accursed.

"(2.) Whosoever shall affirm, that in the most holy sacrament of the eucharist there remains the substance of the bread and wine, together with the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; and shall deny that wonderful and peculiar conversion of the whole substance of the bread into his body, and of the whole substance of the wine into his blood, the species only of bread and wine remaining, which conversion the Catholic Church most fitly terms 'transubstantiation;' let him be accursed.

"(3.) Whosoever shall deny that Christ entire is contained in the venerable sacrament of the eucharist, under each species, and under every part of each species when they are separated; let him be accursed.

"(4.) Whosoever shall affirm that the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ are not present in the admirable eucharist, as soon as the consecration is performed, but only as it is used and received, and neither before nor after; and that the true body of our Lord does not remain in the hosts or consecrated morsels which are reserved or left after communion; let him be accursed.

"(5.) Whosoever shall affirm that remission of sins is the chief fruit of the most holy eucharist, or that other effects are not produced thereby; let him be accursed.

"(6.) Whosoever shall affirm that Christ, the only-begotten Son of God, is not to be adored in the holy eucharist with the external signs of that worship which is due to God; and therefore that the eucharist is not to be honoured with extraordinary festive celebration, nor solemnly carried about in processions, according to the laudable and universal rites and customs of holy Church, nor publicly presented to the people for their adoration; and that those who worship the same are idolaters; let him be accursed.

"(7.) Whosoever shall affirm that it is not lawful to preserve the holy eucharist in the sacristy, but that immediately after consecration it must of necessity be distributed to those who are present; or that it is not lawful to carry it in procession to the sick; let him be accursed.

"(8.) Whosoever shall affirm that Christ, as exhibited in the eucharist, is eaten in a spiritual manner only, and not also sacramentally and really; let him be accursed.

"(9.) Whosoever shall deny that all and every one of the faithful in Christ, of both sexes, are bound to communicate every year, at least at Easter according to the injunction of holy Mother Church; let him be accursed.

"(10.) Whosoever shall affirm, that it is not lawful for the officiating Priest to administer the communion to himself; let him be accursed.

"(11.) Whosoever shall affirm, that faith only is a sufficient preparation for the reception of the most holy sacrament of the eucharist; let him be accursed. And lest so great a sacrament should be taken unworthily, and therefore to death and condemnation, the said holy Council doth decree and declare, that previous sacramental confession is absolutely necessary, if a Confessor is at hand, for those who are conscious of the guilt of mortal sin, however contrite they may think themselves to be. Whoever shall presume to teach, preach, or obstinately assert the contrary, or to maintain opposite opinions in public disputation; let him be ipso facto excommunicated." *

In the thirteenth session of the Council of Trent, and in the chapters preparatory to the canons already quoted, we find the following declarations respecting the doctrine of transubstantiation. In the first chapter we read, "The holy Council teacheth, and openly and plainly professeth,

* "Canon (1.) Si quis negaverit, in sanctissimæ eucharistiæ sacramento contineri vere, realiter, et substantialiter, corpus et sanguinem una cum anima et divinitate Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ac proinde totum Christum; sed dixerit tantummodo esse in eo ut in signo, vel figura, aut virtute; anathema sit.

"(2.) Si quis dixerit, in sacro-sancto eucharistiæ sacramento remanere substantiam panis et vini una cum corpore et sanguine Domini nostri Jesu Christi, negaveritque mirabilem illam et singularem conversionem totius substantiæ panis in corpus, et totius substantiæ vini in sanguinem, manentibus dumtaxat speciebus panis et vini; quam quidem conversionem Catholica Ecclesia aptissime transubstantiationem appellat; anathema sit.

"(3.) Si quis negaverit, in venerabili sacramento eucharistiæ, sub unaquaque specie, et sub singulis cujusque speciei partibus, separatione facta, totum Christum contineri; anathema sit.

"(4.) Si quis dixerit, peracta consecratione, in admirabili eucharistiæ sacramento non esse corpus et sanguinem Domini nostri Jesu Christi, sed tantum in usu, dum sumitur, non autem ante vel post, et in hostiis seu particulis consecratis, quæ post communionem reservantur, vel supersunt, non remanere verum corpus Domini; anathema sit.

"(5.) Si quis dixerit, vel præcipuum fructum sanctissimæ eucharistiæ esse remissionem peccatorum, vel ex ea non alios effectus provenire; anathema sit.

"(6.) Si quis dixerit, in sancto eucharistiæ sacramento Christum unigenitum Dei Filium non esse cultu latriæ etiam externo, adorandum; atque ideo nec festiva peculiari celebritate venerandum, neque in processionibus, secundum laudabilem et universalem Ecclesiæ sanctæ ritum et consuetudinem, solemniter circumgestandum, vel non publice, ut adoretur, populo proponendum, et ejus adoratores esse idololatras; anathema sit.

"(7.) Si quis dixerit, non licere sacram eucharistiam in sacrario reservari, sed statim post consecrationem adstantibus necessario distribuendam, aut non licere, ut illa ad infirmos honorifice deferatur; anathema sit.

"(8.) Si quis dixerit, Christum in eucharistia exhibitum spiritualiter tantum manducari, et non etiam sacramentaliter ac realiter; anathema sit.

"(9.) Si quis negaverit, omnes et singulos Christi fideles utriusque sexus, cum ad annos discretionis pervenerint, teneri singulis annis, saltem in Paschate, ad communicandum, juxta præceptum sanctæ Matris Ecclesiæ; anathema sit.

"(10.) Si quis dixerit, non licere Sacerdoti celebranti seipsum communicare; anathema sit.

"(11.) Si quis dixerit, solam fidem esse sufficientem præparationem ad sumendum sanctissimæ eucharistiæ sacramentum; anathema sit. Et, ne tantum sacramentum indigne, atque ideo in mortem et condemnationem, sumatur, statuit atque declarat ipsa sancta Synodus, illis quos conscientia peccati mortalis gravat, quantumcumque etiam se contritos existiment, habita copia confessoris, necessario præmittendam esse confessionem sacramentalem. Si quis autem contrarium docere, prædicare, vel pertinaciter asserere, seu etiam publice disputando, defendere, præsumpserit; eo ipso excommunicatus existat."—Conc. Trid., sess. xiii., De Sac. Sanct. Euch. Sacram.

that our Lord Jesus Christ, true God and man, is truly, really, and substantially contained in the pure sacrament of the holy eucharist, after the consecration of the bread and wine, and under the species of those sensible objects. Neither is it to be regarded as contradictory that our Saviour should always sit at the right hand of the Father in heaven, according to his natural mode of existence, and yet be sacramentally present with us in his substance, in many other places." * In the third chapter of the same session the Council declares: "Immediately after the consecration, the true body of our Lord, and his true blood, together with his soul and divinity, do exist under the species of the bread and wine; his body under the species of bread, and his blood under the species of wine, by virtue of the words of consecration; his body also under the species of wine, and his blood under the species of bread, and his soul under each species, through that natural connexion and concomitance by which all the parts of Christ our Lord, who has risen from the dead no more to die, are closely connected together; and his divinity, through the wonderful and hypostatical union thereof with his body and soul. Wherefore it is most certain that all is contained under either species and under both; for Christ, whole and entire, exists under the species of bread, and in every particle thereof, and under the species of wine, and in all its parts."†

3. To avoid the appearance of misrepresentation, we exhibit the doctrine of transubstantiation, by giving some quotations from the Catechism of the Council of Trent. "The eucharist also contains Christ our Lord, the true grace, and the source of all heavenly gifts."‡ "When preserved in a pyxis, (box,) or deposited in a tabernacle, under either species, it ceases not to be a sacrament."§ "In the eucharist, that which before consecration was bread and wine, becomes, after consecration, really and substantially the body and blood of our Lord."‖ "Care must be taken not only to mingle water with the wine, but also to mingle it in small quantity; for, in the opinion of ecclesiastical writers, the water is changed into wine."¶ "When, therefore, it is said, 'This is the chalice of my blood,' these words are understood to mean, 'This is my blood which is contained in this chalice.'" "As, however, to the body are united his blood, his soul, his divinity, they too must be found to co-exist in the sacrament, not, however, by virtue of the consecration, but by virtue of the union which subsists between them and his body; and this theologians express by the word concomitance. Hence it is clear that Christ, whole and entire, is contained in the sacrament; for when two things are actually united, where one is, the other must also be. Hence it also follows that Christ, whole and entire, is contained under either species; so that, as under the species of bread are contained not only the body, but also the blood and Christ entire, so, in like manner, under the species of wine are contained not only the blood, but also the body and Christ entire. These are matters on which the faithful cannot entertain a doubt."* "The Pastor will also inform the faithful, that Christ, whole and entire, is contained not only under either species, but also in EACH PARTICLE of either species."† Thus we have given their doctrine as contained in their own acknowledged standards, which they can neither evade nor deny without the most palpable contradiction.

The following points, with several others, are clearly contained in their doctrine concerning the eucharist.‡

(1.) That, after the words of consecration are spoken, there is neither bread nor wine left on the table.

(2.) That, though there be neither bread nor wine, yet the accidents or species, that is, the colour, size, weight, taste, and other qualities, of the bread and wine remain. But these accidents, or rather essential properties of matter, do not exist either in the bread or body of Christ, but by themselves. Not in the bread, for bread there is none. Not in the body of Christ, for they will not allow you to say that the body of Christ is round, sweet, has shape, &c.

(3.) That, by virtue of the five words of consecration, Hoc est enim corpus meum, there is, in the place of the substance of the bread and wine, the substance of the body of Christ, truly, really, and substantially, together with his soul and divinity. And though they confess that Christ had but one body, and that body is in heaven, yet they maintain that the body of Christ in the eucharist is the same that was born of the Virgin, which was crucified, ascended to heaven, and is now in heaven.

(4.) That the body, blood, bones, sinews, &c., of Christ, his soul and Godhead, are contained in either the bread or the wine, or in the smallest particle of the bread or the smallest drop of the wine, however small the crumbs or drops may be.

[* "Principio docet sancta Synodus, et aperte ac simpliciter profitetur, in almo sanctæ eucharistiæ sacramento, post panis et vini consecrationem, Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, verum Deum atque hominem, vere, realiter, ac substantialiter sub specie illarum rerum sensibilium contineri. Nec enim hæc inter se pugnant, ut ipse Salvator noster semper ad dexteram Patris in cœlis assideat, juxta modum existendi naturalem; et ut multis nihilominus aliis in locis sacramentaliter præsens sua substantia nobis adsit."—Conc. Trid., sess. xiii., cap. 1.

[† "Statim post consecrationem verum Domini nostri corpus, verumque ejus sanguinem, sub panis et vini specie una cum ipsius anima et divinitate existere; sed corpus quidem sub specie panis et sanguinem sub vini specie, ex vi verborum; ipsum autem corpus sub specie vini, et sanguinem sub specie panis, animamque sub utraque, vi naturalis illius connexionis et concomitantiæ, qua partes Christi Domini, qui jam ex mortuis resurrexit, non amplius moriturus, inter se copulantur; Divinitatem porro propter admirabilem illam ejus cum corpore et anima hypostaticam unionem. Quapropter verissimum est tantumdem sub alterutra specie atque sub utraque contineri; totus enim et integer Christus sub panis specie, et sub quavis ipsius speciei parte, totus item sub vini specie, et sub ejus partibus, existit."—Conc. Trid., sess. xiii., cap. 3.]

‡ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 207.

§ Idem, p. 210. ‖ Idem, ibid. ¶ Idem, p. 214.

 Idem, p. 218.

* Idem, p. 227. † Idem, ibid.

[‡ "Hoc est corpus, &c. His verbis consecravit panem, ut verbis illis, numero 28. Hic est, &c., consecravit vinum; est autem oratio factiva, quæ in fine prolationis effectum habet; hoc est, efficit quod significat. Hoc est, &c. Pronomen hoc demonstrat contentum sub speciebus hunc in modum: Hoc quod sub his accidentibus panis continetur, est corpus meum. D. Thom. 3, pars 9, 78, art. 5. Corpus meum. Corpus accipitur non pro toto homine, sed pro altera tantum parte hominis; nam ex vi verborum consecrationis, panis in solum corpus convertitur, licet anima, sanguis et divinitas simul cum corpore existant per concomitantiam. Itaque si triduo illo mortis Christi aliquis ex Apostolis sacrum fecisset, sub panis speciebus fuisset corpus cum divinitate absque anima et sanguine. Hic. Pronomen hic eodem modo explicandum est, ut explicavimus proxime pronomen Hoc. Sanguis meus. Sub vini speciebus ex vi verborum est solus sanguis, corpus vero, anima, &c., per concomitantiam novi testamenti. Apud Lucam, cap xxii., N. 20, habemus: Hic est calix novum testamentum in sanguine meo, qui pro vobis fundetur. ita etiam D. Paul. 1 ad Cor. xi. 25. Hic calix novum testamentum est in meo sanguine; et sensus est: Id quod hoc calice continetur, est sanguis meus per quem novum testamentum sancitur et confirmatur. Porro novum testamentum dicitur, ut a veteri distinguatur. Vetus testamentum antiquum fœdus fuit cum antiquo Israelitarum populo a Deo initum, quo promisit se illis terram Chananæam daturum et vicissim obstrinxit populum ad legem servandam, quam per Moysem tradidit. Novum autem testamentum est fœdus novum cum novo Christianorum populo percussum, de tradenda nobis hæreditate cœlestis patriæ: ex parte autem nostra vicissim de lege Christi servanda," &c.—Commentarii Menochii, sub. loc.]

(5.) That the body of Christ is eaten by every communicant, whether good or bad.

(6.) That this body remains in those wafers that are not eaten; so that, should any animal happen to devour any of them, it would as really eat the body of Christ as any Christian. And should one of these wafers be burned in the fire, the body of Christ would be as really burned as in the former case it was really eaten.

(7.) This very bread, as Protestants are apt to call it, which they receive and eat, and the wine which the Priest drinks, they worship and adore as very God Almighty, and require this worship under pain of damnation.

(8.) That Protestants, and any others who do not receive all these doctrines, both in faith and practice, or who hold differently from these definitions of the Church of Rome, are pronounced ACCURSED with the highest anathema possible.

These are the points on which we accuse the Church of Rome to have grievously corrupted the Christian doctrine and practice as it concerns the sacrament of the eucharist. It is readily granted that there are several circumstances, in all the different parts of Christian worship and practice, which are not precisely obligatory on all Christian churches. There are several occurrences in the receiving of the sacrament which do not enter into the nature of the action, but are indifferent to it, and may be employed, or omitted, without perverting the original institution or precept. For instance, the time, the place, the posture, the number of persons joining in the action, or the like, are mere circumstances, respecting which, neither our Saviour nor his Apostles gave any peculiar rules.

5. A mere statement of what this doctrine is, and a reference to the several propositions which express it, will be sufficient to prevent every unbiassed individual from assenting to it. Can any person believe this doctrine, unless education, interest, fear, or blind submission has already made it familiar to him? There never was a mystery in any religion in the world so unintelligible, so inconceivable, so loaded with contradictions, and so averse from reason and common sense, as this. We readily grant that there are many honest and sincere persons who believe this doctrine; for it is well known that education and prejudice, together with a want of consideration, have a powerful tendency to pervert the judgment of even good men on the plainest subjects; especially when they are bound by this fatal principle, that they must believe, on pain of damnation, whatever the Church teaches, and that the more difficult the thing is to be believed, the more meritorious is their faith. We do not, therefore, call in question the sincerity of those who profess to receive it; but yet it is fitting that we should reprove it, and show its fallacy. Certainly there is no doctrine in the world that more deserves to be, or is more capable of being, exposed, than the doctrine now under consideration. Should we pursue the above propositions to their several consequences, what a multitude of monstrous absurdities and gross contradictions shall we find! Passing by many of the glaring and blasphemous absurdities connected with this dogma, we shall confine ourselves to such as are necessary for the exposure of the profane heresy embraced in transubstantiation.

Connected with this doctrine are communion in one kind, sacrifice of the mass, and the adoration of the wafer. On each of these we shall treat separately, after we shall have disposed of transubstantiation.

II. We first attempt a confutation of the doctrine of transubstantiation by Scripture and argument.

1. The following are the words of institution as given by St. Matthew:—"And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed IT, and brake IT, and gave IT to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it: for this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." (Matt. xxvi. 26—28.) See also Mark xiv. 22; Luke xxii. 19; 1 Cor. xi. 23—26.

The principal argument of the Roman Catholics for transubstantiation is from the words, This is my body. Hoc est corpus meum. They say, "Does not our Saviour most expressly declare, This is my body? And if ever it were needful that he should speak plainly, and without a figure, it certainly must have been when he instituted this Christian sacrament. What can be more clear than that which Christ has spoken concerning it? Every Christian ought to submit his reason to the revelation of Christ, inasmuch as his reason is fallible; but Christ can neither deceive, nor be deceived. To the word and to the testimony, which is your own Protestant rule. Christ hath said of the bread, This is my body; and, therefore, such it certainly is, whatever our senses or reason may suggest to the contrary."

We cordially assent to the proposition, that whatever Christ has said we are bound to believe, and likewise that he spoke in a manner sufficiently plain to his disciples when he instituted this sacrament. But the question is, whether these words, in their most obvious sense, declare any thing in favour of transubstantiation? They say they do; we say they do not: here, therefore, we join issue.

We are ready to prove that the Romish interpretation of the words of Christ is harsh and forced, and against all the common rules of grammar, and that they not only say nothing in behalf of transubstantiation, but completely overthrow it; and, on the contrary, that our view is the most plain and easy, most natural and proper; and also that it is impossible these words should be understood in any other sense. They contend for a direct literal meaning. We say that our Saviour speaks by a figure; but by such a figure as is common, and which every person may understand upon examining the words. The figure is this: that the bread and wine are symbols, or emblems, of the broken body and shed blood of Christ. We have to examine which of these views comes nearer to our Saviour's meaning, the literal or the figurative, theirs or ours. We shall therefore attempt to show, First, That their sense of the words, and by which alone they can prove transubstantiation, is impossible, and full of absurdity and contradiction. Secondly, That our intepretation is natural and easy, and agreeable to the common way of speaking; and the only sense in which it was possible for the Apostles, to whom our Lord spoke, to understand them.

First, The Roman gloss upon these words supposes things impossible and contradictory.

If we take our Saviour's words in the literal sense, we must make him say in effect, that the bread which he brake and commanded them to eat was not bread, but truly and really his dead body—his body sacrificed for them. This would make our Saviour say and unsay the same thing at the same time. He spoke of the bread which he had blessed and broken when he pronounced the word this, and they all knew it to be bread; and yet, according to them, he must be supposed to mean that it was not bread, but merely his body.

To evade the foregoing contradiction, they say that was bread before the words of consecration were uttered, became his body and blood afterward. But this does not remove the difficulty; for it makes our Saviour not only to speak against the rules of grammar, but also an untruth. For he says, and in the present tense, "This bread is my body," although when he began to speak, the bread was not his body, but, they say, it was presently to be turned into his body. If, indeed, he had said, "This bread will be my body as soon as I have pronounced these words," he then might be supposed to have spoken something in favour of transubstantiation. But he speaks in the present time, This is, not, This will be; and if they are bold enough to change the tenses, then they keep not to the letter of the words, but to the figure, and a figure far more unusual than that for which we contend. When, therefore, our Saviour says, This is my body, his proposition cannot be taken in a literal sense, without making him speak a contradiction or a falsehood.

Let us suppose, however, that what he had in his hands was no longer bread, but became, by a certain inexplicable process, his very body; then this question presents itself: How came it to be his dead body, his body given, broken, or sacrificed for us? That our Saviour spoke of his body in this condition, none can deny. If, therefore, we understand the words literally, as Roman Catholics would have us, we must admit one of the grossest contradictions in the world. We must believe that the body of Christ was both alive and dead at the same time. If we cannot believe this, then it is impossible that our Saviour's words should be taken in a literal sense; namely, that the bread he gave them was truly and really, and without figure, his dead body.

Moreover, Romanists say that the soul and divinity of Christ, as well as his body and blood, bones and sinews, &c., are contained in the bread. If his words are to be taken literally, how can they account for the presence of the soul and divinity of Christ?

They believe that the bread and wine are not changed until the words of consecration, "This is my body," and "This cup is the new testament," &c., are pronounced. Here are several things decidedly against them. If Christ spoke literally, his words would not imply his identical body, for that of which he spoke was bread. But they tell us that the bread was transubstantiated. Be it so; then that could not be Christ's body, but newly-created flesh, which before had no existence. Besides, that which Christ took he broke,—what he broke he blessed,—what he blessed was distributed,—and what was distributed was eaten. Bread, then, was taken by Christ; therefore bread, and not flesh, was eaten. According to their literal meaning, the cup or chalice was really the blood of Christ, and he commanded his disciples to drink or swallow down the cup. The cup must also be the new testament, if their mode of interpretation be right. Now unless the cup in which the wine was contained was really the wine poured into it, and unless the same cup was at the same time the new testament or covenant, the interpretation of Roman Catholics is wrong.

Secondly, Our sense is natural and easy, and agreeable to the common way of speaking; and the only sense in which it was possible for the Apostles, to whom our Lord spoke, to have understood them.

We have shown that the words of our Lord cannot be taken entirely in a literal sense; they must therefore be considered figuratively; and the only figure which we can apply is that whereby we give to the sign the name of the thing signified. Accordingly, we shall understand the words thus: that this bread which he had broken, and the wine which he had poured out, were apt signs, symbols, emblems, or representations of his broken body and shed blood. No sense can be more easy than this; and to prove it, we advance the following reasons:—

(1.) When Christ said, "This is my body," he had nothing in his hands at that time, but a part of the unleavened bread which he and his disciples had been eating at supper; and therefore he could mean no more than this, namely, that the bread which he was now breaking represented his body, which in the course of a few hours was to be crucified. To suppose that the bread and wine, and every particle of each, contained the body, blood, bones, sinews, &c., and the soul and divinity, of Christ, and that Christ held his own body in his hands, and that he and his disciples did eat it, baffles all human and divine faith.

(2.) There is no figure more usual in every language than that whereby we give to the sign the name of the thing signified. We say concerning a picture of George Washington, "This is George Washington." In a map of the United States we say, "This is Pennsylvania." Yet no person is so stupid as to believe that the picture is really Washington, it is only a representation of him; or that that part of the map called Pennsylvania is really that State, it is only a representation of it. When, therefore, Christ took a piece of bread, broke it, and said, "This is my body," who can suppose he was handling and breaking his own body, any more than that the above-named picture was really the person of George Washington, or that the map was truly the State of Pennsylvania? The truth is, there is scarcely any expression more common than "This is," for "This represents," or "This signifies."

(3.) As this is an ordinary figure in common speech, it is peculiarly so in the language of Scripture. In the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Chaldeo-Syriac languages, there are either no words which express to mean, signify, or represent, or else such words are of very rare occurrence. Thus, "The seven kine are" (that is, represent) "seven years." (Gen. xli. 26.) "This is" (that is, represents) "the bread of affliction which our fathers ate in the land of Egypt." "The ten horns are" (that is, signify) "ten Kings." (Dan. vii. 24.) "That rock was" (that is, represented) "Christ." (1 Cor. x. 4.) We also find this idiom running through the Greek language. Thus, "The seven stars are" (that is, represent) "the angels of the seven churches; and the seven candlesticks are" (that is, represent) "the seven churches." (Rev. i. 20.) "I am the vine, ye are the branches." (John xv. 5.) Our Lord did not say, "Hoc est corpus meum," as he did not speak in the Latin tongue, though so much stress has been laid upon this quotation from the Vulgate version, as if the original had been uttered in Latin. Now as our Lord spoke in the Chaldee or Chaldeo-Syriac, he spoke according to the idiom of that tongue. And any man speaking in that language would say, "This is my body," "This is my blood," when he intended to convey the meaning, that the bread and wine represented the body and blood of Christ.

["To give an idea of the many dogmas that necessarily attend the doctrine of transubstantiation, we transcribe the eighth lesson of the 'Catechism for the Use of all the Churches in the French Empire,' published in 1806, with the Bull of the Pope and the Mandamus of the Archbishop of Paris: which is exactly a counterpart to all that have been published from time immemorial, in the Popish churches.

["'Q. What is the sacrament of the eucharist?

["'A. The eucharist is a sacrament which contains really and substantially the body, blood, soul, and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, under the forms and appearance of bread and wine.

["'Q. What is at first on the altar, and in the chalice? Is it not bread and wine?

["'A. Yes; and it continues to be bread and wine till the Priest pronounces the words of consecration.

["'Q. What influence have these words?

["'A. The bread is changed into the body, and the wine is changed into the blood, of our Lord.

["'Q. Does nothing of the bread and wine remain?

["'A. Nothing of them remains, except the forms.

["'Q. What do you call the forms of the bread and wine?

["'A. That which appears to our senses, as colour, figure, and taste.

["'Q. Is there nothing under the form of bread except the body of our Lord?

["'A. Besides his body, there is his blood, his soul, and his divinity; because all these are inseparable.

["'Q. And under the form of wine?

["'A. Jesus Christ is there as entire as under the form of the bread.

["'Q. When the forms of the bread and wine are divided, is Jesus Christ divided?

["'A. No; Jesus Christ remains entire under each part of the form divided.

["'Q. Say, in a word, what Jesus Christ gives us under each form.

["'A. All that he is, that is, perfect God and perfect man.

["'Q. Does Jesus Christ leave heaven to come into the eucharist?

["'A. No; he always continues at the right hand of God, his Father, till he shall come at the end of the world, with great glory, to judge the living and the dead.

["'Q. Then how can he be present at the altar?

["'A. By the almighty power of God.

["'Q. Then it is not man that works this miracle?

["'A. No: it is Jesus Christ, whose word is employed in the sacrament.

["'Q. Then it is Jesus Christ who consecrates?

["'A. It is Jesus Christ who consecrates; the Priest is only his Minister.

["'Q. Must we worship the body and blood of Jesus Christ in the eucharist?

["'A. Yes, undoubtedly; for this body, and this blood, are inseparably united to his divinity.'

["The Priest, in giving the consecrated wafer to the communicant, says, 'Behold the Lamb of God! Behold Him who taketh away the sin of the world!' Then he and the communicant repeat thrice, 'Lord, I am not worthy thou shouldest enter my roof; speak, therefore, but the word, and my soul shall be healed,' the communicant striking his breast in token of his unworthiness. Then, says the Directory, having the towel raised above your breast, your eyes modestly closed, your head likewise raised up, and your mouth conveniently open, receive the holy sacrament on your tongue, resting on your under lip; then close your mouth, and say in your heart, 'Amen, I believe it to be the body of Christ, and I pray it may preserve my soul to eternal life.'* May God grant that such absurd superstitions may never again become a part of the religion of England!"]

["* Ordinary of the Mass, p. 33."]

Dr. Milner, however, informs us, that where Christ calls himself the "vine," and his followers "branches," the figurative meaning is obvious. This, however, is fallacious; for supposing the interpretation to have been literal, their senses, according to the Roman Catholic way of reasoning, would no more have disproved them to be real branches, than it would have disproved Christ to be a real vine. When we say that the senses testify that the bread remains bread, therefore the words of institution are figurative, they do not allow the argument, and discard the evidence of sense. Hence they cannot consistently adduce it to prove that our Lord did not mean that the Apostles were vine-branches. Therefore the objection is rendered nugatory, and the parallelism stands good.

(4.) It is also to be observed that the words of institution were, "This is my body," το διδομενον, "given for you," κλωμενον, "broken;" "This is my blood," το εκχυνομενον, "shed." The words, therefore, "This is my body," "This is my blood," are not all the words embraced in the institution: for he spake these words only once, as he instituted the eucharist only once. Therefore the expressions used by St. Luke and St. Paul, namely, "This is my body given for you," or, "my body broken for you," and, "This is my blood shed for you," embrace no more than what our Lord said at the first establishment of the sacrament. When St. Matthew and St. Mark inform us that he said, "This is my body," they say the truth, but not the whole truth, the words being, as St. Luke and St. Paul declare, "This is my body given," or "broken, for you;" "This is my blood shed for you." From this it is manifest, that since Christ was then actually alive, and therefore his body was not actually given or broken, the bread could not be naturally or really his body, but only by way of figure or representation, being then broken, to represent that body which was shortly to be given and broken upon the cross for us. So also is the wine styled "his blood shed," as being then instituted as the perpetual representation and memorial of his blood which was shed and separated from his body on the cross.

(5.) Besides, both the Evangelist and St. Paul use the present, and not the future, tense. Their words are, "This is my body broken" or "given;" "This is my blood shed." These expressions were used even while Christ was yet alive; when his body was not actually broken, or his blood shed; it could not, therefore, be literally his body or blood, but only by way of representation, as being then instituted to represent that body which was shortly to be given and broken on the cross for us. And this was according to the usual sacramental phrase. Thus, at the institution of the paschal sacrament, we read, "It is the Lord's passover;" (Exod. xii. 11;) that is, "This is what is instituted to represent it." And of circumcision it is said, "This is my covenant," (Gen. xvii. 10,) even before Abraham submitted to that ordinance. (Gen. xvii. 23, 24.)

The Roman Catholics, in their Latin Vulgate, as well as in their English Douay version, employ the future tense instead of the present. This is taking a liberty with the word of God which in no degree favours their cause.

(6.) Wine is, by way of figure, called "the blood of the grape;" (Deut. xxxii. 14; and by the Heathen, αιμα βοτρυων, "blood of the branches," Achilles Tatius, lib. ii.;) and why not, by a like metaphor, called "the blood of Christ?" Moreover, bread is a proper emblem to represent those benefits derived from the death of our Lord by which our souls are spiritually strengthened, as our bodies are nourished with material bread.

(7.) From the words of institution, we learn that the bread and wine remained unchanged after consecration. St. Paul five times calls that "bread" which they did eat, and which to them was "the communion of the body of Christ," and by eating of which unworthily they became "guilty of the body of Christ, not discerning the Lord's body." (1 Cor. x. 16, 17; xi. 26—28.) Thus he five times successively calls that bread which was consecrated, and which our Saviour called his body. Now it is somewhat surprising that one single passage, mentioned by our Saviour while he was alive, should be deemed sufficient to make us all believe that this bread was his body, and that this living Christ was at the same time dead and sacrificed; and that the same body which was before the eyes of the disciples, was also broken for them at the same time, with many thousand other contradictions.

(8.) There is another argument to show that our Lord spoke in a figurative sense; namely, this was the mode of expression that was used among the Jews in their sacraments, and particularly in the sacrament which our Lord had then celebrated. Two eminent sacraments God appointed among the Jews, circumcision and the passover; yet to both of these the holy Scriptures, and the Jews from them, gave the name of the thing to the sign which they signified. Circumcision, which was no more than the sign and seal of God's covenant with the Jews, answering to our baptism, is in Scripture called the covenant itself. Thus twice in one chapter God saith, "This is my covenant; Every male child among you shall be circumcised." And again, "My covenant shall be in your flesh." (Gen. xvii. 10, 13.) And every one knows that circumcision was not God's covenant, but the sign of the covenant, or the sacrament whereby they entered into it.

And as for the other sacrament, the paschal feast, in the place of which our Lord instituted the supper, the very name (passover) by which it is called is an instance of that for which we contend. The sacrificed lamb with which the Jews celebrated this sacrament was not the passover itself, but only a sign or memorial of it; for that ordinance in its literal sense, was God's passing over the Israelites when he slew the first-born of the Egyptians. Yet this feast is called the Lord's passover: "This is the Lord's passover." (Exod. xii. 11.) And ever after, when this paschal feast was kept, and the lamb was set upon the table, the master of the house spoke to his company in these words: "This is the passover, which we therefore eat because God passed by our houses in Egypt." And we have every reason to believe that our Saviour used the same words, when he kept this feast with his disciples. Every one present knew that the lamb was not really the passover, for that was a deliverance which God wrought for them but once: the lamb was only a memorial of that passover or deliverance.

Now since God in Scripture first used the expression, and the Jewish rituals tell us that in all succeeding passovers it was continued, who can doubt that the Apostles, when they heard our Saviour say of the bread, "This is my body," understood the words in the sense we have been declaring? The Apostles at that time were celebrating the paschal feast, which was a commemoration of the past deliverance; yet they heard our Saviour say of the bread, "This is the bread of affliction which your fathers ate in Egypt." They heard him say of the flesh upon the table, "This is the Lord's passover." Having finished the ceremony, they saw our Saviour take bread, give thanks to God, and then bid them eat of it. He then said, "This is my body broken for you." We appeal to every reasonable person, if he would not have understood this latter expression in the same sense that they did the former; that is to say, that the bread which Christ now blessed and brake, was just as much his body broken, as the bread of affliction which their fathers ate in Egypt, or as the lamb of which they had just partaken, was the Lord's passover. And we may with equal propriety imagine, that when these words of the Jewish ritual, "This is the Lord's passover," were spoken, the disciples understood that just then the destroying angel was passing over the houses of the Israelites, and slaying the first-born of the Egyptians, as we can imagine, that when our Saviour said, "This is my body broken for you," they understood him of his real natural body, which was not then crucified. From all which we infer, they took not his expressions literally, as the Roman Catholics do, but in the same figurative sense that was customary among them, and according to which all sound Protestants frame their faith.

Besides, the Apostles neither hesitated nor objected. Whereas if Christ had, contrary to the custom of all nations, and especially in opposition to that of the Jewish people, intended the words, "This is my body," to be understood literally, it is certain that some objections, or some queries, would have been proposed by the Apostles. This we believe, on the point of analogy, is an insuperable barrier to the Roman Catholic: we have never seen any thing like an attempt to beat it down, and certain are we that it will ever prove impregnable.

(9.) Finally: it is impossible that the Apostles could believe that they ate the body of Christ when they saw that body before them; or that they drank his blood, when they knew that blood was still in his veins. Or how could they have been persuaded to drink blood against the express letter of the law, or to eat human flesh, or even swallow their blessed Lord and Master?

Roman Catholics, to get rid of the difficulties so intimately connected with the doctrine of transubstantiation, employ the expression, "the real presence," as a convenient mode of avoiding some of their difficulties. They refer to the Greek Church, the Eutychians, the Jacobites, &c., who hold the doctrine of the real presence of Christ in the eucharist. But the real presence of Christ in the sacrament is not the point in question. Christ has promised that his presence shall be with his people every where. He has especially promised that he will be with the preaching of the Gospel to the end of time. "Lo, I am with you alway, even to the end of the world." There is no doubt but the promise extends to the sacrament of the Lord's supper, which is a significant way of preaching the Gospel. Protestants in general believe in the real presence of Christ in the eucharist, not, indeed, the corporeal, but the spiritual. Roman Catholics have assumed the almost exclusive use of the expression, "real presence;" and having had it generally conceded to them as peculiarly their own, like the word "catholic," they have taken advantage to make it appear that the ancient Fathers and primitive churches, whose principles differ entirely from theirs, were of the same opinion. The doctrine, as defined by the Council of Trent, is not that Christ is really present with the bread and wine, but that these elements are truly converted into the substance of Christ's humanity and divinity, and that not one particle of the bread and wine remains.

All true Protestants acknowledge that the bread and wine are something more than mere representations or symbols of the broken body and shed blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. They are means by which the benefits of Christ's death and sufferings are conveyed to us, and on that account, they have a farther title to be called by their name. Hence, as the words of institution express, they are, (i.) A remembrance of the death of Christ; which can never be said of transubstantiation, that being no remembrance at all. (ii.) By this sacrament we show forth, or proclaim, the Lord's death till he come. (iii.) It is the seal of the covenant of grace through Christ.

2. The doctrine of transubstantiation not only has no foundation in Scripture, but is directly opposed to many of the most plain and important passages of holy writ.

In our Lord's celebrated discourse at Capernaum, on the subject of feeding the church with his flesh and his blood, the language he used was so strong that his hearers exclaimed, "How can this man give us his flesh to eat?" To correct their misapprehension, he declared that his language was figurative, in the following manner:—"It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing. The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." (John vi. 63.) Here, therefore, and on a subject which had a close affinity to the eucharist, our Lord teaches us that his style is figurative when such expressions are employed, as, "Christ is the Rock; his flesh is bread; his blood is drink;" and therefore the exposition of Roman Catholics is opposed to that of our Saviour.

It was foretold by David that God "would not suffer his Holy One to see corruption." (Psalm xvi. 10.) St. Peter applies this to the flesh of Christ, (Acts ii. 22—32,) which "saw no corruption;" but if the doctrine of transubstantiation be true, his body continually undergoes corruption, by the necessary process of digestion.

Again, the Scriptures declare, that the body of Christ was offered but once. (Heb. ix. 28; x. 10; 1 Peter iii. 18.) But according to the Latin Church, in the celebration of the eucharist the Priest offers up really the body and blood of Christ to God, as a propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead. By them Christ is often offered up. Therefore the Scriptures and the Romanists are at variance.

The following is utterly inconsistent with the doctrine of transubstantiation:—"For ye have the poor always with you; but me ye have not always." (Matt. xxvi. 11.) If the soul, body, and divinity of Christ were in the host, then he must be always with his disciples, which would be contrary to the assertion of the Saviour.

But the most accurate reasoners in the Church of Rome are aware that the Scripture does not support the dogma of transubstantiation. Accordingly many have dwelt principally on the authority of tradition, and upon the support to be derived from ecclesiastical decisions. When they have endeavoured to maintain it by Scripture, their arguments have invariably failed; while others have candidly acknowledged that it is not among those doctrines which are to be proved by holy writ.

[The Bible contains the whole belief of the church of God; and as we find nothing of transubstantiation there, we might satisfy ourselves with giving the assertion of the holy Fathers of the Council a broad denial. Some of the greatest writers and Divines, even of the Romish Church, admit, that the doctrine cannot be proved from the Bible. Scotus himself, the great oracle and schoolman, is represented by Bellarmine and others, as having said, that the doctrine of transubstantiation cannot evidently be proved from Scripture; and Bellarmine himself grants that this is not improbable. Suarez and Valasquez acknowledge Durandus to have said as much; and Ocham, another famous schoolman, says expressly, that "the doctrine which holds the substance of the bread and wine to remain after consecration, is neither repugnant to reason, nor to Scripture." Petrus ab Alliaco, Cardinal of Cambray, says plainly, that "the doctrine of the substance of bread and wine remaining after consecration, is more easy and free from absurdity, more rational, and noways repugnant to the authority of Scripture." Nay, he says expressly, that for the other doctrine, that is, transubstantiation, "there is no evidence in Scripture." Gabriel Byel, another great schoolman and Divine of their Church, freely declares, that "as to any thing expressed in the canon of Scripture, a man may believe that the substance of bread and wine doth remain after consecration;" and therefore he resolves the belief of transubstantiation into some other revelation, besides Scripture, which he supposes the Church had about it. Cardinal Cajetan confesses, that "the Gospel doth nowhere express that the bread is changed into the body of Christ; that we have this from the authority of the Church;" nay, he goes farther, "that there is nothing in the Gospel which enforceth any man to understand these words of Christ, 'This is my body,' in a proper, and not in a metaphorical sense; but the Church having understood them in a proper sense, they are to be so explained." Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, who is ranked by the Church of Rome among her martyrs, candidly admits, that there is not one word in Scripture "from whence the true presence of the flesh and blood of Christ in our mass can be proved." Most of these Divines were firm believers in the doctrine; but they had honesty enough to confess that they did not derive it from the Bible, but only from some other revelation which they supposed the Church to have had about it. Some of them, indeed, seem to rest it upon the mere authority of the Church; but whether she had it by a revelation in her private ear, or invented it, they do not inquire.*]

3. The doctrine of transubstantiation contradicts our senses.

By the use of these we readily discern that what is in the cup is wine, and that the bread in the sacrament is not human flesh. To obviate this difficulty it is said, that the species of bread and wine remain in appearance as they were before, even after they have been changed into the body and blood, the soul and divinity, of Christ. In their manuals they also teach that we should in this mystery renounce utterly the judgment of our senses, and all human understanding. Now if our senses cannot be trusted, how do we know that these words, "This is my body," are to be found in Scripture, or on this paper now before our eyes?

The doctrine of transubstantiation contradicts our senses, and on this account proves itself to be a false doctrine, contrary to the Scripture, and not originating from Him who gave us the use of these powers for infallible directors. This doctrine, when viewed in reference to the evidence of sense, is crowded with innumerable difficulties; and, to avoid the shadow of misrepresentation, we will quote their acknowledged writings on this subject. Indeed, many of our readers would consider us to be guilty of slander, were we to state the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this point in our own words; as it is almost incredible, judging from all analogies of human errors and heresies, that any body of men could seriously hold such glaring contradictions.

[* Tillotson's Discourse on Transubstantiation, Works, vol. i., fol., 1714.]

The Council of Trent, as quoted before, (sess. xiii., can. 2,) says "that the species of bread and wine only remain in the sacrament, because the substance is changed into the body and blood of Christ." The authors of the Roman Catechism hold the following language in reference to the eucharist:—"In its belief human reason experiences the greatest difficulties."* "To explain this mystery in a proper manner is extremely difficult. On the manner of this admirable conversion, the Pastor, however, will endeavour to instruct those who are more advanced in the knowledge and contemplation of divine things: those who are yet weak may, it were to be apprehended, be overwhelmed by its greatness."† Speaking of the change affirmed to be effected by transubstantiation, the Catechism says: "The faithful are to be admonished against the danger of gratifying a prurient curiosity, by searching into the manner in which this change is effected. It mocks the powers of conception, nor can we find any example of it in natural transmutations, nor even in the wide range of creation. The change itself is the object, not of our comprehension, but of our humble faith; and the manner of that change forbids the temerity of a too curious inquiry. The same salutary caution should also be observed by the Pastor with regard to the mysterious manner in which the body of our Lord is contained, whole and entire, under the least particle of the bread."‡ "The Pastor will, first of all, impress on the minds of the faithful the necessity of detaching, as much as possible, their minds and understandings from the dominion of the senses; for were they, with regard to this sublime mystery, to constitute the senses the only tribunal to which they are to appeal, the awful consequences must be, their precipitation into the extreme of impiety. Consulting the sight, the touch, the smell, the taste, and finding nothing but the appearances of bread and wine, the senses must naturally lead them to think that this sacrament contains nothing more than bread and wine. Their minds, therefore, are as much as possible to be withdrawn from subjection to the senses, and excited to the contemplation of the stupendous power of God."§ "The accidents which present themselves to the eyes, or other senses, exist in a wonderful and ineffable manner without a subject. The accidents of bread and wine we see; but they inhere in no substance, and exist independently of any. The substance of the bread and wine is so changed into the body and blood of our Lord, that they altogether cease to be the substance of bread and wine."‖ "Here the Pastor will also explain to the faithful that in this sacrament are contained not only the true body of Christ, and all the constituents of a true body, (as bones and sinews, velut ossa et nervos,) but also Christ whole and entire."¶ In this Catechism we have the following extraordinary contradictory sentiments, uttered as the infallible doctrines of truth:—"Our Lord is not in the sacrament as in a place: place regards things only inasmuch as they have magnitude; and we do not say that Christ is in the sacrament inasmuch as he is great or small, terms which belong to quantity, but inasmuch as he is a substance. The substance of the bread is changed into the substance of Christ, not into magnitude or quantity; and substance, it will be acknowledged, is contained in a small as well as in a large space." "The body and blood of our Lord are really and truly contained in the sacrament, to the entire exclusion of the substance of the bread and wine: the accidents cannot inhere in the body of Christ; they must, therefore, contrary to the physical laws, subsist of themselves, inhering in no subject."*

To show even more fully that we do not misrepresent this subject, we adduce the following extracts from Dens's Theology:—"How do these accidents remain, when the substance of bread and wine does not remain?—Answer. These accidents subsist in the sacrament, without any subject, by divine power. That quantity alone exists without a subject; but that the other accidents exist in quantity, as in their immediate subject. The more recent philosophers say that these accidents have their subjects in the air and in our senses."†

We ask from our readers nothing more than a careful examination of the foregoing quotations, to convince them that the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, on the point in question, denies the evidence of the senses in the grossest manner. On the absurdity of their faith on this point of doctrine, we observe:—

The testimony of the senses is infallible. We allow that one or more of the senses, through disease, or some other cause, may prove fallacious. But we maintain that the uniform evidence of the senses is infallible. Such evidence, then, testifying that the bread and wine remain unchanged, must be admitted as demonstrative of the falseness of the doctrine of transubstantiation. The thing in question is not subject to the evidence of one sense only, but to the evidence of four of the senses, namely, sight, taste, smell, and touch. What was bread and wine at first, we see, taste, smell, and feel to be bread and wine still. The Almighty deals with us as with rational creatures. He never called us to believe any thing that is unreasonable, impossible, or contrary to the evidence of our senses; and whenever he condescended to work a miracle, the senses of men were appealed to as the judges of the reality of the miracle. Moreover, the case now before us is not one that can be ranged among the illusions of sense. For here we have assurance by the exercise of four senses; by the senses of all men constantly; the object being at a due distance, the medium fitted, and the organs rightly disposed.

If the evidence of sense be denied, we cannot be certain of any thing. If the notices of sense may not be received as true, then we are liable to be deceived by ten thousand impositions. A man may pass for a bat, or a whale for a winged horse, if bread and wine may be the

* Roman Catechism, p. 219.
‡ Idem, p. 231.
¶ Idem, p. 226
† Idem, p. 230.
§ Idem, p. 220.
‖ Idem, p. 221.

* Idem, p. 232.

[† "Quomodo remanent illa accidentia, cum substantia Panis et Vini non remaneat?—S. Thom., quæst. 77, art. i., dicit accidentia illa in sacramento divina virtute subsistere extra omne subjectum. Ita enim plures theologi conformiter ad condemnationem hujus articuli Joannis Wicliff, in Concilio Constantiensi: Accidentia Panis et Vini non remanent sine subjecto in sacramento altaris. Dicit tamen S. Thomas, eadem quæst., art. ii., in Corp., solam quantitatem existere sine subjecto, cætera vero accidentia existere in quantitate tanquam in subjecto immediato. Recentiores philosophi, qui cum Carthesio negant, dari accidens strictæ entitatis, et extra omne subjectum existens, dicunt, illa accidentia subjectari in aëre et sensibus nostris."—Dens Theol., tom. v., De Euchar., No. 26, p. 288.]

real body and blood of Christ. If our senses cannot be trusted, as the Roman Catechism says, how do we know that these words, "This is my body," are to be found in the Scriptures? Unless we see them there, or hear them read, and can depend on the evidence of our eyes and ears, all is uncertainty. But if I am not certain that the bread and wine, which I see, feel, taste, and smell are bread and wine, but that they are literally and truly the very body and blood of Christ, then there is no medium whatever by which I can discover that the words, "This is my body," are in the New Testament. Only allow the evidence of sense to be denied, and we cannot be positively certain of any thing. It is said, that although the body of Christ be generally invested with improper accidents, sometimes he has appeared in his own shape, and flesh and blood have been taken from the mouth of the communicant. It has also been stated, that on a certain occasion, Plegilus, a Priest, saw Christ in the form of a child on the altar, whom he first took in his arms, and afterwards, under the form of a wafer, devoured. This gave occasion for Berengarius to say, "It was but a Judas's kiss, to kiss him with the lip and bite with the teeth." But these are only a few of the wonders of transubstantiation.

The Scripture receives the leading evidence of its truth from the testimony of sense. St. Luke, in the commencement of his Gospel, professes unlimited confidence in this kind of proof for the facts which he relates: he informs us that he received them from those who were "eye-witnesses and ministers of the word." (Luke i. 2.) In like manner St. John declares that the evidence of the senses was not fallacious, but true:—"That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have beheld, and our hands have handled, of the word of life." (1 John i. 1, 2.) So that the Apostles fully depended on the infallibility of their own senses, and of those who gave them information. With their own ears they heard Christ preach his heavenly doctrines; and beheld the miracles which he wrought in attestation of the truth of his doctrines. And after they had witnessed his crucifixion, they had the testimony of their senses that he was raised from the dead, and that he conversed with them many days. Accordingly the first arguments of the Apostles were founded on the assurance that "our senses do not deceive us." The resurrection of Christ, that cardinal doctrine, and without which our faith is vain, was proved by the evidence of sense. The angel said to Mary, "Come see the place where the Lord lay." Thomas was convinced by seeing and feeling. The inspired Apostles and Evangelists therefore considered the evidence of the senses as infallible: but transubstantiation rejects this testimony; consequently it is a false doctrine, being contradicted by the clearest and most indisputable proof, even that of sense.

If this doctrine were admitted, it would entirely overthrow the evidences of Christianity; and render it impossible for us to assure ourselves, or convince others, of the truth of the Christian religion. If the foundation of our faith be the evidence of our senses, whosoever teaches a doctrine which supposes that they may be deceived, so far shakes the foundation. Or, to make it plainer, if the principal reason why we credit and receive the Scripture be founded on the proposition, that we are to believe our senses; then that doctrine which supposes that we are not to believe our senses, must overthrow the ground of our faith. But the doctrine of transubstantiation takes away the testimony of our senses, and consequently it overthrows this proof of Christianity. If this doctrine be true, then the Apostles could not be certain that what they saw and heard concerning Christ was true; nor could they persuade others to whom they preached, that what they taught was also true. The conclusion therefore is, that if transubstantiation be a doctrine of Scripture, it cannot be satisfactorily proved that Christianity is true, because by the doctrine in question the testimony of our senses is rendered null and void; and yet upon this evidence our belief of Christianity depends.

The humanity of Christ could not be proved if transubstantiation were true. The evidence of the senses is not only needed for the support of the Christian system; it is also required for the confirmation of an important article of the Creed. The Valentinians and the Marcionites thought Christ's body to be only a phantom, and therefore they denied the incarnation. Now how easily could they retort on the Apostles, or on others who asserted that the appearances of bread and wine only remained in the sacrament! They could say that Christ's body, which was so called in Scripture, only seemed to be a body, and that it existed only in appearance. But the doctrine of transubstantiation is only one of the heresies of the Church of Rome.

Romanists farther say, that "the sacrament is an object of faith, and not of sense." We grant it is an object of faith, but it is only the inward and spiritual grace that is such. The outward and visible sign must necessarily be an object of sense. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." If, therefore, our senses deceive us in one plain case which comes under their inspection, there is no certainty but that we may be deceived in every thing.

Equally futile is it to say, that the conversion of the elements is miraculous: miracles are an appeal to our senses, for the purpose of proving a divine commission. When we read of the miraculous conversion of one thing into another, the fact of such a change becomes an object of sense. For instance: when the rod of Moses was changed into a serpent, it ceased to be a rod; it lost all the accidents of a rod, and became, in colour, shape, and quality, a serpent. When our Saviour turned water into wine, it no longer had the appearance or taste of water, it possessed all the accidents, as well as substance, of wine. A corporeal substance cannot exist without accidents, nor accidents without substance; and by the former alone are we enabled to know the latter.

Again, they say: "Although we are not deceived in the object of our senses, we may be deceived by the substances that are conveyed under these objects." This is mere quibbling. The question is not whether there be really such impressions made upon our outward senses, but whether, when such impressions are made, and we use our senses, not one of them separately, but all of them together, to try the object, we may not form a just and proper judgment of it; or rather, whether we ought not, all things being considered, to give judgment according to the result of such investigation? We say we ought: the Roman Catholics say we ought not. But, in asserting this, they overthrow the credit of all sense; so that no man can be certain that any thing he examines is really that which he takes it to be.

They also declare: "It is true, that in other cases our senses are to be believed; but it is not so in this, for Christ, who cannot lie, has pronounced bread and wine to be his body and his blood." To this we reply, that Christ in no place has actually said so; and that his words imply precisely the contrary, as we have sufficiently proved. We will, however, add the following: that in Scripture it is as plainly affirmed to be bread, as it is called the body of Christ; and as it cannot be both in the proper and natural sense, one must be figurative; and we ought to give our judgment on that side to which we are prompted by the dictates of common sense. If Christ had only said, "This is my body," and no Apostle had ever told us also that it was still bread, we might have had reason to suspect our senses, if it were possible they could have been deceived. But when it is affirmed to be bread, as well as to be our Lord's body, and but one of them can be true, shall the testimony of our senses be useless in our decision?

4. The doctrine of transubstantiation is contrary to reason, and involves the plainest contradictions and absurdities.

If this doctrine be true, we must then believe that Christ's body is both one and many at the same time, and in the same manner. To assert the presence of Christ's body in several places at once, is to multiply or divide; a consequence which Roman Catholics deny, but to no purpose, seeing they allow of an endless multiplication of wafers in as many separate places as there are wafers. So that, according to them, a body may be divided without division; it may be here and there, and not here and there; that it is one, and yet not one; that it is many, and yet not many; that it is divided, and yet not divided. If these things can be truth, falsehood can be true, and truth may be falsehood; or, rather, truth and falsehood are but empty names. To believe that our Saviour took his own body in his own hands, and gave the whole of that body to each of his Apostles, and that each of them swallowed him, though at the same time he continued sitting at the table before their eyes; to believe that the very same body which is now in heaven is in many thousand different places on the earth,—in some standing still upon the altar, in others being carried along the streets, and so in motion and not in motion at the same time; to believe that the same body can come from a great distance, and meet itself, as the sacramental bread doth in their processions, and then pass by itself, and go away from itself to the same distance again; is to believe the most absolute impossibilities and contradictions. That a human body should be contained in the space of an inch or two; that the substance of bread should not be in the sacrament, where they acknowledge all the properties of bread to be; and that the substance of flesh should be there, and not one of the properties of it appear, is monstrous! The assertion, that the body of Christ, which was born of a virgin, suffered, died, arose from the dead, and ascended to heaven, and is now there, should at the same time be on earth in the hand of the Priest, lying on the altar, carried about, eaten by vermin, vomited from the stomach, changed by corruption, or the process of digestion, burned in the fire, &c., &c., and under all these various changes multiplied or divided into thousands, is among those things which faith cannot embrace, nor can a moderate share of presumption profess to believe. If such things be true, nothing can be false. Roman Catholics may say these things if they choose, and believe them if they can; and in order so to do, they inculcate, in some of their manuals, the following sentiment:—"Herein I utterly renounce the judgment of my senses, and all human understanding." Were the doctrine of transubstantiation true, accidents may exist without their subjects, or the qualities of bodies without any bodies of which they are the qualities; so that there may be whiteness without any thing white, sweetness without any thing sweet, &c. A Physician in France, of the Roman communion, being pressed with this last difficulty, humorously said, "The Fathers of Trent deserved to be condemned to subsist upon the accidents of bread so long as they lived, for introducing so great a difficulty as this into their faith."

5. The doctrine is not only contrary to reason, but it also involves absolute impossibilities.

When Roman Catholics attempt to make proselytes, they inform them that Protestants deny the omnipotence of God; for so they term our rejection of their absurdities. This device, however, is much older than the doctrine of transubstantiation; for it was the custom of the ancient heretics, namely, the Manichees, the Eutychians, the Apollinarists, the Arians, &c., to fly, when assailed, to this attribute of Deity. The Fathers, referring to this abuse, called it the "sanctuary of heretics." It was even older than the Arians; for we find it to have been the subterfuge of the old tragedians, as Plato asserts. Cicero also referred to it: "Cum explicare argumenti exitum non potestis, confugitis ad Deum." "When you cannot bring your argument to a right conclusion, you fly to the power of God."*

When we say that it is impossible to accomplish a thing, we mean that it is naturally or ordinarily so. If a thing cannot naturally and without a miracle be done, and that miracle is no where affirmed, then to assert the literal sense is the greatest folly of which we can be guilty, in the interpretation of Scripture. God cannot lie; he cannot deceive or be deceived; he cannot be unjust, &c. He cannot reconcile contradictions. It is no part of the divine omnipotency to make the same proposition true and false at the same time, and in the same respect. It is absolutely impossible that the same thing should be and should not be at the same time. When, therefore, it is said in St. Luke, that "nothing is impossible with God," the passage must be thus interpreted.

We now apply this to the present question: our adversaries do not deny that in the doctrine of transubstantiation there are a great many impossibilities, which are such naturally and ordinarily, but by divine power they can be overcome; but that they are overcome, they have no other warrant than the literal sense of the words, "This is my body." It is therefore the climax of absurdity in Roman Catholics, by a continual effort, and violence of interpretation, to attempt to maintain a proposition against reason, thinking it sufficient to oppose against all adversaries the omnipotence of God; as though the shout of "A miracle" were sufficient to cover every absurdity; and as though the wisdom of God were armed against his power and his truth. In transubstantiation there are many natural and ordinary impossibilities; and in proof of this we maintain that the doctrine affirms, that "the essence of a thing remains without the essence, that is, without itself;" and also, that "this doctrine makes a thing to be and not to be at the same time, and in the same respect."

The doctrine of transubstantiation is against the nature and essence of a body. The body of Christ is not now a natural body, but a spiritual body, agreeably to St. Paul: "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." And in whatever such a spirituality may consist, it cannot admit of manducation. Here is the first contradiction. The body of Christ, they say, is the sacrament. It is also in heaven. In heaven it cannot be broken naturally; but in the sacrament, we are told, it is broken both naturally and properly; therefore, according to this doctrine, the same body is and is not, it can and it cannot be, broken. All men in the exercise of a sober judgment believe, that what is circumscribed by its proper place is there, and nowhere else. For if it were there and in another place, it would be two, and not one; consequently the body of Christ would be in a thousand places at once, and yet, at the same time, be but one body. For to exist in heaven and upon so many altars, is to constitute a body a spirit, and to make a finite an infinite. It is true, God can create a new body; but a body, while it remains such, cannot be a spirit. A body must also be in some place. If these things really were as the Romanists would have us believe, then the same thing, and at the same time, could be a body and a spirit, limited and unlimited, wholly in a place and wholly out of that place, finite and infinite, a body and yet no body, one and yet many, the same and not the same; that is, it would not be itself. Indeed, the doctrine of transubstantiation attributes to the human body of Christ the incommunicable attribute of ubiquity, actually and potentially.

* Cicero de Nat. Deor., lib. i., 20. Edit. Davis. p. 51.

We proceed to enumerate more of the impossibilities of transubstantiation. According to this doctrine, the same thing is larger and less than itself, for it is larger in one host than in another; the wafer is said to be the body of Christ, and yet in some instances one wafer may be larger than another; therefore Christ's body is larger than itself. The same thing is above itself and below itself, within itself and without itself. It is as truly a body as that which is most divisible, and yet it is as indivisible as a spirit; nevertheless it is not a spirit, but a body. It is a perfect body, in which the feet are farther from the head than the head from the breast, and yet there is no space between head and feet at all; so that the parts are farther off and nearer, without any distance at all; being farther and not farther, distant and not distant. By this also there is magnitude without extension of parts. By this dogma the same thing lies still, and yet it moves; it stays in a place, and yet it removes from that place; it departs from itself, and yet abides close by itself; and is in itself, and yet out of itself; it is removed, and yet it cannot be removed; broken, and cannot be divided: it is brought from heaven to earth, and yet is nowhere in the way, nor ever stirs from heaven; it ceases to be where it was, and yet does not move from thence, nor yet ceases to be at all. It supposes a body of Christ not "born of the Virgin Mary," that is, a body made of bread. It supposes that Christ's body is there, without the power of moving, or seeing, or hearing, or understanding; that he can neither remember nor foresee, nor save himself from robbers or vermin, corruption or rottenness. It makes that which was raised in power, to be again sown in weakness. It gives to it the characteristics of an idol, to have "eyes and see not, ears and hear not, a nose and not to smell, feet and yet cannot walk." These are some of the consequences of this most unreasonable doctrine. If the partaker and the thing partaken be naturally the same, then the sacrament did as much eat Christ, as Christ did eat the sacrament. It also follows from hence, that the soul of Christ entered into his body, though it were there before it entered; and that it would be there twice at the same time, for it is but one soul; and also, that the soul of Christ, which accompanied the body, which was then alive, was in his body in two incompatible and inconceivable ways.

If we consider the changes that are incident to the accidents of bread and wine, they would also furnish numerous instances of impossibility. Can accidents be lost or be burned, as Hesychius affirms was wont to be the case with the relics of the holy sacrament? Or can accidents make a man intoxicated, as Aquinas supposes the sacramental wine did the Corinthians, of whom St. Paul observes, "One is hungry, and another is drunken?" That which is in the chalice can make a man drunk, but Christ's blood cannot make a man drunk; therefore that which is in the chalice is not the blood of Christ. Again: can the species, or, in other words, the colour, shape, &c., kill a man? But the young Emperor of the house of Luxemburg is said to have been poisoned by a consecrated wafer; Pope Victor III. was in danger of suffering in like manner; and the Archbishop of York, according to the testimony of Matthew Paris and Malmsbury, was poisoned by the chalice. If Christ be really said to be touched and eaten because the accidents are so, then he may be literally made hot, or cold, or mouldy, or venomous, by the change of the accidents. We are weary of pursuing these absurdities, to the end of which we could never arrive.

6. Transubstantiation is one of the most distinguishing tenets of the Church of Rome. In consequence of denying this doctrine many have been put to a cruel death. Speaking of it, Bishop Tillotson says: "It is scandalous also on account of the cruel and bloody consequences of this doctrine; so contrary to the plain laws of Christianity, and to one great end and design of this sacrament, which is to unite Christians in the most perfect love and charity to one another; whereas this doctrine has been the occasion of the most barbarous and bloody tragedies that ever were acted in the world. For this has been in the Church of Rome the great burning article; and as absurd and unreasonable as it is, more Christians have been murdered for the denial of it than perhaps for all the other articles of their religion. And I think it may generally pass for a true observation, that all sects are commonly most hot and furious for those things for which there is least reason; for what men want of reason for their opinions they usually supply and make up in rage. O, blessed Saviour! thou best friend and greatest lover of mankind, who can imagine that thou didst ever intend that men should kill one another for not being able to believe contrary to their senses; for being unwilling to think that thou shouldst make one of the most horrid and barbarous things that can be imagined a main duty and principal mystery of thy religion; for not flattering the pride and presumption of the Priest, who says he can make God, and for not complying with the folly and stupidity of the people, who are made to believe that they can eat him?" *

7. The doctrine of transubstantiation is blasphemous and impious in itself, and tends to promote blasphemy, impiety, and superstition.

The various incongruities already brought to view present but too many instances of the truth of the proposition just now stated. Roman Catholics hesitate not to declare, that did their senses perceive what their faith obliges them to believe, the horror of it would be so great as to lead them to detest the sacrament. Hence they give these two notable reasons why they eat the body and drink the blood of Christ under the species of bread and wine. 1. That human piety might not loathe the sacrament; and, 2. That the action should not lie open to the blasphemies of infidels, who would view it as ridiculous and shameful, inhuman and execrable. Lanfranc and Algerus assign similar reasons.

* Tillotson on Transubstantiation, Works, fol., vol. i., p. 313.

(1.) This was considered not only as eating the flesh of man, and drinking human blood, but also as eating God; and who can say that this was not the reason why the Christian faith was, and is still, execrable both to the Gentile and to the Jew, to the Pagan and to the Mahometan?

(2.) The Apologies of the primitive Christians tell us, this was one of the great accusations which the Heathens made against the Christians,—that they did eat human flesh. This Trypho owns to be a common imputation upon Christians, though he judged it incredible. Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, Minucius, and others, take notice of it, and refute it, and constantly reject it, as the vilest calumny, and an abominable thing, saying, "We Christians do not own the eating human flesh: it is an infamous thing, and falsely is reported of us." "This is," saith Theophilus, "the most wicked and inhuman of all crimes objected to us, that we partake of human flesh: it is not possible that we should be guilty of so vile a thing." "Amongst us there is no eating human flesh," saith Tatian: "you are false witnesses who thus accuse us." "No man," saith Athenagoras, "who is not mad, can charge us with this thing; for we may not eat human flesh." "It is the calumny of the devil," saith Minucius. "You may be ashamed to object it to us," saith Tertullian. Whereas, had they received this as an article of faith, that they did daily eat the flesh of the man Christ, and thought his word obliged them to do this, with what sincerity could they, without all limitation or distinction, not only have denied, but even detested the doing so? But, that which makes it certain, and beyond all doubt, that they conceived that Christ had never taught them properly and substantially to eat his flesh and drink his blood in the sacrament, is the memorable history of Sanctus and Blandina, two Christian martyrs, written by Irenæus, and preserved to us by Oecumenius; namely, that the Heathens, having apprehended the servants of Christians, catechised, and used force with them, that from them they might learn something secret; the servants, having nothing else to say that might be pleasing to their tormentors, having heard from their masters that the sacrament was the body and blood of Christ, told this to the Inquisitors, who, apprehending that the Christians had done this very thing, gave notice of it to other Heathens, who endeavoured to force the martyrs, Sanctus and Blandina, to confess it; to whom Blandina readily and boldly answered, "How should they endure those things, who so fast as not to enjoy lawful flesh?" Now, had the ancient Christians believed this doctrine, that they did truly eat Christ's flesh and blood in the sacrament, how could Irenæus have represented it as a plain mistake, both in those servants and the Heathens, to think the sacrament was really Christ's flesh and blood? or have introduced Blandina refuting this imagination, had it been the sentiment of the church of Christ then, since by so doing she must have rejected one article of Christian faith? or, how could Oecumenius have put these words into his Commentary, without endeavouring to explain or reconcile them to the doctrine of oral manducation, had it then obtained? Let us then again consider whether that ought to be received as an article of faith, owned by all Christians from the beginning, which from the beginning was so expressly denied to be in deed reality, or in the thing itself, the flesh and blood of Christ; which made all the Apologists for, and first defenders of, the Christians, deniers of the truth; and to represent that as a false report, an infamous thing, a calumny of the devil, which was the plain and evident result of their own faith, and of the words of their great Master, as they are now interpreted by the Church of Rome.

But then, when we advance to the consideration of this doctrine, not only as it makes the Christian to eat human flesh, and drink of human blood; but as it is the eating of that very God we worship, as the Council of Trent hath defined; this renders it absurd, ridiculous, and blasphemous. For,

(3.) The very Heathens owned this, as the absurdest and most abominable thing, to be abhorred more than death. "When we call wine Bacchus," saith Cicero, "and our fruits Ceres, we use the common mode of speaking; sed ecquem tam amentem esse putas qui illud quo vescatur deum credat esse? 'But can you think any person so mad as to imagine that which he eats to be a god?'" "The Egyptians," saith Origen, "think a brute creature to be god; and therefore they do abstain from eating of his flesh, more than from death." We read, "that it was an abomination to the Egyptians, to eat bread with the Hebrews," (Gen. xliii. 32,) "because," say Onkelos and Jonathan, "the Hebrews did eat those cattle which the Egyptians worshipped: 'And Moses would depart from Egypt before he sacrificed to the God of Israel, lest he should sacrifice to him the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes;' (Exod. viii. 26;) that is, the beasts which the Egyptians worshipped, and therefore did abhor to kill, or to see killed before their eyes." (See Bochart. Hieroz., part i., l. ii., c. xxxiv., liii.; part ii., l. iv., c. xvi.) Averroes was a learned Heathen, who flourished in the eleventh century, when this portentous doctrine first obtained; and it forced him thus to blaspheme the Christian faith: "I have inquired into all religions, and have found none more foolish than the Christians, because that very God they worship, they with their teeth devour; and thus," he concludes, "quandoquidem Christiani id comedunt quod adorant, 'because the Christians eat what they do worship,' let my soul go to the philosophers." And Bellarmine himself confesseth, "that this, among the Heathens, was always judged, stultissimum paradoxum, 'the most foolish paradox,' as," saith he, "from the words of Averroes doth appear."

(4.) As the highest infamy which the Mahometans can cast upon us, we are by them reproached as the devourers of our God, as M. La Boulay informs us: "And they affirm that, by thus eating of Christ's flesh, the Christians use him worse than did the Jews, because, say they, it is more savage to eat his flesh, and drink his blood, than only to procure his death."

(5.) That the Jewish sentiments as to this matter were the same, we learn from the Epistle of the Prophet Jeremy, to the captive Jews; for he informs them, "that what the Babylonians worshipped, should afterwards be eaten; and by this," saith he, "ye may know they are no Gods." (Baruch vi. 72.) Nor can we doubt of this, if we believe what is so oft declared by the Christian Fathers, that "this was God's design in making the distinction betwixt clean and unclean beasts, to secure his people from idolatry; because, in Egypt, all beasts were deified," saith Pseudo Justin, "except swine. God therefore calls some of them unclean, some clean, and did permit them to sacrifice the clean beasts, and forbid them to eat of the unclean; by both these things, showing they were unworthy the name and honour of a Deity, because they were sacrificed and eaten, and because they were called unclean." "God," saith Theodoret, "pronouncing some beasts clean, and others unclean, persuades us not to think that any of them could be gods; for how," saith he, "can any man of sense think that to be a God which he abominates as unclean, or which is offered to the true God, and eaten by himself?" and this he frequently repeats. St. Jerome informs us, "That Moses did beat the golden calf to powder, and then made the Jews drink of it; ut discant contemnere quod in secessum projici viderant, 'that the people might learn to contemn what they saw went down into the draught.'" Now, could the same God, who had taken such care under the Old Testament to teach the people that that could not be their God which they did eat and sacrifice, appoint under the New Testament, that the Christian's God should be continually sacrificed and eaten? But,

(6.) Nothing is more certain than that the Christian Apologists, or Fathers, continually ridiculed the Heathen for worshipping such deities as might be eaten and sacrificed, and pronounced it the highest absurdity to do so. And,

(i.) They declaim against the thing itself, as infinitely absurd and foolish, declaring that it was the extremity of madness to worship what we eat; that no man of sense can think that a god which is eaten by himself; that the great Lawgiver of the Jews commanded them to eat what other nations worshipped as gods, that they might appear despicable in their eyes, as being eaten by themselves; that these things must be unworthy the name and honour of a God, because they were eaten.

(ii.) They upon this account deride the ignorance and folly of the Heathens, and look upon this as a sure indication of it, that they did worship what was eaten. "The Greeks, through ignorance," saith Clemens of Alexandria, "worship even those things which God hath given them to eat, and so become ungrateful to him." "Nonne et Apim bovem cum Ægyptiis adoratis et pascitis?" "Do not you," saith Minucius, "with the Egyptians, worship, and also feed upon an ox, which you call Apis? And is not this as great a folly as the worship of an ass's head, which without reason you object to us?" This Athanasius looks upon as an instance of the abominable worship of the Egyptians, that the same fish which some of them did consecrate as a god, was made the food of others. "The Egyptians adore a calf, the Lybians worship sheep, both which, in other nations, are sacrificed and fed upon: this," saith he, "is a certain indication of the folly of the Heathen worship." "The Heathens," saith Theodoret, "should have considered, that some of these things they eat; but through extremity of folly and stupidity, they consecrate the images of those things themselves did eat." (See Tatian, p. 149; Orig. contra Celsum, l. v., p. 249.) Now can it possibly be conceived, that all these Fathers should ridicule and expose the religion of the Heathens, for that very thing which made so great a part of their own religion? that they should look on it as an abominable and repugnant thing in Heathens, only to worship that which others did eat, if it had been a constant custom of all Christians to worship as God what themselves did eat? Could they brand that as the extremity of madness, stupidity, and folly, when done by Heathens, which their faith taught them was the highest act of religious worship, when performed by themselves? Surely these things give us sufficient reason, with Scotus, to admire why such an interpretation should be put upon this one article, as makes our faith contemptible to all who are guided by reason. Nor can we abstain from thinking with Petrus Cluniacensis's Carnal Man, "that it is against humanity, against piety, to break with our hands, to tear with our teeth, and to devour, as we do common meat, the flesh and blood of Christ, or that God and man should be devoured by men, the Master by his disciples, the Lord by his servants, and Christ by Christians."*

(7.) Roman Catholics tell us that nothing whatever remains of the substance of bread and wine after pronouncing the words of consecration. Therefore whatever may have been mixed with the bread and wine before consecration, provided the mixture does not destroy the bread and wine, or predominate over them, can do no harm to him that receives it. The following anecdote will illustrate what is here meant. It is of no great importance whether it is literally true in all its circumstances or not, as it may be properly applied to the doctrine in question. "A Protestant lady entered the matrimonial state with a Roman Catholic gentleman, on condition he would never use any attempts, in his intercourse with her, to induce her to embrace his religion. Accordingly, after their marriage, he abstained from conversing with her on those religious topics which he knew would be disagreeable. He employed the Romish Priest, however, who often visited the family, to use his influence to instil his Popish notions into her mind. But she remained unmoved, particularly on the doctrine of transubstantiation. At length the husband fell ill, and during his affliction was recommended by the Priest to receive the holy sacrament. The wife was requested to prepare bread and wine for the solemnity by the next day. She did so; and on presenting them to the Priest said, 'These, you wish me to understand, will be changed into the real body and blood of Christ after you have consecrated them.' 'Most certainly,' he replied. 'Then,' she rejoined, 'it will not be possible, after the consecration, for them to do any harm to the worthy partakers; for, says our Lord, my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed; and he that eateth me shall live by me.' 'Assuredly,' answered the Priest, 'they cannot do harm to the worthy receivers, but must communicate great good.' The ceremony was proceeded in, and the bread and wine were consecrated; the Priest was about to take and eat the bread, but the lady begged pardon for interrupting him, adding, 'I mixed a little arsenic with the bread, but as it is now changed into the real body of Christ, it cannot, of course, do you any harm.' The principles of the Priest, however, were not sufficiently firm to enable him to eat it. Confused, ashamed, and irritated, he left the house, and never more ventured to enforce on the lady the absurd doctrine of transubstantiation."

(8.) We proceed to the standard Roman Catholic authors, which will require no comment of ours to exhibit their absurdity, blasphemy, and superstitious character. These documents rarely appear in English. They are generally sealed from the common people by the Latin garments which they wear.

The Roman Missal says that a consecration is invalid when a Priest has before him eleven wafers, and intends to consecrate only ten, not determining what ten he intends to consecrate.

* Whitby on Matt. xxvi. 26.

Dens, in his Theology, says: "In consecrating the cup, with an ordinary intention, the drops of wine on the outside of the cup are not consecrated: hence these drops may, after consecration, be wiped away without scruple. But concerning the drops on the inside of the cup, and separated from that within, opinions vary: wherefore the Priest should be careful to wipe them away before consecration; for after consecration they cannot be wiped away, because they may PROBABLY be consecrated."*

In the sacrament Roman Catholics mingle water with the wine; and much controversy has taken place among them as to what becomes of the water in consecration. Hear Dens on this subject: "A question remains, What becomes of the water mixed with the wine in consecrating? Three opinions are collected from Innocent III. The first teaches that this water is converted into the water which flowed from the side of Christ; but this opinion is supported by no probability. The second is, that this water is not changed into the blood of Christ, but remains circumfused with the accidents of wine; but this opinion is scarcely probable. The third teacheth that this water is changed into the blood of Christ; and this opinion is to be held as certain. But there is a greater controversy yet; namely, whether this water is immediately turned into the blood of Christ, or whether it is converted first into wine, and thus mediately into the blood of Christ. St. Thomas Aquinas holds this latter opinion; so also the Roman Catechism, and the Roman Pontifical. Aquinas supposes that Innocent III. was of the same opinion. See the authors generally."†

Concerning the accidents of bread and wine, Dens teaches as follows:—"How do these accidents exist when the substance of bread and wine does not remain?—Answer. St. Thomas saith these accidents exist in the sacrament without a subject, by the power of God. St. Thomas also saith that quantity alone can exist without a subject, but the accidents exist in quantity, as in their immediate subject. More recent philosophers say that these accidents have their subject in the air and in our senses. What can the species remaining in the sacrament undergo?—Answer. Generally, whatever the substance of bread and wine would undergo and suffer, were it yet in existence; and thus the consecrated species act on other bodies, and are acted on by them: when taken as food, they nourish, are changed, are corrupted. But when any thing operates to their corruption, God thus wonderfully disposes and works these things in order to conceal this mystery."* "How long does Christ remain in this sacrament?—Answer. As long as the species remain safe, or as long as they are not corrupted, and the substance of the bread and wine does not remain under them: but the body of Christ ceases to exist under the species when, on account of corruption, the substance of bread and wine would cease to exist if no consecration had been made. Besides, whether the species are corrupted or detained, Christ does not leave them, and much less is he corrupted; but he simply ceases to be produced under them. But how long the species remain entire, either in the stomach or otherwise, is quite uncertain. But especially it cannot be said that they cease shortly after reception. Several corollaries may be inferred from this."†

"What takes place when another liquor is mixed with the consecrated wine?—Answer. If any kind of liquor in small quantity is poured upon the consecrated wine, the blood of Christ remains present under the species of consecrated wine.....If another liquor of a different kind, for instance, water, should be poured-in in such a quantity, that if the substance of the wine were present, it would not remain; then when the consecrated species would not remain, the blood of Christ would cease to exist. Nevertheless there are others who hold a different opinion, as Suarez, Sylvius, Wiggers," &c.‡

A wicked or heretical Priest may consecrate; which, by the way, does not appear to be very favourable to morals. "Every Priest may validly consecrate, should he even be wicked, heretical, suspended, excommunicated, degraded," &c.§

"A mouse or a dog, eating the sacramental species, does not eat them sacramentally; yet this proves that then the body of Christ does not cease to exist under the species as long as they exist; in like manner that some of the ancients erred, in teaching that the body of Christ ceased to exist under the sacramental species as soon as they touched the lips of a sinner."‖

[* "Consecrato calice, non consecrari guttas vini exterius calici adhærentes, supposita intentione ordinaria. unde sine scrupulo similes guttæ sunt abstergendæ etiam post consecrationem. De guttis vero calici interius, seu intra cuppam adhærentibus, et a toto separatis, variant sententiæ: quare solicitus sit Sacerdos eas abstergere ante oblationem vel consecrationem; post consecrationem autem abstergi non possunt, quia forte sunt consecratæ, sed sumendæ sunt cum speciebus vini vel prima ablutione."—Dens Theologia, tom. v.; De Euch., No. 11, p. 265.]

[† "Superest quæstio, Quid fiat in consecratione de illa aqua vino consecrando admixta? Tres sententiæ referuntur ex Innocentio III. Prima dicebat, aquam illam converti in aquam quæ fluxit ex latere Christi; sed hæc opinio nulla probabilitate nititur. Secunda vult, quod aqua illa non mutetur in sanguinem Christi, sed maneat vini accidentibus circumfusa; hæc etiam opinio vix probabilis est. Tertia docet, aquam illam converti in sanguinem Christi; et hæc tanquam certa haberi potest. At major est controversia, utrum illa aqua immediate convertatur in sanguinem Christi; an vero prius convertatur in vinum, et sic mediate in sanguinem Christi. Hoc posterius tenet S. Thomas hic art. 8, in Corp. Catechismus Romanus similiter parte 2. Num. 19; Pontificale Romanum, parte 1. tract. x., cap. 12, Ejusdemque sententiæ putat S. Thom. Innocentium III. Vide latius auctores."—Idem, No. 16, p. 273.]

[* See supra, p. 140, col. ii., note †.

["Quid agere et pati possunt species in sacramento remanentes?—R. Generaliter omne illud, quod agere posset et pati substantia panis et vini, si adhuc adesset: et sic species consecratæ agunt in alia corpora, et vicissim ab ipsis patiuntur: sumptæ nutriunt, alterantur, corrumpuntur, quin et ad earum corruptionem quandoque aliquid generatur, hæc omnia Deo sic mirabiliter disponente et operante ad celandum mysterium."—Dens Theol., tom. v., No. 26, p. 288.]

[† "Quamdiu Christus remanet in hoc sacramento?—R. Quamdiu salvæ manent species; sive quamdiu species illæ sic non sunt corruptæ, ut sub illis non remaneret substantia panis et vini: desinit vero corpus Christi sub speciebus quando ob harum corruptionem desiisset substantia panis et vini, si non fuisset facta consecratio. Porro corruptis seu desinentibus speciebus, Christus ab eis non discedit, et multo minus corrumpitur; seu simpliciter sub iis desinit esse productus. Quamdiu autem vel in stomacho, vel aliter salvæ maneant species, satis incertum est; saltem dici nequit, quod mox post sumptionem desinant: ex quo corollaria quædam notatu digna deducit Pauwels, tom. ii., c. xiii., sec. vii., Num. 62, &c."—Idem, No. 28, p. 290.]

[‡ "Quid fit dum vino consecrato admiscetur alius liquor?—R. Si qualiscumque liquor in parva quantitate admisceatur respective ad vinum consecratum, præsens manet sanguis Christi sub specie vini consecrati: quia per similem mixtionem non solvitur species vini consecrati, cui alius affusus liquor tantum circumfunditur, aut certo interfluit. Si alius liquor specie diversus, v. g., aqua, affundatur in tanta quantitate, ut, si adesset substantia vini, ea non remaneret; cum tunc non remaneant species consecratæ, desinit sub illis existere sanguis Christi."—Idem, No. 28, p. 291.]

[§ "Hinc valide consecrat omnis Sacerdos, quantumvis malus, hæreticus, suspensus, excommunicatus, degradatus, &c.; invalide autem quiscumque non Sacerdos."—Idem, No. 29, p. 293.]

[‖ "Similiter, art. 3, cit. ad. 3, dicit S. Thomas, quod mus aut canis species sacramentales manducans, non sumat sacramentaliter; docens tamen contra aliquos, quod tunc corpus Christi non desinat esse sub speciebus, quamdiu hæ manent. Et ibidem in Corp., dicit

"What if a sick person vomits the sacred host?—Answer. Agreeably to the Roman Missal, if the species appear entire, they are reverently to be collected, and afterward received: but if nausea prevent that, then they are cautiously to be separated from the filth, and thus deposited in some sacred place, and after they are corrupted they are to be put into the sacristy or a sacred fish-pond. For as long as the species are entire, they cannot be burned without sacrilege. Likewise, the same thing is to be done if, in any manner, whether by negligence or otherwise, the species should be found corrupted. But if the species do not appear, and yet it is likely that they are not yet corrupted, on account of the shortness of time which intervenes; then the thing thus vomited ought to be burned, and the ashes put in a sacred place, or buried in a graveyard."

"What if, in receiving the viaticum, the sick person immediately dies?—Answer. If the sacred host does not appear in his mouth, the sick person, in that case, is to be left untouched, although it may be uncertain whether he has swallowed the host or not; but if it appear in his mouth, let it be modestly taken out, and reverently preserved, until the species be corrupted: and then it is to be disposed of as is directed respecting the vomited host."*

These quotations need no comments in order to show their absurdity, and even profaneness. They are not the frequently alleged misrepresentations of Protestants. They are the words of Peter Dens, a teacher of theology in the University of Louvain, a celebrated Roman Catholic college and theological school. The work of Dens is designed for the use of students in divinity. It has been the text-book of the theological department of the Maynooth College for many years, and is ranked among the foremost works on dogmatical theology in the Church of Rome. But the above quotations form only a small part of what is contained in the Missal and other Roman Catholic authorities respecting these profanations of Christ's sacrament. We must therefore refer the reader to those extracts from the Missal, respecting the defects of the mass, which are quoted in the chapter on that subject.

III. We proceed to answer the arguments employed by Roman Catholics in favour of transubstantiation.

1. They maintain, that "previous to the institution of the sacrament, bread had never been taken as a sign or symbol of our Lord's body; and therefore the figurative interpretation cannot be correct." We answer, (1.) Allowing that bread was never used to represent the body of Christ, it does not follow that it may not be employed in that sense in the words of the institution of this ordinance. We have no account that Christ, before the Gospel was written, was called "a door," "a way," or "a vine;" yet the figurative application of such terms is evident; because the metaphorical style is plainly employed. In like manner, when it is said, "This is my body, this is my blood," we know that the same style is used, because these expressions in their connexions possess all the analogies pertaining to it. (2.) We have proof that the term "bread" is frequently employed in the metaphorical sense, to signify those blessings which Christ bestows upon his people; and eating and drinking often denote the participation of such communication. Among many examples take the following:—"Wisdom crieth in the streets, Come, eat of the bread and drink of the wine that I have mingled;" (Prov. ix. 5;) that is, "Go in the way of understanding." (Verse 6.) "Eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness." (Isaiah lv. 2, 3.) There never was a sacrament without signs or symbols. Circumcision and the passover had their signs under the law, and we have demonstrated that our Lord used figurative language at the institution of the sacraments of his church.

2. In the sixth chapter of St. John's Gospel, Christ declared, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you;" and again, "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed." The Romanists observe, "What can be more clear, than that in the sacrament of the eucharist, the true, real, and natural body of Christ is eaten, and his true, real, and natural blood is drunk, and not bread and wine, as our senses would persuade us?"

To this we answer, that our Lord, in this chapter, is spoken of as feeding multitudes by a miraculous supply of bread, in consequence of which many followed him, that they might enjoy the privilege again. From this he took occasion to instruct them on spiritual subjects, and to inform them that they should not "labour for the meat that perisheth, but for that which endureth to everlasting life." That the chapter does not belong to the eucharist at all, and, therefore, gives no just ground for the doctrine of transubstantiation, is evident from the following considerations.

(1.) Some celebrated individuals among themselves acknowledge that the passage does not favour transubstantiation; nay, some of them even contend that it has no reference to that sacrament at all. Cardinal Cajetan gives precisely the same gloss that Protestants have done: "To eat," says he, "the flesh of Christ, and to drink his blood, is faith in the death of Jesus Christ; so that the sense is this: If ye use not the death of the Son of God as meat and drink, ye have not the life of the Spirit in you." And he afterward denies that these words are to be understood of eating and drinking in the sacrament.

["There are many Popes, and also a multitude of Doctors of the Romish Church, who with Cajetan hold, as we do, that there is not a word in the sixth chapter of John concerning the eucharist, nor the corporal manducation of Christ's body, but that Jesus speaks there of spiritual manducation, by faith in his own death. Such is the opinion of Pope Innocent III., and Pope Pius II., called Æneas Sylvius, before his elevation to the Popedom; likewise, of Cardinals Bonaventura, Cusanus, De Alliaantiquos quosdam errasse, docentes, quod corpus Christi desinat esse sub speciebus sacramentalibus, tam cito quam labiis peccatoris continguntur."—Idem, No. 50, p. 325.]

[* "Quid si infirmus sacram hostiam evomat?—R. Conformiter ad Missale Rom. de defectibus Missæ, tit. x., No. 14, si species appareant integræ, reverenter accipiantur et postea sumantur: si autem id nausea vetet, nunc caute separentur a sordibus, et ita in aliquo loco sacro reponantur, et postquam corruptæ fuerint, mittantur in sacrarium seu piscinam sacram: etenim citra sacrilegium species, quamdiu integræ sunt, comburi non possunt. Similiter faciendum, si quomodocumque, sive per negligentiam, sive alia occasione, species reperiantur corruptæ. Si autem in casu species non appareant, et tamen verisimile sit, illas nondum esse corruptas ob breve temporis spatium quod intercessit: tunc res sic evomita debet comburi, et cineres mitti in sacrarium vel alium locum sacrum, v. g., terræ mandari in cemeterio.

["Quid si, sumpto viatico, infirmus statim moriatur?—Si sacra hostia non appareat in ejus ore, tunc ita relinquendus est defunctus, quantumvis nesciatur an eam deglutierit: si vero appareat in ore, modeste extrahatur, et reverenter servetur, donec species corrumpantur; et tunc fiat ut mox dictum est de hostia evomita."—Idem, No. 65, p. 351.]

co; also, of Durand, Bishop of Mende, Gabriel Byel, Hesselius, one of the Doctors of the Council of Trent, Lindanus, Bishop of Ruremond, Ruard Tapper, Jansenius, Bishop of Ghent, Ferus, a Divine of Mentz, Valdensis, and many more. Amongst others, Gabriel Byel, in the thirty-sixth lesson on the canon of the mass, says, that the Doctors, with one common consent, hold that 'the sixth chapter of John relates to spiritual manducation only.' But, for brevity's sake, let it suffice to cite the two forenamed Popes.

["Pope Innocent III. expresses himself in these words: 'The Lord speaks of spiritual manducation, saying, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. In this way the righteous alone eat of the body of Christ.'*

["A learned Pope is a very rare personage; nevertheless, it may be said of Pope Pius II., that he was one of the most learned men of his age. Arguing against the Bohemians, in his 130th epistle to Cardinal de Carvial, he writes thus: 'That is not the sense of the Gospel of John which you ascribe to it; for there is no injunction given there to drink of the sacrament; but a spiritual manner of drinking is there taught.' And shortly after: 'The Lord there makes known, by these words, the secret mysteries of spiritual drinking, and not of carnal, when he says, It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing. And again, The words that I speak unto you are spirit and life. Do you wish to know certainly whether the Evangelist speaks of the spiritual manducation, which is performed by faith? Consider what the Lord says in these words, He that eats and drinks: these words are of the present, and not of the future, tense. Therefore, ever since the Lord spake them, there have been persons who have eaten and drunk; and, nevertheless, the Lord had not yet suffered, nor was the sacrament yet instituted.'

["On these words, 'Except ye eat my flesh, ye have no life in you,' Thomas Aquinas says, 'If this refers to spiritual manducation, the sentence is free from all ambiguity. For he who is a partaker in the unity of the Church, as it is affected by charity, &c., does spiritually eat the flesh of Christ, and drink his blood. But if it relates to sacramental manducation, there is ambiguity in this saying, Except ye eat my flesh, ye have no life in you.' But the modern Doctors and Jesuits have renounced this opinion, contemn the authority of the Popes now cited, and teach, that Jesus begins, John vi. 51, to speak of sacramental manducation, but that all before that relates to spiritual manducation. For example: when Jesus Christ says, that he is the bread come down from heaven; that he is the bread of life; that whosoever believeth in him shall never thirst; and that he is the bread come down from heaven, of which whoso eateth shall never die; (verses 33, 35, 50;) they admit that, in all these passages, he speaks of a spiritual manner of eating and drinking, and deny that he speaks of the eucharistic bread; and therefore they understand these expressions figuratively. This doctrine is full of absurdity, and destroys itself. How audacious to teach two kinds of manducation in the sequel of the same discourse, and to pronounce, with magisterial authority, that one part of the chapter is to be taken figuratively, and the other literally, seeing that the same mode of speech is used in both, and the same exposition is equally applicable to both!

["* De Myst. Miss., lib. iv., c. xiv."]

["The Council of Trent was very much embarrassed with this matter, it being long agitated and controverted in that assembly. The Prelates seeing the new Doctors opposed to the old, and even to the Popes, and likewise discording among themselves, would determine nothing upon the subject, but left it undecided, as the Jesuit Salmeron, who was present at the Council, assures us: 'The Synod,' says he, 'would not expressly determine at that time what was the most proper and natural sense of the words of Christ in John vi., on account of the various interpretations of the holy Fathers, and of the Doctors, which were brought forward on each side.' However, it was there especially that that attribute of perfection—the infallibility of the Pope and of the Council—ought to have displayed itself, it being a question of very great importance. The Popes have not determined any thing on the subject even yet, nor have they condemned those who hold an opinion opposite to that of the Jesuits.

["It was urged in the Council of Trent, that the sixth chapter of John should be declared to refer to sacramental eating; but this proposal gave much offence, because it tended to establish the necessity of the communion of the cup, which had already been taken away. Besides, if it were determined that John vi. referred to sacramental eating, it was apprehended that the Council might be reproached with depriving the people of salvation, by having deprived them of the cup. If the haughty and arrogant Council of Trent would not venture to determine whether John vi. referred to sacramental and oral, or to spiritual manducation, how presumptuous and unwarrantable is it in individual Romanists—as Bossuet, Hay, Milner, &c.—to assume that that chapter relates to the eucharist, and then to adduce it in favour of transubstantiation!"*]

(2.) The Roman Catholic is manifestly confused in the commencement. Christ says, that he is the bread which came down from heaven; an expression which cannot mean his body, for he did not bring it down from heaven, but took it of the Virgin, according to the testimony of Scripture and the ancient Creeds.

(3.) Nothing was more common among the inhabitants of the East than to use the metaphor of eating and drinking to express spiritual supplies for the soul.

(4.) The same thing is evidently implied in this chapter; namely, to eat of the bread that came down from heaven, and to believe in Christ. (Verses 35, 40, 47.)

(5.) The bread which Christ gave, is the same with his flesh, which he shall give for the life of the world. (Verse 51.) And because eating this bread of life signified believing on him, (verse 35,) therefore eating his flesh means the same spiritual action. And as the phrases, giving bread to eat, and giving flesh to eat, are synonymous: so eating the flesh of Christ, and eating the bread which he gives, entitle equally to eternal life; the meaning must be precisely the same. And as none could say that Christ could be properly eaten as bread; so neither can we eat his flesh except in a spiritual sense.

(6.) It would be impossible to interpret these words in the Roman Catholic manner, because Christ speaks of such an eating of his flesh and drinking his blood as was actually necessary at that time for the salvation of man. "Except ye eat my flesh and drink my blood, ye have no life in you." This shows that it was necessary for all that heard him, even then, to eat his flesh and drink his blood. But the eucharist was not then instituted, until at least a year after; therefore they could not then be said to partake of it. Either, therefore, the Apostles had no life in them at that time, and were in a state of condemnation, or they ate the flesh of Christ and drank his blood, when there was no eucharist established; and consequently they could not partake of them in that gross and literal sense for which they contend.

[* Du Moulin's Anatomy of the Mass, translated by Shanks, pp. 279—282."]

(7.) But should we be led to suppose a prolepsis or anticipation in these words, that is, though Christ expressed himself in the present time, he nevertheless meant the future, when the sacrament should be instituted; it would be impossible to confine the signification of eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ to eating and drinking in the sacrament, so as to exclude all other means of participating in them. For, according to this, what would ensue in the case of those who never have an opportunity of partaking of Christ's body in this manner? What would become of all baptized infants who die before they arrive at years of maturity, or of mature persons who are cut off by death before they receive the eucharist? If these words are to be understood of this sacrament only, all such have no life in them, but are in a state of condemnation and death, notwithstanding they have been baptized, and, as Papists believe, truly regenerated.

(8.) Supposing the words are to be taken literally, as they contend; such interpretation must necessarily overthrow the doctrine. They inform us that the bread and wine are changed into the very Christ. But our Saviour's words, taken literally, rather prove that his body and blood are turned into bread and wine, than that the latter are changed into the former. He says, "I am the bread of life;" (verse 48;) and, "I am the living bread that came down from heaven." (Verse 51.) Then he says, that "they must eat his flesh and drink his blood." There is some plausibility in the literal form by this change, but none for the change so strenuously asserted by the Romanists.

(9.) But, taking no advantage of this, let us permit them to hold their contended literal sense: then they must allow that Christ's body is true bread; and, therefore, though we eat his body in the sacrament, yet we eat true bread also. Now, how can we eat the very body of Christ, and true bread at the same time? This cannot be answered without overthrowing transubstantiation; for that doctrine will not allow us to believe that we eat Christ's very body and bread at the same time; but, on the contrary, lays it down as an article of faith, that after the bread is made His body, it is no longer bread, but the appearance of it.

(10.) According to their interpretation, the laity among them are in a miserable condition, because they are not allowed the necessary means of salvation, since they receive the one part only. For Christ has made the blood as necessary as the flesh: "Except," says he, "ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." He does not say, "Except ye eat my flesh, or drink my blood, ye have no life in you;" but, "Except you eat my flesh and drink my blood." Both are necessary if one be so; and yet all know that the cup is denied to the laity in the Popish communion.

The doctrine of concomitancy which they have invented will not assist them in overcoming this difficulty: it is this, that the blood of Christ in the sacrament is so essentially united with the body, that whosoever communicates in one element, whether bread or wine, does, on account of that union, partake of both. But Christ here says expressly, if they do not both eat his flesh and drink his blood, they have no life in them: and no other interpretation of these words is allowed but this, that the flesh of Christ here spoken of is that which formerly was the bread in the sacrament; and the blood of Christ is that which formerly was wine in the sacrament. Admitting this sense to be true, we appeal to all, if it is not as necessary to partake of the cup, that is, the blood, as it is to partake of the bread, that is, the body; and we ask, What must become of the people to whom the cup is denied?

(11.) There is another point to be noticed in this passage, which, if what has been said signify nothing, would alone overthrow the doctrine of transubstantiation, so far as this text is concerned. As our Saviour declares, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you;" so he also says in the following verse, "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." The Church of Rome not only confesses, but contends, that every person who receives the sacrament eats Christ's flesh, and drinks his blood: the natural conclusion therefore must be, that every one who receives the sacrament will have eternal life, and that Christ will raise him up at the last day. But is this a just conclusion? No, certainly; for St. Paul says that a man may eat and drink damnation or condemnation, as well as life, to himself. It is therefore evident, even to a demonstration, that what is eaten and drunk in the sacrament is not always the body and blood of Christ which he speaks of in the passage; and consequently it is far from proving transubstantiation. The sacrament was received by Judas, and is now by millions who are both wicked and depraved, and in danger of being lost eternally. This, therefore, cannot be the import of our Saviour's words. For observe, (i.) That our Lord speaks in general terms, "Whosoever eats," &c.; (ii.) That he speaks not by way of promise, which might be conditional, but of certain declaration; and, (iii.) That the text shows that the eating referred to can never be employed unprofitably, but with great benefit.

(12.) Our Lord's discourse is, in style and manner, similar to other emblematical expressions; as when, under the figure of water, he taught the Samaritan woman; (John iv.;) Christ, by the term "leaven," directed the Apostles to the doctrines of the Scribes and Pharisees; (Matt. xvi. 7—11;) and in John vi., the loaves and fishes were the figures under which the Saviour directed them to seek the bread of life.

(13.) The ancient Fathers interpreted the words in the same manner as the Protestant Divines; [and considering the great stress which is laid upon this part of our Saviour's discourse at Capernaum, by the modern champions of Popery, we adduce the following quotations from the writings of the Fathers, in proof of the assertion which we have made; commencing with,—

["(i.) Tertullian.

["If Christ declares, that 'the flesh profiteth nothing,' the sense must be decided from the matter of the saying. For because the Jews deemed his discourse hard and intolerable, as if he had truly determined that his flesh was to be eaten by them; in order that he might dispose the state of salvation toward the spirit, he promised, 'It is the Spirit that quickeneth;' and thus he subjoined, 'The flesh profiteth nothing;' namely, to quicken. There follows also what he would have us to understand by spirit: 'The words which I have spoken unto you, are spirit and life.' As also above: 'He that heareth my words, and believeth on him that sent me, hath eternal life, and shall not come into judgment, but shall pass from death to life.' Appointing, therefore, the word to be the vivifier, because the word is spirit and life, he calleth the same likewise 'his own flesh;' for, since 'the Word was made flesh,' it was thence to be sought for the purpose of life, and was to be devoured in the hearing, and was to be ruminated upon in the intellect, and was to be digested by faith. Hence he had shortly before pronounced his flesh to be also heavenly bread: urging, through the continued allegory of necessary food, the memory of their fathers who had turned the bread and flesh of the Egyptians to a divine vocation. Recalling, therefore, their recollections, because he had perceived them to be scattered, 'The flesh,' saith he, 'profiteth nothing.'*

["(ii.) Cyprian.

["We pray, and say, 'Give us this day our daily bread;' which may be understood both spiritually and literally; because, by divine utility, each sense is profitable to our health. For Christ is the bread of life; and this bread belongs not to all, but is our own peculium. And, as we say, 'Our Father,' because God is the Father of those who understand and believe; so we say, 'Our bread,' because Christ is the bread of us who are allied and conjoined to his body. But we pray, that this bread may be given to us every day, lest we who are in Christ, and who daily receive the eucharist for the food of our health, should be separated from the body of Christ, while, on occasion of any more grievous sin, being kept away and not communicating, we are hindered from the heavenly bread; he himself preaching and admonishing, 'I, who descended from heaven, am the bread of life; if any one shall eat of my bread, he shall live for ever; but the bread which I will give is my flesh for the life of the world.' Since, therefore, he says, that a man lives for ever, if he shall eat of his bread; as it is manifest that those live who are conjoined to his body, and who receive the eucharist of communication rightly; so, on the other hand, it is to be feared and prayed lest, while any one being kept away is separated from the body of Christ, he should remain at a distance from health; inasmuch as he himself threatens and says, 'Unless ye shall eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye shall not have life in you.' Therefore we pray, that our bread, Christ to wit, should be given to us daily; in order that we, who remain and live in Christ, should not depart from his sanctification and body.†

["(iii.) Clement of Alexandria.

["Food is faith, which from catechising, is converted into a foundation; but that, which is more solid than hearing, being made (as it were) a body in the soul itself, is assimilated to food. Elsewhere likewise, our Lord, in the Gospel according to John, has, after a different mode, through symbols, set forth such food as this. For when he says, 'Eat my flesh and drink my blood,' he evidently is allegorizing the drinkableness of faith, and of the promise through which the Church, like a human being, consisting of many members, is irrigated and increased, compounded and compacted, bodily and animally, both from faith and from hope; even as the Lord himself, from flesh and blood. For hope is truly the very blood of faith, by which, as by the principle of animal life, faith is sustained; because, when hope shall have expired, like as when blood flows out, the vital principle of faith is dissolved.*

["The blood of the Lord is two-fold. For under one aspect it is carnal, by which we are redeemed from corruption; but under another aspect it is spiritual, as being that by which we have been anointed; and, to drink of the blood of Jesus, this is to partake of his incorruption. The spirit is the strength of the word, as blood is the strength of the flesh. Analogously, therefore, wine is mingled with water; and the spirit with man; and the one, namely, the mixture, introduces to the feast of faith; but the other, namely, the spirit, leads to incorruption. The mixture, again, of both, namely, the drink and the word, is called the 'eucharist,' a grace praiseworthy and honourable; of which they who partake in faith, are sanctified both in body and in soul; the paternal will mystically mingling together, by the spirit and the word, that divine mixture man.†

["* 'Si carnem ait nihil prodesse, ex materia dicti dirigendus est sensus. Nam, quia durum et intolerabilem existimaverunt sermonem ejus, quasi vere carnem suam illis edendam determinasset: ut in spiritum disponeret statum salutis, promisit; Spiritus est qui vivificat. Atque ita subjunxit: Caro nihil prodest; ad vivificandum, scilicet. Exequitur etiam, quid velit intelligi spiritum: Verba, quæ locutus sum vobis, spiritus sunt, vita sunt. Sicut et supra: Qui audit sermones meos, et credit in eum qui me misit, habet vitam æternam, et in judicium non veniet, sed transibit de morte ad vitam. Itaque sermonem constituens vivificatorem, quia spiritus et vita sermo, eundem etiam carnem suam dixit, quia et sermo caro erat factus, proinde in causam vitæ appetendus, et devorandus auditu, et ruminandus intellectu, et fide digerendus. Nam et paulo ante, carnem suam panem quoque cœlestem pronunciarat: urgens usque quaque, per allegoriam necessariorum pabulorum, memoriam patrum qui panes et carnes Ægyptiorum perverterant divinæ vocationi. Igitur conversus ad recogitatus illorum, quia senserat dispergendos, Caro, ait, nihil prodest.'—Tertull. Oper., de Resurr. Carn., cap. xxxvii., pp. 498, 499, fol. Paris, 1658.

["† 'Postulamus et dicimus: Panem nostrum quotidianum da nobis hodie. Quod potest et spiritaliter et simpliciter intelligi: quia et uterque intellectus, utilitate divina, proficit ad salutem. Nam panis vitæ Christus est; est panis hic omnium non est, sed noster est: et, quomodo dicimus Pater noster, quia intelligentium et credentium Pater est; sic et Panem nostrum vocamus, quia Christus noster (qui corpus ejus contingimus) panis est. Hunc autem panem dari nobis quotidie postulamus, ne, qui in Christo sumus et eucharistiam quotidie ad cibum salutis accipimus, intercedente aliquo graviore delicto, dum abstenti et non communicantes a cœlesti pane prohibemur, a Christi corpore separemur: ipso prædicante et monente; Ego sum panis vitæ qui de cœlo descendi; si quis ederit de meo pane, vivet in æternum; panis autem, quem ego dedero, caro mea est pro seculi vita. Quando ergo dicit in æternum vivere, si quis ederit de ejus pane; ut manifestum est eos vivere, qui corpus ejus attingunt, et eucharistiam jure communicationis accipiunt: ita contra timendum est et orandum, ne, dum quis abstentus separatur a Christi corpore, procul remaneat a salute; comminante ipso et dicente, Nisi ederitis carnem Filii hominis, et biberitis sanguinem ejus, non habebitis vitam in vobis. Et ideo panem nostrum, id est, Christum, dari nobis quotidie petimus; ut, qui in Christo manemus et vivimus, a sanctificatione ejus et corpore non recedamus.'—Cypriani Oper. De Orat., Dom., fol., p. 268. Paris, 1607.

["* 'Βρωμα δε, ἡ πιστις εις θεμελιον εκ κατηχησεως συνεστραμμενη· ἡ δη στερεμνωτερα της ακοης ὑπαρχουσα, βρωματι απεικαζεται, εν αυτῃ σωματοποιουμενη τῃ ψυχῃ. Την τοιανδε τροφην αλλαχοθι δε ὁ Κυριος, εν τῳ κατα Ιωαννην ευαγγελιῳ, ετερως εξηνεγκεν δια συμβολων. Φαγεσθε μου τας σαρκας, ειπων, και πιεσθε μου το αἱμα· εναργες της πιστεως και της επαγγελιας το ποτιμον αλληγορων δι' ὧν ἡ Εκκλησια, καθαπερ ανθρωπος, εκ πολλων συνεστηκυια μελων, αρδεται τε και αυξεται, συγκροτειται τε και συμπηγνυται, εξ αμφοιν· σωματος μεν, της πιστεως· ψυχης δε, της ελπιδος· ὡσπερ και ὁ Κυριος, εκ σαρκος και αἱματος. Τῳ γαρ οντι, αἱμα της πιστεως, ἡ ελπις· εφ' ἡς συνεχεται, καθαπερ ὑπο ψυχης ἡ πιστις· διαπνευσασης δε της ελπιδος, δικην εκρυεντος αἱματος, το ζωτικον της πιστεως ὑπεκλυεται.'—Clem. Alex. Oper., tom. i., Pædag., lib. i., cap. vi., pp. 120, 121. Potter. Edit. Oxon., 1715.

["† 'Διττον δε το αἱμα του Κυριου· το μεν γαρ εστιν αυτου σαρκικον ὡ της φθορας λελυτρωμεθα· το δε, πνευματικον, τουτεστιν ᾧ κεχρισμεθα· και τουτ' εστι πιειν το αἱμα του Ιησου, της κυριακης μεταλαβειν αφθαρσιας. Ισχυς

["(iv.) Origen.

["We are said to drink the blood of Christ, when we receive his discourses.*

["His flesh is true meat, and his blood is true drink; for, by the flesh and blood of his word, as by clean meat and drink, he waters and refreshes the whole race of men.†

["(v.) Athanasius.

["When our Lord conversed on the eating of his body, and when he thence beheld many scandalized, he forthwith added: 'Doth this offend you? What if ye shall behold the Son of man ascending where he was before? It is the spirit that quickeneth: the flesh profiteth nothing. The words which I speak unto you are spirit and life.' Both these matters, the flesh and the spirit, he said respecting himself; and he distinguished the spirit from the flesh, in order that, believing both the visible and the invisible, they might understand his sayings to be not carnal but spiritual. For to how many persons could his body have sufficed for food: so that it might become the aliment of the whole world? But, that he might divert their minds from carnal cogitations, and that they might learn the flesh which he would give them to be supercelestial and spiritual food: he, on this account, mentioned the ascent of the Son of man to heaven. 'The words,' said he, 'which I speak unto you, are spirit and life.' As if he had intimated, 'My body shall be exhibited and given as food for the world; so that that food shall be given to each one spiritually, and shall to all be a preservative to the resurrection unto life eternal.'‡

["(vi.) Cyril of Jerusalem.

["Christ, once conversing with the Jews, said, 'Except ye eat my flesh, and drink my blood, ye have not life in yourselves.' They, not having spiritually understood the things which were spoken, went back; fancying that he exhorts them to flesh-eating. There were, also, in the old covenant, the loaves of the shew-bread; yet these, being of the old covenant, came to an end. But, in the new covenant, there are heavenly bread and the cup of salvation, sanctifying the soul and the body. As bread corresponds to the body, so likewise the word is fitting to the soul. When the man David saith unto God, 'Thou hast prepared a table before me;' what means he else but the mystical and intellectual table which God hath prepared before us? On this account, also, Solomon, enigmatising this grace, says, in the book of Ecclesiastes, 'Come, eat thy bread in cheerfulness;' namely, the spiritual bread; and, 'Come,' (he calls with a saving and beatifying vocation,) 'drink thy wine in a good heart;' namely, the spiritual wine. Strengthen, then, thy heart, partaking of this bread as spiritual; and make joyful the countenance of thy soul.*

["(vii.) Jerome.

["All who are lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God,—while they are not holy in body and spirit, neither eat the flesh of Jesus nor drink his blood; concerning which he himself says: 'He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life.' For Christ our passover is sacrificed for us; and he is eaten, not out of doors, but in one house and within.†

["They sacrifice many victims, and jointly eat their flesh; while they desert the single victim of Christ, and eat not his flesh whose flesh is the food of believers.‡

["We read the holy Scriptures. Now the body of Jesus I suppose to be the Gospel; the holy Scriptures I suppose to be his doctrine. And when he says, 'He that eateth not my flesh and drinketh [not] my blood,' although this may also be understood in the mystery; yet, more truly, the body of Christ and his blood being the theme of the Scriptures, are divine doctrine. If when we go to the mystery, (he that is faithful will understand,) should a person fall into sin; he places himself in danger. If, when we hear the word of God, the word of God, and the flesh and the blood of Christ is poured into our ears, δε του λογου το πνευμα· ὡς αἱμα, σαρκος. Αναλυγως τοινυν κιρναται, ὁ μεν οινος, τῳ ὑδατι· τῳ δε ανθρωπῳ, το πνευμα. Και το μεν εις πιστιν ευωχει, το κραμα· το δε εις αφθαρσιαν ὁδηγει, το πνευμα. Ἡ δε αμφοιν αυθις κρασις, ποτου τε και λογου, ευχαριστια κεκληται, χαρις επαινουμενη και καλη· ἡς οἱ κατα πιστιν μεταλαμβανοντες, ἁγιαζονται και σωμα και ψυχην· το Θειον κραμα, τον ανθρωπον, του πατρικου βουληματος πνευματι και λογῳ συγκιρναντος μυστικως.'—Clem. Alex. Oper., tom. i., Pædag., lib. ii., cap. ii., pp. 177, 178, ["* 'Bibere autem dicimur sanguinem Christi, cum sermones ejus recipimus.'—Orig. in Numer., Homil. xvi., fol. 123, apud Whitby.

["† 'Caro ejus verus est cibus, et sanguis ejus verus est potus: carnibus enim et sanguine verbi sui, tanquam mundo cibo ac potu, potat et reficit omne hominum genus.'—Orig. in Levit., Homil. vii., fol. 73, apud Whitby.

["‡ 'Οτηνικα περι της του σωματος βρωσεως διαλεγομενος, και δια τουτο πολλους ἑωρακως τους σκανδαλισθεντας, φησιν ὁ Κυριος· Τουτο ὑμας σκανδαλιζει; Εαν ουν θεωρησητε τον υἱον του ανθρωπου αναβαινοντα ὁποι ην το πρωτερον; Το πνευμα εστι το ζωοποιουν· ἡ σαρξ ωφελει ουδεν. Τα ρηματα, ἁ εγω λελαληκα ὑμιν πνευμα εστι και ζωη. Και ενταυθα γαρ αμφοτερα περι αυτου ειρηκε, σαρκα και πνευμα· και το πνευμα προς το κατα σαρκα διεστειλεν, ἱνα μη μονον το φαινομενον, αλλα και το αορατον αυτου, πιστευσαντες, μαθωσιν· ὁτι και ἁ λεγει ουκ εστι σαρκικα, αλλα πνευματικα. Ποσοις γαρ ηρκει το σωμα προς βρωσιν, ἱνα και του κοσμου παντος τουτο τροφη γενηται; Αλλα, δια τουτο, της εις ουρανους αναβασεως εμνημονευσε του υἱου του ανθρωπου, ἱνα της σωματικης εννοιας αυτους αφελκυση, και λοιπον την ειρημενην σαρκα βρωσιν ανωθεν ουρανιον και πνευματικην τροφην παρ' αυτου διδομενην μαθωσιν. 'Α γαρ λελαληκα, φησιν, ὑμιν, πνευμα εστι και ζωη. Ισον τῳ ειπειν· Το μεν δεικνυμενον και διδομενον ὑπερ του κοσμου δοθησεται τροφη, ὡς πνευματικως εν ἑκαστῳ ταυτην αναδιδοσθαι, και γινεσθαι πασι φυλακτηριον εις αναστασιν ζωης αιωνιου.'—Athan. Oper., In illud Evan., Quicunque dixerit verbum contra Filium hominis. tom. i., p. 979. Fol. Colon., 1686.

["* 'Ποτε Χριστος, τοις Ιουδαιοις διαλεγομενος, ελεγεν· Εαν μη φαγητε μου την σαρκα και πιητε μου το αἱμα, ουκ εχετε ζωην εν ἑαυτοις. Εκεινοι, μη ακηκοοτες πνευματικως των λεγομενων, σκανδαλισθεντες, απηλθον εις τα οπισω, νομιζοντες ὁτι επι σαρκοφαγιαν αυτους προτρεπεται. Ησαν και εν παλαια διαθηκη αρτοι προθεσεως· αλλ' εκεινοι, παλαιας ουτες διαθηκης, τελος ειληφασιν. Εν δε τῃ καινῃ διαθηκῃ, αρτος ουρανιος, και ποτηριον σωτηριον, ψυχην και σωμα αγιαζοντα. Ὡσπερ ὁ αρτος σωματι καταλληλος· ουτω και ὁ λογος τῃ ψυχῃ ἁρμοδιος.—'Οταν ὁ ανθρωπος λεγῃ Θεῳ, 'Ητοιμασας ενωπιον μου τραπεζαν· τι αλλο σημαινει, η την μυστικην και νοητην τραπεζαν, ἡν ὁ Θεος ἡμιν ἡτοιμασεν εξεναντιας; Δια τουτο, και ὁ Σολομων, ταυτην αινιττομενος την χαριν, εν τῳ Εκκλησιαστῃ λεγει· Δευρο, φαγε εν ευφροσυνῃ τον αρτον σου, τον πνευματικον αρτον· Δευρο (καλει την σωτηριον και μακαριοποιον κλησιν) και πιε τον οινον σου εν καρδια αγαθῃ, τον πνευματικον οινον.—Στηριζου την καρδιαν, μεταλαμβανων αυτου ὡς πνευματικου· και ἱλαρυνον το της ψυχης σου προσωπον.'—Cyril. Hieros. Opera, Catech. Mystag. iv., pp. 237, 238. Fol. Paris, 1631.

["† 'Omnes voluptatis magis amatores, quam amatores Dei,—dum non sunt sancti corpore et spiritu, nec comedunt carnem Jesu, nec bibunt sanguinem ejus. De quo ipse loquitur: Qui comedit carnem meam et bibit sanguinem meum, habet vitam æternam. Etenim pascha nostrum immolatus est Christus: qui, non foris, sed in domo una et intus, comeditur.'—Hieron. Opera, tom. v., Comment. in Esai. lxvi. 17, p. 114. Fol. Paris, 1533.

["‡ 'Isti multas immolant hostias, et comedunt carnes earum: unam Christi hostiam deserentes; nec comedentes ejus carnem, cujus caro cibus credentium est.'—Idem, tom. vi., Comment. in Osee, viii. 12, p. 15.

and we the while are thinking of something else; into what danger are we running! *

["(viii.) Augustine.

["'I, who descended from heaven, am the living bread.' Because I descended from heaven, I am therefore living. The manna also descended from heaven: but the manna was a shadow; he is the truth. 'If any one shall eat of this bread, he shall live for ever; and the bread which I will give, is my flesh which I will give for the life of the world.' When would flesh receive this, that he called the bread flesh? That is called flesh, which flesh receiveth not. And therefore flesh doth not the more receive it, because it is called flesh. At this they were horrified; this they declared to be an exorbitant demand upon them; this, they thought, could not possibly be. 'My flesh,' says he, 'is for the life of the world.' The faithful know the body of Christ, if they neglect not to be the body of Christ. Let them become the body of Christ, if they wish to live from the Spirit of Christ. Nothing, save the body of Christ, liveth from the Spirit of Christ. Wilt thou live from the Spirit of Christ? Then be in the body of Christ. Hence the Apostle Paul, when explaining to us this bread, saith, 'We, being many, are one bread, one body.' O sacrament of piety! O sign of unity! O bond of charity! He who would live has where he may live, has whence he may live. Let him approach, let him believe, let him be incorporated, that he may be made alive. 'The Jews, therefore, strove among themselves, saying, How can this man give us his flesh to eat?' They strove among themselves, because they neither understood nor wished to take the bread of concord; for they who eat such bread, strive not among themselves; because we, being many, are one bread, one body. 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, Unless ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye shall not have life in you.' He spake this, not to dead carcasses, but to living men. Therefore, lest, understanding him to speak of that mere physical life, they should upon this point strive among themselves, he added in consecution: 'He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life.' Hence, the person who eateth not that bread, and who drinketh not that blood, hath not this life; for men may have temporal life without it; but without it they cannot have eternal life. Consequently, he who eateth not his flesh and who drinketh not his blood, hath not life in himself; he who eateth his flesh and drinketh his blood, hath life. He gave an answer to both, in saying eternal. It is not so in the food, which we take for the sustentation of this temporal life. For he who does not take it cannot live; and yet he who does take it cannot live in perpetuity; for very many of those who do take it die either through old age, or through disease, or through some accident. But in this meat and drink, that is to say, in the body and blood of the Lord, it is not so. For he who taketh not that food hath not life; and he who taketh it hath life, and that life eternal. Therefore, by this meat and drink, he would have us understand the intimate association of Christ the Head and the faithful his members. The sacrament of this thing, that is to say, of the unity of the body and blood of Christ, is prepared on the Lord's table, in some places every day, in other places at certain intervals; and, from the Lord's table, is received: by some, to life; by others, to destruction. But the thing itself, whereof the outward ordinance is the sacrament, whosoever shall be a partaker of it, is received by every man to life, and to destruction by no man. Finally, he expounds, how that of which he speaks takes place, and what it is to eat his body and to drink his blood. 'He who eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood abideth in me, and I in him.' This, then, is to eat that meat and to drink that drink; namely, for a man to abide in Christ, and to have Christ abiding in him. And, through this, he who abideth not in Christ, and in whom Christ abideth not, without doubt, neither spiritually eateth his flesh nor drinketh his blood; although, carnally and visibly, he may press with his teeth the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ; but he rather eateth and drinketh to his own judgment the sacrament of so great a thing; because, being unclean, he hath presumed to approach to the sacraments of Christ which no person, save he who is clean, receiveth worthily.*

[" * 'Legimus sanctas Scripturas. Ego corpus Jesu, evangelium puto; sanctas Scripturas, puto doctrinam ejus. Et quando dicit; Qui non comederit carnem meam, et (non) biberit sanguinem meam: licet et in mysterio possit intelligi, tamen verius corpus Christi, et sanguis ejus, sermo Scripturarum est, doctrina divina est. Si, quando imus ad mysterium, (qui fidelis est intelligit,) si in maculam ceciderit, periclitatur. Si, quando audimus sermonem Dei, et sermo Dei et caro Christi et sanguis ejus in auribus nostris funditur, et nos aliud cogitamus: in quantum periculum incurrimus.'—Hieron. Oper., tom. viii., Comment. in Psalm cxlvii. 3, p. 94. Idem.

[" * 'Ego sum panis vivus, qui de cœlo descendi. Ideo vivus, quia de cœlo descendi. De cœlo descendit et manna: sed manna umbra erat; iste veritas est. Si quis manducaverit ex hoc pane, vivet in æternum. Et panis, quem ego dabo, caro mea est pro mundi vita. Hoc quando caperet caro: quod dixit panem, carnem? Vocatur caro, quod non capit caro. Et ideo magis non capit caro, quia vocatur caro. Hoc enim exhorruerunt; hoc ad se multum esse dixerunt. Hoc non posse fieri putaverunt: Caro mea est, inquit, pro mundi vita. Norunt fideles corpus Christi, si corpus Christi esse non negligant. Fiant corpus Christi, si volunt vivere de Spiritu Christi. De Spiritu Christi non vivit, nisi corpus Christi. Intelligite, fratres mei, quid dixerim. Vis ergo et tu vivere de Spiritu Christi? In corpore esto Christi. Inde est, quod exponens nobis Apostolus Paulus hunc panem, Unus panis, inquit, unum corpus, multi sumus. O sacramentum pietatis! O signum unitatis! O vinculum charitatis! Qui vult vivere, habet ubi vivat, habet unde vivat. Accedat, credat, incorporetur, ut vivificetur. Litigabant ergo Judæi ad invicem, dicentes: Quomodo potest hic carnem suam nobis dare ad manducandum? Litigabant utique ad invicem: quoniam panem concordiæ non intelligebant, nec sumere volebant: nam, qui manducant talem panem, non litigant ad invicem; quoniam unus panis, unum corpus, multi sumus. Amen, amen, dico vobis, nisi manducaveritis carnem Filii hominis, et biberitis ejus sanguinem, non habebitis vitam in vobis. Hæc, non utique cadaveribus, sed viventibus loquebatur. Unde, ne, istam vitam intelligentes, de hac re litigarent, secutus adjunxit: Qui manducat meam carnem, et bibit meum sanguinem, habet vitam æternam. Hanc ergo non habet, qui istum panem non manducat, nec istum sanguinem bibit: nam temporalem vitam sine illo habere homines possunt; æternam vero omnino non possunt. Qui ergo non manducat ejus carnem, nec bibit ejus sanguinem, non habet in se vitam: et, qui manducat ejus carnem, et bibit ejus sanguinem, habet vitam. Ad utrumque respondet, quod dixit æternam. Non ita est in hac esca, quam, sustentandæ hujus temporalis vitæ causa, sumimus. Nam, qui eam non sumpserit, non vivet: nec tamen, qui eam sumpserit, vivet; fieri enim potest, ut, senio vel morbo vel aliquo casu, plurimi, et qui eam sumpserint, moriantur. In hoc vero cibo et potu, id est, corpore et sanguine Domini, non ita est. Nam et, qui eam non sumit, non habet vitam: et, qui eam sumit, habet vitam, et hanc utique æternam. Hunc itaque cibum et potum societatem vult intelligi corporis et membrorum suorum: quod est sancta Ecclesia in prædestinatis et vocatis et justificatis et glorificatis sanctis et fidelibus ejus. Hujus rei sacramentum, id est, unitatis corporis et sanguinis Christi, alicubi quotidie, alicubi certis intervallis dierum, in Dominica mensa præparatur, et de mensa Dominica sumitur: quibusdam, ad vitam; quibusdam, ad exitium. Res vero ipsa, cujus sacramentum est, omni homini ad vitam, nulli ad exitium, quicunque ejus particeps fuerit. Denique, jam exponit, quomodo id fiat quod loquitur, et quid sit manducare corpus ejus et sanguinem bibere. Qui manducat carnem meam, et bibit meum sanguinem, in me manet, et ego in illo. Hoc est ergo, manducare illam escam, et illum bibere potum: in Christo manere, et illum manentem in se

["(ix.) Bertram, or Ratram, of Corbey, about the middle of the ninth century.

["Here we must consider how his words are to be taken: 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye shall not have life in you.' He doth not say that his flesh, which hung on the cross, should be cut in pieces and eaten by his disciples, or that his blood, which he was to shed for the redemption of the world, should be given to his disciples to drink. It had been a horrible crime for his disciples to drink his blood or to eat his flesh, as the unbelieving Jews then understood him. Wherefore, in the words following, he saith to his disciples who received his words not in unbelief but in faith, though they did not fully see how those words were to be understood: 'Doth this offend you? What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before?' As though he said, 'Think not that my flesh is to be corporally eaten, or my blood corporally drunk, by you; that it is divided, or to be hereafter divided, into parts; for, after my resurrection, ye shall see me ascend into heaven with the fulness of my entire body and blood. Then shall ye understand that my flesh is not to be eaten by believers, as the faithless suppose; but that bread and wine, truly, yet sacramentally, changed into the substance of my body and blood, are to be taken by them.' And immediately he addeth: 'It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing.' He saith that the flesh profiteth nothing as those unbelievers understood it; but otherwise it giveth life, as it is mystically received by the faithful. And why so? He himself declareth, saying, 'It is the spirit that quickeneth.' Wherefore, in this mystery of the body and blood, it is the spiritual working that giveth life; without which working, these mysteries avail nothing. They may feed the body, but cannot feed the soul.

["St. Augustine saith, that 'sacraments are one thing; and the things of which they are sacraments another.' For the body in which Christ suffered, and the blood which flowed from his side, are the things themselves; whilst the mysteries of these things are the sacraments of the body and blood of Christ, which are celebrated in memory of the Lord's passion, not only during the whole paschal solemnity in every year, but also every day throughout the year. And although the body of Christ in which he suffered is one, and his blood which was shed for the salvation of the world is one; yet the sacraments of these things have assumed the names of the things themselves, so as to be called 'the body and blood of Christ;' and this from their likeness to the things which they shadow forth. Even as the passion and the resurrection, which are celebrated every year, are so called; though he suffered and rose again in his own person but once, nor can those days now be recalled, since they have passed away; yet the days, on which the passion or resurrection of the Lord is commemorated, are so called in that they have a resemblance to those days on which the Saviour once suffered and rose again.*

habere. Ac, per hoc qui non manet in Christo, et in quo non manet Christus, proculdubio nec manducat spiritualiter carnem ejus, nec bibit ejus sanguinem; licet carnaliter et visibiliter premat dentibus sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Christi: sed magis tantæ rei sacramentum ad judicium sibi manducat et bibit; quia immundus præsumpsit ad Christi accedere sacramenta, quæ aliquis non digne sumit, nisi qui mundus est.'—August. Oper., tom. iii., in Johan. Evang., cap. vi., Tractat. xxvi., pp. 499—501. Fol. Bened. Edit., 1680.

["* 'Hic etiam considerare debemus, quemadmodum sit accipiendum quod ipse dicit: Nisi manducaveritis carnem Filii hominis et sanguinem ejus biberitis, non habebitis vitam in vobis. Non enim ["(x.) Rabanus Maurus, Archbishop of Mentz about A. D. 825.

["With respect to your interrogation, Whether the eucharist, after it has been consumed, and in the manner of other food has passed into the draught, returns again into his pristine nature which it had before its consecration upon the altar: a question of this description is superfluous, since in the Gospel the Saviour himself hath said, 'Every thing that enters into the mouth goes into the belly, and passes away into the draught.' The sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord is composed of things visible and corporeal; but it produces an invisible sanctification both of the body and of the soul. Why need we, then, on the part of that which is digested in the stomach, and which has passed away into the draught, talk of a return to its pristine state; when no person ever asserted the occurrence of any such return? Lately, indeed, some individuals, not thinking rightly concerning the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord, have said, that 'that very body and blood of the Lord, which was born from the Virgin Mary, in which the Lord himself suffered on the cross, and in which he rose again from the sepulchre, is the same as that which is received from the altar.' In opposition to which error, as far as lay in our power, writing to the Abbot Egilus, we propounded what ought truly to be believed concerning the body itself. For, respecting his body and blood, the Lord says in the Gospel: 'I who descended from heaven am the living bread. If any person shall eat of this bread, he shall live for ever. For my flesh is truly meat, and my blood is truly drink. He who eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life.' The person, dicit, quod caro ipsius, quæ pependit in cruce, particulatim concidenda foret, et a discipulis manducanda; vel sanguis ejus, quem fusurus erat pro mundi redemptione, discipulis dandus esset in potum. Hoc enim scelus esset, si, secundum quod infideles tunc acceperunt, a discipulis vel sanguis ejus biberetur vel caro comederetur. Propter quod, in consequentibus ait discipulis, non infideliter sed fideliter verba Christi suscipientibus, nec tamen, quomodo illa verba forent intelligenda, penetrantibus: Hoc vos scandalizat? inquiens: Si ergo videritis Filium hominis ascendentem ubi erat prius? Tanquam diceret: Non ergo carnem meam vel sanguinem meum, vobis corporaliter comedendam vel bibendum, per partes distributum vel distribuendum, putetis, cum, post resurrectionem, visuri sitis me cœlos ascensurum cum integri corporis sive sanguinis mei plenitudine. Tunc intelligetis, quod non, sicut infideles arbitrantur, carnem meam a credentibus comedendam, sed vere, per mysterium, panem et vinum, in corporis et sanguinis mei conversa substantiam a credentibus sumenda. Et consequenter, Spiritus est, inquit, qui vivificat; caro non prodest quicquam. Carnem dicit quicquam non prodesse, illo modo sicut infideles intelligebant: alioquin, vitam præbet, sicut a fidelibus per mysterium sumitur. Et hoc quare? Ipse manifestat, cum dicit: Spiritus est, qui vivificat. In hoc itaque mysterio corporis et sanguinis, spiritualis est operatio, quæ vitam præstat, sine cujus operatione mysteria illa nihil prosunt: quoniam corpus quidem pascere possunt, sed animam pascere non possunt.

['S. Augustinus dicit: Aliud, sacramenta; et aliud, res quarum sunt sacramenta. Corpus autem in quo passus est Christus, et sanguis ejus de latere qui fluxit, res sunt: harum vero rerum mysteria dicit esse sacramenta corporis et sanguinis Christi, quæ celebrantur ob memoriam dominicæ passionis, non solum per omnes paschæ solemnitates singulis annis, verum etiam singulis in anno diebus. Et, cum unum sit corpus dominicum in quo semel passus est, et unus sanguis qui pro salute mundi fusus est: attamen sacramenta ipsarum rerum vocabula sumpserunt, ut dicantur corpus et sanguis Christi; cum, propter similitudinem rerum quas innuunt, sic appellentur. Sicut pascha et resurrectio Domini vocantur, quæ per singulos annos celebrantur, cum semel in seipso passus sit et resurrexerit, nec dies illi jam possint revocari, quoniam præterierunt. Appellantur tamen illorum vocabulo dies, quibus memoria dominicæ passionis sive resurrectionis commemoratur, idcirco quod illorum similitudinem habeant dierum, quibus Salvator semel passus est, et semel resurrexit.'—Ratram. de Corp. et Sang. Domin., cap. 29—31, 36, 37.

therefore, who eats not that bread, and who drinks not that blood, has not the life here intended; for mere temporal life, indeed, without any such manducation, may in this world be enjoyed by men who are not in his body through faith; but eternal life, which is promised to the saints, can never be enjoyed by such individuals. Lest, however, they should fancy that, in that meat and drink which they receive carnally, and understand not spiritually, life eternal is promised in faith; so that they who receive it should die neither in soul nor in body; he condescended to meet and to anticipate any such cogitation. For when he had said, 'He who eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life;' he immediately subjoined, 'I will raise him up at the last day;' that meanwhile he may have eternal life according to the Spirit.*

["(xi.) Elfric the grammarian, about the end of the tenth century.

["Some things are spoken of Christ literally, others, figuratively. What is said of his birth, passion, death, and other matters which happened to him upon earth, is to be understood according to the plain import of the words. But when he is called 'bread,' a 'lamb,' or a 'lion,' the language is emblematical; for he is no one of these things. He is termed 'bread,' because he is the life of both men and angels; a 'lamb,' on account of his perfect innocence; a 'lion,' in reference to the power whereby he overcame Satan. Upon this principle bread and wine, though continuing unchanged to human apprehension, become, in truth, by consecration, the Saviour's body and blood to believing minds. Thus also, after baptism, a heathen child remains, in outward appearance, unaltered; but from within is washed away the stain which was contracted from Adam's transgression; so that a corruptible fluid is made a well-spring of life, through the operation of God's Holy Spirit. In like manner the eucharistic elements are, naturally, corruptible bread and corruptible wine; but God's might renders them, spiritually, though not naturally, the body and blood of Christ. Great, however, is the difference between the body in which Jesus suffered, and that which is hallowed at the communion. Our Lord's body, in which he suffered, was born of Mary, and had all the parts common to the human frame: his mystical body in the eucharist is made from grains of wheat, and has no part belonging to the human frame. The holy sacrament, therefore, is called a 'mystery;' because, in it, one thing is seen, and another is understood. That which is seen has the properties of matter; that which is understood strengthens the spirit. Assuredly, Christ's body which suffered death and rose from the grave, dieth no more, but is eternal, and obnoxious to no change: the eucharistic elements, however, are temporal, not eternal; liable to corruption, and to all the accidents which attend ordinary substances. These elements, therefore, are the Lord's body and blood mystically and figuratively. A like figure is used by St. Paul, in speaking of the Israelites; who 'were all,' he says, 'under the cloud; and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea; and did all eat the same spiritual meat, and did all drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual rock that followed them: and that Rock was Christ.' Now the rock, from which the water ran, was not Christ bodily, but spiritually. It was a type of Christ, who says to all the faithful, 'Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him, shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life.' This our Lord spake of the Spirit, which those received who believed in him. So St. Paul, when he spake of the spiritual meat and drink received by the ancient Israelites, intimated, that they derived spiritual nourishment from the body and blood of Christ, which is now offered spiritually in the eucharist. Upon this principle our Lord, before he suffered, hallowed bread and wine, saying, 'This is my body;' and, 'This is my blood.' Nor did these things fail to become such to the receivers; any more than did so, what was received by the Israelites in the wilderness, before Jesus was born. Upon another occasion, the Saviour said, 'Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life.' But he did not mean by these words the body wherewith he was enclosed, and the blood which he shed upon the cross. He only referred to the holy eucharist, his mystical body and blood, and the means of attaining eternal life to all who receive it with a believing heart. Under the old law, various sacrifices were offered pre-signifying the great sacrifice for sin hereafter to be made by Christ. Under the new dispensation, the holy sacrament is administered as a commemoration of that sacrifice now that it has been offered. Christ suffered for sin once; but his sufferings are mystically renewed at his holy supper. At this also we are reminded, that as many grains go to make the bread of which we eat, and many grapes to make the wine of which we drink, so all true Christians are members of Christ, and form integral parts of his mystical body. Now, therefore, as that mystical body is placed upon the altar, receive it with due preparation of mind; and ye will receive that with which ye are spiritually united.*"]

[Dr. Turton, late Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, and now Dean of Westminster, ["* 'Quod autem interrogastis, Utrum eucharistia, postquam consumitur et in secessum emittitur more aliorum ciborum, iterum redeat in naturam pristinam quam habuerat antequam in altari consecraretur: superflua est hujusmodi quæstio, cum ipse Salvator dixerit in Evangelio, Omne, quod intrat in os, in ventrem vadit, et in secessum emittitur. Sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Domini, ex rebus visibilibus et corporalibus conficitur: sed invisibilem, tam corporis quam animæ, efficit sanctificationem. Quæ est enim ratio, ut hoc, quod stomacho digeritur et in secessum emittitur, iterum in statum pristinum redeat; cum nullus hoc unquam fieri asseruerit? Nam quidam nuper, de ipso sacramento corporis et sanguinis Domini non recte sentientes, dixerunt: Hoc ipsum corpus et sanguinem Domini, quod de Maria Virgine natum est, et in quo ipse Dominus passus est in cruce et resurrexit de sepulchro, idem esse quod sumitur de altari. Cui errori, quantum potuimus, ad Egilum Abbatem scribentes, de corpore ipso quid vere sit credendum, aperuimus. Dicit enim, de corpore et sanguine suo, Dominus in Evangelio: Ego sum panis vivus, qui de cœlo descendi. Si quis manducaverit ex hoc pane, vivet in æternam: caro enim mea vere est cibus, et sanguis meus vere est potus. Qui manducat meam carnem et bibit meum sanguinem, habet vitam æternam. Hanc ergo vitam non habet, qui illum panem non manducat, nec istum sanguinem bibit. Nam illam temporalem vitam sine illo homines utcunque in hoc sæculo habere possunt, qui non sunt per fidem in corpore ejus; æternam vero nunquam quæ sanctis promittitur. Ne autem putarent, sic in isto cibo et potu, quem carnaliter sumunt et spiritualiter non intelligunt, in fide promitti vitam æternam; ut, qui eum sumerent, nec anima nec corpore morerentur, huic cogitationi dignatus est occurrere. Nam, cum dixisset, Qui manducat carnem meam et bibit meum sanguinem, habet vitam æternam: continuo subjecit et dixit, Ego resuscitabo eum in novissimo die; ut habeat interim, secundum spiritum, vitam æternam.'—Raban. Archiepisc. Mogunt., Epist. ad Heribald. Episc. Autissiodor. de Euchar. cap. xxxiii., ad calc. Reginon. Abbat. Pruniens., lib. ii., de Eccles. Disciplin. et Relig. Christian., p. 516, Stephan. Baluz. Lutet. Paris., 1671.

["* Elfric. Homil. Pasch. in Soames's History of the Reformation, vol. iii., pp. 162—164."] in his controversy with Dr. Wiseman on the subject of the "Real Presence," has most triumphantly driven the Romanists from the station which they had assumed in their interpretation of this passage, by completely refuting every argument which had been brought forward in support of it. As the work of Dr. Turton is deservedly esteemed one of the most valuable on the Popish controversy, we give the following view of the position which the Right Reverend Nicholas Wiseman, D.D., Bishop of Melipotamus, President of St. Mary's College, Oscott, Coadjutor Bishop-Vicar General and Dean ex officio of the Roman Catholic Central District, endeavours to maintain, and the argument which is pursued by the Protestant Divine :—

["Although Dr. Wiseman, at the outset of his Second Lecture, professed to be showing that 'the phrases which occur in the first part of our Lord's discourse were calculated to convey the idea of listening to the doctrines of our Lord and believing in him'—he thinks himself 'authorized to conclude' that 'those who heard him could not possibly misunderstand that portion, nor give any other interpretation to the figure there used, than that of being spiritually nourished by the doctrines which he brought down from heaven.'* My hope is, that I 'cannot possibly misunderstand' the learned author, when I suppose him thus to affirm, that the Jews actually did give a spiritual interpretation to the first part. Such then is Dr. Wiseman's plan of operation. He enunciates one proposition, as about to be established; and, at the end of the process, he enunciates another, as actually proved. The discourse 'was calculated' to produce a certain effect upon the Jews—therefore it did produce that effect; on the principle, I suppose, that to point out, in any case, what ought to have been the conduct of men, is only another method of ascertaining what it really was. A strange principle this, under any circumstances; but above all strange, when applied to the occurrences which attended our Lord's earthly existence. Whatever Dr. Wiseman may imagine, as to the impossibility of misunderstanding the purport of our Lord's discourse; the people undoubtedly did misunderstand it, from first to last. Their thoughts and expectations were wholly carnal throughout. They recollected that they had eaten of the loaves and had been filled; and were intent upon similar manifestations of power in their favour. I cannot imagine any intelligent person reading the chapter, without perceiving that such were their feelings. What is their language?—'What sign showest thou then, that we may see, and believe thee? What dost thou work? Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat.'—And when our Lord informed them that 'the bread of God is that which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world'—their reply—(verse 34) 'Lord, evermore give us this bread (Κυριε, παντοτε δος ἡμιν τον αρτον τουτον)'—as surely indicates temporal views, as did the reply of the Samaritan woman in the fourth chapter, (verse 15,)—'Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not, neither come hither to draw (Κυριε, δος μοι τουτο το ὑδωρ, ἱνα μη διψω, μηδε ερχομαι ενθαδε αντλειν).'—The same gross views were still present to their minds, when they afterwards (verse 41) 'murmured at him, because he said, I am the bread which came down from heaven;' and their disappointment and discontent were roused to the uttermost when (verse 52) they 'strove among themselves, saying, How can this man give us his flesh to eat?' For my own part, I cannot discover the slightest intimation of a single idea, in their minds, save that of obtaining a supply of food, similar to that of the preceding day.....On this part of the subject, it would be useless to add more than a single concluding remark—which is this: To commence an investigation, with a division of discourse, at once opposed to reason and disapproved by every thing that can be deemed authority—subsequently to engage in the hopeless attempt to prove a fact, not by evidence but by argument—such, so far as we have yet had an opportunity to observe, are the peculiar characteristics of Dr. Wiseman's undertaking.

["On proceeding to Dr. Wiseman's remarks on the latter portion of the discourse,—that is, from verse 48 to the end,—we find him asserting, 'that if we accurately consider the phraseology of this portion of the chapter, according to the only manner in which it could possibly be understood by the Jews whom Christ addressed, we must conclude that they would necessarily infer a change of topic in it, and be convinced that the doctrine now delivered was of a real eating of the flesh and drinking of the blood of him who addressed them.'* That the Jews understood the latter part of the discourse, as they had understood the former, in the very grossest sense which the words admitted—there can be no doubt; but whether they ought so to have understood it, is another matter, the consideration of which will chiefly occupy the remainder of this section. To that consideration I shall request the reader's attention, after a few words on that total change of subject, so strenuously insisted upon by the learned author.

["In verse 48, we find, 'I am the bread of life (Εγω ειμι ὁ αρτος της ζωης)'—and in verse 31, we have the identical words. In verse 49, we find, 'Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead'—referring to what the Jews had said, verse 31, 'Our fathers did eat manna in the desert.' In verse 50, we find, 'This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die'—reminding them of his former reply to them, (verse 32,) 'My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven.' In verse 51, we find, 'I am the living bread: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever'—corresponding to verse 35, 'I am the bread of life—he that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst.' Even in the latter part of verse 51, where our Lord first mentions his flesh, no one can fail to remark how closely he connects it—identifies it, indeed—with the bread of life, on which he had so largely expatiated: 'And the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world.' And finally, after dwelling upon eating his flesh, and drinking his blood, observe how carefully (verses 57, 58) the subject is connected with all that had preceded: 'As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father: so, he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. This is that bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: he that eateth this bread shall live for ever.' If what has thus been brought together is not a full proof of unity of subject—of continuity of purpose, on the part of the speaker—from the beginning of the discourse to the end, I utterly despair of finding unity of design in any ancient writing whatever. Identified moreover, as we perceive the eating of the flesh of Christ and the drinking of his blood to be, with eating the bread of life, which is on all hands allowed to be a spiritual act—I must acknowledge myself to be incapable of drawing an inference at all, before I can hesitate to believe that the eating of the flesh and the drinking of the blood (however it may be interpreted) must likewise be essentially a spiritual act. In fine, my real opinion is, that, if the latter part of this discourse be referred to the eucharist, it entirely subverts the Roman Catholic doctrine of our Lord's corporal presence—and of the carnal eating and drinking of his body and blood—in that sacrament.

["* Dr. Wiseman's Lectures on the Real Presence of the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ in the blessed Eucharist, p. 55.

["* Idem, p. 56.

[" I now proceed to Dr. Wiseman's speculations on the latter part of the discourse; with regard to the phraseology of which, he enumerates various peculiarities, which, as he states, 'oblige us to consider the topic on which it treats, as totally distinct from that which occupies the former portion of the chapter.' The first peculiarity is involved in obscurity:—whether because it contains something too vague for language to convey, or too absurd for the writer to have attempted to express clearly—let the reader judge.

[" '1. We have seen above, that after our Saviour, in consequence of difficulties found by the Jews, had commenced, at verse 35, to explain his sentiments literally, he never returns again to the figurative expression, until after he closes that section at verse 47. If we suppose him to continue the same topic after this verse, we must believe him, after having spent thirteen verses in doing away with the obscurity of his parabolic expressions, and in giving the explanation of its figures, to return again to his obscure phrases, and to take up once more the use of the same parable which he had so long abandoned for its literal interpretation.' (P. 57.)

[" The position here taken, I strongly suspect, is this: An instructor having, in the course of his observations, employed certain figurative terms, the intended import of which he subsequently takes care to explain, we are not to suppose that he will resume the said figurative expressions in the same sense. Now, in reality, is it not clear, to the commonest apprehension, that the explanation previously given of such terms is the very best warrant for recurring to them in that sense? Nay, more, after such explanation, would not the use of the same terms, in another sense, infallibly lead into error? And yet this, if I mistake not, is what Dr. Wiseman has attributed to our Lord, in the present discourse. In the beginning of the discourse, mention is made of a heavenly gift, under the similitude of the bread of life. Faith is then declared to be the medium by which the gift is received and the benefit realized. This, according to Dr. Wiseman, is the doctrine enforced to the end of the 47th verse. When our Lord, after that verse, reverts to his original similitude of the bread of life, he cannot, according to the learned author, be thought to employ the similitude in the same sense. The bread from heaven must no longer be held to represent those divine truths which our Saviour came to reveal; nor must faith be deemed the means of receiving them. Now, if an interpreter of Scripture is allowed to divide a discourse where he pleases, as Dr. Wiseman has done—without the concurrence of a single commentator, good, bad, or indifferent; and without a single reason, which he ought not to have been ashamed to produce—if such an interpreter is then allowed to decide that the word, on which the import of the discourse mainly depends, has one signification above the line of division, and another signification below it—what, I ask, is such a process, but the means of extracting, from the pages of holy writ, any doctrine that may be the most agreeable to the fancy of the individual? When such modes of interpretation are connected in our minds with the hermeneutical principles laid down by the learned author, the entire plan of operation cannot but be considered as one of the most extraordinary moral phenomena which have been exhibited in modern times.

[" The second peculiarity alleged by Dr. Wiseman has already (p. 69) been stated; and is again recorded in this place partly to show the kind of argument of which a learned controversialist can twice condescend to avail himself; and partly for the purpose of offering a few observations on the subject.

[" '2. We have seen likewise how carefully our Lord avoids, throughout the first part, the harsh expression to eat him, even where the turn of his phrase seemed to invite him to use it; on the contrary in the latter section, he employs it without scruple, and even repeats it again and again. This is a remarkable difference of phraseology between the two sections.' (Pp. 57, 58.)

[" Dr. Wiseman, when before adverting to this subject, observed—with reference to the words of Isaiah and Jeremiah (which I have twice quoted, pp. 65, 70)—'These examples demonstrate that to the Jews it was no unusual image, no harsh phrase, to speak of doctrines under the form of bread or food. But the figure could not be pushed farther than that:—Jeremiah or Isaiah could not have been represented in the passage quoted from them, as saying, Come and EAT ME.'* Very true: and neither could Isaiah, nor yet Jeremiah, be represented, as saying—'He that believeth on me hath everlasting life.' These are, to the intelligent, among the marks which distinguish the subordinate functions even of those Prophets, great as they were, from the paramount authority of THE SON OF GOD. In such considerations, indeed, there is high matter—upon which, did my limits allow, I should be glad to expatiate; but enough has been stated, to demonstrate the extreme rashness with which a phrase, that might or might not have suited one of the old Prophets, has been made a test of the language of the Messiah himself.....Farther: 'Throughout the first part,' says Dr. Wiseman, 'our Lord carefully avoids the expression, to eat him;' but, 'in the latter section, he employs it without scruple, and even repeats it again and again.' Here is another instance of the recklessness of this learned writer. Our Lord has used the expression, to eat him, once; that is, in the 57th verse:—but so far was he from 'repeating it again and again,' that he has never used it except that once. In whatever point of view such misrepresentations are beheld, what confidence can possibly be placed in the individual who has thus presented them to the world? It can be to no avail, to Dr. Wiseman, to allege that, by the expression, to eat him, he meant to eat his flesh, or to eat the bread of life; for he has separately treated of these latter expressions. My fear is that he intended to write what he did write; and that, by what he wrote, he also intended to produce a considerable effect. But, in truth, so much had been previously said by our Lord, to identify himself with the bread of life—such a constant reference had been made to faith in himself, as the great principle required on the part of his hearers—that, even if, in the latter section of the discourse, he had used that expression 'again and again,' there would have been nothing, so gradual was the change of phraseology, in the least inconsistent with the most complete unity of subject. And although, for reasons sufficiently apparent, we should not expect the expression 'he that eateth me,' from Isaiah or Jeremiah —yet there are considerations, furnished by the learned author himself, which may well reconcile us to the use of it by our Saviour. In the 24th chapter of Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom is personified, and represented as addressing the children of men. Among other declarations, there is (verse 21) the following: 'They that eat me shall yet be hungry, and they that drink me shall yet be thirsty:'—where eating and drinking signify hearing and receiving instruction. If, then, Wisdom may, in this sense, use the expression 'they that eat me'—why may we not understand our Saviour, 'the Word and Wisdom of the Father'—when identifying himself with his doctrines (to adopt Dr. Wiseman's language)—as employing a similar expression in a similar sense?.....But, the learned author objects, 'Wisdom is speaking as an abstract personage, an allegorical being, to whom imaginary life is given; and consequently to whom the terms could not, by possibility, be literally applied.'* Is, then, the literal sense of expressions always to be adhered to, unless it cannot 'by possibility' be maintained? Is there no attention to be paid to the context? For example, in the midst of a discourse, in which our Lord has all along been identifying HIMSELF with his doctrines, shall we understand one phrase relating to himself literally —although forbidden by every feeling that is creditable to our nature—although forbidden by that common sense, which commands us to take care that we interpret not any portion of such discourse, so as to place an entire section of it in contradiction to the rest?—The learned author advances a second objection—from which it appears that 'this ideal person (Wisdom) speaks of herself under the image of a plant—a vine;' but after various attempts to ascertain in what way this objection can be brought to bear upon the subject before us, I have desisted from the undertaking, in despair. I should have thought the notion favourable to my own views. As, however, I have nothing but conjectures to offer, it may be advisable to lose no time, in deriving all the advantage we can, from the learned author's subsequent lucubrations.

[" * Idem, p. 53.

["The third peculiarity, mentioned by Dr. Wiseman, is couched in the following terms:—

["'3. So long as Christ speaks of himself as the object of faith, under the image of a spiritual food, he represents this food as given by the Father; (verses 32, 33, 39, 40, 44;) but after verse 47, he speaks of the food, which he now describes, as to be given by himself. (Verses 52, 53.) This marked difference in the giver of the two communications, proposed in the two divisions of the discourse, points out that a different gift is likewise promised. If faith is the gift in both, there is no ground for the distinction made in them; if there is a transition to a real eating, the whole is clear.' (P. 58.)

["Dr. Wiseman's distinction—representing God as the giver in the former part of the discourse, and our Lord himself as the giver in the latter part—is a mistake; not the greatest which has been made, but the greatest which the case admits. When our Lord (verse 27) first recommended this spiritual food to his hearers, he used the following terms: 'Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which THE SON OF MAN shall give unto you.' It appears, then, that our Lord is the giver of the spiritual food, as well as the Father—no less in the former part of the discourse, than in the latter. If therefore, according to Dr. Wiseman's views, a diversity of givers implies a diversity of gifts—an identity of givers in the two parts of the discourse indicates an identity of gifts in those parts. And this is all that I shall offer in reply to the learned lecturer's notable distinction.

["Dr. Wiseman's fourth peculiarity, occupying more than two pages, is too long for transcription. My object therefore must be, to give its meaning without diminution of its force:—'In the first part of the discourse, our Lord speaks of coming unto him; (verses 35, 36, 44, 45;) which implies a principle of faith. (Matt. xi. 28; Luke vi. 47; John v. 40; vii. 37.) In the second part, he speaks of abiding in him; (verses 56, 57;) which indicates an internal principle of love or charity. (John xiv. 23; xv. 4—9; 1 John ii. 24; iv. 16, 17.) So that the effects of the doctrine inculcated after the 48th verse are quite different from those before rehearsed; and as the latter apply to faith, so these are such as describe a union with Christ through love. Something, therefore, is here delivered or instituted, which tends to nourish and perfect this virtue, and not faith; the topic, therefore, is changed, and a transition has taken place.'*.....Most assuredly, the distinction here drawn, between the internal principle appropriate to the first part and that peculiar to the second, is as visionary as the division of the discourse itself at the 47th verse—as the notion of different givers—or the notion of different gifts—before and after that division. When, for instance, in verse 29, our Lord said, 'This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent' —can any one suppose that he did not mean a continuance of belief—an abiding in him? When again, in verse 35, he declared, 'He that cometh to me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst'—does not the very turn of expression imply, as before, an abiding with him? In these expressions, which occur before the 47th verse, the principle of love is as strongly implied, as in some of those which are found subsequently to that verse: When it is said, verse 50, 'This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die'—and in verse 51, 'If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever'—we must not imagine that the eating here mentioned is an act once for all—but an habitual act of faith; of a faith which cannot exist without a principle of love. The distinction of principle, therefore, is, as I have said, altogether visionary; although the abiding in Christ may be more clearly inculcated in the latter part, than in the former. But if Dr. Wiseman supposes that, in this, there is any thing tending to confirm his own interpretation, more than that of the Protestant who differs from him the most widely—I know not in what terms to express my opinion of his misconceptions on the subject. The truth is, that arguments of this kind are of so attenuated a texture, that they almost elude the touch.....With reference to the topic just discussed, it is worthy of remark that, after the discourse to the people, our Lord's conversation, with his disciples, still turned upon faith: 'There are some of you that believe not.' And thus, Peter's final avowal, for himself and his brethren, was—a belief in him, as 'the Christ, the Son of the living God.' This circumstance affords a strong confirmation of the opinion, that faith, in our Lord and his doctrines, was the grand principle inculcated throughout the discourse.

["* Idem, ibid.

["* Idem, pp. 58—60.

[" The preceding argument of the learned author, although but little entitled to regard, is far superior to his fifth peculiarity, which now claims attention. To myself there is, I confess, something mortifying in the thought, that—in a formal treatise, by a grave divine, on an important subject—there should be an attempt to influence the reader's mind by such means as I am about to point out.....Dr. Wiseman, after making a few observations which do not require notice, allows, for a moment, that 'the bread of life, which our Lord identifies with himself, is to be eaten: in other words, that he is our food; and that by this is signified, that we must believe in him.' Then comes the objection:—

["'5. But if to feed on Christ mean to believe in Christ, then, to eat the flesh of Christ (if the phrase has to be considered parallel) must signify to believe in the flesh of Christ. This is absurd: for the flesh and blood of Christ was not an object of faith to those who really sinned by believing him too literally to be only a man; nor can our belief in them be the source of eternal life. Protestants say, that, as to feed on Christ signifies to believe in him, so, to eat his flesh and drink his blood, means to believe in his passion. But they do not bring a single argument to show that such a phrase was in use, or would have been intelligible to his hearers. The expressions, therefore, used in the second part of our Lord's discourse are in no wise parallel to those of the first, nor can they bear the same meaning. In fact, the only one they can bear is the literal signification.' (Pp. 61, 62.)

[" The reasoning, in the outset of the foregoing extract, which makes eating the flesh of Christ to signify believing in his flesh, because eating him signifies believing in him—is that which I alluded to, as mortifying to behold, in the well-considered production of a learned writer. If, according to the supposition, eating the flesh of Christ be equivalent to eating him—and if by eating him is meant believing in him—then must eating the flesh of Christ also signify believing in him.....But as Dr. Wiseman, in commenting on the inference—'to believe in the flesh of Christ'—which he thought proper to draw, has ventured to pronounce, 'this is absurd'—I will also venture to take a word with the learned lecturer on the subject; and the result may be, to show that the discredit, inevitably attaching to the procedure, is not the only thing to be considered, when a man has recourse to so wretched a perversion of words, as that just witnessed. There will, I trust, be readers of these pages, who scarcely need to be reminded how strenuously the Apostle St. John, in particular, has dwelt upon the reality of our Lord's human nature. Such readers will be aware of the prevalence, in the early ages, of tenets directly opposed to that reality; and will justly be surprised at the strange treatment which a belief in the flesh of Christ has received at Dr. Wiseman's hands. Are we, they will be disposed to ask, warranted in thinking the belief, of the real humanity of Christ, a point of little consequence, because some persons erroneously maintain the doctrine of his mere humanity? What then, in addition to the declarations of holy writ, mean those very remarkable enumerations, of the particulars of his earthly existence, which are found in the Apostles' Creed and in the Nicene Creed? Why is the perfect human nature of Christ so carefully dwelt upon, by the ablest Christian writers of ancient times? Has Dr. Wiseman forgotten that, in the fifth century, Pope Gelasius wrote a book to establish the reality of the two natures of Christ—in opposition to the widely-spread opinion, that the humanity was absorbed in the divinity—and consequently lost? Readers, moreover, such as I have imagined, might refer him to the sentiments of his own Church upon the subject—even in later times. In the Rhemish Testament, for instance, they might suggest that there is the following note on John i. 14, 'THE WORD WAS MADE FLESH:'

["'This is the high and divine testimony of Christ's incarnation, and that he vouchsafed to become man; for the acknowledging of which inexplicable benefit and giving humble thanks for the same, all Christian people in the world, by tradition of the Fathers, prostrate themselves or kneel down, when they hear it sung or said at the holy Mass, either in this Gospel, or in the Creed, by these words, ET HOMO FACTUS EST.'

[" The same readers might also deem the note, in the same work, on 1 John iv. 2, 'EVERY SPIRIT THAT CONFESSETH THAT JESUS CHRIST IS COME IN THE FLESH IS OF GOD'—worthy of attention; although they might think the commentator too much disposed to restrict the application of the sentiment, in the first part of the note—and too much inclined to enact the controversialist, in the latter part:—

["'The Apostle speaketh according to that time, and for that part of Christian doctrine which then was specifically to be confessed, taught, and maintained, against certain wicked heretics, Cerinthus, Ebion, and the like, that taught wickedly and against the person and both natures of Christ Jesus. The Apostle therefore giveth the faithful people this token to know the true teachers of those days from the false. Not that this mark would serve for all times, or in case of all other false doctrines, but that it was then a necessary note. As if a good Catholic writer, Pastor, or parents would warn all theirs now in these days, to give ear only to such teachers as acknowledge Christ our Saviour to be really present and sacrificed in the B. Mass; and that all such are true preachers and of God, the rest to be of the devil, or to be counted the spirit of Antichrist. Which spirit of Antichrist (he saith) was come even then, and is no doubt much more now in all heretics; all being precursors of that great Antichrist which shall come towards the latter end.'

[" The reality of our Lord's passion depends upon the reality of his human nature; and it is singular enough that language such as Dr. Wiseman has employed, respecting a belief in the flesh of Christ, should have come from ROME. What renders this language the more strange is, that it was adopted after some reflection. 'To believe in the flesh of Christ,' says Dr. Wiseman, 'is absurd; for the flesh and blood of Christ was not an object of faith to those who really sinned by believing him too literally only a man; nor can our belief in them be the source of eternal life.' There is, in all this, a disregard of TRADITION as well as of SCRIPTURE, not easy to be found in any other volume than that of Dr. Wiseman.

[" In the course of the last paragraph from the learned author, there are these sentences:—'Protestants say, that, as to feed on Christ signifies to believe in him, so, to eat his flesh and drink his blood, means to believe in his passion. But they do not bring a single argument to show that such a phrase was in use, or would have been intelligible to his hearers.' The phrase which the Protestants alluded to apply to our Lord's passion, not then undergone—Dr. Wiseman applies to the eucharist, not then instituted. And 'he does not bring a single argument to show that such a phrase was in use, or would have been intelligible to the hearers.' I have never yet known an instance, in which excessive subtilty did not entail disastrous consequences upon a controversial writer.....Various remarks, on the last paragraph, might still be added; but the topics already brought forward are, as we learn, 'mere præludia to the real and decisive examination of the point which yet remains.' To the sixth, and final, argument, then, let us proceed without delay.

[" Dr. Wiseman having, by means of much learning, proved that bread, or food, was, in ancient times, used figuratively for doctrine, concluded that the bread, mentioned in the former part of our Lord's discourse, could not but have been so understood. While, acknowledging that it ought to have been so understood, I showed that it was not. The learned writer now occupies many of the last twenty pages of his second lecture in proving, by similar means, that the phrase of eating the flesh was, in ancient times, used figuratively, in a sense excluded by the circumstances of the case; and concludes that this expression, in the latter part of the discourse, could not but have been understood literally. I grant that it was understood literally; but contend that it ought not to have been so understood. In this portion of his lecture, Dr. Wiseman certainly exhibits passages from the Old Testament, the Arabic, the Syriac, the Rabbins, the Greek and the Latin, in which some expressions of the kind now under review indicate an injury either to person or character—in short, an evil intention. The ordinary meaning of eating the flesh of a person, when taken figuratively, appears to be, to calumniate him. Whether other significations may be occasionally involved in such expressions, I will not inquire; the inquiry, according to my view of the matter, being of no consequence. To say the truth, Dr. Wiseman, while discussing this topic, writes like a man who is convinced that his argument is invulnerable; nevertheless, there will be no great difficulty in discovering its weak points. After the learned author had employed almost twenty pages in proving that to eat the flesh of any one is used metaphorically in a bad sense, so that, when interpreting John vi., the metaphorical meaning must be discarded—he ought, by all means, to have added a few pages, to show that to eat the flesh of any one is used literally in a good sense, so that there was a positive reason for maintaining the literal meaning in opposition to the figurative. If extraneous usage is to be the test in one case, we are justified in expecting that it should be produced in another. Dr. Wiseman holds that, in John vi., love, or charity, is the internal principle implied in eating the flesh of Christ, according to his own literal sense: he ought, then, to follow up his own plan; and make out, by citations from the Old Testament, the Arabic, the Syriac, the Greek, and so on, that the literal eating of the flesh of a person, with a feeling of love and charity, admits of exemplification. Whatever difficulty, in this point of view, may stand in the way of the figurative interpretation, I will venture to say, that much greater must be removed before the literal interpretation can be admitted; and I assert, without fear of contradiction, that he has no right to assume the truth of the literal meaning, till he has removed the objections to which it is exposed by the operation of his own principles.

[" On looking over the passages cited by Dr. Wiseman —to prove that to eat the flesh, in its figurative sense, meant, according to ancient usage, to calumniate—I have observed nothing, in a literary point of view, requiring notice; unless it be that the quotation from Martial—

> 'Non deerunt tamen hac in urbe forsan
> Unus, vel duo, tresve, quatuorve,
> Pellem rodere qui vellent caninam'— would have been rendered exact in metre, truly grammatical, and in accordance with the printed editions, if it had been thus exhibited—

> 'Non deerunt tamen hac in urbe forsan
> Unus, vel duo, tresve, quatuorve,
> Pellem rodere qui velint caninam.'
> Lib. v., Ep. 60., verse 8.

By way of conclusion, therefore, to the present section, I can now lay before the reader a few remarks upon the literal interpretation affixed by the Jews to our Lord's phrase, of eating his flesh; an interpretation vindicated by Dr. Wiseman, as embodying the sense intended at the time.

[" What, then, did the Jews really understand by eating the flesh of Christ? Beyond all doubt, they understood it to signify the actual eating of the natural flesh of the individual whom they beheld. But, in order that there may be no mistake in this matter—which is of great consequence in the present inquiry—I shall here produce statements on the subject, by writers of the highest estimation in the Church of Rome. In the first place, I present the words of the famous annotator in the Rhemish Testament:—

[" 'This carnality of theirs [the Jews] stood in two points specially: First, that they imagined that he would kill himself, and cut and mangle his flesh into parts, and so give it them raw or roast to be eaten among them. Which could not be meant, saith S. Augustine, for that had contained an heinous and barbarous fact; and therefore they might, and should have been assured, that he would command no such thing: but some other sweet sense to be of his hard, mystical, or figurative words; and to be fulfilled in a sacrament, mystery, and a marvellous divine sort, otherwise than they could comprehend. Secondly, they did err touching his flesh, in that they took it to be the flesh of a mere man, and of a dead man also, when it should come to be eaten.' (From the note on John vi. 63.)

[" Such, in the judgment of this acute and learned commentator, were the thoroughly gross conceptions of the Jews—the grossest certainly that could possibly be entertained—on the subject. Let us now attend to the account of the same matter, given by a no less strenuous advocate, for the tenets of the Church of Rome, than Estius; who after observing that there are four modes of eating the flesh of Christ, and drinking his blood—namely, carnally, cruelly, sacramentally, and spiritually—thus proceeds:—

[" 'Carnalem modum manducandi et bibendi corpus et sanguinem Christi, scriptura quidem non tradit, sed ex Christi verbis Joan. 6 male intellexerunt Capharnaitæ, putantes a Christo promitti carnem ejus manducandam, more carnium animalium occisorum, quæ laniatæ aut dissectæ in partes vel crudæ vorantur a bestiis, vel coctæ manducantur ab hominibus: et de sanguine similiter. Hunc modum et Dominus in evangelio tanquam carnalem reprobat, et Patres tanquam barbarum et flagitiosum explodunt et condemnant, nominatim Augustinus, lib. iii., de Doctrinâ Christianâ, c. xvi.' (In lib. Sent. iv., 9, 1, p. 110.)

[" Here we find Estius, as well as the Rhemish commentator, attributing to the Jews the grossest conceptions of eating the flesh of Christ:—conceptions which he declares to have been condemned by our Lord, as carnal —and rejected by the Fathers, as barbarous and flagitious. To the same effect writes Dr. Wetham, a Roman Catholic Professor at Douay—the editor of an English Testament, with annotations, published in 1730. In a note on verse 63, he denounces 'the gross and carnal imaginations of those Capharnaites, that our Lord meant to give them his body and blood to eat, in a visible and bloody manner, as flesh, says St. Augustine, is sold in the market and in the shambles.'.....On entering upon the consideration of this point, I naturally wished to put the reader in possession of the sentiments of Roman Catholic divines, in relation to it; and having done so, by means of two or three instances, I need only state in addition, that, so far as I know, there is, among Protestant commentators, a perfect agreement with them in opinion upon the subject. The case, indeed, is too clear for dispute. Such, then, was the Jewish interpretation of our Lord's expressions; and that was the strictly literal interpretation. Now a large portion of Dr. Wiseman's Lectures on John vi. is employed in arguing against all figurative meanings, in the case, as prohibited by the very nature of the phrases themselves: in vindicating the rigorously literal meaning of those phrases: in proving that they could not but be understood literally—that they were understood literally —and that they ought to be understood literally—that, in short, the Jews were perfectly right in their views of the matter. To avoid the risk of misrepresentation, I once more transcribe his own words. In the latter part of our Lord's discourse, there is, he writes, 'a totally different phraseology; which to his hearers could not possibly convey that [figurative] meaning [which prevails through the first part] nor any other, save that of a real eating of his flesh, and drinking of his blood.' Here we have the Jewish interpretation distinctly stated; and we afterwards find it as stoutly maintained. This moreover is done, in opposition, not only to common sense and human feeling, but to the general sentiment of his own Church, as well as of the whole Christian world. On principles which we have already canvassed, he decides that the phrases do not admit of figurative meanings; and for reasons which will afterwards appear, he infers that, if the Jews had mistaken their import, our Lord would have corrected them. My conclusion from all this is, that imagination cannot conceive any man more heavily fettered to a particular tenet, than Dr. Wiseman here is to the Jewish interpretation. By what means, then, does he render that interpretation subservient to his own purposes? This I shall now endeavour to explain.

["The truth appears to be as follows: When Dr. Wiseman has fairly persuaded his readers that he is discussing the Jewish interpretation, he contrives—no one sees how or when, but with a dexterity which cannot be too much admired, and a disingenuousness which cannot be too severely reprobated—to substitute—as if it were the same thing—the sacrament of the eucharist. Now, this sacramental interpretation is not the same as the Jewish interpretation. No sane man has yet, I believe, ventured to say that the Jews were thinking of the sacrament. The unwarrantable substitution here pointed out is, apart from all other considerations, absolutely fatal to Dr. Wiseman's argument, as conducted by himself; but I hope to render some service, by tracing a few of the consequences flowing from the substitution.

["Dr. Wiseman holds that the phrases, in the second part of our Lord's discourse, are not susceptible of a figurative interpretation: but Dr. Wiseman interprets those phrases of the eucharist—which is a figurative interpretation:—therefore Dr. Wiseman holds contradictory propositions—which cannot both be true. To prove that to interpret those phrases of the eucharist is to interpret them figuratively, although no proof is wanted, I appeal to the Rhemish annotator, as already quoted. He writes of a 'sweet sense' as existing in our Lord's 'hard, mystical, or figurative words'—'to be fulfilled in a sacrament, mystery, and a marvellous divine sort.' In fact, if the phrases be interpreted of the sacrament, they cannot but be interpreted figuratively. The phrases must either be understood literally or figuratively. The Jews understood them literally, and assigned to them the only literal meaning the words could possibly bear. For that meaning, no man, not even Dr. Wiseman himself, will really contend. The phrases, therefore, must be understood figuratively; however people may differ about the import to be attached to them: some persons explaining them sacramentally, others spiritually, and others again, both sacramentally and spiritually. All these persons, however, adopt a figurative interpretation. It is sad work to have thus to revert to the most elementary considerations; but I have had recourse to the expedient, from an impression that I might, by such means, the most effectually dispel the darkness, in which Dr. Wiseman has contrived to involve the whole subject.

["The learned author, as we shall soon see, undertakes to prove, at great length, that if the literal interpretation of the Jews had not been right, it would have been corrected. Why, then, does he not himself adhere to the literal interpretation? Why adopt a figurative interpretation, of which the Jews could not possibly have had the slightest notion? The truth is, he would fain interpret the same phrase literally and figuratively, at the same time; and thus combine, for his own purposes, the significations peculiar to each method. Now, that is permitted to no one. Dr. Wiseman may take his choice between the two methods; but he cannot secure the advantages of them both. Should he decide in favour of the literal interpretation, the phrase cannot be applied to the eucharist—and the controversy respecting the sixth chapter of St. John is at an end. Should he prefer the sacramental interpretation, he must abandon the literal signification of the phrase; which must then be understood figuratively—that is, with reference solely to the sacrament. When an object is to be considered in a figurative sense, there is something so preposterous in the supposition, that the actual physical properties of that object are thereby transferred to that sense, that I would not beforehand do any one the injustice to believe him capable of holding such an opinion. Yet such an opinion is held by those who apply the latter phrases of our Lord's discourse to the eucharist, and at the same time maintain, from the same expressions, that the actual flesh is to be eaten in that sacrament. The inference which ought to be drawn, by those who interpret that part of the discourse—of the eucharist, is—that the literal sense, of eating the flesh, is excluded by the mode of interpretation; and that the eucharistical sense can be decided by those parts of Scripture only, which expressly treat of that sacrament. Let me illustrate, by an example, what I have now advanced. Our Lord said to Nicodemus, 'Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.'

(John iii. 3.) Nicodemus being perplexed by the literal meaning of this, our Lord gave him its figurative interpretation: 'Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.' Now, if, in expounding the nature of baptism, an interpreter were to insist upon the circumstances of the natural birth, instead of considering our Lord's explanation, and those other passages of Scripture in which that sacrament is mentioned, he would not act more absurdly than do those, who, after applying our Lord's expressions, in John vi., to the eucharist, determine its nature, by means of such expressions.

["When Dr. Wiseman, whether from some ambition of originality I know not, determined, in opposition to the most renowned Doctors of his own Church, to maintain the correctness of the Jewish interpretation of the closing expressions in our Lord's discourse, he could scarcely have calculated the consequences of his undertaking. He must have felt that the literal sense was not the sense he really meant to establish; and there was, at least, a possibility that the silent substitution, in the course of the argument, of a meaning not literal, instead of that literal meaning which he professed to support, might not pass without observation. Yet he does not seem to have made any provision against the contingency. Appearances, at present, are somewhat ridiculous. He had a leaning wall to support; and he has built his buttresses on the wrong side of it. The stronger are his reasonings, in defence of the literal interpretation of the Jews, the more fearfully do they press upon his sacramental interpretation. In fact, through the greater portion of his Lectures on this subject, he has exerted himself in adding weight to that which crushes his own hypothesis to atoms. I doubt whether a more surprising instance, of such a mode of proceeding, is to be found in the history of theological literature.

["These concluding remarks are of themselves destructive of Dr. Wiseman's system; but I shall examine his remaining Lectures on the subject, with similar care to that which I have already manifested. His explanations of Scripture furnish instruction of a very peculiar kind; and the reader, I trust, has still some remains of curiosity and patience. But before I proceed to the next lecture, I wish to point out how unwisely, in my opinion, the learned author has deviated from one of the ablest members of his own communion—and I could instance many others—in interpreting the sixth chapter of St. John.

["Estius, with the sanction, as he says, of Scripture and the Fathers, mentions four methods, as I have already stated, of eating and drinking the body and blood of Christ: that is, 1. Carna'ly, 2. Cruelly, (crudeliter,) 3. Sacramentally, and, 4. Spiritually. The first method has been described.....The second method approaches to that which Dr. Wiseman has given, as the only figurative method. David, according to Estius, prophetically personifying our Saviour, exclaims, 'When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell;' (Psalm xxvii. 2;) also, 'They gaped upon me with their mouths, as a ravening and a roaring lion:' (Psalm xxii. 13:) with reference to the events attending the crucifixion.....The third (sacramental) method relates to the eating and drinking in the eucharist, where Estius, as a Roman Catholic, of course believes that the real body and blood exist under the appearance of bread and wine.....The fourth (spiritual) method is placed in several points of view; but I will mention only the first two: (1.) To be incorporated with the mystical body of Christ, whether by baptism, the eucharist, or any other means, is to eat the flesh of Christ and to drink his blood. For this view of the matter, great authorities are quoted; namely, the sixth chapter of St. John, Augustine, the Master of the Sentences, Gratian, and (in Dr. Wiseman's estimation I should think) more than all, Pope Innocent I. ..... (2.) We eat and drink spiritually, through faith in the flesh of Christ consigned to the cross for us, and in his blood shed for us; which, induced by probable arguments, some think may be proved from our Lord's discourse in John vi. On this subject I cannot but quote the very words of Estius:

["'Secundo autem modo spiritualis manducatio intelligitur quæ fit per fidem in carnem Christi traditam pro nobis in cruce, et sanguinem pro nobis effusum. Quem modum alii probabilibus argumentis moti putant proprie significatum esse a Domino in illo sermone quem habuit Joan 6. Quem et Augustinus tradit, cum ait in illis verbis, Nisi manducaveritis, &c., FIGURAM esse, qua præcipiatur passioni Domini esse communicandum, et suaviter atque utiliter recondendum in memoria, quod pro nobis caro ejus crucifixa sit et vulnerata.' (In Sent., lib. iv., 9, 1, p. 111.)

["In a scholar of the Roman Church, we naturally excuse a respect, even if it happens to border upon veneration, for the general voice of antiquity. Now, there are two points, concerning which I should be surprised to find any difference of opinion, amongst Fathers, Schoolmen and Divines, from the age of the Apostles to our own—till Dr. Wiseman arose. One is, a belief that the Jewish literal interpretation of our Lord's expressions was wrong; another, that the expressions must be understood figuratively. The learned author appears to me, in this respect, very like a man rowing by himself, in his own small boat, in opposition to a mighty stream; and it is easy to predict the result."*]

Having shown the inconsistency of the Roman Catholic exposition, we shall now give such an interpretation of the passage as will avoid their absurdities, and agree with the general tenor of our Saviour's discourse.

It appears to us that our Lord has himself given a key to the passage, and in express words cautioned us against taking his language in a grossly literal sense, in the place of that which is mystical and spiritual. We are told (verse 60) that many of the disciples, when they heard this apparently harsh command to eat Christ's flesh and to drink his blood, (taking the words in a carnal sense, as the Roman Catholics now do,) "were much offended, and said, This is a hard saying, who can hear it?" When Jesus knew this in himself that his disciples murmured at it, he said, "Doth this offend you?" (Verse 61.) In these words our Lord chides their dulness, and rectifies their mistake respecting that which he had spoken. And lest even this should not give them light sufficient to understand the allegory he had been pursuing, he farther adds, "It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing." That is, "Though you could really eat my flesh, yet that would do you no good as to the spiritual life of your souls; for it is the Spirit of God that must quicken you." And then he concludes, by saying, "The words that I have spoken to you, they are spirit and they are life."*

[* Dean Turton's Roman Catholic Doctrine of the Eucharist Considered, in reply to Dr. Wiseman's Argument from Scripture, part i., sect. ii., pp. 72—104.]

But what is that spiritual sense in which the expressions eating his body and drinking his blood are to be understood? To this we reply according to the light that is thrown upon the subject in the context. To eat the flesh of Christ and to drink his blood is to come to him, or to believe in him; for by these phrases it is explained in this chapter. Christ says, "This is the will of Him that sent me, that every one that believeth on the Son of man may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day." (Verse 40.) "No man can come unto me except the Father draw him, and I will raise him up at the last day." (Verse 44.) And in verse 54 he says, "Whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day." So the same promise, in similar words, being made in the same discourse to all that "believe in Christ," to all that "come to him," and to all that "eat his flesh and drink his blood," is an undeniable argument, that both "coming to Christ," and "believing on him," and "eating and drinking his flesh and blood," are synonymous terms. This is a general exposition.

But more particularly. The chief design of Christ in the chapter is very obvious: the men that now followed Jesus were those who had partaken of those loaves and fishes which had been miraculously multiplied. Jesus took occasion to tell them, that "they did not follow him for the sake of miracles, but for the loaves they had eaten;" (verse 26;) and from thence, as was his usual manner, exhorted them, "not to labour for the meat that perisheth, but for that which endureth to everlasting life." They then asked him "how they were to do that." He answered immediately, the way was "to believe on him." (Verse 29.) They asked him again "what sign he would give, or what miracle he would work, that they should believe on him," (verse 30,) urging him to do as Moses did, that is, to give them bread from heaven. (Verses 31, 32.) He then compared himself with that manna which Moses gave the Israelites; showing how much he excelled it, (verses 49, 50,) which only continued for a short space, but by believing on him they might obtain eternal life. At this they murmured. He told them again, "He that believeth on me hath everlasting life; I am that bread of life," (verses 47, 48,) that spiritual food, that will bring mankind to the full possession of its enjoyment. And lest they should be mistaken as to the kind of bread to which he refers, he explained himself still more fully: "The bread is the flesh which I shall give for the life of the world." (Verse 51.) That is, "I will lay down my life for the salvation of mankind, which my death shall procure for them; and this flesh of mine, thus crucified, shall be the procuring cause of spiritual food to all believers, that shall nourish their souls into everlasting life: whosoever shall eat this bread shall have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day:" which is the same as to say, "Whosoever heartily believes on me, becomes my disciple, and obeys my commandments; to all such my death will procure eternal life, through the agency of the Holy Spirit, who shall raise him up at the last day. But, on the other hand, he that does not believe on me, and refuses to become my disciple, who tramples under foot the Son of God, and rejects the provision which is made in the blood of atonement for the nourishment of the soul, hath no life in him, nor shall he be raised up at the last day."

This, as far as we can gather from the chapter, by comparing one part with another, is the true meaning. The text, therefore, is not to be interpreted in a gross and carnal sense, as though it were necessary to salvation that every one should eat the natural flesh of Christ, and drink his blood. It is enough if he truly believe in him; that he become his disciple; and be made conformable to his death, by dying to sin and living to righteousness. This is feeding on Christ's body and blood. And though we do not deny that one means by which we eat Christ's flesh and drink his blood is the eucharist, it is by no means confined to that institution. Every sincere Christian who lives according to the Gospel, does, in every act of religion which he performs, eat the flesh of Christ and drink his blood; for he exercises faith and obedience, which are truly the eating and drinking mentioned in the chapter.

But the Church of Rome contends that Christ here speaks of a carnal eating his flesh and drinking his blood. This was the mistake of the Jews. They "strove among themselves, saying, How can this man give us his flesh to eat?" and said, "This is a hard saying; who can hear it?" And the Church of Rome holds and teaches at this day the very doctrine for which the carnal Jews were condemned. They maintain that, Christ, literally, gave his body to be eaten, and his blood to be drunk. They have adopted the construction of the depraved Jews, and maintain it most pertinaciously, though it is both impious and absurd.

Those who partake of the Lord's supper unworthily are said to "eat and drink damnation to themselves, not discerning the Lord's body;" (1 Cor. xi. 29;) from which some Roman Catholic writers triumphantly exclaim, "How can they discern the Lord's body if it be not there?" To this it will be enough to reply, that it is there under the symbolical representation of the elements of bread and wine, which he appointed to signify his body in that holy ordinance. The believing Israelite discerned the Lord's body in the paschal Lamb, which prefigured the sacrifice of Christ; but no Jew ever imagined that the Lamb was the real Messiah; so every one who eats the Lord's supper in faith discerns the Lord's body in the symbols which represent and commemorate his death; but it was reserved for the Church of Rome to excel in impiety and absurdity all that had been foolishly maintained by the Jews in times of the greatest apostasy and idolatry, by teaching that the symbols which represent the Saviour, are really the Saviour himself.

3. It is argued, from the secret discipline of the early Church, that the doctrine of transubstantiation was the chief mystery held in concealment from the catechumens. To this we answer, (1.) That so far was this from being the case, that the chief mysteries were the doctrines of the Trinity, the divinity of Christ, the incarnation, and others connected therewith. This appears from Cyril of Jerusalem, Jerome, Origen, and Augustine, who all refer to the doctrine of the Trinity, &c. (2.) The Catholic Church of the first five centuries recognised no change in the elements whatever; and a doctrine which had no existence in the early Church certainly could not be taught in its secret discipline. (3.) Moreover, Julian the Apostate, who had been baptized, and therefore initiated into all the mysteries of the

* Ussher's Works, Answer to a Challenge made by a Jesuit in Ireland.--Vol. iii., p. 52, et seq. 8vo. edit.

Church, and who ridiculed the doctrines of the incarnation, divinity of Christ, &c., would not certainly have passed over so glaring an absurdity as transubstantiation, had any such doctrine been taught at that time. (4.) The primitive Christians, also, who were sometimes accused of eating human flesh, from misapprehensions arising from the figurative language used in the eucharist, uniformly deny the accusation; which they could not have done with any show of consistency, had they believed the Popish doctrine of the eucharist.*

4. From the language of ancient Liturgies, and from the phraseology of early ecclesiastical writers, Roman Catholics argue in favour of transubstantiation.

Some of the Christian Fathers express themselves respecting the sacrament of the eucharist in the same figurative style as that which the Jews were accustomed to adopt in their sacraments, and according to the emblematical style of Scripture. Hence some of their expressions, when detached from their natural connexion, and interpreted according to the modern style, might seem to favour the notion of a real presence. But they were very far from expressing themselves accurately either on this, or on many other subjects. On the doctrine of the divinity of Christ, many of their expressions, rigidly interpreted and detached from the context, require much qualification.

But when we make this concession, it must be observed, that they speak of the consecrated elements of this sacrament as symbols, figures, images, or types of the body and blood of Christ. This is a mode of expression which can never be consistent with transubstantiation; but with our views of this sacrament it entirely agrees. However, it is said, in order to shun this difficulty, that "a thing may be a symbol of another thing, and yet be the same identical thing which it is employed to symbolize." Then, according to this new mode of employing language, the serpent, which among the Egyptians was a symbol of the world, was the world itself. And Hagar, who allegorically represented Mount Sinai, was really a mountain. And with equal propriety, the wine in the sacrament is both the symbol of Christ's blood, and his blood, at the same time.†

5. They say this doctrine is no more mysterious than the doctrines of the Trinity, incarnation, &c.

When we urge that the doctrine of transubstantiation is absurd and contradictory, they attempt to awe us into silence, along with their deluded hearers, by language similar to the following:—"Will you be a Christian, or will you not? If you will, then you must be led by faith, and not by sense. You must believe what God hath said, and not what your own carnal fallible reason suggests. You cannot conceive how that which appears bread should be the real body of Christ which is in heaven. Your ideas of many of the Christian mysteries are equally obscure. Is not the incarnation of our Saviour, the manner how God and man can be one person, every whit as unaccountable? Are you not as much at a loss when you endeavour to reconcile the doctrine of the Trinity with your reason, as you are in the case you object against us? Can any man living give a more intelligible account of that mystery than we can give of transubstantiation? Will not the notion of three in one be eternally as great a contradiction, as that the body of Christ should be in a thousand places at once? Leave, therefore, these sensual hankerings after reason, and believe whatever God says to be true, how impossible soever it may seem to us: it is not our business to dispute God's assertions, but to submit to them."

This, indeed, is said plausibly, and it is probable that the unwary may occasionally be deceived by it. But when it is duly weighed, the sophistry will be apparent; because there is a vast disparity between the doctrine of transubstantiation and those of the Trinity, incarnation, &c. We shall offer four considerations by which this disparity will be manifest.

(1.) The doctrine of the Trinity is so clearly revealed in Scripture, that we must reject the authority of divine revelation, if we deny it; and none, from Christ's time till the present, ever renounced the doctrine of the Trinity, or of the incarnation, without incurring the charge of heresy. Whereas transubstantiation has no foundation in Scripture, but is directly opposed to it.

(2.) The doctrines of the Trinity and the incarnation were contained in the Apostles' Creed, and were taught assiduously by the primitive church. But transubstantiation was never in any of the ancient Creeds, nor taught by the Doctors in the church of Christ during the first eight centuries. Indeed it is a perfect novelty, first established by the Council of Lateran. So that it is most absurd to associate the doctrine of transubstantiation with that of the Trinity or of the incarnation.

(3.) Another difference between the doctrine of transubstantiation and those of the Trinity and of the incarnation is, that the first comes under the inspection of our senses, the others do not. It is no wonder we cannot fathom the depth of the Trinity, because God is an infinite being, and our understanding is finite. God only knows his own nature, and we know no more of it than what he has been pleased to reveal; and though our reason cannot fully comprehend the nature of God, we know that ther is an infinite disproportion between our faculties and the great object of our contemplation. Yet our not being able to fathom his nature proceeds from its incomprehensibility, and the weakness of our mental powers, rather than from any thing inconsistent or unreasonable in the thing itself. But when we come to speak of transubstantiation it is quite different, this being an object of sense. If we can judge of the reality of any thing in the world, we certainly are able to judge concerning a cup of wine or a piece of bread. We are undoubtedly competent judges of those things that fall under our senses, or we must suspend all opinion concerning things to the end of the world.

It is in vain, therefore, for Romanists to say, that our not being able to give an account of the Trinity is as much an argument against that mystery, as their not being able to give an account of transubstantiation is an argument against it. If the nature of God fell under our senses, and were to be judged by them, as all bodies are, they would argue right: but it is otherwise; for God is an infinite and incomprehensible Spirit, and therefore cannot be an object that the senses of man can comprehend, because they can only take cognizance of objects which are material and finite.

(4.) The Roman Catholics say that the doctrine of the Trinity is as absurd and contradictory as that of transubstantiation. This we deny, because we can refer every person of common sense to many impossibilities and contradictions in the latter, such as they cannot evade, notwithstanding their distinctions and subtleties. But they cannot show any such absurdities and contradictions in the doctrine of the Trinity, however mysterious it may appear; no, nor in any of the doctrines of Christianity. Though we may not be able to prove every doctrine by reason, yet, if God has revealed it, we may safely certify that such revelation is not contrary to reason, although it may far surpass our intellectual powers to comprehend it fully.

* Faber's Difficulties of Romanism, pp. 95—129. Edit. 1826.

† See this argument, first adduced by the Bishop of Meaux, considered at large by Faber, ut supra, p. 131, et seq.

It is the height of sophistry to represent the sublime mystery of the Trinity and the absurdity of transubstantiation as being equally improbable, or equally easy of comprehension. The sacred doctrine of the Trinity is, in fact, a partial revelation, and accommodated to the imperfection of our limited capacities. If the Gospel declared that there are three Persons in the Godhead, and that yet there is only one Person, we must necessarily reject it, as being founded on insufficient evidence. But the case is otherwise. "The Catholic faith is, that we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in unity, neither confounding the Persons nor dividing the substance." The unity of the Deity is essential. The Trinity of the Deity is personal. But in whatever the divine unity may consist, it does not consist in that of person; for we acknowledge a plurality of persons. How this plurality should agree with unity of essence we do not pretend to conceive, because we are ignorant of the nature of the divine essence. This truth is undoubtedly mysterious to the loftiest created intelligence. But we can readily conceive the difference between a mystery and a contradiction. It is one thing to believe a mystery, on the authority of divine revelation, though we cannot comprehend it; and another thing to believe a contradiction, no matter upon what authority, and which we are certain cannot but be false.

6. We are told that the doctrine of transubstantiation is a mystery. To this we answer, that it is not so, but is as plainly proved to be an error, as any other thing may be proved to be true; because it relates not to an infinite nature, as God, but to what is finite, namely, a piece of bread and a human body.

7. They say also, "God can do all things, and therefore there is nothing impossible to him in the doctrine of transubstantiation." But God will not do that which is naturally impossible to be done: will he make a thing to be this, and not to be this, or to be here and elsewhere, at the same time? This objection was fully met when we considered the gross impossibilities which accompanied this dogma.

8. Sometimes they pretend that this doctrine is wholly a speculative point; that our practice is not concerned in it; and although it be an error, it is not one of much importance, inasmuch as it is no obstacle to our salvation.

(1.) Supposing that it is a speculative error; they have made the reception of it an article of faith, absolutely necessary to salvation. It is one of the twelve articles which Pius IV., by order of the Council of Trent, affixed to the Apostles' Creed; so that wherever that Council is received, every Priest is bound not only to subscribe, but to swear that he believes this, together with all the other additions. We say nothing but what is true, as any man will be convinced who will take pains to read the Bull of that Pontiff, which may generally be found at the end of the Canons and Decrees of that Council, concerning the form of the oath respecting the profession of faith.

(2.) It is stated, that if it be an error, it is only a speculative one, and has no influence upon our practice. This is utterly false; for the belief of it involves the grossest idolatry. For what greater idolatry can there be than to worship and perform divine adoration to a piece of bread, as if it were Almighty God? The doctrine of transubstantiation necessarily implies divine worship; and if this doctrine be not true, the Papists are idolaters.

(3.) So far from being a matter of speculation, if the dogma be admitted, it entirely overthrows the evidences of Christianity, and renders it impossible that we should assure ourselves, or convince others, of the truth of the Christian system. This has been fully established.

IV. We next adduce the testimony of the ancient Fathers respecting the doctrine of transubstantiation, and assert, that it was not a doctrine of the primitive church.

1. Concerning this we have several things to premise.

(1.) It is unnecessary that we should furnish the testimony of all the Fathers on this head. Their unanimous consent may be necessary to support transubstantiation; but not to prove the doctrine non-catholic or non-universal, as a proposition cannot be universal if there be one, or two, or more exceptions.

(2.) None of the Fathers condemn the sentiments of Protestants: their opinions frequently exclude the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this subject.

(3.) Those expressions of the Fathers which are general and unexpounded, give no decision on the point in question. Therefore, when the Fathers say, "The body and blood of Christ," "There is the body of the Lord," or the like, there is no other change intended than the change of condition, sanctification, or usage. On this account, therefore, most of the quotations alleged by the Roman Doctors prove nothing to their purpose.

(4.) When the Fathers, on this question, speak of the change of the symbols in the holy sacrament, they sometimes employ the terms "conversion," "mutation," "transition," "migration," "transfiguration," &c.; by which they understand a sacramental, and not a proper, natural, or substantial change. There is a vast difference between conversion and transubstantiation. The first is not denied, by which is meant a change of use, condition, or sanctification; as, for instance, a table is changed into an altar, a house into a church, Matthew into an Apostle: but this proves nothing in favour of transubstantiation; in which there are three marvellous things: (i.) The natural being of bread and wine ceases. (ii.) The accidents of bread and wine remain without a subject. And, (iii.) The body and blood of Christ are brought into the place of bread and wine, which are not changed into them, but are succeeded by them.

(5.) The Fathers also, and directly contrary to the doctrine of transubstantiation, make the bread and wine to be the sacrament, sign, type, and image of the body and blood of Christ. They, according to Scripture, call the figure by the name of the thing figured.

(6.) These venerable men speak more than is allowed to be literally true by either side, and consequently compel us to receive an interpretation of their words different from that of the Roman Catholic Church. Such are the words of St. Chrysostom: "Thou seest him, thou touchest him, thou eatest him, and thy tongue is made bloody by this admirable blood; thy teeth are fastened in his flesh, thy teeth are made red with his blood." The author of the tract De Cœnâ Domini, formerly attributed to St. Cyprian, also says: "We stick close to the cross, we suck his blood, and fasten our tongues between the very wounds of the Redeemer."

(7.) It is in vain to allege the words of the Fathers which speak of the conversion of bread into Christ's body or flesh, and of the wine into his blood; since they assert the very same thing of us, that we are turned into Christ's flesh and blood. So St. Chrysostom: "He reduces us into the same mass, and in very deed makes us to be his body." Many such instances might be given.

(3.) Whatever the Fathers say of the eucharist, they affirm of the other sacrament, and also of the rituals of the Church. Cyril of Alexandria says: "As the bread of the eucharist, after the invocation of the Holy Ghost, is no longer common bread, but the body of Christ, so this holy ointment is no longer mere and common ointment." St. Chrysostom says: "The table or altar is as the manger in which Christ was laid." St. Ambrose, speaking of the baptismal waters, affirms, "Naturam mutari per benedictionem:" "The nature of them is changed by blessing." Austin asserts that "we are made partakers of the body and blood of Christ, when in baptism we are made members of Christ; and are not estranged from the fellowship of that bread and chalice, although we die before we eat that bread and drink that cup." And Tertullian says, "Tingimur in passione Domini:" "We are baptized into the passion of our Lord."

The testimonies which we shall bring forward from the ancient Fathers against transubstantiation will be affirmative of the Protestant sense, and subversive of that of Rome.

(1.) St. Ignatius says: "Breaking one and the same bread, which is the medicine of immortality, our antidote that we should not die, but live for ever in Christ Jesus."* Again: "Wherefore, putting on meekness, renew yourselves in faith, that is, the flesh of the Lord; and in charity, that is, the blood of Jesus Christ."† Here, certainly, there is no ground for transubstantiation. Speaking of certain heretics, he says: "They abstain from the eucharist, and from the public offices, because they confess not the eucharist to be the flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ, which suffered for our sins, and which the Father, of his goodness, raised again from the dead."‡ These heretics denied the incarnation of Christ, therefore they thought it inconsistent to receive the sacrament of the eucharist. What they denied was the incarnation, not the real presence. From these quotations it is therefore evident that Ignatius had no idea that the body and blood, soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, existed under the appearances of bread and wine.

(2.) Irenæus, in the second century, declares: "That cup, which is a creature, he confirmed to be his blood which was shed, whereby he increaseth our bodies. Therefore, when the mixed cup and the broken bread receive the word of God, it is made the eucharist of the blood and body of Christ, whereby the substance of our flesh is increased and doth consist."§ "The bread which is from the earth, receiving the divine invocation, is now no longer common bread, but the eucharist, consisting of two things; the one earthly, the other heavenly."* He says that it is no longer common bread, because it is set apart for a heavenly use; but the expression implies that it is still bread, and nothing else.

(3.) Tertullian says: "The bread which he had taken and distributed to his disciples he made his body, by saying, 'This is my body;' that is, 'the figure of my body.'"†

(4.) Justin Martyr declares, when writing against Trypho the Jew, "Figura fuit panis eucharistiæ, quem in recordationem passionis facere præcipit:" "The bread of the eucharist was a figure, which Christ the Lord commanded to be celebrated in remembrance of his passion." Justin, in his second Apology, says: "We are taught that the sanctified food wherewith our blood and flesh are nourished by conversion, is the flesh and blood of Jesus incarnate." The conversion or change of bread and wine into our bodies can never agree with transubstantiation, unless our bodies be nourished by mere accidents, or by the real body and blood, soul and divinity of Christ; all of which is absurd and blasphemous.

(5.) Origen declares: "There is in the New Testament a letter which killeth him that does not understand spiritually the things there said. For if you take this according to the letter, 'Except ye eat my flesh and drink my blood,' this letter killeth."‡ Again: "If, as the Marcionites say, Christ had neither flesh nor blood, of what flesh, or of what blood did he, giving bread and the chalice as the images, command his disciples, by which they might make a remembrance of him?" In the dialogues against the Marcionites, collected out of Maximus, in the time of Commodus or Severus, or about A. D. 190, Origen is brought to speak as above.§

(6.) Clemens Alexandrinus, in the second century, says: "For be ye sure he also did drink wine, for he also was a man, and he blessed wine when he said, 'Take, drink; this is my blood,' the blood of the vine; for this expression ('shed for many for the remission of sins') signifies, ALLEGORICALLY, a holy stream of gladness; but that the thing which had been blessed was wine, he showed again, saying to his disciples, 'I will not drink of the fruit of this vine till I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom.'"‖

[* "Ενα αρτον κλωντες, ὁς εστιν φαρμακον αθανασιας, αντιδοτος του μη αποθανειν, αλλα ζην εν Ιησου Χριστω δια παντος."—Ignat. ad Ephes. Epist., sect. xx.]

[† "Τμεις ουν πρεπει ευπαθιαν αναλαβοντες ανακτισασθε ἑαυτους εν πιστει, ὁ εστιν σαρξ του Κυριου, και εν αγαπη, ὁ εστιν αἱμα Ιησου Χριστου."—Idem, ad Trall. Epist., sect. viii.]

[‡ "Ευχαριστιας και προσευχης απεχονται, δια το μη ὁμολογειν την ευχαριστιαν σαρκα ειναι του Σωτηρος ἡμων Ιησου Χριστου την ὑπερ ἁμαρτιων ἡμων παθουσαν ἡν τη χρηστοτητι ὁ Πατηρ ηγειρεν."—Idem, ad Smyrn. Epist., sect. vii.]

[§ "Eum calicem, qui est creaturæ, suum sanguinem qui effusus est, ex quo auget nostrum sanguinem; et eum panem qui est a creatura suum corpus confirmavit, ex quo nostra auget corpora. Quando ergo et mixtus calix, et fractus panis percipit verbum Dei, et fit eucharistia sanguinis et corporis Christi, ex quibus augetur et consistit carnis nostræ substantia."—Irenæus adv. Hæres., lib. iv., cap. ii., pp. 396, 397. Fol. Oxon., 1702.]

[* "Quemadmodum enim qui est a terra panis, percipiens vocationem Dei, jam non communis panis est, sed eucharistia, ex duabus rebus constans, terrena et cœlesti."—Idem, lib. iv., cap. xxxiv. Fol., p. 265. A. D. 1570.]

[† "Acceptum panem et distributum discipulis, corpus suum illum fecit, 'Hoc est corpus meum,' dicendo, id est, 'Figura corporis mei.'"—Tertul. Opera adv. Marcion., lib. iv., c. xl., p. 297. Fol. Paris, 1658.

[‡ "Est et in Novo Testamento litera quæ occidat eum qui non spiritualiter quæ dicuntur adverterit. Si enim secundum literam sequaris hoc ipsum, quod dictum est, Nisi manducaveritis carnem meam, et biberitis sanguinem meum, occidit hæc litera."—Origen. Opera, tom. ii., Hom. vii. in Levit., cap. 5. Fol. Edit. Bened., 1733.

[§ Taylor's Works, vol. x., of the Real Presence, &c., sect. xii., p. 82. Heber's Edit.

[‖ "Ευ γαρ ιστε, μετελαβεν οινου και αυτος· και γαρ ανθρωπος και αυτος, και ευλογησεν γε τον οινον, ειπων, Λαβετε, πιετε· τουτο εστιν αἱμα της αμπελου· τον λογον, τον περι πολλων εκχεομενον εις αφεσιν ἁμαρτιων, ευφροσυνης ἁγιον αλληγορει ναμα, ὁτι δε οινος ην το ευλογηθεν, απεδειξε παλιν, προς τους μαθητας λεγων· Ου μη πιω εκ του γεννηματος της αμπελου ταυτης, μεχρις αν

(7.) In the third century Cyprian says: "Because his blood, by which we are redeemed and quickened, cannot SEEM to be in the cup, if the wine that represents the blood of Christ be not in the cup." * Again: "Therefore our Lord, in his table in which he did partake his last banquet with his disciples, with his own hands gave bread and wine; but on the cross he gave to the soldiers his body to be wounded, that, in the Apostles, the sincere truth and the true sincerity being more secretly imprinted, he might expound to the Gentiles how wine and bread should be his flesh and blood, and by what reasons causes might agree with effects, and divers names and kinds might be reduced to one essence, and the signifying and the signified might be reckoned by the same words."

(8.) The words of Eusebius are very decisive in favour of the doctrine of Protestants: "He gave to his disciples the SYMBOLS of divine economy, commanding the IMAGE of his own body to be made." † Again: "They received a command, according to the constitution of the New Testament, to make a memorial of this sacrifice upon the table, by the SYMBOLS of his body and healthful blood." ‡

(9.) Ephrem, Patriarch of Constantinople, declares: "That no man having understanding could say that there was the same nature in that which could be handled, and in that which could not be handled, in that which was visible and in that which was invisible. And even thus the body of Christ, which is received by the faithful, departs not from his sensible substance, and is undivided from a spiritual grace; for even baptism being wholly made spiritual, and being that which is the same and proper of the sensible substance, I mean of water, saves, and that which is born doth not perish." §

(10.) Macarius's words are sufficiently plain: "In the Church is offered bread and wine, the ANTITYPE of his flesh and blood; and they that partake of the flesh that appears do spiritually eat the flesh of Christ." ‖

(11.) Augustine plainly teaches contrary to the doctrine in question: "If a passage forbid something flagitious, or command something good, it is not figurative. But if it seem either to command something flagitious, or to forbid something good, then such passage is figurative. Thus, for example, Christ says, 'Unless ye eat,' &c. In these words he apparently commands something horrible and flagitious. Therefore, according to the rule I have laid down, the passage is a figure. Hence it must only be interpreted as enjoining us to communicate in the passion of our Lord, and as admonishing us to lay it up sweetly and usefully in our memory, because for us his flesh was crucified and wounded." * Augustine brings in our Saviour speaking of this matter as follows: "Christ admitted Judas to that banquet, in which he commended and delivered unto his disciples the figure of his body and blood." † Again: "The Lord did not doubt to say, 'This is my body,' when he gave the SIGN of his body." ‡ "You are not about to eat this body which you see, nor to drink that blood which they shall shed, who shall crucify me. I have recommended to you a certain sacrament, which, if spiritually understood, shall quicken you." §

(12.) From Cyril of Jerusalem we select the following:—"With all assurance let us partake as of the body and blood of Christ. For under the TYPE of bread, his body is given unto thee; and under the TYPE of wine, his blood is given unto thee; that so thou mayest partake of the body and blood of Christ, being one body and one blood with him." ‖

(13.) Jerome informs us that Christ "did not offer water, but wine, as a TYPE of his blood." ¶

(14.) Gregory Nazianzen speaks as expressly on this subject as if he had undertaken to confute the doctrine of Trent: "Now we shall be partakers of the paschal supper, but still in a figure, though more clear than in the old law. For the legal passover was a more obscure figure of a figure." **

(15.) Ambrose declares: "Make this ascribed oblation reasonable and acceptable, which is the figure of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ." ††

(16.) The authority of Chrysostom is adduced by both parties. His rhetoric occasionally places him on the side of the Papists; but his divinity and sober judgment lead him to that of the Protestants. After stating that Christ is both God and man, and that he has two natures without mixture or confusion, he writes as follows:—"For τωιω αυτο μεθ' ὑμων εν τη βασιλειᾳ του Πατρος μου."—Clemen. Alex. Opera, tom. i., Pædagog., lib. ii., cap. ii., p. 186. Edit. Potter, Oxon, 1715.

* "Quia non potest videri sanguis ejus, quo redempti et vivificati sumus, esse in calice; quando vinum desit calici, quo Christi sanguis ostenditur."—Cypriani Oper., Epist. 63, p. 105. Fol. Paris, 1726.

† "Τα συμβολα της ενθεου οικονομιας τοις αυτου παρεδιδου μαθηταις την εικονα του ιδιου σωματος ποιεισθαι παρακελευομενος."—Euseb. Oper., Demonst. Evang., lib. viii., cap. 1. p. 380. Fol. Paris, 1628.

‡ "Τουτου δητα του θυματος την μνημην επι τραπεζης εκτελειν, δια συμβολων τουτε σωματος αυτου και του σωτηριου αἱματος κατα θεσμοις της καινης διαθηκης παρειληφοτες."—Idem, lib. i., cap. ult., p. 39.

§ "Αλλ' ουδεις αν ειπειν δυναται νουν εχων, ὡς ἡ αυτη φυσις ψηλαφητου και αψηλαφητου και ὁρατου και ἀορατου ὑντως και το παρα των πιστων λαμβανομενον σωμα Χριστου και της αισθητης ουσιας ουκ εξισταται φυσεως, και της νοητης ἀδιαιρετον μενει χαριτος και το βαπτισμα και πνευματικον ὁλον γενομενον και ἐν ὑπαρχον, και το ιδιον της αισθητης ουσιας, του ὑδατος λεγω, διασωζει κ ι ὁ γεγονεν ουκ απολ.. εσε."—Ephrem de Sacris Antioch. Legibus, lib. i., in Photii Bibliotheca, codex 229.

‖ Homily xxvii.

[* "Si præceptiva locutio est aut flagitium aut facinus vetans, aut utilitatem aut beneficentiam jubens, non est figurata. Si autem flagitium aut facinus videtur jubere, aut utilitatem aut beneficentiam vetare, figurata est. Nisi manducaveritis, inquit, carnem Filii hominis, et sanguinem biberitis, non habebitis vitam in vobis. Facinus vel flagitium videtur jubere: figura est ergo, præcipiens passione Dominica communicandum, et suaviter atque utiliter recondendum in memoria quod pro nobis caro ejus crucifixa et vulnerata sit."—Aug. Opera, tom iii., De Doct. Christ., lib. iii., cap. 24. Fol. ut supra.]

[† "Cum ejus cogitationes non ignoraret, eum adhibuit ad convivium, in quo corporis et sanguinis sui figuram discipulis commendavit et tradidit."—August. Oper., tom. iv., in Psalm. iii., p. 9. Fol. Bened. Edit., Paris, 1680.]

[‡ "Non enim Dominus dubitavit dicere, Hoc est corpus meum, cum signum daret corporis sui."—Idem, tom. viii., Contra Adimantum, cap. xii., sect. iii., col. 124.]

[§ "Non hoc corpus quod videtis, manducaturi estis, et bibituri illum sanguinem, quem fusuri sunt qui me crucifigent. Sacramentum aliquod vobis commendavi, spiritaliter intellectum vivificabit vos."—Aug. Oper., tom. iv., Enarratio in Psalm. xcviii., col. 1066.]

[‖ "Quare cum omni persuasione tamquam corpus est et sanguinem Christi (illa) sumamus. Nam in figura panis datur tibi corpus, et in figura vini datur tibi sanguis, ut quum sumpseris corpus et sanguinem Christi, concorporeus et consanguis ipsi efficiaris."—Cyril. Oper. Cat. xxii., Mystag. iv., sect. iii. Fol. Bened. Edit, 1720.]

[¶ "In typo sanguinis sui non obtulit aquam, sed vinum."—Hieron. Opera, Ad. Jovin. Fol. Edit. Bened., 1706.

[ "Jam vero paschatis participes erimus, nunc quidem adhuc typice, tametsi apertius, licet quam in veteri, legale siquidem, pascha, nec enim dicere verebor, figuræ figura erat obscurior)."—Greg. Nazian. Opera, Orat. ii., in Pasch. Fol., p. 261. Edit. Antw., 1612.]

[†† "Fac nobis, inquit, hanc oblationem adscriptam, ratam, rationabilem, acceptabilem: quod figura est corporis et sanguinis Domini nostri Jesu Christi."—Ambros. Oper., tom. ii., De Sacrament., lib. iv., cap. 5. Fol. Edit. Bened, 1690.]

as (in the eucharist) before the bread is consecrated we call it bread, but when the grace of God, by the Priest, has consecrated it, it is no longer called bread, but is esteemed worthy to be called the Lord's body, although the nature of bread still remains in it; and we do not say there be two bodies, but one body of the Son; so here, the divine nature being joined with the body, they both make up but one Son, one person. Yet they must be confessed to remain without confusion, after an invisible manner, not in one nature only, but in two perfect natures." *

(17) Theodoret's testimony on this point is also decisive on the Protestant side. In his day the Eutychians denied that the two natures of Christ were united in one person, and maintained that his humanity was taken into the divinity after his ascension. To this heresy Theodoret replied in his Dialogues, in which he represented the Eutychians under the name of Eranistes, himself taking that of Orthodoxus. "Inasmuch as he who called his own natural body wheat and bread, and who farther bestowed upon himself the appellation of a vine; he also honoured the visible symbols with the name of his body and blood, not changing their nature, but adding grace to nature." † Again: "The mystical symbols, after consecration, pass not out of their own nature, inasmuch as they still remain in their original substance, and form, and appearance; and they may be seen and touched, just as they were before consecration." ‡

(18.) Gelasius, Bishop of Rome, in the fifth century, writing against the same errors as Theodoret, says: "Certainly the sacraments of the body and blood of the Lord, which we receive, are a divine thing, because by these we are made partakers of the divine nature. Nevertheless, the substance or nature of bread and wine ceases not to exist; and assuredly the image and similitude of the body and blood of Christ are celebrated in the action of the mysteries." § Baronius and Bellarmine endeavour to prove that this work is not that of Pope Gelasius, but of Gelasius Cyzicenus; the Roman Catholic historian, Du Pin, || however, proves indisputably, that the treatise on the two Natures of Christ, is the production of Gelasius of Rome.

(19.) Facundus, in the sixth century, thus writes: "The sacrament of adoption may be called adoption; just as the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, which is in the consecrated bread and wine, we are wont to call his body and blood. Not, indeed, that the bread is properly called his body, or that the wine is properly his blood, but because they contain the mystery of his body and blood within themselves. Hence it was that our Lord denominated the consecrated bread and wine, which he delivered to his disciples, his own body and blood."

3. Having adduced the preceding quotations from the Fathers, the number of which might be extended considerably, sufficient has been given to show that transubstantiation was not a doctrine of the early church. Those venerable men contradict the Church of Rome respecting the nature and properties of bodies; they deny that the accidents may exist without a subject, and that our senses can deceive us. The primitive Christians never reserved what remained of the elements after the administration of the ordinance, nor held them up as objects of supreme worship, which is the practice of the Church of Rome.† It must be, however, acknowledged, that the Fathers did not invariably speak on this subject in a manner consistent with Scripture or themselves.

V. It now remains for us to trace the rise, progress, and establishment of the doctrine of transubstantiation.

1. That the ancient Fathers did not believe this doctrine, is clear. That they made use of expressions which were easily accommodated to favour the dogma in after-times, is equally certain. Instead of interpreting the sublime and figurative language of Scripture according to the analogy of faith, writers of a fertile imagination went far beyond it. This gave rise to the idea of a physical change; and when once an opinion had taken root that seemed to exalt the sacrament so much, it speedily spread and prevailed; and, in those times of ignorance and superstition, the more easily on account of its extreme absurdity.

As illustrative of the foregoing remark, we refer to some ancient authorities. In the second century, Justin Martyr says: "We do not take (these elements) as common bread, and common wine. But as Jesus Christ our Saviour was made flesh by the Word of God, and had real flesh and blood for our salvation, so are we taught that this food, which the very same Word blessed by prayer and thanksgiving, is turned into the nourishment and substance of our flesh and blood, and is in some sense the flesh and blood of the incarnate Jesus." ‡

In the fourth century, Cyril of Jerusalem taught the catechumens who had been recently baptized as follows:— "When Christ himself hath declared and spoken concerning the bread, 'This is my body,' who shall henceforth dare to hesitate? And when he hath peremptorily pronounced and asserted, 'This is my blood,' who shall venture to doubt, saying that it is not his blood? He once, at the marriage-feast in Cana of Galilee, changed the water into wine: shall we not then give him credit for changing the wine into blood? If, when called to a mere corporeal marriage, he wrought that great wonder, shall we not much rather confess that he hath given the

* "Sicut enim antequam sanctificetur PANIS, PANEM nominamus, divina autem illum sanctificante gratia, mediante Sacerdote, liberatus est quidem ab appellatione panis, dignus autem habitus est Dominici corporis appellatione, etiamsi natura panis in ipso permansit; et non duo corpora sed unum corpus Filii prædicamus: sic et hic divina insidente corporis natura unum Filium, unam personam, utraque hæc fecerunt. Agnoscendum tamen inconfusam et indivisibilem rationem, non in una solum natura, sed in duabis perfectis." —Chrysost. Oper., tom. iii., Epist. ad Cæs. Monach., p. 744. Fol. Bened. Edit., 1721.

† Theodoret, Oper., tom. v., Dial. i., p. 273, et seq. Fol. Paris, 1684.

‡ Idem, Dial. ii., p. 297, et seq.

§ "Certe sacramenta quæ sumimus corporis et sanguinis Christi, divina res est, propter quod et per eadem divinæ efficimur consortes naturæ; et tamen esse non desint substantia vel natura panis et vini. Et certo imago et similitudo corporis et sanguinis Christi, in actione mysteriorum celebrantur."—Gelasius de duabus Naturis in Christo, contra Eutychen. Biblioth. Vet. Patrum, tom. iv.

|| Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 519, et seq. Dublin, 1723.

[* "Potest sacramentum adoptionis adoptio nuncupari: sicut sacramentum corporis et sanguinis ejus, quod est in pane et poculo consecrato, corpus ejus et sanguinem dicimus: non quod proprie corpus ejus sit panis, et poculum sanguis; sed quod in se mysterium corporis ejus sanguinisque contineant. Hinc et ipse Dominus benedictum panem et calicem quem discipulis tradidit, corpus et sanguinem suum vocavit."—Facundi Defens. trium capitulor. Conc. Chalced., lib. ix., cap. v., Bibl. Vet. Patr., tom. xi., pp. 767, 768. Fol. Venet., 1776.]

† Those who have not an opportunity of consulting the works of the Fathers will find them largely quoted in Bishop Taylor's Discourses on Popery, Usher's Answer to a Jesuit, Faber's Difficulties of Romanism, &c.

‡ Justin Martyr, Apol. i., pp. 76, 77.

fruition of his own body and blood to the sons of the bridegroom ?" * Cyril does not compare the one change with the other ; but simply argues from the miracle performed at Cana, as he might from any other, that if the Lord could work miracles transcending the power of man, why should we doubt his power to change the bread and wine into his own body and blood ? Such is the argument, not the comparison ; which leaves the matter still undecided. The preceding quotation from Cyril furnishes a specimen of the incautious and loose manner in which some of the primitive Fathers expressed themselves : at the first view of the passage, we might readily suppose that Cyril favoured the doctrine of transubstantiation, did we not meet in his writings with such expressions as the following :—"Ye are anointed with ointment, and ye have become partakers of Christ. But take care lest you deem that ointment to be mere ointment. For as the bread of the eucharist, after the invocation of the Holy Spirit, is no longer mere bread, but the body of Christ ; so this consecrated ointment is no longer mere or common ointment, but the free gift of Christ, and the presence of the very Godhead of the Holy Spirit energetically produced." †

["The change, wrought by consecration in the elements, thus stated by Cyril, is also described in a similar manner by Gregory of Nyssa, as being similar in nature to the change wrought by consecration in oil, or in an altar, or in a church, to the change wrought in our mortal bodies by their being made capable of immortality, to the change wrought in a layman by sacerdotal ordination, and to the change wrought in the unregenerate by the mighty efficacy of spiritual regeneration.

["'This altar, before which we stand,' says he, 'is physically mere common stone, differing nothing from the stones with which our houses are built : but, after it has been consecrated by benediction to the service of God, it becomes a holy table, a sanctified altar. In a similar manner, the eucharistic bread is originally mere common bread ; but, when it has been consecrated in the holy mystery, it becomes, and is called, the body of Christ. Thus also the mystic oil and the wine, though of small value before the benediction, work wonders after their sanctification by the Spirit. The same power of consecration likewise imprints a new and honourable character upon a Priest, when by a new benediction he is separated from the laity. For he, who was previously nothing more than a common man, is suddenly transformed into a teacher of religion, and into a steward of the holy mysteries. Yet this great mutation is effected without any change in his bodily form and appearance. Externally, he is the same that he already was ; but, internally, by an invisible and gracious operation, a mighty change is effected in his soul.'

["So far as I can understand Gregory, whose language perfectly accords with that of Cyril and Irenæus, and the ancient author of the Homily in Jerome, he seems to have acknowledged no change in the bread and wine by virtue of consecration, save such a change as that which is wrought in a layman when by virtue of consecration he becomes a Priest. Now, the only change in the layman, as indeed Gregory most carefully informs us, is a MORAL change. Therefore, the only change in the bread and wine, to which this change in the layman is expressly compared, must clearly be a MORAL change also. No person, who held the doctrine of a PHYSICAL change in the elements, could possibly compare that PHYSICAL change to a variety of other changes, every one of which is purely MORAL. Hence it is evident, that the primitive Church acknowledged only a MORAL change in the elements ; and hence nothing can be more nugatory than the conduct of the Roman controversialists, who perpetually quote the Fathers as speaking of a PHYSICAL change, when they most indubitably speak only of a MORAL change." *]

2. The doctrine of transubstantiation seems to have originated in the heresy of Eutyches, who believed that in Christ there was but one nature, namely, that of the incarnate word ; and that the human nature was changed into the substance of the divine nature. Availing himself of the phraseology of the ancient liturgies, though abundantly explained as to their real meaning, he formed the premises of his doctrines, which are well expressed by Theodoret in the following declaration of Eranistes, the spokesman for the doctrine of Eutyches :—"As the symbols of the Lord's body and blood are one thing before their consecration by the Priest, but after their consecration are physically changed, and become quite another thing ; so the material body of the Lord, after its assumption, was physically changed into the divine essence."† The heresy of Eutyches was refuted by Theodoret and Pope Gelasius in the fifth century, and by Ephrem of Antioch in the sixth.

3. The seventh General Council, held in Constantinople in the year 754, maintained that "Christ chose no other shape or type under heaven by which to represent his incarnation but the sacrament, which he delivered to his Ministers for a type and effectual commemoration ; commanding the substance of bread to be offered, which did not in any way resemble the form of man, that no occasion might be given for bringing in idolatry." This Council decreed against images. But the second Council of Nice, held in 787, ordered that the sacrament is not the image or antitype of Christ's body and blood, but is properly his body and blood. So that the doctrine of the corporeal presence in the sacrament was first introduced to support image-worship. Still, however, though the doctrine received the sanction of a General Council, and that in direct contradiction of another General Council, it was in a rude and undigested state. The above refers to the introduction of the doctrine into the Greek Church.

4. In the ninth century a warm contest arose in the Church concerning the manner in which the body and blood of Christ were present in the sacrament. The sentiments of Christians on this point were various and [* "Quum igitur Christus pronuntiaverit et dixerit de pane, Hoc corpus est meum, quis audebit deinceps ambigere? Et quum ipse adseveraverit et dixerit, Hic meus est sanguis, quis unquam dubitaverit, aiens non esse ejus sanguinem ? Aquam olim in vinum, quod sanguini affine est, in Cana Galilææ transmutavit ; et eum parum dignum existimabimus cui credamus, quum vinum in sanguinem transmutavit ? Ad nuptias corporales vocatus stupendum hoc miraculum effecit : et non eum multo magis filiis thalami nuptialis corpus suum et sanguinem fruenda donasse confitebimur."—Cyril. Oper. Cat. xxii., Mystag. iv., De Corp. et Sang. Dom., p. 320. Fol. Bened. Edit., 1720.

[† "Vos vero unguento uncti estis, Christi participes et consortes effecti. Cæterum vide ne nudum et vile suspiceris unguentum hoc esse. Nam sicut panis eucharistiæ, post invocationem Sancti Spiritus, non est communis panis, sed corpus Christi ; ita et sanctum istud unguentum, non amplius nudum neque, si quis ita appellare malit, commune unguentum est post invocationem ; sed Christi donarium et Spiritus Sancti præsentia divinitatis ejus efficiens factum."—Idem, Opera. Cat. xxi., Mystag. iii., De Sacro Chrismate, pp. 316, 317.]

[* Faber's Difficulties of Romanism, book i., chap. iv., on Transubstantiation, pp. 70—72.]

† Theodoret. Opera, tom. v., Dial. ii., p. 297, et seq.

contradictory, nor had any Council determined it with precision. Reason and folly had hitherto been left free, nor had the establishment of any imperious mode of faith suspended the exercise of the one, or restrained the extravagance of the other.

In the year 831, Paschasius, a Benedictine monk, afterward Abbot of Corbey, in France, published a treatise, "Concerning the Body and Blood of Christ," which he presented fifteen years subsequently, carefully revised and augmented, to Charles the Bald. The doctrine advanced by Paschasius may be expressed by the following propositions:—First, That after the consecration of the bread and wine in the Lord's supper, nothing remained of these symbols but the outward figure, under which the body and blood of Christ were locally present. Secondly, That the body and blood of Christ, thus present in the eucharist, was the same body that was born of the Virgin, that suffered on the cross, and was raised from the dead. This new doctrine, especially that contained in the second proposition, excited the astonishment of many. It was accordingly opposed by Rabanus, Heribald, and others, though not in the same manner, or on the same principles. Charles the Bald ordered the famous Bertram and Johannes Scotus to draw up a clear and rational explication of that doctrine which Paschasius had so egregiously corrupted. In this controversy the parties were as much divided among themselves, as at variance with their adversaries. The opinions of Bertram are confused, although he maintained that bread and wine, as symbols or signs, represented the body and blood of Christ. Scotus maintained uniformly that the bread and wine were the signs and symbols of the absent body and blood of the Saviour. Other theologians seemed to have no fixed opinions on these points. One thing, however, is certain, that none of them were properly inducted into the doctrine of transubstantiation, then unknown, as the worship of the elements was not mentioned, much less contended for, by any of the disputants. This was an extravagance of superstition too gross even for the ninth century. Bertram and those who thought with him allowed no material, but only a sacramental, change in the elements. Christ's body and blood were present effectively and really, but not bodily, substantially, or transubstantially, as held by the Romanists: it is in this sense that Protestants hold the doctrine of the real presence of Christ in the sacrament, although they deny transubstantiation. At this period no one maintained that the soul and divinity of Christ were contained in the eucharist; which may be brought forward as another proof that the Roman novelty had not then any existence. The testimony of Raban Maurus, Archbishop of Mentz, in the year 847, is worthy of a place here, and is as follows:—"Some persons, of late, not entertaining a sound opinion respecting the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord, have actually ventured to declare that this is the identical body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; the identical body, to wit, which was born of the Virgin Mary, in which Christ suffered on the cross, and in which he arose from the dead. This error we have opposed with all our might."*

The question of Stercorianism arose immediately out of these disputes. Paschasius asserted, "that bread and wine in the sacrament are not under the same laws with our other food, as they pass into our flesh and substance without any evacuation." Bertram affirmed that "the bread and wine are under the same laws with all other food." Some supposed that the bread and wine were annihilated, or that they have a perpetual being, or else are changed into flesh and blood, and not into humours or excrements to be voided. These, and various kindred questions and opinions, go to show that the doctrine of transubstantiation was only received in part, even by those who were on the side of Paschasius; while it is equally evident that by others it was entirely rejected.*

5. During the tenth century there was little but controversy on the subject of the sacrament of the Lord's supper; opinion, however, seemed to fluctuate, maintaining about the same bounds as in the ninth century. Nevertheless, the dominancy, in consequence of the profound ignorance of the times, appeared to be in favour of a crude system, which gradually advanced until the doctrine of transubstantiation became an article of faith.

["The contests concerning the eucharist, that had agitated the Church in the preceding century, were in this happily reduced to silence. This was owing to the mutual toleration that was practised by the contending parties, who, as we learn from writers of undoubted credit, left it to each other's free choice to retain or to change their former opinions. Besides, the ignorance and stupidity of this degenerate age were ill-suited to such deep inquiries as these contests demanded; nor was there almost any curiosity among an illiterate multitude to know the opinions of the ancient Doctors concerning these and other knotty points of theology. Thus it happened, that the followers of Augustine and Pelagius flourished equally in this century; and that if there were many who maintained the corporal presence of the body and blood of Christ in the holy sacrament, there were still more who either came to no fixed determination upon this point, or declared it publicly as their opinion, that the divine Saviour was really absent from the eucharistical sacrament, and was received only by a certain inward impulse of faith, and that in a manner wholly spiritual.† This mutual toleration, as it is easy to conclude from what has already been observed, must not be attributed either to the wisdom or virtue of an age which was almost totally destitute of both. The truth of the matter is, that the Divines of this century wanted both the capacity and the inclination to attack or defend any doctrine, whose refutation or defence required the smallest portion of learning or logic."]‡

6. In the year 1045, Berenger, Principal of the public school at Tours, and Archdeacon of Angiers, openly avowed his opposition to transubstantiation. He was a man of profound learning and acuteness, but wanted moral courage to enable him to cling to his profession. He was condemned for heresy by several Councils. At a Council held at Verceil, in 1050, Berenger durst not appear in

* Raban. Maur. Epist. ad Heribald., c. xxxiii.

* See the above and more of the same kind in Du Pin's Eccles. Hist., cent. ix., chap. vii., vol. ii., pp. 84—86. Dublin edit. 1724.

["† It is certain that the Latin Doctors of this century differed much in their sentiments about the manner in which the body and blood of Christ were present in the eucharist: this is granted by such of the Roman Catholic writers as have been ingenuous enough to sacrifice the spirit of party to the love of truth. That the doctrine of transubstantiation, as it is commonly called, was unknown to the English in this century, has been abundantly proved from the public Homilies, by Rapin de Thoyras, in his History of England, vol. i., p. 463. It is, however, to be confessed, on the other hand, that this absurd doctrine was already adopted by several French and German Divines. For a judicious account of the opinions of the Saxon-English Church concerning the eucharist, see Collier's Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, vol. i., cent. x., pp. 481—485."] person; and two others whom he had sent to maintain his doctrine were forced into silence as soon as they had commenced his defence. At another Council, held in Paris in the same year, it was ordained that he and his adherents should be constrained to recant, under pain of being put to death. At neither of these Councils did he make his appearance, being apprehensive that his life would be forfeited; he was therefore condemned unheard. By threats, and not by argument or conviction, he was compelled, by a Council held in Tours in 1054, to abjure his opinions: he soon, however, gave proof that his abjuration was only nominal, and not real. At a Council, held in Rome, under Nicholas II., in the year 1058, he was again obliged to recant, in the following words, which were drawn up by Humbert, Cardinal Bishop of Blanchesalve; namely,—that "the bread and wine, after consecration, were not only a sacrament, but also the real body and blood of Jesus Christ; and that this body is handled and broken by the Priest, and bruised by the teeth of the faithful, (fidelium dentibus atteri,) not only in the sacrament, but also in a sensible manner." This doctrine was so monstrous that no man could or ever did seriously believe it. It appears also that the Pope and his Council were not skilful enough to express themselves rightly on this matter; for the gloss upon the canon law says, "that unless we understand these words of Berenger in a sound sense, we shall fall into a greater heresy than that of Berenger; for we do not make parts of the body of Christ." Berenger speedily returned to the inculcation of his former opinions on his return home, in which he was supported by many of the wisest men of the age. In the year 1078, under the popedom of Gregory VII., and in a Council held in Rome, Berenger was again called upon to draw up a new confession of his faith, and to renounce that which had been composed by Humbert, although that had been solemnly approved and confirmed by Nicholas II. and a Roman Council. In consequence of the threats of his enemies, Berenger ratified by an oath, "that the bread laid on the altar became, after consecration, the true body of Christ, which was born of the Virgin, suffered on the cross, and now sits on the right hand of the Father; and that the wine placed on the altar became, after consecration, the true blood which flowed from the side of Christ." In a Council held in Rome, A. D. 1079, the Pope had drawn up for Berenger, in consequence of further clamours of his enemies, a third confession, which he was required to confirm by oath. By this he professed to believe "that the bread and wine were, by the mysterious influence of the holy prayer, and the words of our Redeemer, substantially changed into the true, proper, and vivifying body and blood of Christ." Berenger had no sooner escaped out of the hands of his enemies than he once more maintained his true sentiments, wrote a book in their defence, retreated to the Isle of St. Cosme, near Tours, repenting bitterly of his former dissimulation and want of firmness, until death, in 1088, terminated his life and his persecutions together.

‡ Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, cent. x., part ii., chap. iii., sec. ii., pp. 418, 419.

In the eleventh century the Roman Church had not decided concerning the nature and manner of Christ's presence in the eucharist. This appears evident from the three confessions of Berenger, signed by the order of three Councils, which confessions differed from each other, not only in the terms which were used, but also in the doctrines which they contained. Gregory was of opinion, that it was improper to pry too curiously into the mysteries of the eucharist, or into the manner in which Christ was said to be present there, and that it was more safe to adhere to the plain words of Scripture; and as this also was Berenger's opinion, the Pope pronounced him innocent; but he was evidently intimidated by the clamorous Council, and compelled to yield to their fury. Indeed, there is every reason to believe that the Pope was one in faith with Berenger on the very article for which the latter was condemned.

In the commencement of the eleventh century, Ælfric, Archbishop of Canterbury, in his Saxon Homily, also maintained the doctrine of Bertram, and nearly in his own words. In a letter to Wulffine, Bishop of Shyrburne, he says, "That housel" (that is, sacrament) "is Christ's body, not bodily, but spiritually; not the body which he suffered in, but the body of which he spake, when he blessed the bread and wine to housel the night before his suffering, and said by the blessed bread, 'This is my body.'" And in writing to Wulfstane, the Archbishop of York, he said, "The Lord halloweth daily, by the hand of the Priest, bread to his body, and wine to his blood, in spiritual mystery, as we read in books. And yet notwithstanding, that lively bread is not bodily so, nor the self-same body that Christ suffered in."* From these quotations it is evident that at that period transubstantiation had made but little progress in England.

7. In the time of Peter Lombard, Master of the Sentences, A. D. 1160, it appears that transubstantiation was not fully established or understood. This will be manifest by the following quotation from his writings:—"If it be inquired what kind of conversion it is, whether it be formal or substantial, or of another kind, I am not able to determine: I only know that it is not formal, because the same accidents remain, the same colour and taste. To some it seems to be substantial: they say that the substance is changed into the substance, and that it is done essentially; to which the former authorities seem to consent. But to this sentence others oppose these things: If the substance of bread and wine be substantially converted into the body and blood of Christ, then every day some substance is made the body and blood of Christ, which before was not the body; and to-day something is Christ's body which yesterday was not; and every day Christ's body is increased, and is made of such matter of which it was not made in the conception."† These words, which were written about fifty years before the doctrine decreed in the Lateran Council, prove that it was then new, and not that of the Church. During the period in which Lombard flourished, four opinions appear to have been entertained and disputed. The first was that of consubstantiation; the second, that the substance of bread is made the flesh of Christ, but ceases not to be what it was; the third, that the substance of bread is not converted, but annihilated; and the fourth was the doctrine of transubstantiation, confusedly held, and variously defended and explained.

8. We have seen that the opinions of the Doctors of the Church concerning the manner in which the body and blood of Christ were present in the eucharist, were numerous and varied; and that the Church had not determined, by any clear and positive decree, her views concerning this doctrine. Pope Innocent III. pronounced the very opinion which is now embraced by the hierarchy of Rome. He summoned a Council, consisting of four hundred and twelve Bishops in person, about eight hundred Abbots and Priors, and a large number of deputies of the absent Bishops and of the Chapters. The Council met in the church of St. Saviour de Lateran, November, 1215. The Pope read seventy canons or decrees, which he had prepared; and, without any deliberation, debate, or voting on the part of the Council, he caused these decrees to pass as the decisions of that body. To prove that we do not misrepresent the case, we quote the words of the Roman Catholic historian, Du Pin, in his record of this assembly: "It is certain," says he, "that these canons were not made by the Council, but by Innocent III., who presented them to the Council ready drawn up, and ordered them to be read; and that the Prelates did not enter into any debate upon them, but that their silence was taken for an approbation."*

* Usher's Works, vol. iii., Answer to a Challenge, &c., p. 88. 8vo. edit. Taylor's Works, vol. x., Of the Real Presence of Christ in the Holy Sacrament, sect. xii., p. 98. Heber's edit.

† Bishop Taylor's Works, vol. x., Dissuasive from Popery, chap. i., sect. iii., p. 156. 8vo. edit.

The decree on transubstantiation is as follows:—"The body and blood of Christ are contained really in the sacrament of the altar, under the species of bread and wine; the bread being transubstantiated into the body of Jesus Christ, and the wine into his blood, by the power of God."† A singular reason for this wonderful doctrine of transubstantiation has been assigned: "That we might receive of Christ's nature what he had received of ours." The word "transubstantiation" was first used by Stephen, Bishop of Augustodunum, about 1100; which so pleased Innocent, that he inserted it in the decrees which he proposed to the Council. These decrees or canons, though not ordained by that assembly, obtained authority by being inserted among the decretals of Gregory IX., which was done, not in the name of the Council, but in that of Pope Innocent. They were first published under the name of the Lateran Council in 1538, by John Cochlæus. But the article on transubstantiation was determined in Rome by a conclave of fifty-four Bishops, thirty-six years after the nominal Council of Lateran. It was therefore the Council of Trent, in 1551, which authoritatively established the doctrine.‡

[* Du Pin's Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii., p. 449. Fol. edit., Dublin.]

† "Cujus corpus et sanguis in sacramento altaris sub speciebus panis et vini veraciter continentur; transubstantiatis pane in corpus, et vino in sanguinem potestate divina."—Concil. Lateran. IV., cap. i.; Labb. Conc., tom. xi., pars i., p. 145. Paris, 1671.

[‡ Cardinal Bellarmine grants that transubstantiation was not imposed as an article of faith until a Council of Rome, under Gregory VII., in the year 1073; (de Euch., lib. iii., cap. 23;) which Council he concludes Duns Scotus had not read. But surely at that time this dogma could only have been a matter of private opinion amongst some few; for Peter Lombard, who lived sixty-seven years after Pope Gregory VII., and who was esteemed the master of the Roman Schoolmen, when he had laboured to resolve all doubts, especially in this very question; namely, Whether the conversion were substantial or not; confesses plainly, as stated above, definire non sufficio, "I am not able to determine." (Peter Lombard, Senten., lib. iv., Distinct. ii., Ed. 1477.) Hitherto, therefore, this article of faith was but in embryo, which obliged the learned and subtle Doctor, Duns Scotus, to fix its birth at a later period, and to affirm that the doctrine of transubstantiation was no article of faith before the Council of Lateran, under Pope Innocent III., A.D. 1215; and, therefore, Bellarmine taxes the deeply-read and "acute" Scotus with "deficient reading." But the Jesuit Costerius, and Cardinal Perron, must be also as ignorant of ancient learning, or else they gave little credit to the Council under Gregory VII., cited by Bellarmine: for Costerius says in direct terms, that "the name of transubstantiation was used in the Council of Lateran for the more clear explanation of that wonderful matter; that Christians might understand the substance of bread converted into the substance of the body of Christ" (Coster. Euch., cap. 8. sect. De Transub.) But Cardinal Perron more peremptorily concludes, that "if it had not been for the Council of Lateran it might be even now lawful to impugn it."

[Finally: "The direct tendency of the dogma of transubstantiation is to forward a design which is too obvious to be mistaken, and which seems to be inherent in all the main principles of the Popish Church,—the exaltation of the priesthood. It is easy to anticipate with what veneration those must be regarded whom it is believed God employs as the instruments of accomplishing, whenever they choose, one of the most awful and stupendous miracles. We do not say that we have in this the real origin of the dogma; but no one can deny that such a dogma is calculated to become an engine of tremendous power in the hands of an ambitious order of men. And can the fact be concealed that such it has actually been? Nay, it admits of no question, as a matter of history, that the dogma has been prostituted to worse than the purposes of ambition, and of worldly power; that it has been a tool in the hands of the grasping and the avaricious; and that the very mystery of the incarnation, and the very passion of the Redeemer, have been bought and sold for money!

["It has been said that Christianity needs some such dogma as this to form a cope-stone of glory to the system, and to connect and to unify us with God. It is this dogma (we lately heard it declared from the pulpit of a Popish chapel*) which wondrously renews that intercourse between the Creator and his creatures, which had been broken up by sin, and which incorporates us with God. And it may be granted, that, upon the supposition, Roman Catholics do indeed incorporate themselves with God, and that they do accomplish a union with God, but it is of a gross and material kind. It is not a harmony between the views and the affections of their minds, and the will and the heart of Christ; but it is a carnal and a monstrous union of their flesh and blood with the flesh and blood of Christ. Such a union we do not desire; and the very idea we hold to be not only absurd, but awfully blasphemous. But there is a glorious spiritual union between Christ in heaven and his people on earth, compared with which the mere animal incorporation of Roman Catholics is ineffably disgusting. There is a union of affection and of will,—an ardent love to Christ, on the one hand, and a delightful sense of His love to us on the other,—an intimate and endearing fellowship with Him in the exercise of religious affections by us, and in the communication of the tokens and expressions of love by Him! There is such a union and fellowship which is not only permitted, but which it is the very desire of Christ to establish. 'Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I WILL COME IN TO HIM, AND SUP WITH HIM, AND HE WITH ME.'"†]

(Cardinal Perron en sa Harangue au Tiers Etats, p. 33.) A plain acknowledgment that it was no article of faith previous to that Council, even as Scotus had before affirmed. But we will pursue this subject a little farther, and show that transubstantiation was not defined even in the Council of Lateran; for Platina tells us that many things were consulted upon in this Council, but that nothing was clearly determined, the Pope dying at Perusium. (Platina in vita Innocent. III., Edit. Colon., 1479.) And when we add that the supposed acts of this Council were not published till more than two hundred years afterwards, it is no wonder that some of the most learned Schoolmen, amongst whom are Scotus and Byel, held "transubstantiation not to be very ancient." And the celebrated Breerly, whose opinion was of great credit with the Romanists in England, says, "Complete transubstantiation" (that is, both for form and matter) "was not determined until the last Council of Trent, in the year 1560."]

["* The Preacher was the Rev. Dr. Wiseman.

[† Fletcher's Lectures on the chief Points in Controversy between Protestants and Roman Catholics, pp. 402—404.]

CHAPTER V.

SACRIFICE OF THE MASS.

1. THEIR doctrine defined. Council of Trent, and other authorities, &c., quoted: 2. Use of the word "sacrifice:" 3. The sacrifice of the mass not authorized by our Lord's institution, or any other passage of Scripture. Case of Melchizedec: 4. It is contrary to Scripture: 5. It is injurious to the sacrifice of Christ: 6. It is barbarous and inhuman: 7. Its celebration in Latin is unscriptural: 8. The Church of Rome makes the mass a matter of gain: 9. Extracts from the Missal.

1. To understand properly what the Roman Catholics mean by the sacrifice of the mass, we must bear in mind that they are taught, that in the sacrament of the eucharist are contained truly, really, and substantially, the body and blood, soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ; that is to say, the whole Christ; and that the celebration of the mass is offering him up to God as a propitiatory sacrifice, both for the living and the dead, in as true a manner as that in which he was offered on the cross at Jerusalem; and that it is equally meritorious. This doctrine the Church of Rome teaches as an article of faith, to which she requires the assent of every member on pain of eternal damnation. We shall quote the canons of the Council of Trent on this subject; and although the first and third contain the essence of the doctrine in question, we shall give the nine entire, inasmuch as one will aid in explaining the other.

"Canon (1.) If any one shall say, that a true and proper sacrifice is not offered to God in the mass; or that what is to be offered is nothing else than giving Christ to us to eat; let him be accursed.

"(2.) If any one shall say, that by these words, 'Do this for a commemoration of me,' Christ did not appoint his Apostles Priests, or did not ordain that they and other Priests should offer his body and blood; let him be accursed.

"(3.) If any one shall say that the mass is only a service of praise and thanksgiving, or a bare commemoration of the sacrifice made on the cross, and not a propitiatory offering; or that it only benefits him who receives it, and ought not to be offered for the living and the dead, for sins, punishments, satisfactions, and other necessities; let him be accursed.

"(4.) If any one shall say, that the most holy sacrifice of Christ, made on the cross, is blasphemed by the sacrifice of the mass; or that the latter derogates from the glory of the former; let him be accursed.

"(5.) If any one shall say, that to celebrate masses in honour of the saints, and in order to obtain their intercession with God, according to the intention of the Church, is an imposture; let him be accursed.

"(6.) If any one shall say, that the canon of the mass contains errors, and ought therefore to be abolished; let him be accursed.

"(7.) If any one shall say, that the ceremonies, vestments, and external signs, used by the Catholic Church in the celebration of the mass, are excitements to irreligion rather than helps to piety; let him be accursed.

"(8.) If any one shall say, that those masses in which the Priest only communicates sacramentally are unlawful, and therefore ought to be abolished; let him be accursed.

"(9.) If any one shall say, that the practice of the Roman Church, in uttering with a low voice part of the canon, and the words of consecration, is to be condemned; or that the mass should be celebrated in the vernacular language only; or that water is not to be mixed in the cup with the wine, when the sacrifice is offered, because it is contrary to Christ's institution; let him be accursed." *

[The mass is the Liturgy of the Popish Church, and, says Dr. Chaloner, "consists in the consecration of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, and the offering up of this same body and blood to God by the ministry of the Priest for a perpetual memorial of Christ's sacrifice upon the cross, and a continuation of the same until the end of the world." † High mass is the same service, accompanied by all the ceremonies which custom and authority have annexed to its celebration. Some have imagined that the word was derived from the Hebrew missach, which signifies, "a voluntary offering;" others, with greater appearance of correctness, from missio, or missa, alluding to the dismission of catechumens and others, who were not permitted anciently to be present at this service. "Ita missa est," said the officiating Minister, and immediately the congregation withdrew. The term thus employed was used in process of time to designate the service about to be performed: it was called missa, "the mass."

[The entrance of the absurdity of the mass into the holy place was not effected without strong remonstrances from many noble spirits who fearlessly testified against the abomination. The sanguinary persecutions raised in our own country against the Protestants in the days of that weak, worthless, and wicked woman, Queen Mary, were levelled chiefly against those who opposed the Popish doctrine of the mass. "It was not," as Dr. Adam Clarke justly observes, "because our fathers refused to obey the then constituted authorities of the state, that they were so cruelly and barbarously oppressed and murdered; it was not because they were not subject to every ordinance of man, not only for wrath, (that is, fear of punishment,) but for conscience' sake, that they had trial of cruel mockings, but because they believed concerning this divine ordinance, the eucharist, as Jesus Christ had

* "Canon (1.) Si quis dixerit, in missa non offerri Deo verum et proprium sacrificium, aut quod offerri non sit aliud, quam nobis Christum ad manducandum dari; anathema sit.

"(2.) Si quis dixerit, illis verbis, Hoc facite in meam commemorationem, Christum non instituisse Apostolos Sacerdotes; aut non ordinasse, ut ipsi aliique Sacerdotes offerrent corpus et sanguinem suum; anathema sit.

"(3.) Si quis dixerit, missæ sacrificium tantum esse laudis et gratiarum actionis, aut nudam commemorationem sacrificii in cruce peracti non autem propitiatorium; vel soli prodesse sumenti; neque pro vivis et defunctis, pro peccatis, pœnis, satisfactionibus, et aliis necessitatibus offerri debere; anathema sit.

"(4.) Si quis dixerit, blasphemiam irrogari sanctissimo Christi sacrificio in cruce peracto, per missæ sacrificium, aut illi per hoc derogari; anathema sit.

"(5.) Si quis dixerit, imposturam esse, missas celebrare in honorem sanctorum, et pro illorum intercessione apud Deum obtinenda, sicut Ecclesia intendit; anathema sit.

"(6.) Si quis dixerit, canonem missæ errores continere, ideoque abrogandum; anathema sit.

"(7.) Si quis dixerit, ceremonias, vestes, et externa signa, quibus in missarum celebratione Ecclesia Catholica utitur, irritabula impietatis esse magis, quam officia pietatis; anathema sit.

"(8.) Si quis dixerit, missas in quibus solus Sacerdos sacramentaliter communicat, illicitas esse, ideoque abrogandas; anathema sit.

"(9.) Si quis dixerit, Ecclesiæ Romanæ ritum, quo summissa voce pars canonis et verba consecrationis proferuntur, damnandum esse; aut lingua tantum vulgari missam celebrari debere; aut aquam non miscendam esse vino in calice offerendo, eo quod sit contra Christi institutionem; anathema sit."—Concil. Trid., sess. xxii. De Sacrificio Missæ.

† The Catholic Christian instructed, p. 78.

taught them, and boldly refused to prefer the ignorance of man, to the wisdom and authority of God.

[" The abomination which maketh desolate had got into the holy place. The state, corrupt and languid in every department, had resigned the administration of all affairs into the hands of a Church illiterate and profligate beyond all example and precedent. In this awful situation of affairs, the genuine followers of God showed themselves at once, not in opposition to a tyrannical government, but in opposition to a corrupt and unprincipled priesthood. They would not, because they could not, believe that a little flour and water, kneaded together and baked in an oven, or any where else, were the body and blood of the Saviour of the world, the God who made the heavens and the earth, and the only object of religious adoration. 'Away,' said the murderous Priests, 'with such fellows from the earth! they are not fit to live; let them have judgment without mixture of mercy, and anticipate their final damnation by perishing in the flames.' And they, rather than defile their conscience or deny their God, embraced death in its most terrific forms, and, through the medium of Smithfield fires, were hurried into a distinguished rank among the noble army of martyrs! But their fall became the fall of the sanguinary power by which they were slaughtered; and the blood of these martyrs was the seed of the Church. In this most honourable conflict, besides the vast numbers who suffered by fines, confiscations, and imprisonment, not less than two hundred and seventy-seven persons fell a sacrifice to the ignorance, bigotry, and malevolence of the Papal hierarchy. Among these were, one Archbishop, four Bishops, twenty-one Clergymen, eight lay gentlemen, eighty-four tradesmen, one hundred husbandmen, fifty-five women, and four children, who were all burnt alive, and this with circumstances of cruelty and horror which surpassed the bloodiest persecutions of pagan antiquity! But they conquered! they were glorious in their death! and have handed down to us uncorrupted those living oracles, and that holy worship, which were their support and exultation in the dark and cloudy day."*

[Bishop Jewel, who had himself recently been delivered from the fearful chains of Popish superstition, preached an eloquent discourse at Paul's-Cross in 1560, in which he sounded forth a challenge to all the supporters of the Papal heresy; but to which no response was made. "If," said he, "any learned man of all our adversaries, or if any learned men who are alive, be able to bring any one sufficient sentence, out of any one Catholic Doctor or Father, or out of any old General Council, or out of the holy Scriptures of God, or any one example of the primitive church, whereby it may be clearly and plainly proved, that there was any private mass, at that time, in the whole world, or that the people were then taught to believe, that Christ's body is really, substantially, corporally, carnally, or naturally in the sacrament, I promise them that I will give over, and subscribe to him. But I am well assured that they shall never be able truly to allege one sentence; and because I know it, therefore I speak it, lest you haply should be deceived."† It is sufficient to add, that the good Bishop died a Protestant.

[When Papists are pressed in argument on these topics, they are accustomed to deny the authority of individual writers, however great, and even of those Catechisms which are recommended by the Priests, and are in general and daily use. The Douay Catechism does not use the word "propitiatory;" and therefore a Papist, when assailed by a Protestant, may disavow the doctrine as not in his Catechism. On the other hand, should he be accused, by one of his own brethren, of not holding that fundamental doctrine of his Church, namely, that the mass is a real propitiatory sacrifice, he will get out of his difficulty by referring to his Catechism, in which the mass is declared to be the very same sacrifice which Christ offered upon the cross, and which is allowed on all hands to be propitiatory.

[" The sacrifice of the mass," says Prebendary Payne, "is the most considerable part of the worship of the Romish Church: it is their juge sacrificium, their daily and continual offering, and the principal thing in which their religion does consist. It is, they tell us, of the greatest profit and advantage to all persons, and I am sure the Priests make it so to themselves; for by this alone, a great number of them get their living, by making merchandise of the holy sacrament, and by selling the blood of Christ at a dearer rate than Judas did. The saying of masses keeps the Church of Rome more Priests in pay, than any Prince in Christendom can maintain soldiers, and it has raised more money by them than the richest bank or exchequer in the world was ever owner of. It is indeed the truest patrimony of their Church, and has enriched it more than any thing else. It was that which founded their greatest monasteries, and their richest abbeys; and it had well-nigh brought all the estates of the kingdom into the Church, had not the Statute of Mortmain put a check to it. The donation of Constantine, were it ever so true, and the grants of Charles and Pepin, were they ever so large, and the gifts of all their benefactors put together, are infinitely outdone by it. The gain of it has been so manifestly great, that one cannot but on that account suspect its godliness."*

[In corroboration of the opinions promulgated by the conciliar assembly of Trent, and also in illustration of the views entertained by the Papistry in general, of the sacrifice of the mass, we quote from their standard authorities verbatim et literatim; and refer, in the first place, to their established Catechisms,—those forms of instruction by means of questions and answers, by which juvenile minds are initiated into an acquaintance with various articles of faith and practice; beginning with the Douay Catechism:—

[" Q. Is the eucharist a sacrament only? A. No; it is also a sacrifice. Q. What is a sacrifice? A. It is a supreme act of religion due to Almighty God. Q. How is this performed? A. By offerings made to him in testimony of his being the Sovereign Lord of all things. Q. In what did the sacrifice of the old law consist? A. Chiefly in bloody sacrifices of beasts, which the Priests offered in the temple, as figures of Christ's sacrifice on the cross, which was then to come. Q. In what consists the sacrifice of the new law? A. In the voluntary and bloody oblation which Christ made to his eternal Father by dying on the cross for our redemption. Q. But this is past; how have we now any sacrifice in the new law? A. By the standing memorial and continuance of it in the blessed eucharist. Q. Why do you say that the eucharist is a standing memorial of Christ's sacrifice upon the cross? A. Because Christ at his last supper commanded it should be offered as a remembrance of his passion to the end of the world, and this is what is performed in the sacrifice of the mass. Q. Why is it a continuation of Christ's sacrifice? A. Because Jesus Christ, who is a Priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedek, having offered himself once in a bloody manner on the altar of the cross, continues daily to offer himself by the ministry of his Priests, in an unbloody manner, under the form of bread and wine. So that the sacrifice offered upon the cross, and the sacrifice of the mass, are one and the same, and differ only in the manner of offering. Q. What, therefore, is the mass? A. It is the sacrifice of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, under the form of bread and wine, in memory of his death and passion for the remission of sins. Q. Who said the first mass? A. Jesus Christ. Q. When did he say it? A. At the last supper, when he instituted the holy eucharist. Q. To whom is the sacrifice of the mass offered? A. To God only. Q. Is it not sometimes offered to the saints? A. No; masses are sometimes said in honour and memory of the saints, in thanksgivings to God for the benefits he has been pleased to bestow upon them, and that they, joining their prayers to ours, may intercede for us in heaven, whose memory we celebrate here on earth. Q. What benefit receive we by this sacrifice? A. It is a daily application of the merits of Christ for the relief of our necessities, by laying before the eternal Father the infinite value of his Son's bitter passion. Q. What are the benefits the living receive by it? A. They are many; 1. It applies the merits of our Saviour's passion for the remission of our sins. 2. It procures new graces and blessings for us, by virtue of the said passion. 3. It is the most acceptable offering we can make to Almighty God in thanksgivings for all his benefits. Q. Does it avail the faithful departed? A. It is not to be doubted, as St. Augustine says, by this wholesome sacrifice which is offered for them, they are so far helped, as to be treated with more mercy than their sins deserve. Q. Is it not a prejudice to the faithful that the mass is said in an unknown tongue? A. No; for the mass contains only those prayers which the Priest is alone commanded to say, as the Mediator between God and his people."

[* Sermons by Adam Clarke, LL.D., &c., vol. iii., pp. 141, 142. 8vo. edit.

[† Salter's-Hall Lectures against Popery, vol. i., Appendix.

[* Payne's Discourse of the Sacrifice of the Mass, quoted in M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. ii., p. 89. Tenth edit.

[From this long extract we discover what is the most modified and moderate view which Papists give of this great act of their worship. The Douay Catechism does not say in plain words, that the mass is a real propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead, although as much is implied in the words which represent it as being the very same sacrifice that Christ offered on the cross, and in the words which it ascribes to Augustine, that the dead are so far helped by it, "as to be treated with more mercy than their sins deserve;" from which last expression it appears to be a doctrine held by Papists, that their sins deserve some mercy. The mass only helps them to more than they would otherwise receive. All the world is acquainted with the Popish doctrine of the merits of good works; and this doubtless is the first time that some of our readers are informed that they ascribe merit to their sins, and that these "deserve" mercy, although in a small degree, without the additional merit of the mass.

[Our next reference shall be to the "Catechism for the Use of all the Churches in the French Empire:" it was published in 1806, by the authority of the Emperor Napoleon, and was accompanied with the Bull of the Pope, and the Mandamus of the Archbishop of Paris. This document is even more explicit on the Popish notions of the sacrifice of the mass. Speaking of the souls of the dead, it is asked and answered:—"Q. Are these souls anywise relieved by this sacrifice? A. Yes; they are very much relieved. Q. Why? A. Because in it Jesus Christ is offered as the common propitiation for all mankind." The fact is asserted still more plainly in the "Grounds of Catholic Doctrine," contained in the profession of faith, published by Pope Pius IV., in which we read as follows:—"Q. What is the Catholic doctrine as to the mass? A. That in the mass, there is offered unto God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead. Q. What do you mean by the mass? A. The consecration and oblation of the body and blood of Christ, under the sacramental veils or appearances of bread and wine. So that the mass was instituted by Christ himself at his last supper. Christ himself said the first mass, and ordained that his Apostles, and their successors, should do the like. 'Do this in remembrance of me.' Q. What do you mean by a propitiatory sacrifice? A. A sacrifice for obtaining mercy, or by which God is moved to mercy." There is an error in this last expression distinct from the error of the mass, and which we might briefly notice did we not wish to give an unbroken exhibition of the views entertained by Popish authorities on this subject.

["The Catechism of the Council of Trent, published by command of Pope Pius V.," is a standard and authorized exposition of the doctrines of Papal Rome: there we read, "We confess that the sacrifice of the mass is one and the same sacrifice with that upon the cross: the victim is one and the same, Christ Jesus, who offered himself, once only, a bloody sacrifice on the altar of the cross. The bloody and unbloody victim is still one and the same, and the oblation of the cross is daily renewed in the eucharistic sacrifice, in obedience to the command of our Lord, 'This do for a commemoration of me.' The Priest is also the same Christ our Lord: the Ministers who offer this sacrifice consecrate the holy mysteries not in their own but in the person of Christ. This the words of consecration declare: the Priest does not say, 'This is the body of Christ,' but, 'This is my body;' and thus invested with the character of Christ, he changes the substance of the bread and wine, into the substance of his real body and blood. That the holy sacrifice of the mass, therefore, is not only a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, or a commemoration of the sacrifice of the cross, but also a sacrifice of propitiation, by which God is appeased and rendered propitious, the Pastor will teach as a dogma defined by the unerring authority of a General Council of the Church. As often as the commemoration of this victim is celebrated, so often is the work of our salvation promoted, and the plenteous fruits of that bloody victim flow in upon us abundantly through this unbloody sacrifice."*

[In a work entitled, "Holy Altar and Sacrifice explained," by the Rev. Father Pacificus Baker, of the Order of St. Francis, we find the following:—"Many are the spiritual graces and benefits which the devout Christian gains by seriously attending to, and assisting at, this holy sacrifice. 1. By the sacrifice of the mass, the fruits of Christ's bloody sacrifice of himself on the altar of his cross are applied to our souls; this sacrifice of the mass being the same with that on the cross, differing only in the manner. On the cross Christ offered himself in a bloody manner, shedding every drop of his sacred blood as a sacrifice of redemption for mankind. In the mass he offers himself by the ministry of the Priest in an unbloody manner. Hence the mass is called by the holy Fathers, an incruental, or 'unbloody sacrifice,' as it is one and the same host, (or body,) and the same offerer now, by the ministry of the Priest, who offered himself on the cross, differing only in the manner of offering, the fruits of which unbloody oblation are here most plentifully received. 2. The mass is latreutical, that is, a holocaust, or oblation offered to God in acknowledgment of his supreme majesty and dominion over us, worshipping him herein with divine worship due to him alone, and not to any creature, how excellent and perfect soever. 3. It is an eucharistical sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving for, as well as commemoration of, the inestimable benefit of Christ's passion, and of praise and thanksgiving for all the blessings we have received, spiritual and temporal. 4. It is an impetratory sacrifice, by which we may obtain whatever we ask, if we ask as we ought, according to what our Saviour says, 'Ask, and you shall receive.' For the Father will not deny what we ask in his Son's name, much less when we ask by his Son, who is here offered to him. With him he has given us all things. With him he will refuse us nothing. 5. It is a propitiatory sacrifice, by which we may obtain pardon of our sins, and of our daily failings and offences against God, by the merits of Christ's passion, here received and offered up for us."* Here we may observe, en passant, that no real sacrifice ever made on earth contained so many things, as are here ascribed to the mass, not even the sacrifice of Christ upon the cross. That certainly was not unbloody, nor incruental, as the Rev. Father says that of the mass is; and we question very much the propriety of calling the sacrifice of Christ eucharistical. If the mass, then, has two ingredients, which the sacrifice of Christ had not, it is absurd to call it the very same sacrifice. The sacrifice of Christ was undoubtedly propitiatory; and one of the principal errors of the Church of Rome on this subject, consists in ascribing the same character to their mass. But more of this anon.

[* Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 249, 250.

[Dr. Chaloner, in his "Catholic Christian instructed," asks, "Are the sacrifice of the cross, and that of the eucharist, the same sacrifice, or two distinct sacrifices?" and is answered, "They are the same sacrifice, because the victim is the self-same, namely, Jesus Christ. It was he that offered himself upon the cross. It is he that offers himself upon the altar. The only difference is the manner of the offering, because in the sacrifice of the cross Christ really died, and therefore that was a bloody sacrifice; in the sacrifice of the altar he only dies mystically, and therefore this is an unbloody sacrifice. I say, he dies mystically, inasmuch as his death is represented in the consecrating apart the bread and the wine, to denote the shedding of his sacred blood from his body at the time of his death."†

[Dr. John Milner, late Vicar Apostolic of the Midland District, declares, that "the servants of God under the law of nature and the written law, had perpetual sacrifices of animals to represent the death of Christ, and to apply the fruits of it to their souls. In the same manner Catholics have Christ himself really present, and mystically offered on their altars daily, for the same ends, but in a far more efficacious manner, and, of course, a true propitiatory sacrifice."* "We are represented," says this author in another place, "as idolaters, by worshipping bread and wine in the blessed sacrament, knowing at the same time as our adversaries do, that (Roman) Catholics hold, as an article of faith, that there is no bread nor wine in it, but only Jesus Christ, true God and true man."†

[We conclude this array of superstition and error by quoting a proposition of Berington and Kirk, in their work entitled, "The Faith of Catholics confirmed:" "Our Saviour, in leaving to us his body and blood, under two distinct species or kinds, instituted not only a sacrament, but also a sacrifice, a commemorative sacrifice, distinctly showing his passion and death until he come. For as the sacrifice of the cross was performed by a distinct effusion of his blood, so is that sacrifice commemorated in this of the altar by a distinction of the symbols. Jesus, therefore, is here given, not only to us, but for us; and the Church is thereby enriched with a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice, usually termed 'the mass;' propitiatory, we say, because, representing, in a lively manner, the passion and death of our Lord, it is peculiarly pleasing to our eternal Father, and thus more effectually applies to us the all-sufficient merits of the sacrifice of the cross."‡

[A full description of the manner in which the mass is celebrated in the Romish Church would be incompatible with the brevity of this work. Suffice it to say, that on the occasion of performing this ceremony, the officiating Priest is clothed with certain vestments, which are designed to be emblematical of the different circumstances connected with the last sufferings of the Redeemer. The altar is also arranged and fitted out with the same view, that it may in some sort represent the cross on which our Saviour was suspended. Upon the altar is the chalice or cup, which is to contain the wine mingled with a little water; and covering the cup is the patten or plate, intended to hold the cake or wafer. After an almost endless variety of forms, and movements, and prayers, and readings, the Priest goes to the altar, and, taking the cup containing the wine and water, with the wafer upon the cover, these having been before consecrated and transubstantiated into the body and blood of Christ, he raises his eyes and says, "Accept, O holy Father, Almighty and eternal God, this unspotted host, which I, thy unworthy servant, offer unto thee my living and true God, for my innumerable sins, offences, and negligences, and for all here present, as also for all faithful Christians, both living and dead, that it may avail both me and them unto life everlasting. Amen."§ And again: "Let the performance of my homage be pleasing to thee, O holy Trinity; and grant that the sacrifice which I, though unworthy, have offered up in the sight of thy majesty, may be acceptable to thee, and through thy mercy be a propitiation for me, and all those for whom it has been offered, through Christ our Lord."‖

[Throughout the Latin Church unleavened bread is used at mass. It is made thin and circular, and bears upon it either the figure of Christ, or the initials I. H. S., and is commonly called "the wafer." This is the real Christ of the Church of Rome, their God and Saviour, and object of worship. In reference to the manufacture of this contemptible monument of superstition and idola-

[* M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. ii., p. 92.
[† Catholic Christian instructed, p. 81.
[* End of Controversy, Letter xlix. † Ibid., Letter xliv.
[‡ Faith of Catholics confirmed, p. 263.
[§ Rock's Hierurgia, p. 25; Missale Romanum.
[‖ Hierurgia, p. 59; Missale Romanum.

try, the following statement of the Rev. Edward Nangle, in one of his letters to the notorious John M'Hale, Titular Archbishop of Tuam, is worthy of notice. He says: "The writer is personally acquainted with a poor woman in this country (Ireland) who was delivered from the influence of Popery in the following manner. A Friar one day came into her cabin, and after the usual salutations had passed between them, he called for a saucepan. Placing the vessel on the fire, with a little water in it, he took out of his pocket a paper containing some flour, which he poured into the saucepan, stirring it, as if, to use my informant's words, 'he was making stir-about.' When the paste was thickened to the consistence of wax, he ordered his hostess to provide him two smoothing-irons; and having pressed the paste between these instruments to the thinness of a wafer, he cut it into round pieces with a pair of scissors, and then, holding up one of the pieces, he said, 'When I have consecrated, whoever will not believe it to be the very body, blood, soul, and divinity of Jesus Christ, will be damned to all eternity.' It has been observed, that there is but a step between the sublime and the ridiculous: the transition from superstition to scepticism may be equally rapid: it was in the mind of the Friar's hostess,—he had passed the bound, and the spell was broken. 'I thought it,' said the woman, 'such folly and wickedness, to say that the things which the Friar carried in his pocket in a bit of paper, which I saw boiled in a saucepan on the fire, pressed out between two smoothing-irons, and clipped with scissors, was God, and that I should trust in it, and worship it, that I determined never to enter the chapel again.' The poor woman, notwithstanding much persecution, has adhered to her resolution; and I would advise my Roman Catholic countrymen to follow her example; for however Dr. M'Hale, and his more talented colleagues in the priesthood, may exhibit superior tact in the manufacture of the wafer-idol, and cast a cloud of mystery around the wheaten deity, by a more dexterous management of this hocus-pocus, yet their God is no better than the Friar's. The words of the Prophet are as applicable to the one as to the other: 'The workman made it, therefore it is not God.' (Hosea viii. 6.)"

[One word respecting the ceremonies and accompaniments of the mass. The vestments or robes used by the Priests at this service are of five different colours,—white, red, green, purple, and black. White is used on all feasts of our blessed Lord, the Virgin Mary, Bishops, Confessors; red, on the vigil of the Pentecost, the feasts of the holy cross, martyrs, and Apostles; green, on all Sundays from Trinity-Sunday to Advent, and a few other occasions; purple, on all Sundays in Advent, and on all Sundays from Septuagesima until Palm-Sunday, and occasionally at other times. Black is employed on Good-Friday, All-Souls-Day, and when mass is said for the dead. The dress of these performers is, to say the least of it, fantastical, and more becoming itinerant mountebanks, than individuals professing to be Ministers of Christ.

[Popish authorities tell us, that among the vestments, the amice, a linen veil which the Priest puts on, represents the covering put on Christ's face in the house of Caiaphas, when they smote him, and at every blow bade him prophesy who it was that struck him. The albe is a long white linen garment, representing the robe which, by Herod's command, was put upon our Saviour in mockery and derision. The girdle, used to tie the albe around the body of the Priest, represents the cord with which our Saviour was bound, when seized upon by the Jews. The maniple which the Priest puts upon his left arm, represents the cord which bound our Saviour to the pillar when he was scourged: the Priest, before he puts it on, kisses the cross which is in the centre of it. The stole represents the cord whereby he was led to be crucified: the Priest also uses it to represent his power of binding and loosing, which he professes to have received from Christ. And the chasuble, which is the last vestment which the Priest uses, represents the seamless coat of our Saviour, and the scarlet or purple robe in which the soldiers scornfully arrayed him. Picture to yourselves, if possible, an officiating Priest decorated in these gaudy and childish habiliments, parading in solemn mockery before an ignorant and superstitious throng, at a service which degrades the Saviour, and stultifies common sense, and you will acknowledge the mass to be a tragical and blasphemous theatrical representation of the crucifixion of our adorable Lord, in which the puppet-Priest is the chief actor. He professes to be habited like Christ, and to act like him. His retiring back three steps from the altar, and bowing, or, in other words, humbling himself, before the scene opens, is intended to signify the prostration of Christ in the garden of Gethsemane. "There is," however, as M'Afee justly observes, "confusion and a want of unity in the action of the drama. For if the wafer be Christ himself, he can require no representation, as he is truly present. The very actings of the Priest contradict the real presence; and as the one is a mere sham, or show, so is the other."* Dr. Chaloner says, "There are always lighted candles upon the altar during mass."† But why? Mass must be celebrated in the forenoon, when there can be no necessity for these tapers: the Priest and people require them not, for it is daylight; the wafer-god wants them not, for it has no eyes. "These lights," Dr. Chaloner says, "betoken our joy, and the glory of Christ, and denote the light of faith:" our Saviour, however, declares, "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." Again: the mass is celebrated in Latin, a tongue which the majority of the people do not understand, and consequently the service to them is altogether profitless and incomprehensible. An honest Hibernian being asked why the mass was celebrated in Latin, with considerable adroitness immediately replied, "And, faith, how can I tell, unless it is because the devil does not understand the Latin?" The whole ceremony is therefore pantomimical, unscriptural, blasphemously wicked, and absurd.

[With this ample description of the ceremony of the mass, a description exclusively drawn from Popish authorities,—of a ceremony so fanciful and irrational, mingled with fooleries which none but untutored Indians, just emerging from the shades of barbarism into civilized life, could tolerate or endure; a ceremony derogatory to the pure and holy character of the Deity, and degrading to the sublimity and grandeur, the simplicity and beauty, of the Gospel dispensation; we now proceed to bring the whole to the grand test-book of faith and practice, the Bible. The Papists have asked, "If sacrifices for sin were offered up by the Priests under the Mosaic law, notwithstanding the atonement which was to be made at the 'fulness of time' by the Redeemer himself, why may they not be continued in the Christian church now, although the Redeemer has actually made the atonement?" Now, to this we answer, 1. That the sacrifices under the law were divinely appointed; but there is no appointment of God for sacrifices in the literal sense of the term under the evangelical dispensation. 2. The sacrifices under the law were, in their own nature, true and proper sacrifices; for in them there was a living victim, actually slain for sin; but the mass is not in its nature a sacrifice at all, and it is not pretended that life is taken or that blood is shed. 3. The only reason why sacrifices were appointed under the law was this, the Messiah had not then appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. Those sacrifices were not of the smallest value in themselves. "It was impossible," says St. Paul, "that the blood of bulls or of goats could take away sin." Again: "Burnt-offering and offering for sin thou didst not desire;" that is, God took not pleasure in them, of themselves. "Then, said I," these are the words of the Redeemer, anticipating the time when, in the stead of all such sacrifices, he himself should die, "Lo, I come, in the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God." The ancient sacrifices answered one purpose, and one purpose alone,—they prefigured Christ. When the sins of an individual were confessed over the head of the Victim, it was not on any value that could attach to it that he was called to depend; but his duty was to look forward to the great atoning sacrifice of the Lamb of God. The reason, therefore, that such sacrifices were instituted was, not that they possessed the smallest efficacy in themselves, but only that Christ had not been offered up, and that the faith of men in this future sacrifice demanded something which should assist and encourage its operation. Accordingly, when Christ came, the very and the only reason of the existence of these sacrifices was entirely removed. These were the shadows, but this the substance; and when the substance had come, it was obviously involved, in the very nature of the case, that they and every thing of the kind should be for ever superseded. Who, then, does not perceive the monstrous folly, and presumption, and impiety, now that the substance has come, of going back to the shadows? now that light has shone, of attempting to darken it by a revival of the ceremonies, types, and other dumb pageantry of a dispensation that has been for ever set aside and abolished?

[* O'Connell and the Wesleyans, p. 65.
[† Garden of the Soul, p. 96.

[But overlooking for the present that the mass is an uncalled for and an unauthorized addition to the services of religion, an addition made by men, as if the ordinances of divine institution were incomplete and defective; it is in the very nature of things impossible that in it a true sacrifice can be offered up. A sacrifice, properly so called, is the solemn infliction of death upon a living animal, generally by the effusion of its blood, in a way of religious worship, and the presenting of this act to God, as a supplication for the pardon of sin, and a supposed mean of compensation for the insult and injury thereby offered to his majesty and government. But the Papists are in the habit of representing the mass as an "unbloody sacrifice," in opposition to the bloody sacrifice of the cross. The epithet, however, is without meaning, and involves a palpable contradiction; and because Protestants refuse to acknowledge positive contradictions as truth, they are most liberally and impudently cursed. And, pray, what is our crime? We will not believe a heap of self-contradictory assertions, opposed to the plain letter of Scripture, and some of which are acknowledged by the Papists themselves, to rest on no other authority than tradition, which tradition has never been produced or verified. The Church of Rome would compel us to acknowledge that a sacrifice wherein no blood has been shed, is one and the same with a sacrifice wherein blood was shed; that the words "blood" and "no blood" mean one and the same thing; that the vital fluid gushing and trickling from the temples, feet, and side of our Lord, is one and the same thing with the purple tide flowing undisturbedly and regularly through the uninjured arteries, and unopened veins; that a tortured and agonized body, nailed to a wooden cross, is one and the same with a wafer lying unmoved on the table. Because the Protestants of bloody Mary's day refused to credit this farrago of nonsense and absurdity, they were consigned to the flames of Smithfield; and we of the nineteenth century are doomed to the bitter pains of everlasting damnation; according to a practical maxim of Papal Rome: Heretics, when strong, are to be left to God; when weak, to be given to the executioner.

[Further, the Council of Trent tells us, that in the mass Christ is immolated, and yet that it is without the shedding of blood. These assertions are palpable contradictions. To immolate means to kill in sacrifice; that is, to shed blood. The Church of Rome, in the Vulgate edition of the Bible, which she deems infallible, has shown this to be the true meaning of the word "immolation." In Exodus xii. 6, the Latin word signifying "shall immolate" is used, which is thus translated in the Douay Bible: "And the whole multitude of the children of Israel shall sacrifice" (immolate) "it in the evening, and they shall take of the blood thereof." Does the Papal Church expect us to be credulous, where she is contradictory? Again: whilst the Council of Trent denies that blood is shed in the mass, it asserts that the sacrifice is truly propitiatory. The signification of propitiatory is, "that by which lost favour may be regained." By the sin of our first parents, we lost the image and the favour of God. By it we came under the sentence of the law, whose award is death: "In the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." "Sin is the transgression of the law," and "the wages of sin is death." Our lives are forfeited to divine justice. We have nothing satisfactory to plead in palliation of our guilt. We have nothing of ourselves to offer whereby we could stay the arm of divine vengeance. Present or future obedience cannot atone for past transgression; justice cannot forego its claims upon the criminal; holiness cannot be upheld without satisfaction being made for the guilty. Sin can only be commuted for, in divine transactions, by death; and life can only be bestowed on the condemned, after his substitute, having been put to death, has again been raised from the dead. "The life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul." (Lev. xvii. 11.) Our Lord Jesus "was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." (Rom. iv. 25.) "God hath set him forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; to declare, I say, at this time his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." (Rom. iii. 25, 26.) "He is the propitiation for our sins." (1 John ii. 2.) Through Christ alone we have access to the Father, through him we are renewed after the image of Him that created us, and spiritual and glorious life is bestowed upon us; in a word, in him we are freed from the curse and condemnation of the law. Yet these blessings we cannot possess, unless that "through his name, believing in him we receive remission of sins." (Acts x. 43.) But without shedding of blood there is no remission; consequently justice could be satisfied with nothing less than the suffering of death. This was intimated by the whole typical system of the law. The life of the victim was required in sacrifice, and, on this account, atonement could be made only by the effusion of blood, as the medium through which life circulated. A strangled beast was forbidden. Typical expiation was made by the warm life of the victim being poured out on the altar. The Popish assertion, therefore, that the sacrifice of the mass is propitiatory, and that through it we may obtain remission of sins, whilst at the same time there is no shedding of blood in it, stands in unmasked, barefaced opposition to the Scriptures of truth. For in the mass, where is the living victim? where is the life taken away? where is the blood shed? When Christ offered himself upon the cross for the sins of the world, it is admitted on all hands, that he endured inexpressible agonies of body and mind, that "he was wounded for our transgressions, bruised for our iniquities;" that the sins of men were laid upon him, as their substitute, and that he bore the punishment due to them; that his body was tortured and lacerated; that his soul was pierced with unknown anguish; that he suffered at the hands of men and devils; that, above all, he endured the agony of the wrath of his Father; and that, crushed and overwhelmed by an insupportable load of sorrows, he bowed his head and died. Now, in the mass, will it be pretended that the sufferings of the Redeemer are repeated, and that the scenes of Mount Calvary are again transacted? Is the body of Christ daily tortured and lacerated? Is his soul again wounded and agonized? Does he still endure, and every day endure, the wrath of his Father? Now, in the midst of his glory, has he to descend to the same profound abasement which he had once to encounter? and has he to conflict with the same thunders that once burst upon his head? Where is the cross? where the bleeding Lamb of God that was suspended upon it? Where the tears, the groans, the blood? Where the last convulsive struggles, that set free the soul, and left the body a lifeless trunk? The sacrifice of the mass is an empty sound, an enormous blasphemy. There can be no sacrifice, because there is no suffering.*

[Christ crucified is the only sacrifice of the Gospel. It is a divine sacrifice; for he offered himself. The High Priest among the Jews offered the bullock, the goat, and the lamb; but Christ offered himself. Numerous scriptures prove this: "Thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin." "Christ hath loved us, and given himself for us." "When he had by himself purged our sins, for ever sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high." The sacrifice of the mass cannot be the sacrifice of Christ, because the Priests are not the same who present it to God. Christ offered his own sacrifice, the Priests present that of the mass. Every Papist must acknowledge that either the host or the Priest is our Lord Jesus Christ. If the host be Christ, then it offers itself, and the Priest of Rome is a false, intermeddling, and impious creature for interfering in this matter. He has no right to be called a Priest. He is not one after the order of Aaron; for that priesthood is done away. He is not one after the order of Christ; because Christ can have no successor, seeing he ever lives in heaven, and executes his own office. The Popish Priest in this ministration, being neither the successor of Aaron nor of Christ as a Priest, it follows, that he is no Priest at all; and, consequently, as far as himself is concerned, there can be no sacrifice in the mass, because there is no Priest to present it. The host, therefore, is the only Priest on this occasion. If so, then it sprang from the tribe of Judah; it was born of the Virgin Mary; it suffered on the cross; it is after the order of Melchisedec; and hence it is without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life; because it never had any; a full proof of which we have, that after consecrat on it cannot offer itself. Is the host a Priest? then it cannot be Christ; for he has passed into the heavens, there to appear in the presence of God for us; but it (the host) abides on earth, and returns unto the dust whence it was taken, even after it has either been stolen or lost. The sacrifice of the mass has no Priest; and hence it is no sacrifice of any kind, much less the sacrifice of Christ.

["To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Do the sacred Scriptures sanction in any way the sacrifice of the mass? Christ certainly made no elevation of the host, and the Apostles did not worship the sacrament, and none of those actions were performed at the institution of the eucharist which necessarily constitute a sacrifice. But what say the Papists? Cardinal Bellarmine freely confesses all this, saying, "The oblation which follows consecration belongs to the integrity of the sacrifice, but not to its essence: this is proved by our Lord not having made any oblation, nor even his Apostles in the beginning, as we have demonstrated from Gregory." This is a most important concession on the part of this champion of Popery, by which the Cardinal would persuade us that Christ and his Apostles made a sacrifice without offering any thing; that is to say, he did not offer himself in sacrifice in the eucharist, but that the Romish Church now offers him in sacrifice, contrary to his own example, and that of his Apostles. Take another testimony from a Popish authority, on the unscriptural character of the mass. The Jesuit Salmeron, in the first book of his Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, gives an enumeration of certain unwritten traditions, in which he mentions "the ecclesiastical hierarchy, (that is to say, the Papal monarchy,) the worship of images, the mass, the mode of sacrifice, and the tradition that Jesus offered a sacrifice in bread and wine." One more: Cardinal Baronius, who makes a similar confession, acknowledges that the eucharistical sacrifice is an unwritten tradition, of which, consequently, there is no mention made in the Gospel. All these Doctors speaking thus, tacitly condemn the Council of Trent. Where, then, is the infallibility of the Church?]

Such is the Roman Catholic doctrine concerning the sacrifice of the mass.

2. In a certain sense, Protestants, in common with the ancient church, call the sacrament of the eucharist, as well as other portions of religious service, a sacrifice. The ancient church offered to God, at the celebration of the eucharist, a part of their substance; they presented also their prayers their praises, and themselves, as a reasonable sacrifice to God, at the same time in which they commemorated the sacrificial death of the Redeemer, through the merits of which they expected to obtain mercy. We offer up our alms, our praises, and ourselves, by virtue of the sacrifice of Christ which is brought before us by way of remembrance; and it would be difficult to prove that the primitive Christians did more than this. The celebration of the eucharist was their Christian sacrifice, and it is ours. Were the Church of Rome content with such sacrifice as this, we should have no complaint to bring against her. Instead of this, she has invented a sacrifice which Christ never instituted; which the Apostles never thought of, but to condemn; which the primitive church would have abhorred; and which we, if we would follow their faith and piety, must utterly reject. That the sacrifice of the mass is without any foundation in Scripture, nay, that it is contrary to holy writ, highly derogatory to the sacrifice of Christ, and in itself barbarous and inhuman, we can prove from Scripture, and by other invincible arguments.

[* Young's Lectures on the Controversy between Protestants and Roman Catholics, p. 148.]

3. It should be considered, that there is no foundation for the sacrifice of the mass either in our Lord's institution of the eucharist, or in any other passage of Scripture. Nothing that our Lord says has any reference whatever to the sacrifice of the mass. "He took bread and blessed it, he gave it to his disciples, saying, Do this in remembrance of me," &c. In this institution there is no intimation given that he should offer up himself, or that he commanded his church to offer him up to God the Father in the sacrament of the eucharist. Did our Saviour, at his last supper, present himself, body, soul, and divinity, a true sacrifice to God, or did he not? If not, how then shall we dare to pretend to offer him up in our sacrament? If he did, as the Roman Catholics say, to what purpose did he afterward expire upon the cross a sacrifice?

As it regards the other writers of the New Testament, although they do occasionally refer to this sacrament, we cannot conclude, from any thing they have said, that the doctrine of the mass is true. St. Paul's discourse to the Corinthians respecting things offered to idols is an effectual confutation of the Romish sacrifice. For it plainly shows that St. Paul considered the Christian communion not in the light of a sacrifice, as the idolatrous feasts were, but rather a feast upon a sacrifice.

The fact of Melchizedec's bringing forth bread and wine when he met Abraham after the discomfiture of the five Kings, has been brought forward as proof for the mass oblation. Melchizedec, they say, was the Priest of the most high God, and all Christian Priests are after his order; and as his priesthood consisted in offering up bread and wine, so must the Christian. This is the position which the Roman Catholics assume: how far it is tenable, the following arguments will show:—(1.) They cannot prove that Melchizedec's bringing forth wine was any act connected with his priestly office. It was rather one of hospitality to those persons, and not a sacrifice to God. (2.) Supposing he officiated as Priest, and offered up sacrifice to God, this can be of no use in the controversy, unless it can be proved that Christian Ministers succeed him in his priesthood, which cannot be done. We read that Christ was a Priest after the order of Melchizedec, but not a word is said that Christians are so likewise. Nay, the supposition that Melchizedec was a type of Christ will destroy every pretence to that order in Gospel Ministers. (3.) Admitting the Christian Clergy are the successors of Melchizedec, how does that give authority to them to offer up Christ to the Father in the communion? He offered up only bread and wine; but they profess to offer up the body and blood, the soul and divinity, of Christ, which certainly formed no part of Melchizedec's offering; and therefore what he did cannot give any sanction to the practices of the Church of Rome.

4. The Popish sacrifice of the mass has not only no foundation in Scripture, but is directly contrary to it.

Roman Catholics contend that Christ is offered up daily in the mass sacrifice. But the Scripture says that Christ was to be offered but once. St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, insists upon this; and herein he places the difference between the law and the Gospel,—that the sacrifices of the law being imperfect, and not able to put away sin, were every year to be repeated; (Heb. x. 1, 2;) but Christ, "by ONE offering, hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." (Verse 14.) And therefore he saith, "Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the High Priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others. For then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now ONCE in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. For as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment; so Christ was ONCE offered, to bear the sins of many." (Heb. ix. 25, &c.) Nothing can be plainer than that, according to St. Paul, Christ was to be offered but once; and yet the Priests offer him a thousand times every day.

Again, from these words, "Without shedding of blood is no remission," (Heb. ix. 22.) it follows, either that the sacrifice of the mass must be a bloody sacrifice, and so Christ's blood must be shed as often as he is offered in the mass; or else that it obtaineth no remission. They, however, tell us "that Christ's oblation on the cross was a bloody sacrifice, but that which is offered in the mass is without blood." To this we reply, (1.) That this exposition involves them in contradictions: they say, that the sacrifice of Christ in the mass is without shedding of blood; and also, that in every crumb of the bread, and in every drop of the wine, there is contained the blood, as well as the body, soul, and divinity, of Christ; and whosoever does not believe these two contradictory doctrines is cursed by the Council of Trent. (2.) If the sacrifice of the mass be a bloodless one, how can they assert that it is propitiatory, when St. Paul affirms, that "without shedding of blood is no remission?" (3.) Furthermore, their affirming that the consecrated wafer contains the whole Christ, embraces so many shocking absurdities, that we cannot in words describe the extravagance connected with the mass, except by transferring to it all the monstrosities connected with transubstantiation.

The sacrifice of the mass is also overthrown by these words: "By one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." For what necessity or advantage would there be in doing that again which is already perfectly and fully accomplished, and that for ever? Moreover, "where remission of sins is, there is no more offering for sin." If, after remission is granted to the sinner, his sins are remembered no more; and if Christ, by one sacrifice, "hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified;" then the sacrifice of the mass, about which the Romish Clergy employ themselves incessantly, and to which the laity trust for the pardon of their sins, in proportion to the number of masses which, either by favour, money, or legacies, they cause to be said for them after death, hath no foundation whatever in Scripture.

If they say that the mass is only a representation and commemoration of the death of Christ, they then virtually give up their cause, and at once renounce an article of their faith which was established by the Council of Trent, that declares the mass "to be a true and proper propitiatory sacrifice for sin." We repeat it, they give up the cause: for the representation and commemoration of a sacrifice cannot possibly be a sacrifice. In reference to the sacrifice of the mass, we can see neither proof, nor the possibility of proof, being forthcoming. For it not only supposes transubstantiation to be true, which we have proved to be false, but it is also at variance with two whole chapters of the Hebrews, namely, the ninth and the tenth.

5. In the third place, as the sacrifice of the mass is not only without support from, but absolutely against, the Scripture, so also it is derogatory to the complete and perfect propitiation of Christ, as it would deprive it of its dignity and value. If the original sacrifice of Christ once offered possessed all the efficacy that can be procured by a sacrifice, nothing is then left which can be accomplished by the second. It is altogether superfluous that the Priest should offer every day a propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead, when all necessary propitiation was made by the first. If the second be needful, it can only be on this account, that something was wanting to complete the first. Therefore there must either be no second oblation, or the second will be a reproach to the infinite value of the first; for it is grounded on the manifest supposition, that the original oblation of Christ on the cross was defective.

They attempt to get over this difficulty by saying, that "Christ's sacrifice on the cross was sufficient to obtain pardon for the sins of the whole world; but the sacrifice is to be repeated, in order that the benefits of the first sacrifice might be constantly applied." This is very little to the purpose; the notion of a propitiatory sacrifice is, to procure pardon for sin; if the sacrifice of Christ on the cross did that, what need is there of another? According to this notion, they should not call the sacrifice of the mass a propitiatory, but rather an applicatory, one. To assign to this the power of applying to believers the benefits of Christ's passion, involves a most erroneous principle. The way in which the Scripture declares those blessings to be applied to us, infers the performance of several conditions on our part.

6. The sacrifice of the mass is not only derogatory to the one, perfect, and final sacrifice of Christ, but it is also barbarous and inhuman; inasmuch as in this sacrifice the Priest pretends to offer up every day our Saviour to God, as really as he offered himself upon the cross. The absurdities contained in this monstrous idea have been sufficiently pointed out in the chapter on transubstantiation.

7. The celebration of the mass in Latin, or in an unknown tongue, is also contrary to Scripture. St. Paul said, "In the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue." (1 Cor. xiv. 19.) The testimony of the Apostle is in direct contradiction to the custom of celebrating mass in an unknown tongue. The voice of history is to the same purpose. Like the ancient wizards, who "peeped and muttered," the Roman Catholic Priest recites a considerable part of the service in a low, murmuring voice, entirely unintelligible to the people. If it be said that they are allowed the use of translations, it may be replied that those translations comprise only detached portions of the service, and that it is obviously impracticable to derive any benefit from them during the time of worship. The rapid succession of ceremonies, the frequent changes of posture, the constant appeal to the senses, cannot but divert the attention, and present an insuperable obstacle to all attempts of the kind; to say nothing of the difficulty of reading to advantage, while at the same time the service is being carried on in another tongue. Of this Roman Catholic instructers are fully aware. Their books of devotion contain no directions for the use of a translated Missal, but rather aim to recommend what is termed spiritual communion, that is, meditation on what the Priest is supposed to be saying.

8. The sacrifice of Christ has this glorious peculiarity, that all the benefits of it are bestowed gratuitously; whereas the Church of Rome requires her members to pay immense sums of money for her mass sacrifice. The Priest professes to offer the body and blood of Christ in sacrifice daily, but no sinner can receive the benefit of it without payment. The Clergy of Rome profess to have entirely in their possession the sacrifice of Christ, and to apply it to the benefit of particular persons, or withhold it, as they may judge proper: for if they do not intend to apply it to particular persons, it is not applied; if otherwise, then it is applied. The efficacy of any mass for the pardon of the sins of the people depends upon the intention of the Priest. This being the case, it will be found necessary to get the good-will of the Priest; and that this may be secured, their exorbitant exactions for saying masses can testify. The language of Scripture is the following:—"Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk, without money and without price." (Isai. lv. 1.) "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." (Rev. xxii. 17.) This is the true character of kindness and mercy, and is therefore worthy of God; but to expose spiritual blessings for sale, and extort money for them, is worthy only of such corrupted religion.

9. The following extracts from the Roman Missal will furnish a complete refutation of the mass. We leave this without comment, as the shocking profanation and superstition manifest in this infallible decision of the Roman Church must appear clear to all.

"RESPECTING DEFECTS OCCURRING IN THE MASS.

"Mass may be defective in the matter to be consecrated, in the form to be used, and in the officiating Minister. For if in any of these there be any defect, namely, due matter, form, with intention and priestly orders in the celebration, no sacrament is consecrated.

"Of defects in the bread.

"If the bread be not of wheat, or, if of wheat, it be mixed with such quantity of other grain that it doth not remain wheaten bread, or if it be in any way corrupted, it doth not make a sacrament.

"If it be made with rose or other distilled water, it is doubtful if it make a sacrament.

"If it begin to corrupt, but is not corrupted; also if it be not unleavened, according to the custom of the Latin Church, it makes a sacrament, but the Priest sins grievously.

"If a consecrated host should disappear, either by accident, by wind, or miracle, or be devoured by some animal, and cannot be found, then let another be consecrated.

"Of defects in the wine.

"If the wine be quite sour or putrid, or be made of bitter or unripe grapes, or if so much water be mixed with it as spoils the wine, no sacrament is made.

"If, after consecration of the body, or even of the wine, the defect of either kind be discovered, one being consecrated; then if the matter which should be placed cannot be had, he must proceed.

"The defects of the Minister.

"The defects on the part of the Minister may occur in those things required in him: these are, first and especially, intention, after that disposition of soul, adjustment of the body, disposition of garments, and disposition in the service itself, as to those matters which can occur in it.

"The defect of intention.

"If any one intend not to consecrate, but to counterfeit; also if any wafers remain forgotten on the altar, or if any part of the wine or any wafer lie hid, when he did not intend to consecrate but what he saw; also if he shall have before him eleven wafers and intended to consecrate but ten only, not determining what ten he meant; in all these cases there is no consecration, because intention is required.

"Defects occurring in the celebration itself.

"If, after consecration, a gnat, a spider, or any such thing, fall into the chalice, and if it produce nausea to the Priest, let him draw it out and wash it with the wine; and when mass is concluded, let him burn it, and let him throw the ashes and the washings into a sacred place. But if there is no nausea, and he fears none, let him swallow it with the blood.

"If poisonous matter should fall into the cup, or any thing that would cause a vomiting, let the consecrated wine be put in another cup, and other wine with water be again placed to be consecrated; and when mass is finished, let the blood be poured on linen cloth or tow, and remain till dry, and then let the tow be burned, and the ashes cast into a holy place.

"If any poisonous matter touch the consecrated host, then let the Priest consecrate another and receive it in the proper manner, and let the poisoned one be preserved in a box, in a separated place, until the species be corrupted, and then let the corrupted species be thrown into a sacred place.

"If in winter the blood be frozen in the cup, put warm clothes about the cup; if that will not do, let it be put into boiling water near the altar till it be melted, taking care it does not come into the cup.

"If any of the blood of Christ fall on the ground or table by negligence, it must be licked up with the tongue, the place must be thoroughly scraped, and the scrapings burned; but the ashes must be buried in holy ground.

"If the Priest vomit the eucharist, and the species appear entire, they must be reverently swallowed, unless nausea prevent; and in that case the consecrated species must be cautiously separated from the vomit, and laid by in some sacred place until they be corrupted, and afterward they are to be thrown into a sacred place; but if the species do not appear, the vomit must be burned, and the ashes thrown into a sacred place."*

* "DE DEFECTIBUS IN CELEBRATIONE MISSARUM OCCURRENTIBUS.

"Potest autem defectus contingere ex parte materiæ consecrandæ, et ex parte formæ adhibendæ, et ex parte Ministri conficientis. Quidquid enim horum deficit, scilicet materia debita, forma cum intentione, et ordo sacerdotalis in conficiente, non conficitur sacramentum.

"De defectu panis.

"Si panis non sit triticeus, vel si triticeus admixtus sit granis alterius generis in tanta quantitate ut non maneat panis triticeus, vel sit alioqui corruptus, non conficitur sacramentum.

["The doctrine which we have discussed naturally leads to great immoralities; to idolatry, cruelty, and profaneness. It is not a mere abstract speculation which rests in the mind, but it affects the practice. The bread and wine being supposed to be changed into the body and blood of Christ, is adored with the supreme worship which is given to the true God,* by solemn prayer, the lowest prostrations, and highest marks of homage. Now, whatever worship is due to the body of Christ, together with his soul and divinity, if it appears from what has been said, that there is no such thing, or any body of Christ in the sacrament at all, but only bread and wine, set apart in commemoration of it; then it must be acknowledged, that all this homage and devotion is misplaced, and is worshipping a mere creature, and without any warrant and appointment, which is the true notion of idolatry. And though I know it is said, that however in that case, it is only simple error, and not idolatry, because the homage is designed to be paid to Christ, and not to bread and wine; that then, indeed, they are mistaken, but not idolaters; yet I think we justly charge the "Si sit confectus de aqua rosacea, vel alterius distillationis, dubium est an conficiatur.

"Si cœperit corrumpi, sed non sit corruptus; similiter si non sit azymus, secundum morem Ecclesiæ Latinæ; conficitur, sed conficiens graviter peccat.

"Si hostia consecrata dispareat, vel casu aliquo, aut vento, aut miraculo, vel ab aliquo animali accepta, nequeat reperiri; tunc altera consecretur.

"De defectu vini.

"Si vinum sit factum penitus acetum, vel penitus putridum, vel de uvis acerbis, seu non maturis expressum, vel ei admixtum tantum aquæ ut vinum sit corruptum, non conficitur sacramentum.

"Si post consecrationem corporis, aut etiam vini, deprehenditur defectus alterius speciei, altera jam consecrata; tunc si nullo modo haberi possit, procedendum erit.

"De defectibus Ministri.

"Defectus ex parte Ministri possunt contingere quoad ea quæ in ipso requiruntur. Hæc autem sunt: in primis intentio, deinde dispositio animæ, dispositio corporis, dispositio vestimentorum, dispositio in ministerio ipso quoad ea quæ in ipso possunt occurrere.

"De defectu intentionis.

"Si quis non intendit conficere, sed delusorie aliquid agere: item si aliquæ hostiæ ex oblivione remaneant in altari, vel aliqua pars vini, vel aliqua hostia lateat, cum non intendat consecrare nisi quas videt: item si quis habeat coram se undecim hostias, et intendat consecrare solum decem, non determinans quas decem intendit, in his casibus non consecrat, quia requiritur intentio.

"De defectibus in ministerio ipso occurrentibus.

"Si post consecrationem ceciderit musca, aut aliquid ejusmodi, et fiat nausea sacerdoti, extrahat eam, et lavet cum vino; finita missa, comburat, et combustio ac lotio hujusmodi in sacrarium projiciatur. Si autem non fuerit ei nausea, nec ullum periculum timeat, sumat cum sanguine.

"Si aliquod venenosum ceciderit in calicem, vel quod provocaret vomitum, vinum consecratum reponendum est in alio calice, et aliud vinum cum aqua apponendum denuo consecrandum; et, finita missa, sanguis repositus in panno linteo vel stuppa tamdiu servetur donec species vini fuerint desiccatæ, et tunc stuppa comburatur et combustio in sacrarium projiciatur.

"Si aliquod venenatum contigerit hostiam consecratam, tunc alteram consecret, et sumat eo modo quo dictum est; et illa servetur in tabernaculo, in loco separato, donec species corrumpantur, et corruptæ deinde mittantur in sacrarium.

"Si in hieme sanguis congeletur in calice, involvatur calix in pannis calefactis; si id non proficerit, ponatur in fervente aqua prope altare, dummodo in calicem non intret donec liquefiat.

"Si per negligentiam, aliquid de sanguine Christi ceciderit, seu quidem super terram seu super tabulam, lingua lambatur, et locus ipse radatur quantum satis est, et abrasio comburatur; cinis vero in sacrarium recondatur.

"Si Sacerdos evomet eucharistiam, si species integræ appareant, reverenter sumantur, nisi nausea fiat; tunc enim species consecratæ caute separentur, et in aliquo loco sacro reponantur donec corrumpantur, et postea in sacrarium projiciantur; quod si species non appareant, comburatur vomitus, et cineres in sacrarium mittantur."
—Missale Romanum, De Defectibus Missæ.

["* Conc. Trid., sess. xiii., c. 5."

opinion and practice with idolatry; for I meddle not with the persons of men, at least, till they have fairly answered our arguments, and sufficiently supported their own, because it has the nature of idolatry in it, and is worshipping a creature, to be sure, as much as worshipping by mistake an unconsecrated host, which some of their own writers allow to be so: and their intention will not alter the nature of things, whatsoever abatement it may be of the crime. Besides that, this would justify the Jewish and heathen idolatry, which is so severely condemned in the Scripture, and is contrary to one great design of Christianity, which was to bring men to the worship of the true God, and banish all idolatry out of the world; to turn men from idols to serve the living and true God. I am sure so many things are required, in the qualification and intention of the Priest, and the qualities of the bread, to make the consecrated host a proper object of adoration, that it must needs, upon their own principles, be full of hazard and almost impossible to be secure from the danger of it. And that cannot be a safe way of religion which is liable to so great an evil in their daily worship.

["And certainly it is the greatest instance of inhumanity to eat the flesh and blood of any human person, and much more of the Saviour of the world; and especially in the case of the Virgin Mary, who, if she ever communicated, which I suppose will not be denied, did eat the flesh and blood of her own child; as Saturn is fabled by the heathen poets, to have devoured his own children; besides the numberless lives which have been sacrificed to this idol, and the altars stained with the blood of martyrs. The great symbol of union and love has been made an engine of hatred and violence, of the most unchristian anathemas, and inhuman cruelties, in many parts of the world, in former and later ages.

["And it is the highest instance of profanation, to eat the real body of Christ, his very flesh and blood, which then must partly turn into the nourishment of the body, and partly go into the draught; which is too horrid to bear a thought, or admit an aggravation."*]

CHAPTER VI.

HALF COMMUNION.

1. The doctrine stated. Council of Constance quoted. Trent quoted: 2. The Church of Rome, by her doctrine, has mutilated the sacrament: 3. Half communion is contrary to the institution of Christ: 4. The very nature of the eucharist requires both kinds: 5. Without the cup there is no sacrament: 6. The primitive church administered in both kinds: 7. Strictures on the reasons which the Church of Rome gives for this practice.

1. Transubstantiation and communion in one kind are ingeniously connected together. Roman Catholics believe that Christ whole and entire, his soul, body, and divinity, is contained in either species, and in the smallest particle of each. Hence they infer, that whether the communicant receive the bread or the wine, he enjoys the full benefit of the sacrament. Therefore, to support this monstrous dogma, a Christian ordinance is divided in two: transubstantiation justifies communion in one kind, and communion in one kind proves the truth of transubstantiation. Such is the argument. But in denying the cup to the laity, they mutilate this institution of Christ, pervert the express law of the Gospel, and recede from the practice of the Apostles; and although they acknowledge it was the practice of the primitive church to receive the sacrament in both kinds, they lay it aside, and anathematize all who say they are wrong; that is, they curse all those who follow the example of Christ, his Apostles, and his church, and reject at the same time the holy commandment delivered unto them.

The Council of Constance, in 1414, declared that Christ instituted the sacrament in both kinds; and that in the primitive church both were received by the laity, as well as the Clergy; but for the purpose of avoiding certain dangers and scandals, half communion was resorted to; and now communion in both kinds is called an error, and the Clergy are punished for administering it in that manner. We give the decree of the Council, and allow the Church of Rome to speak in her own words: "Whereas, in several parts of the world, some have rashly presumed to assert that all Christians ought to receive the holy sacrament of the eucharist under both species of bread and wine, and that also after supper, or not fasting, contrary to the laudable custom of the Church, justly approved of, which they damnably endeavour to reprobate as sacrilegious: hence it is that this holy General Council of Constance, assembled by the Holy Ghost to provide for the salvation of the faithful against this error, declares, decrees, and defines, that although Christ did after supper institute this holy sacrament, and administer it to his disciples in both kinds, of bread and wine, yet this notwithstanding, the laudable authority of the sacred canons, and the approved custom of the Church, hath fixed and doth fix, that this sacrament ought not to be consecrated after supper, nor received by the faithful except fasting. And as this custom, for the purpose of avoiding certain dangers and scandals, has been rationally introduced, and that, although this sacrament was received by the faithful under both kinds in the primitive church, it was afterward received in both kinds by the officiating Priests, and by the people under the species of bread only, it being believed most certainly, and nothing doubted, that the entire body and blood of Christ are really contained as well under the species of bread as of wine; this, therefore, being approved, it is now made a law. Likewise this holy Synod decrees and declares, as to this matter, to the reverend Fathers in Christ, Patriarchs, Lords, &c., that they must effectually punish all such as shall transgress this decree, or shall exhort the people to communicate in both kinds." *

[* Dr. Harris's Discourse concerning Transubstantiation, preached at Salter's-Hall, February 13th, 1734, pp. 36—38.]

* "Cum in nonnullis mundi partibus quidam temerarie asseverare præsumant populum Christianum debere eucharistiæ sacramentum sub utraque panis et vini specie suscipere, etiam post cœnam, vel non jejunans, contra laudabilem Ecclesiæ consuetudinem, rationabiliter approbatam, quam sacrilegam damnabiliter reprobare conantur. Hinc est, quod hoc præsens Concilium sacrum generale Constantiense, in Spiritu Sancto legitime congregatum, adversus hunc errorem saluti fidelium providere satagens, declarat, discernit, et diffinit, quod, licet Christus post cœnam instituerit, et suis discipulis administravit sub utraque specie panis et vini, hoc venerabile sacramentum, tamen, hoc non obstante, sanctorum canonum auctoritas laudabilis, et approbata consuetudo Ecclesiæ servavit et servat, quod hujusmodi sacramentum non debet confici post cœnam, neque a fidelibus recipi non jejunis.

"Et sicut consuetudo hæc ad evitandum aliqua pericula et scandala est rationabiliter introducta, quod, licet in primitiva ecclesia hujusmodi sacramentum a fidelibus sub utraque specie reciperetur; postea a conficientibus sub utraque specie, et a laicis tantummodo sub specie panis suscipiatur; cum certissime credendum sit, et nullatenus dubitandum, integrum Christi corpus et sanguinem, tam sub specie panis quam sub specie vini veraciter contineri; igitur approbata, nunc pro lege habenda. Item ipsa sancta Synodus decernit et

The Council of Trent declares: "Although Christ the Lord did in the last supper institute this venerable sacrament of the eucharist in the species of bread and wine, and thus delivered it to the Apostles; yet it does not thence follow that all the faithful in Christ are bound by divine statute to receive both kinds."*

"Moreover, the Council declares, that though our Redeemer, as has been before said, did, in the last supper, institute this sacrament in two kinds, and thus delivered it to the Apostles, it must nevertheless be granted, that the true sacrament and Christ, whole and entire, is received in either kind by itself."†

The following canons were also enacted by the Council:

"1. Whoever shall say that all and every one of the faithful are obliged by divine precept, or as necessary to salvation, to receive the most holy sacrament of the eucharist under both kinds; let him be accursed.

"2. Whoever shall say that the holy Catholic Church had no just and reasonable causes to give to the laity, and even to the non-consecrating Clergy, for the communion of the eucharist under the species of bread alone, or that it erred therein; let him be accursed.

"3. Whoever shall deny that Jesus Christ, the author and fountain of all graces, is received whole and entire under the species of bread alone, because he is not received under both species, according to the institution of Jesus Christ, as some falsely maintain; let him be accursed."‡

2. It was not enough for the Church of Rome "to make the commandment of none effect by tradition;" she has mutilated an express ordinance. The Council of Trent, imitating the example of that of Constance, confesses that Christ instituted the sacrament in both kinds, and so delivered it to the Apostles, and that they and the primitive Church practised accordingly; then it is asserted that the Church had weighty and just causes for altering the divine institution, as though the Church were wiser than her living Head. Christ ordained communion in both kinds; the Church of Rome forbids it. In this it was the custom of the primitive Church to obey Christ; a later and opposite practice is introduced by the Church of Rome; which novelty she has passed not only into a law, but also into an article of faith. If this be not teaching for doctrines the commandments of men, nothing else can! The question is not whether this doctrine and practice be an innovation, but whether it ought to be so. Is it better to obey man rather than Christ? But although the Council of Constance, and that of Trent, acknowledge the scriptural authority as well as antiquity of communion in both kinds, yet since the period in which these Councils were held the theologians of Rome have endeavoured to maintain that half communion was always, more or less, the practice of ancient times. They have even gone so far as to adduce Scripture testimony in favour of half communion, when they do not attempt to deny that the doctrine of the present Church of Rome is, that the scriptural institution was originally in both kinds. This is another of the many instances in which she rejects the testimony of Scripture.

3. The usage of half communion is evidently contrary to the institution of Christ himself. "Drink ye ALL of this," is the language of our Saviour, according to St. Matthew. St. Mark says, "And they ALL drank of it." St. Luke represents our Saviour as saying, "Divide it among yourselves." Here, then, when Christ instituted the eucharist, he consecrated the bread and wine, and his disciples received it in both kinds; but in the modern Church of Rome none of the Priests, except the one who consecrates, receives in both kinds, it being of no importance how many soever may be present; the Church of Rome, therefore, is opposed to Christ's institution. Again: that the eucharist was administered, according to our Saviour's appointment in both kinds to the people by the Apostles, we have the authoritative declaration of St. Paul: "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup." (1 Cor. xi. 28.) Roman Catholics, however, acknowledge that our Saviour did administer in both kinds, and that he commanded all those to whom he administered, to drink of the cup. This is now called an error, and for weighty and just reasons communion in one kind is preferred! The following are the weightiest arguments by which the innovation is defended.

They say, "that the Apostles were commanded to take of the cup as well as the bread, because they were Clergymen." To this we reply, that it was to the Apostles only he gave the bread; therefore the laity should have neither bread nor cup, if the objection were valid. Besides, the Apostles, though not officiating, received the cup; consequently the non-officiating Clergy ought to partake of it. Their doctrine, therefore, has no support from this argument; but a strange quibble is introduced. They grant that the Apostles were laymen, and that they represented the whole body of Christians, when they received the bread; but assert that when our Saviour said the words, Hoc facite, "Do this," he ordained them Priests; and that these words were spoken before he gave them the cup. So that when he came to dispense the other part of the sacrament, that is, the wine, they then did not receive as laymen, and the representatives of the people, but as Clergymen. The Council of Trent doubtless had reference to this quibbling sophism, when the following canon was introduced:—"If any one shall say that by these words, 'Do this in remembrance of me,' Christ did not institute his Apostles Priests, or did not ordain that they and other Priests should offer his body and blood; let him be accursed."*

It is asserted that "our Saviour, after his resurrection, declarat, super ista materia, reverendis in Christo patribus, et patriarchis, et dominis, ut effectualiter puniant eos contra hoc decretum excedentes, qui communicandum populum sub utraque specie panis et vini exhortati fuerint."—Conc. Constan., A.D. 1414, sess. xiii.

* "Etsi Christus Dominus in ultima cœna venerabile hoc sacramentum in panis et vini speciebus instituit, et Apostolis tradidit; non tamen illa institutio et traditio eo tendunt, ut omnes Christi fideles statuto Domini ad utramque speciem accipiendam astringantur."—Conc. Triden., sess. xxi., c. 1.

† "Insuper declarat, quamvis Redemptor noster, ut antea dictum est, in suprema illa cœna hoc sacramentum in duabus speciebus instituerit, et Apostolis tradiderit; tamen fatendum esse, etiam sub altera tantum specie totum atque integrum Christum, verumque sacramentum sumi."—Idem, c. iii.

‡ "Canon 1. Si quis dixerit, ex Dei præcepto, vel necessitate salutis, omnes et singulos Christi fideles utramque speciem sanctissimi eucharistiæ sacramenti sumere debere; anathema sit.

"2. Si quis dixerit, sanctam Ecclesiam Catholicam non justis causis et rationibus adductam fuisse, ut laicos, atque etiam Clericos, non conficientes, sub panis tantummodo specie communicaret, aut in eo errasse; anathema sit.

"3. Si quis negaverit, totum et integrum Christum omnium gratiarum fontem et auctorem sub una panis specie sumi, quia, ut quidam falsò asserunt, non secundum ipsius Christi institutionem sub utraque specie sumatur; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid., sess. xxi.

* "Si quis dixerit, illis verbis, Hoc facite in meam commemorationem, Christum non instituisse Apostolos Sacerdotes; aut non ordinasse, ut ipsi, aliique Sacerdotes offerrent corpus et sanguinem suum; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid., sess. xxii.; De Sacrificio Missæ, can. 2.

administered the sacrament in one kind; inasmuch as St. Luke says, that sitting down with his two disciples at Emmaus, he took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them." This, however, was not administering the sacrament at all; it was rather an act of thanksgiving to God, a practice which our Saviour followed, after the manner of the devout Jews, when he fed the multitudes with the loaves and fishes.

They also argue, that in the Acts of the Apostles it is said that the disciples "continued steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread and in prayers." (Acts ii. 42.) This, we are told, refers to the eucharist, and the cup is not once mentioned as having been given. But it is not certain that this has any reference whatever to the sacrament. And supposing it has; as in Scripture language common feasts are expressed by the single phrase of eating bread, which by no means proves that the guests drank nothing; neither does it follow that the guests drank nothing, even at a religious feast, although described by a similar term. Besides, if there be no mention of the laity receiving the cup, there is none of the Priests receiving it. Yet this they think to be absolutely necessary; and if one may be taken for granted without being particularly mentioned, so also may the other. Add to all this, that where St. Paul formally speaks of this sacrament, he mentions the cup as being a necessary part of the ordinance.

They also plead, that "the laity, by receiving the body of Christ, receive his blood also; for the blood is contained in the body." They ought, however, to consider, that the wine was intended to be a memorial of the blood shed; therefore, they who do not receive the cup, do not make this memorial which Christ commanded. Yet why did Christ institute the cup? If his disciples, in receiving the bread, had received both the body and blood, what need was there to give the cup, and to call it the new testament in his blood? Again: if partaking of the bread be the communion both of the body and blood of Christ, why did Paul make such a distinction between the bread and the cup, calling one the communion of the body of Christ, and the other the communion of his blood? Lastly, if both the body and blood are received in the bread, what does the Priest who administers receive when he takes the cup?

They also urge, "If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever." (John vi. 51.) But they must first show that this verse, and indeed the context at large, relates to the Lord's supper. This they have not been able to do, according to the principles of their Church, which require that they "receive and interpret Scripture not otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers." Now the Council of Trent (sess. xxi., c. 1) acknowledges that the Fathers and Doctors gave various interpretations (varias interpretationes) of this portion of the sixth chapter of St. John; while many Bishops of Rome, Cardinals, and other dignitaries of their Church, upwards of thirty in number, deny that their doctrine with respect to the eucharist is to be collected from this chapter.

From the phrase, "as often as ye drink it," they argue, that the cup in the eucharist may sometimes be omitted: it should, however, be remembered, that the same phrase, "as often as," is applied equally to the bread with the cup.

From the passage, "Whosoever shall eat this bread AND drink this cup unworthily," (1 Cor. xi. 27,) Roman Catholics complain that the Protestants have corrupted the text, as both the Greek and Vulgate, instead of και and et, AND, have η and vel, OR: "Whosoever shall eat this bread OR drink this cup unworthily." To this we reply, (1.) This criticism gives no countenance to communion in one kind only, because their own Greek, Latin, and English versions (1 Cor. xi. 26, 28, 29; x. 16, 17) no less than five times use the conjunction AND, in joining the bread and cup together, to be both received in remembrance of Christ. Therefore, to say the cup is not necessary, is to make the Apostle contradict himself, as well as our Lord's institution. (2.) That και, and, is the true reading, and not η, or, numerous MSS. and versions sufficiently prove; and that et, not vel, is the proper reading of the Vulgate, original editions formed by Roman Catholics themselves testify.* (3.) Besides, whatever may be the true reading, the doctrine of half communion gains nothing by it; because the Apostle teaches that EITHER to eat OR drink unworthily was wrong. The Corinthians drank of the cup; and that some of them drank unworthily, or in an irreverent manner, is plainly declared in the context.

4. The very intention and nature of the sacrament require that both kinds should be employed in order properly to celebrate it. Two reasons are obvious for the distribution of the cup to the whole body of the Christian church. (1.) Because it is the blood of the new covenant, which belongs as much to the laity as to the Clergy. It is the blood shed for the remission of sins, not only of the Priests, but also of the laity. (2.) By the drinking of the cup, they remembered Christ's blood as shed for them, and by which they showed forth his death. Now since these reasons equally concern all Christians, the drinking of the cup, by which this commemoration is made, must be of like importance: therefore the means which Christ appointed for the celebration of such an institution ought to be adopted by all who are anxious to comply with the command of Christ. If St. Paul reproved the Corinthians for varying from the original institution in their manner of celebrating it, what would he have said had they erred as the Romanists, who have deprived the people of one half of this sacrament?

5. Without the cup there can be no sacrament at all; and therefore the eucharist is not, strictly speaking, celebrated in the Church of Rome. The following admirable quotation from Dr. Adam Clarke's Discourse on the eucharist will set this in a clear light:—"With respect to the bread, he had before simply said, 'Take, eat, this is my body;' but concerning the cup he says, 'Drink ye all of this;' for as this pointed out the very essence of the institution, namely, the blood of atonement, it was necessary that each should have a particular application of it; therefore he says, 'Drink ye ALL OF THIS.' By this we are taught that the cup is essential to the sacrament of the Lord's supper; so that they who deny the cup to the people, sin against God's institution; and they who receive not the cup, are not partakers of the body and blood of Christ. If either could, without mortal prejudice, be omitted, it might be the bread; but the cup, as pointing out the blood poured out, that is, the life, by which alone the great sacrificial act is performed, and remission of sins procured, is absolutely indispensable. On this ground it is demonstrable, that there is not a Popish Priest under heaven who denies the cup to the people (and they all do this) that can be said to celebrate the Lord's supper at all; nor is there one of their votaries that ever received the holy sacrament! All pretension to this is an absolute farce, so long as the cup, the emblem of the atoning blood, is denied. How strange is it, that the very men who plead so much for the bare literal meaning of, 'This is my body,' in the preceding verse, should deny all meaning to, 'Drink ye all of this cup,' in this verse! And though Christ has in the most positive manner enjoined it, they will not permit one of the laity to taste it! O what a thing is man! a constant contradiction to reason and to himself. The conclusion, therefore, is unavoidable. The sacrament of the Lord's supper is not celebrated in the Church of Rome. Should not this be made known to the miserable, deluded Catholics over the face of the earth?"

* Dr. A. Clarke's Commentary on 1 Cor. xi. 27, with the notes at the end of that chapter.

6. As it regards the practice of the primitive church, nothing is more clear than that this sacrament was constantly administered in both kinds. We except the Manichean heretics, who considered the wine in the sacrament as abominable, because they believed that wine was not created by God, but by the devil. It appears therefore that the corrupted Church of Rome, with all her claims to infallibility, has adopted at least one part of the Manichean heresy.

The introduction of this innovation in the Church of Rome, and that is the only Church in which it is tolerated, was in the year 1415, by the Council of Constance. But it was Innocent III. who made it a law; for the Council of Constance, as we have seen, did not even act upon the decrees drawn up by the Pope,—a fact which candid Roman Catholics acknowledge, although some of them may deny it, and a few are ignorant of the fact. Afterward the Council of Trent decreed in favour of half communion; the Pope's faction being so powerful in that Synod, that, contrary to the institution of our Lord, they carried that measure which the Council of Constance had introduced. Members of the Church of Rome in modern times have had recourse to various expedients in order to meet the numerous arguments brought against them. Some of them maintain, contrary to the decree of their Councils, as well as to Scripture, that the word of God authorizes communion in one kind. Others maintain that it is a mere disciplinary regulation; asserting that church authority may interfere in this matter; for as the Church of Rome has determined on communion in one kind, the word of God, which sanctions the authority of the Church, gives her a right to reject the cup.

Now as some deny the doctrine to be a novelty, we will adduce testimonies concurrent with the Council of Constance. Cassander affirms that "in the Latin Church, for above a thousand years, the body of Christ and the blood of Christ were separately given, the body apart, and the blood apart, after the consecration of the mysteries."* So Aquinas also affirms: "According to the ancient custom of the Church, all men, as they communicated in the body, so they communicated in the blood; which also, to this day, is kept in some churches."† Indeed, there was a law for communion in both kinds; for Pope Gelasius says, "We find that some, having received a portion only of the holy body, do abstain from the cup of the holy blood; who doubtless (because they are bound by I know not what superstition) should receive the entire sacraments wholly, or should be driven from the entire wholly; because the division of one and the same mystery cannot be without very great sacrilege."‡

* Cassand. Opera. Cons., art. xxii., fol. Paris, 1616.

† Com. in 6th Johan., sec. 7.

‡ "Comperimus quod quidam, sumpta tantummodo corporis sacri portione, a calice sacri cruoris abstineant; qui proculdubio (quoniam nescio qua superstitione docentur abstringi) aut sacramenta integra percipiant, aut ab integris arceantur. Quia divisio unius et ejusdem mysterii sine grandi sacrilegio non potest provenire."—Dist. 2, De Consecratione, A. D. 492.

[* "Quare agnoscens sancta mater Ecclesia hanc suam in administratione sacramentorum auctoritatem, licet ab initio Christianæ religionis non infrequens utriusque speciei usus fuisset: tamen progressu temporis, latissime jam mutata illa consuetudine, gravibus et justis causis adducta, hanc consuetudinem sub altera specie communicandi approbavit; et pro lege habendam decrevit: quam reprobare, aut sine ipsius Ecclesiæ auctoritate pro libito mutare non licet."—Conc. Trid., Can. et Decret., sess. xxi., cap. 2.]

7. We now produce a few of those reasons which the Church of Rome gives for such practice, on which we shall offer some observations.

It has been stated that those who desired the cup were disaffected persons, and not true Catholics; and that if they were to yield this to them, they would clamour for farther encroachments, such as having the prayers in the vernacular tongue, the marriage of the Clergy, and other things which the Roman Church refuses to allow.

They probably thought the Clergy were already in sufficient contempt; and that if they granted the people the same privilege in the sacrament with themselves, it would prepare the way for farther contumely; it would make the people and Priest equal.

Salmeron Alphonsus, who attended the Council of Trent, as a Divine of the Pope, said: "It was certain that the Church could not err, because it is the basis and pillar of truth; and consequently, since the cup has for a considerable time been forbidden to the laity, pursuant to the Councils of Constance and Basil, it was certain that communion under both kinds was not of divine obligation." Thus, in order to maintain the infallibility of the Church, they have divided the institution of Christ.

The Council of Trent says there were grave reasons for administering this sacrament in one kind: "Wherefore, though from the beginning of the Christian religion the use of both kinds was not unfrequent, yet when in process of time that practice was, for weighty and just causes, changed, holy mother Church, recognising her acknowledged authority in the administration of the sacraments, approved the custom of communion in one kind, and commanded it to be observed as law: to condemn or alter which, at pleasure, without the authority of the Church herself, is not lawful."*

The following are the arguments which the Roman Catechism brings forward in favour of half communion:— "The Church, no doubt, was influenced by numerous and cogent reasons, not only to approve, but confirm, by solemn decree, the general practice of communicating under one species. In the first place, the greatest caution was necessary to avoid accident or indignity, which must become almost inevitable if the chalice were administered in a crowded assemblage. In the next place, the holy eucharist should be at all times in readiness for the sick; and if the species of wine remained long unconsumed, it were to be apprehended that it might become vapid. Besides, there are many who cannot bear the taste or smell of wine: lest, therefore, what is intended for the nutriment of the soul should prove noxious to the health of the body, the Church, in her wisdom, has sanctioned its administration under the species of bread alone. We may also observe, that in many places wine is extremely scarce, nor can it be brought from distant countries without incurring very heavy expense, and encountering very tedious and difficult journeys. Finally: a circumstance which principally influenced the Church in establishing this practice, means were to be devised to crush the heresy which denied that Christ, whole and entire, is contained under either species, and asserted that the body is contained under the species of bread without the blood, and the blood under the species of wine without the body. This object was attained by communion under the species of bread alone, which places, as it were, sensibly before our eyes the truth of the Catholic faith."*

Therefore lest the Clergy should not be honourable enough, and for fear of impeaching the infallibility of the Church, to put a stop to the inquiring laity, the Council of Trent presents mere fanciful reasons for withholding the cup from the laity; and that, too, in opposition to Christ's institution, the Apostles' practice, and the usage of the Catholic Church for so many ages; and have ordered that "none, in a public sacrament, shall communicate in both the elements of bread and wine, but only the Priest that consecrates."

["To conclude, therefore: Communion in one kind is both contrary to the institution and to the command of Christ, as well as to the tradition and practice of the primitive church, grounded upon that command, and is no less than a sacrilegious dividing and mangling of the most sacred mystery of Christianity, a destroying the very nature of the sacrament, which is to represent the death of Christ, and his blood separated from his body; a lessening the signification and reception of our complete and entire spiritual nourishment whereby we are sacramentally to eat Christ's body, and drink his blood; an unjust depriving the people of that most precious legacy which Christ left to all of them, to wit, his sacrificial blood which was shed for us, and which it is the peculiar privilege of Christians thus mystically to partake of; and, lastly, a robbing them of that grace, and virtue, and benefit of the sacrament which belongs not to any part but to the whole of it, and cannot ordinarily be received without both kinds. O that God would therefore put it into the hearts of those who are most concerned not to do so much injury to Christians and to Christianity, and not to suffer any longer that divine mystery, which is the great foundation of all spiritual grace and life, to be tainted and poisoned with so many corruptions, as we find it is above all other parts of Christianity! And O that that blessed sacrament which was designed by Christ to be the very bond of peace and the cement of unity among all Christians, and to make them all one bread and one body, may not, by the perverseness of men, and the craft of the devil, be made a means to divide and separate them one from another, and to break that unity and charity which it ought to preserve."†]

CHAPTER VII.

WORSHIP OF THE HOST.

Absurdity of this: 9. Their practice in this adoration. Mode of adoration. Processions. Custom in Spain. Litany of the sacrament: 10. The feast of Corpus Christi.

1. We proceed to inquire, whether Roman Catholics have not greatly erred, and are not guilty of a gross corruption, when they worship the wafer in the sacrament with the same honour as that which they render to Almighty God, and oblige all the members of their Church to do the same. That this is their practice, none can deny; that it is the doctrine of their Church, the Council of Trent plainly declares. After that Council had asserted, that after consecration the bread and wine in the sacrament are changed into our Lord Jesus Christ, true God and man; and that though our Saviour always sits at the right hand of God in heaven, he is, notwithstanding, in many other places sacramentally present, we have the following decision:—"There is, therefore, no room to doubt that all the faithful in Christ are bound to venerate this most holy sacrament, and to render thereto the worship of latria which is due to the true God, according to the constant usage in the Catholic Church. Nor is it the less to be thus adored, that it was instituted by Christ our Lord."* "If any one shall say that this holy sacrament should not be adored, nor solemnly carried about in procession, nor held up publicly to the people to adore it, or that its worshippers are idolaters; let him be accursed."† This worship they give the host, (the round wafer,) not only at the time of receiving it, but whenever it is carried about in the streets. All persons are, by the sound of a bell, admonished to worship the passing God; and if any refuse to do so, and say the practice is wrong, he is pronounced accursed. So all are accursed who do not offer supreme adoration to the host, which a mouse may run off with and eat, or the Priest himself may eat and vomit, and eat again.!

2. The Catholic Church of Christ, in the first ages, had no such worship. That it is a novelty, not known till 1216, is plain: (1.) Because it was in 1215 that transubstantiation, by the Council of Lateran under Pope Innocent III., was made an article of faith, as Scotus, Tonstal, and others write. (2.) In the Roman canon law we find that it was Pope Honorius who ordered, in the following year, that the Priests, at a certain part of the mass service should elevate the host, and cause the people to prostrate themselves in worshipping it.

Besides a profound silence of antiquity concerning it, we have this undeniable argument: that the Pagans would have retorted upon the Christians, when they reproved them for their many idols; but we do not find that they did so. All the writings of the Christian Fathers are full of invective against the heathen idolatry. But how could they do this if they had been guilty of similar practices? Could the Christians say that what the Pagans worshipped were idols and false gods, but that the object of their adoration was Jesus Christ; this might satisfy themselves, but not the Heathen; by whom a piece of bread would be thought to be bread, however the Christians might imagine it to be Almighty God. If a Pagan had seen a Christian worship the host,

1. The doctrine stated. Council of Trent quoted: 2. The primitive church had no such worship: 3. It is idolatry to worship that for God which is not God: 4. All the marks and reproaches of idolatry apply to the adoration of the host. Minutius Felix cited: 5. The adoration of the host is peculiarly absurd: 6. Their eating their supposed God in the wafer is notably so too: 7. Their plea, that they worship only Christ, is not valid: 8. They say their good intention screens them from idolatry.

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 244, 245.

[† Gibson's Preservative against Popery, vol. ii., tit. vii., cap. iii., pp. 150, 151. Fol.

* "Nullus itaque dubitandi locus relinquitur, quin omnes Christi fideles, pro more in Catholica Ecclesia semper recepto, latriæ cultum qui vero Deo debetur, huic sanctissimo sacramento in veneratione exhibeant; neque enim ideo minus est adorandum, quod fuerit a Christo Domino, ut sumatur institutum."—Conc. Trid., sess. xiii., cap. 5.

† "Si quis dixerit non solemniter circumgestandum in processionibus, vel non publice ut adoretur populo proponendum, aut ejus adoratores esse idolatras; anathema sit."—Idem, sess. xiii., can. 6.

would he not think that he had as good reason to reproach him for adoring a piece of bread, as the Christian had to upbraid him with adoring the sun, moon, or an image? But since there are no such censures, we have every reason to infer that this practice was unknown to the primitive Christians.

But, let the custom of the Church be what it may, they who adore the consecrated bread with the worship that is due to God only, are idolaters as much as the Heathen.

3. First, is it idolatry to worship that as God which is no God? If so, then they who render to the host divine worship are idolaters; for certainly that which they worship is no God, it is not our Saviour, it is but a wafer,—a piece of bread. It is true, they do not think so; but we are as much convinced that it is nothing else, as we can be of any thing of which we have the testimony of our senses, our reason, and of Scripture. If ignorance or mistake will excuse Roman Catholics, it must also the Pagans; and if it did not excuse the former, it cannot the latter.

4. Secondly, all the marks that the Scriptures give of an idol, and the contempt which they cast upon it, apply as well to the Popish god in the sacrament, and fall as heavily upon it, as upon any object worshipped by the Heathen. It is the distinguished character of a heathen idol, that it is made by men. And is not the god in the mass as much the work of men's hands as any of the pagan idols? Let none be offended when we say that the Romanists form their god, or manufacture the body and blood of Christ; for this is their own assertion, and which they solemnly make. One of the strongest reasons which they urge in denying the validity of the Protestant ministry is, that in their ordination they do not pretend to confer a power of making the body of Christ.

Moreover, the Scripture not only describes an idol, but also exposes it to laughter and ridicule, by recounting the many outrages and insults to which it is exposed, and from which it cannot rescue itself. Now there is no abuse of this kind to which they refer, but the god which the Roman Catholics adore in the mass, is as subject to as any pagan idol. If Laban were laughed at for serving gods which were stolen, (Gen. xxxi. 30,) are they not equally to be despised, who worship a god which has been so often in danger of being carried away by thieves, that they have been obliged to make a law for its safe custody? If men are reproached for worshipping what may be cast "to the moles and bats," (Isai. ii. 20,) are not the Romanists equally censurable for worshipping that which may become the prey of rats and mice, &c.? If it were a sufficient proof that the Babylonian gods were idols because they were "carried away captive," will it not be as powerful an argument to prove that the host in the mass is also an idol? For they carry it about from place to place to be worshipped, one day in the year being set apart for that purpose, namely, that of Corpus Christi; and if the page of history be credited, the host has been taken from the Christians, and carried away captive by the infidel Mohammedans.

In the forty-fourth chapter of Isaiah we have the following description of an idol:—"The smith with the tongs both worketh in the coals, and fashioneth it with hammers, and worketh it with the strength of his arms. The carpenter stretcheth out his rule; he marketh it out with a line; he fitteth it with planes, and he marketh it out with the compass, and maketh it after the figure of a man, according to the beauty of a man; that it may remain in the house. He burneth part thereof in the fire; with part thereof he eateth flesh: and the residue thereof he maketh a god, even his graven image: he falleth down unto it, and worshippeth it, and prayeth unto it, and saith, Deliver me, for thou art my god." The parallel between this, and making the host and its worship, is truly remarkable.

The farmer sows wheat, it grows, it ripens, is reaped, and is prepared for the mill, where it is ground, and sifted with a sieve; with a part thereof the fowls and cattle are fed; another part is taken and baked in the oven, yet it is no god; it is brought forward and laid on the altar, and yet it is no god; the Priest handles and crosses it, and yet it is no god; he pronounces over it a few words, when instantly it is the supreme Jehovah. He falls down before it, and prays to it, saying, "Thou art my God." He lifts it up before the people, and cries, Ecce Agnus Dei, qui tollit mundi peccata. "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world." The whole congregation fall down and worship it, crying, Mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa. "My fault, my fault, my very great fault." How exact the parallel between Popish and heathen idolatry!

The following from Minutius Felix, in the year 230, may be presented as furnishing an excellent parallel to the worship of the host:—"Now, would any one be pleased to consider the pains taken and engines that are employed in the formation of images, he would be ashamed to stand in such fear of a thing that the hand of the artist had been so long playing upon to make a god. For this wooden god, taken, perhaps, out of some old faggot-pile, or a piece of some forsaken stump, is hung up, hewn, planed, &c.; or if it be a god of gold or silver, it is ten to one but it derives its pedigree from a dirty kettle, as happened with the Egyptian King; it is melted, hammered, and beat on anvils. But if it happen to be a god of stone, then the mallets and chisels are set to work upon him, and some lewd hand or other brings him up to the requisite smoothness; but as he is not sensible of any hardships in making, so neither of your divine honours when made, unless, perhaps, when you have named it a god, it ceases to be stone, or wood, or silver any longer. But when, pray, does it become divine? Behold, it is cast, fashioned, and filed; well, it is no god yet: behold, it is soldered, put together, and set upon its legs; well, it is no god yet: behold, it is decked, consecrated, and prayed to; then, then at last, behold a complete god, after man has vouchsafed to make and dedicate him."*

5. It is remarked further concerning the Popish host, and which will prove it even more an idol or a false god than any pagan deity can possibly be:—The Pagans made gods of silver, gold, wood, and stone; yet they were never so foolish as to think, after they had formed them into a variety of figures, and by consecration made them gods, that these materials, by such consecration, lost their substances, and were turned into the nature and properties of that god they intended to worship. No; they believed that what was thus consecrated still retained its former nature, and was no more an object of their worship, except as a representation of the god whom they worshipped, or the habitation in which he condescended to dwell. If this idol happened to be stolen, broken, defaced, or carried captive, they were far from concluding that the object of their worship was stolen, defaced, or carried captive. They thought such affronts might be offered to the image, but that the god himself was far above such injuries. This was the pagan notion. The Romanists, however, teach that that bread of which the Priest, by consecration, makes Jesus Christ, is changed into the very substance which they adore. By consecration, they declare, it is not made merely a representation of the Saviour, or his tabernacle, but that it is transmuted into the Deity himself. So that if this which they worship (we call it a "wafer," they call it "Christ entire") should be stolen or burned, trodden under foot or devoured by vermin, they cannot deny that it is their Saviour himself, he whom they worship, that suffers all this abuse and indignity. For, according to the Papists, after the words of consecration are uttered, and thereby the substance of the bread is turned into the body and blood of Christ, it continues so, as long as any of the accidents of bread remain; that is, until it is decomposed, or so long as we can distinguish the shape, colour, taste, &c., of the bread.

* "Quod si in animum quis inducat, tormentis quibus, et quibus machinis simulacrum omne formetur, erubescet timere se materiam ab artifice, ut deum faceret, illusam. Deus enim ligneus, rogi fortasse vel infelicis stipitis portio, suspenditur, cæditur, dolatur, runcinatur: et deus aureus vel argenteus, de immundo vasculo sæpius, ut factum Ægyptio Regi, conflatur, tunditur malleis, et incudibus figuratur: et lapideus cæditur, scalpitur, et ab impurato homine lævigatur; nec sentit suæ nativitatis injuriam, ita ut nec postea de vestra veneratione culturam: nisi forte nondum deus saxum est, vel lignum, vel argentum. Quando igitur hic nascitur? Ecce, funditur, fabricatur, scalpitur; nondum deus est: ecce plumbatur, construitur, erigitur,; nec adhuc deus est: ecce ornatur, consecratur oratur; tunc postremo deus est, cum homo illum voluit et dedicavit."—Minutius Felix, De Idolor. Vanit., c. 23. Oxon. 1662.

6. Another important particular is the following:— That though all the reproaches that Scripture casts upon heathen idols fall equally upon the worship of the host, there is one from which the former are exempt, but which falls heavily on the latter. The Romanists no sooner make a Saviour out of bread, and worship him, but they eat him. Most commonly, indeed, the Priest only eats Jesus Christ; but on most solemn occasions, the people devour him as well as he. Did ever any Pagan make a god, consecrate him, then worship him, and afterwards eat him? This is done in the Church of Rome every day. Cicero, who was a Pagan himself, and knew as much of the pagan religion as any man, expressly says, that "among all the religions of his time, there was no man so foolish as to pretend to eat his god." * The Egyptians, who worshipped the ox, the wolf, the hawk, the crocodile, the ibis, the cat, and rendered divine honours to the leek and the onion, never dared to eat what they had once worshipped; but the Romanists do not hesitate to cast this indignity on the adorable Jesus every time the sacrament is administered. Either, therefore, let them cease to worship the sacrament, or let them not render themselves contemptibly ridiculous by eating it. If they will do both, against sense and reason, against Scripture and the doctrines and customs of the purest and best of Christians, let them never attempt to persuade reasonable men to become Christians. Such may answer, as the Arabian Averroes, the Mohammedan, said, "Since the Christians adore what they eat, it is better for us to be of the religion of the philosophers."

7. But to this charge of idolatry in the adoration of the host, the Roman Catholics answer, that "they do not worship any thing in the sacrament but Jesus Christ. Do we think they would worship the host if they thought it was nothing but a piece of bread? No; they would abhor it as much as we. But being convinced that Christ is there under the form of bread, they think it not only lawful, but their duty, to give divine worship to Christ thus visibly present." We verily believe they would not worship the host, unless they believed it to be the real body of Christ, and not a mere wafer. And we also think, that if Christ's real body were actually present, together with his soul and divinity, they ought to worship him. But having granted this, it does not favour their cause, nor release them from the guilt of idolatry, for the two following reasons:—

First: by their own confession, all that can render the worship of the host lawful, is the transubstantiation that is made of the bread into the body of Christ. But even should the doctrine of transubstantiation be true, they are not certain that every time they adore the host, they are free from idolatry. For, according to the doctrine of their Church, the bread and wine are never transubstantiated but by a due consecration; and for this purpose three things are necessary: "That the words of consecration be properly spoken; that he who speaks them be a lawful Priest; and that the Priest speaks the words with the intention of making the body of Christ." If any one of these be wanting, there is no consecration; and if no consecration, no transubstantiation; and if no transubstantiation, no body of Christ; and if no body of Christ, then what is worshipped is no more than a piece of bread; and, consequently, the worship that is rendered is idolatrous. Now, how can a man be certain that in the consecration these qualifications have been observed? It is impossible for a man to know that the Priest speaks the words right, because he cannot hear them pronounced; for, by the laws of their Church, the Priest is required to speak the words in a low voice, so that the spectators cannot distinctly apprehend him. Can he be assured, in the second place, that the man who consecrates is a true Priest? Before he can ascertain this, he must be acquainted with a hundred things which are utterly impossible for him to know. For instance: that the person who consecrates was lawfully baptized; that is, with the right form of baptism, and with a true intention in the administrator; that he had his orders from a true Bishop, and that that Bishop observed the essential form of ordination, and did intend also, at the time, to make him a Priest; and to make this Bishop truly such, he must likewise have been baptized and ordained with due form, with due intention, and by him that had proper power; and then to ascertain whether he had due power, the same question must be asked concerning those who ordained him; and so on till we come to the Apostles' times. But, thirdly, how can a man be assured that the Priest who consecrates had right intention? Supposing the Priest to be an infidel or atheist, which is not uncommon; or supposing he did not believe transubstantiation, as many who have become Protestants declared that they did not believe it, even during the time in which they pertained to the Church of Rome; how can a man be certain, under these circumstances, whether that which he worships is only a wafer, or the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; even upon the supposition that the doctrine of transubstantiation be true? Did ever God require men to worship him at random? They cannot be certain, therefore, that they do not commit idolatry every time they worship the host.

But secondly, all this is upon the supposition that the doctrine of transubstantiation is true. If it be false, are they not truly idolaters? Do they not in this case give divine worship to a creature? Undoubtedly they do; and according to the ideas that the Scriptures attach to idolatry as defined by the primitive church, all are guilty who worship the host. Now, we are certain that the doctrine of transubstantiation is not true; and without hesitation declare it to be contrary to the united testimony of Scripture, reason, and common sense.

* De Nat. Deorum, lib. iii.

8. For the worship of the host the following apology has been offered:—"Suppose they are mistaken in their belief, their good intention would excuse them from the crime of idolatry, as they intend only to adore Christ, who is a proper object of worship." To this we answer:—

In the first place, this plea supposes that idolatry cannot be committed where the worshipper is mistaken in the object of his adoration. This supposition is not only false, but the contrary is true. There never was any idolatry but what was founded on mistake; for no serious man was ever so foolish as to adore that for the supreme God which he did not believe to be such; yet, if what he worshipped was not God, he was, notwithstanding his good intention, an idolater. The Roman Catholics do not more firmly believe in transubstantiation and the worship of the host, than millions formerly believed that the sun was the great and eternal God; yet their mistake did not acquit them of the charge of idolatry in worshipping the sun; and for the same reason the Roman Catholics cannot be exculpated from a similar crime in rendering divine honours to the host.

Secondly, we readily grant that ignorance and mistake, so far as they are not the result of our own negligence, will excuse in all cases; and therefore in this of idolatry. Nevertheless, as it is certain that idolatry does proceed from mistake and ignorance; so is it also certain that this crime will be inexcusable, when sufficient evidence is afforded to the worshipper that he is in error. What plea can the Roman Catholics have, when their senses tell them that a piece of bread cannot be God? Their reason informs them, by way of mathematical demonstration, that transubstantiation is impossible. They have many cogent arguments from Scripture sufficient to assure them, that the sense which they put upon our Saviour's words, "This is my body," is not that which he meant, but the contrary. And lastly, they have had means sufficient to convince them of their error by Protestants, who have continually, since the Reformation, given undeniable proof both of its falsehood and its absurdity.

9. Having considered the adoration of the host as it is taught by the Church of Rome, we shall notice the practice which obtains in this department of their worship. According to the Missal, the Priest in every mass, as soon as he has consecrated the bread and wine, with bended knees adores the sacrament. He worships that very thing which is before him, upon the paten and in the chalice; and gives the supreme worship both of body and mind to it, as he could to God or to Christ himself. With his head and soul bowing toward it, and his eyes and thoughts fixed on it and directed to it, he prays to it as to Christ: "Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us. Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us. Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world, give us peace."* The following is a translation of the language used in the Missal:—"Having uttered the words of consecration, the Priest, immediately falling on his knees, adores the consecrated host: he rises, shows it to the people, places it on the corporale, and again adores it." When the wine is consecrated, the Priest, in like manner, "falling on his knees, adores it, rises, shows it to the people, puts the cup in its place, covers it over, and again adores it."

The Priest, rising up, after he has adored it himself, lifts it up as high as he conveniently can, and, with eyes fixed upon it, shows it, to be devoutly adored by the people, who, having notice also by ringing the mass-bell, as soon as they see it, fall down in the humblest adoration to it, as if it were the very appearance of God himself. If Christ were visibly present, they could not bestow more acts of worship than they do to the host. They pray to it, and use the same form of petition and invocation as they do to Christ himself, of which we have already given a specimen.

Thus both the Priest and the people adore the host and the cup in the celebration of the eucharist. They direct and terminate their prayers upon the sacrament which is before them; and it is become a common form of doxology among them to say, "Praise be given to the most holy sacrament," instead of saying, "Praise be given to God."

This adoration is not only in the time of communion, but at others also, in the church, whenever it is placed on the altar with the candles burning and the incense smoking before it, or hung up in its rich shrine and tabernacle, with a canopy of state over it. They say the church is sanctified with it as with the presence of God himself.

They also worship this sacrament when it is carried through the street in solemn and pompous procession, either before the Pope, or in its conveyance to some sick person, or on the feast of Corpus Christi. On all these occasions it is to be worshipped as God himself, as it passes by. Every one bows the head to the earth and worships. The person who, in great churches, conveys the sacrament to the numerous communicants, is called Bajulus Dei, the "porter or carrier of God."

[This ceremony has been described in a very graphic manner by an eye-witness.

["San Juan de Dios is the first remarkable object that meets the eye upon entering Cadiz by the sea-gate. A single glance at the convent had awakened the strongest and most rooted aversions of my heart, when, just as I was walking into the nearest street to avoid the crowd, the well-remembered sound of a hand-bell made me instantly aware that, unless pretending not to hear it, I could retrace my steps, and turn another corner, I should be obliged to kneel in the mud till a Priest, who was carrying the consecrated wafer to a dying person, had moved slowly in his sedan-chair from the farthest end of the street to the place where I began to hear the bell.

["The rule on these occasions, is expressed in a proverbial saying, Al Rey, en viendolo; a Dios, en oyendolo; which, after supplying its elliptical form, means that external homage is due to the King upon seeing him, and to God, that is, the host, preceded by its never-failing appendage, the bell, the very moment you hear him. I must add, as a previous explanation of what is to follow, that God and the King are so coupled in the language of this country, that the same title of 'Majesty' is applied to both. You hear, from the pulpit, the duties that men owe to 'both Majesties;' and a foreigner is often surprised at the hopes expressed by the Spaniards, that 'His Majesty' will be pleased to grant them life and health for some years more. I must add a very ludicrous circumstance arising from this absurd form of speech. When the Priest, attended by the Clerk, and surrounded by eight or ten people, bearing lighted flambeaux, has broken into the chamber of the dying person, and gone through a form of prayer, half Latin, half Spanish, which lasts for about twenty minutes, one of the wafers is taken out of a little gold casket, and put into the mouth of the patient as he lies in bed. To swallow the wafer without the loss of any particle,—which, according to the Council of Trent, (and I fully agree with the Fathers,) contains the same divine Person as the whole,—is an operation of some difficulty. To obviate, therefore, the impropriety of lodging a sacred atom, as it might easily happen, in a bad tooth, the Clerk comes forth with a glass of water, and, in a firm and loud voice, asks the sick person, 'Is His Majesty gone down?'* The answer enables the learned Clerk to decide whether the passage is to be expedited by means of his cooling draught.

* "Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis. Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis. Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, dona nobis pacem."—Missale Romanum.

* "Prolatis verbis consecrationis, statim hostiam consecratam genuflexus adorat: surgit, ostendit populo, reponit super corporale, iterum adorato."—Idem.

["But I must return to my Gallego, and myself. No sooner had I called him back, as if I had suddenly changed my mind as to the direction in which we were to go, than with a most determined tone he said, Dios—Su Magestad! Pretending not to hear, I turned sharply round, and was now making my retreat; but it would not do. Fired with holy zeal, he raised his harsh voice, and, in the barbarous accent of his province, repeated three or four times, Dios—Su Magestad! adding, with an oath, 'This man is a heretic!' There was no resisting that dreadful word: it pinned me to the ground. I took out my pocket-handkerchief, and, laying it on the least dirty part of the pavement, knelt upon it—not, indeed, to pray; but, while, as another act of conformity to the custom of the country, I was beating my breast with my clenched right hand, as gently as it could be done without offence,—to curse the hour when I had submitted thus to degrade myself, and tremble at the mere suspicion of a being little removed from the four-footed animals, whom it was his occupation to relieve of their burdens.

["In the more populous towns of Spain, these unpleasant meetings are frequent. Nor are you free from being disturbed by the holy bell in the most retired part of your house. Its sound operates like magic upon the Spaniards. In the midst of a gay, noisy party, the word, Su Magestad, will bring every one upon his knees until the tinkling dies in the distance. Are you at dinner? you must leave the table; in bed? you must, at least, sit up. But the most preposterous effect of this custom is to be seen at the theatres. On the approach of the host to any military guard, the drum beats, the men are drawn out, and as soon as the Priest can be seen, they bend the right knee, and invert the firelocks, placing the point of the bayonet on the ground. As an officer's guard is always stationed at the door of a Spanish theatre, I have often laughed in my sleeve at the effect of the chamade both upon the actors and the company. Dios! Dios! resounds from all parts of the house, and every one falls that moment upon his knees. The actors' ranting, or the rattling of the castanets in the fandango, is hushed for a few minutes, till, the sound of the bell growing fainter and fainter, the amusement is resumed, and the devout performers are once more upon their legs, anxious to make amends for the interruption. So powerful is the effect of early habit, that I had been for some weeks in London before I could hear the postman's bell in the evening, without feeling instinctively inclined to perform a due genuflection."*]

The idolatry of the mass will be more fully exhibited by the "Litany of the blessed Sacrament," which is to be found in most Popish books of devotion. We quote from the Christian's Guide, published "by the permission of the Most Reverend R. C. Archbishop Whitfield."

"O living bread, which came down from heaven,
O Saviour of Israel, who art truly a hidden God,
O wheat of the elect,
O wine, which makest virgins to spring forth,
O bread which is fat, and yieldeth dainties to Kings,
Continual feast,
Clean oblation,
Lamb without blemish,
Food of angels,
Hidden manna,
Memorial of the wonders of God,
Supersubstantial bread,
Word made flesh and dwelling among us,
Holy victim,
Chalice of benediction,
Mystery of faith,
Most high and venerable sacrament,
Most holy sacrifice, truly propitiatory for the living and the dead,
Heavenly antidote, by which we are preserved from sin,
Most stupendous of all miracles,
Memorial of the most sacred passion of our Lord,
Gift of God exceeding all fulness,
Singular pledge of divine love,
Overflow of divine liberality,
Most holy and august mystery,
Remedy which confers immortality,
Awful and life-giving sacrament,
Bread, by the omnipotence of the word, changed into flesh,
Unbloody sacrifice,
Our food and our guest,
Delicious banquet, at which ministering angels are present,
Sacrament of piety,
Bond of union
Offerer and oblation,
Spiritual sweetness, tasted in its very sauce,
Refection of the holy souls,
Pledge of the glory to come,

Have mercy on us."

10. The feast of Corpus Christi.

The annual festival of the holy sacrament, or Corpus-Christi day, was established by Urban IV. in 1264, and the institution was confirmed at a Council held in Vienna in 1311. It is held on Thursday after Trinity-Sunday. Its origin is variously related. Some say that a woman named Juliana, residing at Liege, had a vision, to the following effect:—"that as often as she addressed herself to God or to the saints in prayer, she saw the full moon, with a small defect or breach in it; and that having long studied to find out the signification of this strange appearance, she was inwardly informed by the Spirit, that the moon signified the Church, and that the defect or breach was the want of an annual festival in honour of the holy sacrament." This induced the Pope to institute the feast. Others say that a certain Priest was performing mass who doubted the dogma of the real presence, and that blood flowed from the host which he held in his hands, which, of course, completed his conviction. This being reported to the Pope, he instituted the festival.*

["* The Spanish words are, Ha pasado su Magestad?"

[* Doblado's Letters from Spain, pp. 8—12.]

["This is the only day in the year when the consecrated host is exposed, about the streets, to the gaze of the adoring multitude. The triumphal character of the procession which issues forth from the principal church in every town of note in the kingdom, and a certain dash of bitter and threatening zeal which still lies disguised under the ardent and boundless devotion displayed on this festival, show but too clearly the spirit of defiance which suggested it in the heat of the controversies upon the real presence. It is within my memory that the taste for dignity and decorum which this metropolitan Church has ever evinced in the performance of religious worship, put an end to the boisterous and unbecoming appendages which an inveterate custom had annexed to this pageant.

["At a short distance in front of the procession appeared a group of seven gigantic figures, male and female, whose dresses, contrived by the most skilful tailors and milliners of the town, regulated the fashion at Seville for the ensuing season. A strong man being concealed under each of the giants and giantesses, the gaping multitude were amused at certain intervals with a very clumsy dance, performed by the figures, to the sound of the pipe and tabor. Next to the Brobdignag dancers, and taking precedence of all, there followed, on a movable stage, the figure of a hydra encircling a castle, from which, to the great delight of all the children of Seville, a puppet not unlike Punch, dressed up in a scarlet jacket trimmed with morris-bells, used often to start up; and having performed a kind of wild dance, to vanish again from view into the body of the monster. The whole of this compound figure bore the name of Tarasca, a word of which I do not know either the meaning or derivation. That these figures were allegorical no one can doubt who has any knowledge of the pageants of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It would be difficult, however, without the help of an obscure tradition, to guess that the giants in periwigs and swords, and their fair partners in caps and petticoats, were emblems of the seven deadly sins. The hydra, it should seem, represented heresy, guarding the castle of schism, where folly, symbolized by the strange figure in scarlet, displayed her supreme command. This band of monsters was supposed to be flying in confusion before the triumphant sacrament.

["Mixed with the body of the procession, there appeared three sets of dancers: the Valencianos, or natives of the kingdom of Valencia, who, in their national costume of loose waistcoats, puffed linen sleeves, bound at the wrists and elbows with ribbons of various colours, and broad white trousers reaching only to the knees, performed a lively dance, mingling their steps with feats of surprising agility: after these followed the sword-dancers in the old martial fashion of the country: and, last of all, the performers of an antiquated Spanish dance; I believe the chacona, dressed in the national garb of the sixteenth century.

["A dance of the last-mentioned description, and in a similar costume, is still performed before the high altar in the presence of the Chapter, at the conclusion of the service on this day and the following se'nnight. The dancers are boys of between ten and fourteen, who, under the name of seizes,* are maintained at the college which the cathedral supports for the education of the Acolytes, or inferior Ministers. These boys, accompanied by a full orchestra, sing a lyric composition in Spanish, which, like the Greek choruses, consists of two or three systems of metres, to which the dancers move solemnly, going through a variety of figures in their natural step, till, ranged at the conclusion of the song, in two lines facing each other as at the outset, they end with a gentle caper, rattling the castanets, which hitherto lay silent and concealed in their hands. That this grotesque performance should be allowed to continue is, I believe, owing to the pride which this Chapter take in the privilege, granted by the Pope to the dancers, of wearing their hats within view of the consecrated host; a liberty which the King himself cannot take, and which, if I am not misled by report, no one besides can boast of, except the Dukes of Altamira; who, upon certain occasions, clap on their hat, at the elevation of the host, and draw the sword, as if showing their readiness to give a conclusive answer to any argument against transubstantiation.

["The Corpus-Christi procession begins to move out of the cathedral exactly at nine in the morning. It consists in the first place of the forty communities of Friars who have convents in this town. They follow one another in two lines, according to the established order of precedence. The strangeness and variety of their dresses, no less than their collective numbers, would greatly strike any one but a Spaniard, to whom such objects are perfectly familiar. Next appears the long train of relics belonging to the cathedral, placed each by itself on a small stage moved by one or more men concealed under the rich drapery which hangs on its sides to the ground. Vases of gold and silver, of different shapes and sizes, contain the various portions of the inestimable treasure whereof the following is an accurate catalogue:—

["A tooth of St. Christopher.

["An agate cup used at mass by Pope St. Clement, the immediate successor of St. Peter.

["An arm of St. Bartholomew.

["A head of one of eleven thousand virgins.

["Part of St. Peter's body.

["Ditto of St. Lawrence.

["Ditto of St. Blaise.

["The bones of the Saints Servandus and Germanus.

["Ditto of St. Florentius.

["The Alphonsine tables, left to the cathedral by King Alphonso the Wise, containing three hundred relics.

["A silver bust of St. Leander, with his bones.

["A thorn from our Saviour's crown.

["A fragment of the true cross.

["Last of all appears the body of Prebendaries and Canons, attended by their inferior Ministers. Such, however, is the length of the procession, and the slow and solemn pace at which it proceeds, that, without a break in the lines, it takes a whole hour to leave the church. The streets, besides being decorated with more taste than for the processions of the Passion Week, are shaded all the way with a thick awning, and the pave-

* See Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, cent. xiii., part ii., ch. iv., sect. 2. Also M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. ii., p. 67, et. seq.

["* This name is, as far as I know, peculiar to Seville. The similarity of its sound to that of sizars used at Cambridge, seems to denote a common origin in the two words.

ment is strewed with rushes. An article of the military code of Spain obliges whatever troops are quartered in a town where this procession takes place, to follow it under arms; and if sufficient in number, to line the streets through which it is to pass.

[" Under all these circumstances, the first appearance of the host in the streets is exceedingly imposing. Encircled by jewels of the greatest brilliancy, surrounded by lighted tapers, and enthroned on the massive yet elegant temple of silver, no sooner has it moved to the door of the church, than the bells announce its presence with a deafening sound, the bands of military music mix their animating notes with the solemn hymns of the singers, clouds of incense rise before the moving shrine, and the ear is thrilled by the loud voice of command, and the clash of the arms which the kneeling soldiers strike down to the ground. When the concealed bearers of the shrine present it at the top of the long street where the route commences, the multitudes which crowd both the pavement and windows, fall prostrate in profound adoration, without venturing to rise up till the object of their awe is out of sight. Flowers are often scattered from the windows, and the most beautiful nosegays adorn the platform of the movable stage.

[" Close behind the host follows the Archbishop, surrounded by his ecclesiastical retinue. One of his Chaplains carries a large double cross of silver, indicative of metropolitan dignity. The train of the purple mantle is supported by another Clergyman. These, like the rest of the Prelate's attendants and pages, are young men of family, who disdain not this kind of service, in the expectation of high Church preferment. But what gives all this state the most unexpected finish is an inferior Minister in his surplice bearing a circular fan of richly-embroidered silk about two feet in diameter, and attached to a silver rod six feet in length. At a convenient distance from the Archbishop this fan is constantly waved, whenever, during the summer months, he attends the cathedral service, thus relieving him from the oppressive effects of his robes under the burning sun of Andalusia. This custom is, I believe, peculiar to Seville." *]

Such was the rise of this great festival, and the manner in which it was celebrated; and so late was its institution in the Roman Church, to which it is confined at this day. The whole practice of the adoration of the host is novel, and was unknown to the primitive church, and to ancient writers; as can be abundantly shown, against the following unsupported canon of the Council of Trent in these words:—" Whoever shall affirm, that Christ, the only begotten Son of God, is not to be adored in the holy eucharist with the external signs of that worship which is due to God; and therefore that the eucharist is not to be honoured with extraordinary festive celebration, nor solemnly carried about in processions, according to the laudable and universal rites and customs of holy Church, nor publicly presented to the people for their adoration; and that those who worship the same are idolaters; let him be accursed." †

Thus the Roman Catholics address prayers and hymns to the sacrament as if it were the living God. They profess to believe, not only that God is in it, but that it is God. As such, they pray to it, and trust in it. To honour it, they believe is to honour God; and to contemn it, is to contemn him. In their estimation, there is no impiety equal to that of slighting the consecrated wafer; and no punishment too great for those who reject such worship, or who refuse to join in it.

[" It is an infinite scandal, especially to infidels and unbelievers, and an effectual prejudice to the propagation and entertainment of the Gospel in the world. It is the highest offence to a great part of the Christian world, to see men worship the host, and fall down to a bit of bread. The greatest part of the Greek Church, the Moscovites, Armenians, the Nestorians, the Maronites, Ethiopians, and the vast empire of the Abyssines, &c., and all the Protestant Churches, which together make a greater body of Christians than those in the communion of the Church of Rome, have an irreconcilable prejudice to the doctrine, and can never unite upon this foot. They ought, according to the Apostle's rule, upon this account, to remove the offence out of the way: 'That no man put a stumbling-block, or occasion of falling, in his brother's way.' (Rom. xiv. 13.) And, 'Give none offence, neither to the Jew nor the Gentile, nor to the church of God.' (1 Cor. x. 32.)

[" But what is more considerable, it is an infinite prejudice to the unbelieving world, and hinders the progress of the Gospel wherever it comes to be known. The Jewish, the Mahometan, the pagan world, look upon it as monstrous and ridiculous, for men to make their God, and eat him when they have done. It reflects an infinite dishonour upon the Christian doctrine, and exposes it to scorn and contempt.* They can never bring men to believe Christianity to be true, but upon reasons which will prove transubstantiation to be false, and there will be just so much reason against the one as there can be for the other. Indeed it destroys the great evidence upon which it ought to be received, and which was designed to convince the world. And though their zeal and industry in propagating the Christian religion in heathen countries, may justly deserve commendation, and, in some respects, be an example to others; yet we cannot but detest the shameless savings and deceitful shifts of their Missionaries, who conceal and dissemble the matter, and attempt to reconcile them by scandalous compliance, and false pretences; for the truth of which I appeal to the late conduct of the Jesuits in China.

[" If it be said, that this is nothing peculiar to their doctrine, that it gives offence to the world, for so did the doctrine of the cross at first; and the preaching of Christ crucified, by the Apostles, was to 'the Jews a stumbling-block,' and to 'the Greeks foolishness;' (1 Cor. i. 23;) I answer, it was so through their own fault; from the prejudices of their own minds, and the false notions they had entertained; not from the nature of the thing. There was nothing absurd and unreasonable, but the greatest wisdom and kindness, in saving the world by the death of Christ, which the Church of Rome acknowledges as well as we: but the case is otherwise here; the matter is infinitely absurd, and shocking to all reasonable nature. The offence arises from the nature of the thing, and is a scandal, not only to the unbelieving world, but to far the greater part of the Christian world too.

[" I shall deduce this corollary from what has been said, that the adoration of the host, the sacrifice of the mass as a propitiation for the quick and the dead, and the communion in one kind, are utterly groundless, and without foundation; for as they all go upon the supposition of transubstantiation, and entirely depend upon it, so if the foundation is removed, they must necessarily fall too.

[* Doblado's Letters from Spain, pp. 268—274.]

[† " Si quis dixerit, in sancto eucharistiæ sacramento Christum unigenitum Dei Filium non esse cultu latriæ, etiam externo, adorandum; atque ideo nec festiva peculiari celebritate venerandum, neque in processionibus, secundum laudabilem et universalem Ecclesiæ sanctæ ritum et consuetudinem, solemniter circumgestandum, vel non publice, ut adoretur, populo proponendum, et ejus adoratores esse idololatras; anathema sit"—Conc. Trid., sess. xiii., can. 6.

[" * 'Ecquam tam amentem esse putas, qui illud quo vescatur, Deum credat esse?'—Cicer. De Natur. Deor., lib. iii.

["I shall conclude with this practical reflection upon the whole. What just matter of astonishment is it, on the one hand, that so many nations of men, many of whom are of exquisite learning and refined sense; many, I doubt not, truly pious and devout, should ever be brought to agree in so complicated an absurdity, without any necessity, or probability, against all reason and possibility, and to so great a mischief and inconvenience to the Christian interest, with so little shadow of reason for it, and so many substantial and undeniable reasons against it! How unspeakable are the prejudices of education, the bias of worldly interest, and the awe of authority and power! One cannot forbear thinking of those awful words of the Apostle: 'Because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. For this cause God sent them strong delusions to believe a lie.' (2 Thess. ii. 10, 11.) No wonder that men of freer minds, or greater honesty, in Popish countries, are often tempted, when they apprehend so great an absurdity in the Christian doctrine, to throw off all belief of the Christian revelation, and become secret Deists; which is said to be the case especially in Italy, from whence this doctrine sprang, and where it is triumphant.

["And what reason have we, on the other hand, to be thankful to God, for the invaluable blessing of the Reformation, which delivered us from the tyranny and superstition of the Church of Rome, and restored, in so great a measure, the rights of conscience, and purity of the Christian worship? We partake of the ordinances of the Gospel, according to the institution of Christ, without the gross mixtures of superstition and idolatry. May it spread and prevail, in God's good time, through the whole Christian world, and be carried everywhere to a closer conformity to the Christian rule; may we never forfeit so great a blessing by our unworthiness and abuse; but ever enjoy it ourselves, and transmit it down to the latest posterity!" *]

CHAPTER VIII.

PENANCE—ABSOLUTION.

REMARKS on the sacrament of penance. It comprises absolution, contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Absolution considered. 1. Popery invests the Priest with the power of forgiving sins. Council of Trent quoted. Dens referred to. Roman Catechism cited. The form of absolution. The precatory form invalid. Dens quoted. Bishop Hay cited, and Milner: 2. Examination of the passages of Scripture which are quoted to establish it. Matt. xviii. 18, considered; John xx. 23: 3. The first Preachers never exercised such power: 4. No man can be qualified for exercising such an act as absolution, especially immoral Priests: 5. God only can forgive sins: 6. The primitive church never believed in the possession of such power: 7. In the exercise of which there is no proper distinction between the righteous and wicked: 8. The Scripture way of obtaining pardon is different from the Popish mode.

REPENTANCE embraces a great part of what the Gospel justly requires of man; the sole condition on which its benefits are bestowed, are "repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." (Acts xx. 21.) Although this doctrine is plain, there is scarcely any that is more obscured, misrepresented, or corrupted by the Church of Rome than it. Their numerous innovations on this part of the Christian system not only perplex the consciences of the scrupulous, but give encouragement to the vice and the excesses of the profligate. The Roman Church designates repentance, "penance," which they have made a sacrament. The following definition of it is given by the Council of Trent in the fourteenth session of that Synod. Canon 1. "Whoever shall affirm, that penance, as used in the Catholic Church, is not truly and properly a sacrament, instituted by Christ our Lord, for the benefit of the faithful, to reconcile them to God as often as they shall fall into sin after baptism; let him be accursed." Canon 4. "Whoever shall deny, that, in order to the full and perfect forgiveness of sins, three acts are required of the penitent, constituting, as it were, the matter of the sacrament of penance, namely, contrition, confession, and satisfaction, which are called the three parts of penance; or shall affirm that there are only two parts of penance, namely, terrors wherewith the conscience is smitten by the sense of sin, and faith produced by the Gospel, or by absolution, whereby the person believes that his sins are forgiven him through Christ; let him be accursed." *

Besides, they believe that the Clergy are endowed with the power of retaining and remitting sins. There are consequently four points included in, or connected with, the sacrament of penance, so called; namely, absolution, contrition, confession, and satisfaction; each of which will require a separate consideration.

1. We proceed to state the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this subject from their own acknowledged authorities. In the fourteenth session of the Council of Trent the doctrine of penance is laid down in nine chapters and fifteen canons. The Council declares, most unequivocally, that the Priest has the power of forgiving sin, not ministerially, but judicially; not by praying to God on behalf of the penitent for forgiveness, but as a judge or governor, pronouncing him pardoned. In commenting on the words, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," the Council says, chapter 1: "By this remarkable action, and by these express words, as the Fathers have by universal consent always understood the same, the power of forgiving and retaining sins, in order to reconcile the faithful who have sinned after baptism, was communicated to the Apostles and their lawful successors. And the Catholic Church hath, with good reason, rejected and condemned as heretics, the Novatians, who obstinately deny the power of forgiveness. Wherefore this holy Synod, approving and receiving the above most evident sense of these words of our Lord, condemns the vain interpretations of those persons who falsely restrict them to the power of preaching the word of God and publishing the Gospel of Christ, in opposition to the institution of this sacrament." * Speaking of baptized persons, the Council says: "If these afterward defile themselves by any transgression, it is not his will that they should be cleansed by a repetition of baptism, which is on no account lawful in the Catholic Church, but they should be placed as offenders before the tribunal of penance, that they may be absolved by the sentence of the Priests, not once only, but as often as they flee thereto, confessing their sins." † It is also declared by the Council: "Though the Priest's absolution is the dispensation of a benefit which belongs to another, yet it is not to be considered as merely a ministry, whether to publish the Gospel, or to declare the remission of sins, but as the nature of a judicial act, in which sentence is pronounced by him as a judge; and therefore the penitent ought not to flatter himself on account of his faith, so as that though he should have no contrition, and though the Priest should not intend to act seriously and really to absolve him, he should suppose that he is nevertheless truly absolved before God on the ground of his faith only; for faith without penance cannot procure remission of sins." ‡

[* Dr. Harris's Discourse concerning Transubstantiation, preached at Salters'-Hall, February 13th, 1734, pp. 38—43.]

[* "Si quis dixerit, in Catholica Ecclesia pœnitentiam non esse vere et proprie sacramentum pro fidelibus, quoties post baptismum in peccata labuntur ipsi Deo reconciliandis, a Christo Domino nostro institutum; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid. Can. et Decret., sess. xiv., De Pœnitentia, can. 1.

["Si quis negaverit, ad integram et perfectam peccatorum remissionem requiri tres actus in pœnitente, quasi materiam sacramenti pœnitentiæ, videlicet, contritionem, confessionem, et satisfactionem, quæ tres pœnitentiæ partes dicuntur; aut dixerit, duas tantum esse pœnitentiæ partes, terrores scilicet incussos conscientiæ, agnito peccato, et fidem conceptam ex Evangelio, vel absolutione, qua credit quis sibi per Christum remissa peccata; anathema sit."—Idem, can. 4.]

The two following canons expressly ascribe the power of absolution to be invested in the Priest:—"Whosoever shall affirm that the words of the Lord our Saviour, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained,' are not to be understood of the power of forgiving and retaining sins in the sacrament of penance, as the Catholic Church has always, from the very first, understood them; but shall restrict them to the authority of preaching the Gospel in opposition to the institution of this sacrament; let him be accursed." § "Whoever shall affirm that the Priest's sacramental absolution is not a judicial act, but only a ministry to pronounce and declare that the sins of the party confessing are forgiven, so that he believes himself to be absolved even though the Priest should not absolve seriously, but in jest; or shall affirm that the confession of the penitent is not necessary in order to obtain absolution from the Priest; let him be accursed." *

The absolution of a wicked Priest is as valid as that of a pious one. "The Council farther teaches, that even those Priests who are living in mortal sin exercise the function of forgiving sins, as the Ministers of Christ, by the power of the Holy Spirit conferred upon them in ordination; and that those who contend that wicked Priests have not this power hold very erroneous sentiments." † "Whoever shall affirm that Priests living in mortal sin have not the power of binding and loosing, or that Priests are not the only Ministers of absolution, &c.; let him be accursed." ‡ Dens says: "A wicked Priest can validly absolve, because Christ is the principal Minister." §

We also refer to the Catechism of the Council of Trent, by which the arrogant claims of the Popish hierarchy further appear: "Our sins are forgiven us by the absolution of the Priest. The voice of the Priest, who is legitimately constituted a Minister for the remission of sins, is to be heard as that of Christ himself, who said to the lame man, 'Son, be of good cheer; thy sins are forgiven thee.'" "The absolution of the Priest, which is expressed in words, seals the remission of sins, which it accomplishes in the soul." "Unlike the authority given to the Priests of the old law, to declare the leper cleansed from his leprosy, the power with which the Priests of the new law are invested is not simply to declare that sins are forgiven, but, as the Ministers of God, really to absolve from sin; a power which God himself, the author and source of grace and justification, exercises through their ministry." "There is no sin, however grievous, no crime, however enormous, or however frequently repeated, which penance does not remit." "Without the intervention of penance we cannot obtain or even hope for pardon. It is written, 'Unless you do penance you shall all perish.'" "The penitent must also submit himself to the judgment of the Priest, who is the Vicegerent of God, to enable him to award a punishment proportioned to his guilt." ‖

From the form of absolution the enormous claims of the priesthood will appear: it is as follows:—Ego te absolvo a peccatis tuis, in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti: "I absolve thee from thy sins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." But the essential part of the form is, Te absolvo, "I absolve thee." The forms, Absolvat te Christus, "May Christ absolve thee," or, Absolvat te Deus, "May God absolve thee," are considered invalid by most Roman Catholic Divines, because the Priest does not pray for pardon, but, on the contrary, bestows it authoritatively and officially.

[* "Quo tam, insigni facto et verbis tam perspicuis, potestatem remittendi et retinendi peccata, ad reconciliandos fideles post baptismum lapsos, Apostolis et eorum legitimis successoribus fuisse communicatum, universorum Patrum consensus semper intellexit. Et Novatianos, remittendi potestatem olim pertinaciter negantes, magna ratione Ecclesia Catholica tanquam hæreticos explosit, atque condemnavit. Quare verissimum hunc illorum verborum Domini sensum sancta hæc Synodus probans et recipiens, damnat eorum commentitias interpretationes, qui verba illa ad potestatem prædicandi verbum Dei, et Christi Evangelium annuntiandi, contra hujusmodi sacramenti institutionem falso detorquent."—Conc. Trid. Can. et Decret., sess. xiv., cap. i.]

[† "Nam hos si se postea crimine aliquo contaminaverint, non jam repetito baptismo ablui, cum id in Ecclesia Catholica nulla ratione liceat, sed ante hoc tribunal, tamquam reos, sisti voluit; ut per Sacerdotum sententiam non semel, sed quoties ab admissis peccatis ad ipsum pœnitentes confugerent, possent liberari."—Idem, sess. xiv., cap. 2.]

[‡ "Quamvis autem absolutio Sacerdotis alieni beneficii sit dispensatio; tamen non est solum nudum ministerium, vel annuntiandi Evangelium, vel declarandi remissa esse peccata; sed ad instar actus judicialis; quo ab ipso, velut a judice sententia pronuntiatur. Atque ideo non debet pœnitens adeo sibi de sua ipsius fide blandiri, ut, etiam si nulla illi adsit contritio, aut Sacerdoti animus serio agendi et vere absolvendi desit; putet tamen se, propter suam solam fidem, vere et coram Deo esse absolutum. Nec enim fides sine pœnitentia remissionem ullam peccatorum præstaret."—Idem, sess. xiv., cap. 6.]

[§ "Si quis dixerit, verba illa Domini Salvatoris; Accipite Spiritum Sanctum: quorum remiseritis peccata, remittuntur eis, et quorum retinueritis, retenta sunt: non esse intelligenda de potestate remittendi et retinendi peccata in sacramento pœnitentiæ, sicut Ecclesia Catholica ab initio semper intellexit; detorserit autem contra institutionem hujus sacramenti, ad auctoritatem prædicandi Evangelium; anathema sit."—Idem, sess. xiv., De Penitent., can. 3.]

[* "Si quis dixerit, absolutionem sacramentalem Sacerdotis non esse actum judicialem, sed nudum ministerium pronuntiandi et declarandi remissa esse peccata confitenti; modo tantum credat se esse absolutum; aut Sacerdos non serio, sed joco absolvat; aut dixerit non requiri confessionem pœnitentis, ut Sacerdos eum absolvere possit; anathema sit."—Idem, sess. xiv., can. 9.]

[† "Docet quoque, etiam Sacerdotes qui peccato mortali tenentur per virtutem Spiritus Sancti, in ordinatione collatam, tamquam Christi Ministros, functionem remittendi peccata exercere, eosque prave sentire qui in malis Sacerdotibus hanc potestatem non esse contendunt."—Idem, sess. xiv., cap. 6.]

[‡ "Si quis dixerit, Sacerdotes, qui in peccato mortali sunt, potestatem ligandi et solvendi non habere, aut non solos Sacerdotes esse Ministros absolutionis, &c.; anathema sit."—Idem, sess. xiv., can. 10.]

[§ "Malus enim Sacerdos potest valide absolvere, quia Christus est principalis Minister."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi., De Sacram. Pœnit., No. 108.]

‖ Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 256—263.

In confirmation of the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, as teaching that the Priest has the power of remitting and retaining sins, we refer to the opinions of some of their most celebrated Divines. Peter Dens asks, "What is the sense of the sacramental form, Ego te absolvo, &c.?—Ans. The sense is this: I judicially bestow on thee the grace of the remission of all thy sins, or grace of itself remissive of all thy sins, as far as is in the power of my ministry. This sense of the form cannot be admitted, 'I declare thee absolved,' because it is condemned by the Council of Trent, sess. xiv., can. 9."* Bishop Hay declares: "Jesus Christ gave to the Pastors of his Church, in the persons of his Apostles, the power of forgiving and retaining sins; and passed his sacred word that when they forgive a penitent's sins, by pronouncing the sentence of absolution upon him, they are actually forgiven, that is, are washed away from his soul by the grace of God then poured down into it."† Bishop Milner says: "This Church has uniformly taught that confession, and the Priest's absolution, where they can be had, are required for the pardon of the penitent sinner, as well as contrition and a firm purpose of amendment."‡ [Berington and Kirk, in the Faith of Catholics Confirmed, inform us, that "Catholics believe that when a sinner repents of his sins, from his heart, and acknowledges his transgressions to God and his Ministers, the dispensers of the mysteries of Christ, resolving to turn from his evil ways, and to bring forth fruit worthy of penance, there is, then, and not otherwise, an authority left by Christ to absolve such a penitential sinner from his sins; which authority, we believe, Christ gave to his Apostles and their successors, the Bishops and Priests of his Church, in these words, when he said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost,'" &c. §]

2. We proceed to examine those portions of Scripture which are usually quoted to establish this doctrine.

[The first to which we allude is that in Matt. xvi.: "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." The Rhemish Testament contains the following note on this passage:—

["Whatsoever thou shalt bind—All kinds of discipline and punishment of offenders, either spiritual (which directly is here meant) or corporeal, so far as it tendeth to the execution of the spiritual charge, are comprised under the word 'bind.' Of which sort be excommunications, anathematism, suspensions, degradations, and other censures and penalties, or penances, enjoined either in the sacrament of confession, or in the exterior courts of the Church, for punishment both of other crimes, and especially of heresy and rebellion against the Church, and the chief Pastors thereof.

["Verse 19. Loose—To loose is as the cause and the offender's case requireth; to loose them of any of the former bands, and to restore them to the Church's sacraments and communion of the faithful, and execution of their function; to pardon, also, either all or part of the penance enjoined, or what debts soever a man oweth to God or the Church, for the satisfaction of his sins forgiven. Which kind of releasing or loosing is called 'indulgence.' Finally: this 'whatsoever' excepteth nothing that is punishable or pardonable by Christ on earth; for he hath committed his power to Peter. And so the validity of Peter's sentence, in binding or loosing whatsoever, shall, by Christ's promise, be ratified in heaven. (Leo, Ser. de Transfig., et Ser. 2, in Annivers. Assumpt. ad Pontif. Hilar., can. 16, in Matth. Epiph. in Anchorato, prope initium.) If, now, any temporal power can show their warrant out of Scripture for such sovereign power as is here given to Peter, and consequently to his successors, by these words, 'whatsoever thou shalt bind,' and by the very keys, whereby greatest sovereignty is signified in God's church, as in his family and household, and therefore principally attributed and given to Christ, who in the Scripture is said to have the key of David, but here communicated also unto Peter as the name of 'rock;' if, I say, any temporal power can show authority for the like sovereignty, let them challenge hardly to be head, not only of one particular, but of the whole universal church."

[We now adduce the view of this text as generally held by orthodox Protestants:—

["And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, &c.—Some, who apply these words to Peter exclusively, understand by the gift of the keys the honour assigned to Peter to open the gates of the kingdom of heaven, that is, the perfected evangelical dispensation, to the Jews at the day of Pentecost, and then afterwards, to the Gentiles, when he went down to Cornelius at Cæsarea. Others, as the Papists, understand by the phrase the committal of a special authority to Peter over the church of Christ, of which it is certain that we have no evidence or illustration in the New Testament. The emblem of the keys was a familiar one to the Apostles, if the later Jewish writers have correctly described the ancient ceremony of constituting a Rabbi or Doctor of the law; for according to them the person admitted to this office had a key given to him as an emblem both of his ability and duty TO OPEN THE MEANING of the law, which key he wore as a badge of his office. Still, without any reference to this custom, supposing it as old as our Lord's day, the figure very naturally expresses the opening of 'the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven' BY PUBLIC TEACHING, and so setting open the doors of evangelical knowledge, and, by consequence, of the Christian church. This is a much more natural exposition of the emblem in this connexion, than that which regards it as significant of the committal of power and authority to govern the church; and is indeed pointed out with great clearness to be its meaning, by what follows as to the power of binding and loosing, which must be taken as exegetical of the power of the keys. These expressions are manifestly Jewish, and may therefore be satisfactorily explained by reference to this mode of speaking. With the Jews to bind and loose was a usual phrase for declaring what was lawful or unlawful; what was BINDING upon men's consciences; and that from the obligation of which they were LOOSED or free. Lightfoot, Schoetgen, and others, have produced a great number of examples from the Rabbinical writings: one or two instances will suffice. 'He asked one wise man, and he bound; do not ask another, lest perhaps he loose.' 'The school of Schammai binds it; the school of Hillel

[* "Quis est sensus formæ sacramentalis: Ego te absolvo, &c.?—R. Sensus est hic: Ego judicialiter tibi confero gratiam remissionis peccatorum tuorum, sive gratiam de se remissivam peccatorum tuorum, quantum est ex parte ministerii mei. Sensus formæ non potest admitti iste: Declaro te absolutum, quia id damnatum a Conc. Trid., sess. xiv., can. 9."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi., De Sacram. Pœnit., No. 14.]

† Sincere Christian, vol. ii., p. 69.

‡ End of Controversy, l etter 51.

[§ Faith of Catholics Confirmed, p. 292.]

looseth it.' 'Get thyself a heart to hear the words of them that pronounce unclean, and the words of them that pronounce clean; the words of them that bind, and the words of them that loose; the words of them that reject, and the words of them that declare it right.' Under these terms, therefore, our Lord gave his disciples authority to declare the laws of the Gospel dispensation under the guidance of his own teaching, and the inspiration of the Holy Spirit; which authoritative declaration of the terms of man's forgiveness, and how Christians ought to walk so as to secure the approbation of God, and that infliction of the divine displeasure which should follow disobedience, he promises should be confirmed 'in heaven;' as constituting his own law and rule of moral government to be laid down by them, first in their preaching, and then in their writings. It is this which distinguishes those writings from all others. They not only contain a revelation of truth from God, but they have an authority as LAW derived from this,—that God himself acts upon them. Whatever the Apostles have in those writings BOUND is a matter of conscience, it must be obeyed, not of choice merely, but necessity, since our salvation depends upon it; but whatever they have not bound is LOOSE to us, we are free from it, and no lower authority can make it binding upon the conscience, or connect with our disregard of it the penalty of the divine displeasure. But that this promise looked to that future time when they should be fully qualified for this great office, is evident from what took place after Christ's resurrection, when the same power, under a somewhat different form, but of precisely the same import, was ratified. After breathing upon them, he said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted to them; and whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained.' To qualify them for this authoritative declaration of what was obligatory upon men or otherwise, and of the terms upon which sins are remitted, and the circumstances under which they are retained, they previously received the Holy Ghost; a sufficient proof that this power was connected with the plenary inspiration of the Apostles, and beyond them it cannot extend. The manner, also, in which the Apostles exercised this power elucidates the subject, which has been greatly abused in the Romish and some other Churches. We have no instance of their forgiving the sins of any individual by virtue of any authority deposited with them, much less did they affect to transmit this power to their successors. They merely proclaimed and laid down the terms of pardon under the authority of Christ. And we have no instance of their 'retaining the sins' of any one, except by declaring the offender condemned by the laws of the Gospel, of which they were the teachers. They authoritatively explain in their writings the terms of forgiveness; and, as to duty, they state what is obligatory, or not obligatory, upon Christians; they pronounce sinners of various kinds to be under God's wrath, and they declare certain apostates to be put beyond forgiveness, but by their unbelief and blasphemies, and not by apostolic excommunication; and thus they bound or loosed, remitted sins or retained them. It is also to be remarked, as on the preceding verses, that whatever this power was, it was not given exclusively to Peter. Still he stands before the Lord as the representative of the rest of the Apostles, and receives nothing but what they all received; and hence, in chap. xviii. 18, our Lord says to them collectively, and in the plural form of address, 'Whatsoever YE shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever YE shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.' God will act upon your inspired decisions."*

[The second portion of divine truth which has been quoted in favour of priestly absolution, is that in John xx. 23: "Whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained." On which the Romish commentator remarks as follows:—

["Whose sins—Power to offer sacrifice, which is the principal function and act of priesthood, was given them at the institution of the blessed sacrament; the second and next special power of priesthood, consisting in remitting sins, is here bestowed on them. And, withal, the holy sacrament of penance, implying contrition, confession, and satisfaction in the penitent, and absolution on the Priest's part, is instituted. For inasmuch as express power and commission is given to Priests to remit or retain all sins; and that Christ promiseth, whose sins soever they forgive, they are of God forgiven also; and whose sins they retain, they are retained before God; it followeth necessarily, that we are bound to submit ourselves to their judgment for release of our sins. For this wonderful power were given them in vain, if none were bound to seek for absolution at their hands. Neither can any rightly seek for absolution from them, unless they confess particularly at least all their mortal offences, whether they be committed in mind, heart, will, and thought only, or in word and work. For God's Priests, being, in this sacrament of penance, constituted in Christ's stead, as judges in causes of our conscience, cannot rightly judge our cases without full and exact knowledge of all our sins, and the necessary circumstances and differences of the same. Which cannot otherwise be had by them, being mortal men, than by our plain, sincere, and distinct utterance to them of our sins, with humble contrite heart, ready to take and do penance according to their injunction. For that authority to retain sins consisteth especially in enjoining satisfaction and penitential works of praying, fasting, alms, and such like. All which God's ordinance whosoever condemneth or contemneth, as heretics do, or neglecteth, as some careless Catholics may perhaps do, let them be assured they cannot be saved."

[The Rev. Joseph Benson observes here:—"Whosesoever sins ye remit—According to the tenor of the Gospel; that is, supposing them to repent and believe; they are remitted. And whosesoever sins ye retain—Supposing them to remain impenitent and unbelieving, they are retained. So far is plain: but here arises a difficulty. Are not the sins of one who truly repents, and unfeignedly believes in Christ, remitted without the absolution by Christ's Ministers here spoken of? And are not the sins of one who does not repent and believe retained even with it? What, then, does this commission imply? Can it imply any more than, 1. A power of declaring with authority the Christian terms of pardon, whose sins are remitted and whose retained? as is done in the form of absolution contained in our Church-service: and, 2. A power of inflicting and remitting ecclesiastical censures? that is, of excluding from, and re-admitting into, a Christian congregation. Some, indeed, are of opinion, that something further than this is intended in this commission, as given to the Apostles, namely, the gift of discerning the spirits of men in such perfection, as to be able to declare with certainty to particular persons in question whether or not they were in a state of pardon and acceptance with God ; and it must be acknowledged, that such a gift was doubtless conferred, in certain cases, on some, if not on many, of the first Ministers of Christ, 1 Cor. xii. 10." *]

[* Watson's Exposition, in loc.

That these are the scriptural views of the subject will appear if we consider that this was the way in which the Apostles and first Ministers of Christ actually understood their commission : therefore, according to the word of God, no human being is qualified to exercise the power claimed by the Church of Rome ; God only can forgive sins ; and the primitive church, in its purest and best days, never referred the power of remitting or retaining sins, except declaratively or ministerially, to any but God.

3. That no such power as that which the Romish Priests claim was ever invested in the Apostles of Christ, or in the early Ministers of Christianity, by the abovementioned commission, we have indubitable proof, by their never attempting to exercise it, but always ascribing the forgiveness of sins to the Most High. After the resurrection, our Lord commanded his Apostles to declare, " that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations." (Luke xxiv. 47.) On the day of Pentecost, St. Peter preached, " Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." (Acts ii. 38.) When addressing the people on the occasion of the restoration of the blind man to sight, he instructed them in the same manner : " Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." (Acts iii. 19.) In the unfolding of the Christian dispensation we find nothing like priestly absolution. When St. Peter opened the door of faith to the Gentiles, he declared : " To him give all the Prophets witness, that through his name, whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." (Acts x. 43.) And St. Paul was sent to the Gentiles, " to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in me." (Acts xxvi. 18.)

The apostolical Epistles give no countenance to this modern doctrine of priestly absolution.

In the accounts recorded in the Old Testament respecting the pardon of sin, it is always ascribed to God, without any such ministry of man as that which is employed in the absolution of the Church of Rome. The passages of Scripture which assert this are too numerous to be quoted, and too plain to be misunderstood.

From all this the conclusion is inevitable, that no such power as that which is implied in this assumption of the hierarchy, has any countenance from Scripture. For as God only, under the dispensations which preceded Christianity, forgave iniquity without the interference of any such ministry as that claimed by Roman Catholics in their sacrament of penance ; and as neither the Apostles of Christ, nor any of his primitive Ministers, have left us examples to adopt the practice, or any rules to guide us in the administration, of such authority ; we infer that no such power is bestowed on the Gospel ministry.

4. No human being is or can be qualified to perform such a responsible act. If we consider the work of pardon, and the proper character of man, we may immediately infer that no human being is capable of transacting it. The work or act of forgiveness is of too solemn a nature, the parties concerned being an offended and insulted God and man the offending creature. If we consider the ignorance of man, he is utterly unqualified for the task ; for he who forgives must know the hearts and thoughts of the applicants before he can pronounce absolution in their case. This he never can accomplish. Besides, every man needs the pardon of his own sins. He is therefore utterly at a loss to undertake such a work as that of absolving a sinner. This reasoning will come with more force, when we consider that the Church of Rome calls the absolution of the Priest a judicial act, and not a ministerial or declarative one. The Priest is judge, although he is unqualified to decide, both from his own ignorance, and from himself being a party concerned.

The Church of Rome is by no means scrupulous concerning the moral character of the absolver. It is true, they generally recommend the Clergy to be pious ; but this is not insisted upon as being indispensable. The Priest may be guilty of mortal sin, and still dispense pardons to his fellow-men. The Council of Trent declares in one of her canons, quoted already, that "if any one says that Priests under mortal sin have no power to bind or loose ; let him be accursed." Thus, no matter how wicked a Priest may be, his pardons, pronounced officially, are as valid as those of the most holy saint in the world. What great encouragement this must give to the committal of crime, both among the Clergy and laity, is obvious to every person of common understanding.

5. Furthermore, " none can forgive sins but God alone." (Mark ii. 7 ; Luke v. 21.) This was the doctrine of the Jews, which our Lord confirmed when he declared that the Son of man had power upon earth to forgive sins. He did not contradict their doctrine, but established it ; and proved his own divinity in exercising that power. That God alone can and does forgive sin, we have ample proof from Scripture ; and the following passages will show it to be a prerogative that belongs to God alone, and which can never be exercised by any human being :—Exod. xxxiv. 7 ; Psalm cxxx. 4 ; Dan. ix. 9 ; Eph. iv. 32 ; Col. iii. 13 ; 1 John i. 9.

6. The primitive Church never believed that such power as that which is claimed by Roman Catholic Priests was ever given by Christ to his Ministers. They directed the people to God for this, who alone was qualified to bestow such inestimable blessings.

7. In the exercise of priestly absolution, no proper distinction is observed between the righteous and the wicked. The main ground on which the Papists attempt to maintain auricular confession is, that the Priest, having heard the particulars respecting the penitent's sins, may be able to judge whether the person is to be bound or loosed. But the affair is so transacted, that every man generally carries away with him his absolution, and all descriptions of people usually receive the same. " If thou take forth the precious from the vile, thou shalt be as my mouth, saith the Lord." (Jer. xv. 19.) But whose mouth can they be who make it their ordinary practice to pronounce the same sentence of absolution on the precious as they do upon the vile ? It is true there are occasional penances enjoined ; but these are of such a character, and so little distinction is made between the good and bad, that both are treated in a similar manner.

8. The Scripture way of obtaining pardon or justification, is altogether different from the Popish mode of bestowing it.

By the former we are exhorted to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, in order to obtain pardon and peace.

[* Benson's Commentary, in loc.]

"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." (John iii. 16.) "What must I do to be saved?" said the jailer; to whom the Apostle answered, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." (Acts xvi. 30, 31.) The truth concerning Christ, when received in the exercise of faith, establishes itself in the heart, and becomes the means of regeneration. The applicant sees sin in a light he never did before; and humbles himself before God in deep and unfeigned repentance. His repentance is not the effect of abstinence or bodily mortification, but the operation of the Holy Spirit, by means of the word of truth. Such an one is enabled to believe on the Redeemer with a heart unto righteousness, and, in believing, he is justified freely. To him the very thought of another than God, who could pardon, would be to think of another God. This was the sentiment of the Prophet Micah on this subject: "Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage? he retaineth not his anger for ever, because he delighteth in mercy." (Micah vii. 18.)

The manner, however, in which the Church of Rome pretends to vouchsafe the blessings of pardon and peace is very different from that of the Scripture. She professes to bestow it by means of the sacraments of baptism and penance; the former of which is founded on divine institution, but the latter is of human invention. Baptism, though of divine origin, is, as we have proved, much perverted in the Church of Rome. It was meant to be, among other important ends designed by it, a representation of the work of the Holy Spirit in renewing and sanctifying the soul; but they ascribe to it the power of regeneration. They admit the doctrine of original sin: but assert, that baptism takes it away, and procures pardon for all sin committed previous to its administration. Independently of this opposition to the divinely appointed way of giving peace to the conscience, their scheme contains in itself that which must for ever render it unsafe and insecure; inasmuch as the whole virtue of every sacrament depends on the intention of the Priest. No man can be certain that the Priest who baptized him, intended to do so at the time; and therefore, on their own principles, they cannot tell whether they have been regenerated or not. They are unable to show that the external rite of baptism makes a man any more holy than he was before. If the thing signified accompany the sign, a holy character is undoubtedly imparted: but the experience of many centuries has proved that this is not always the case; for we find persons, who have been baptized, on advancing to maturity, are as unholy as those who have not. This, however, gives the Church of Rome no concern; for she has in reserve the sacrament of penance, by which she professes to take away all the sins which a man may have committed after baptism. Persons living in the practice of every sin, may, as often as they please, on confessing to a Priest, obtain remission; this they are required to do once a year; at which time they receive an absolution, which is understood to be as effectual, and to satisfy the sinner as completely, as though he were favoured with a voice from heaven, assuring him that he was absolved on high.

[The secret force of conscience is proverbial. It is a force from which the most obdurate and the most depraved cannot shake themselves loose. They are often, by this invisible but irresistible power, driven from crime, in spite of themselves. But let this power be given to the winds; let the voice of conscience be hushed, and flattered into silence; let men know that they can at any time secure perfect safety here and hereafter; and what must be the consequence, but that they will plunge headlong, without one movement of hesitation, and without one feeling of remorse, into all the vices which they love, or to which circumstances may tempt them? Here, then, is a doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church at the very outset, which is slaying its thousands and its tens of thousands! Here, as on the altar of some bloody demon, whole hecatombs of human beings are offered up! Here is one of the master-devices of the arch foe of human kind, by which he is peopling his gloomy territories, and by which he is seducing multitudes to share with him in his destiny of eternal wretchedness and despair. The love of truth, love to our fellow-men, the love of Christ, constrain us to "cry aloud and spare not, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear."

[And wherefore any such contrivance, even were it not so ungainly in itself, and so widely separated from the doctrine and the genius of Scripture, when the Lord Jesus Christ, by his incarnation and his suffering, hath accomplished all that is necessary for our salvation? "In Christ we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace." There is a divinely appointed method for obtaining full and everlasting pardon of sin; but it is wisely guarded against those dangers and evils, which are inherent in the clumsy artifice of indulgences. There is pardon; but it is pardon placed on such a footing as to attach to it all the salutary effects of punishment. There is safety, perfect and infallible safety; but it is safety secured by such means as awaken the liveliest and strongest impressions of danger. Conscience is completely pacified and set at rest, and yet it is quickened into keener sensitiveness, and it is armed with more formidable power. The motive of love and of gratitude is brought into full and invincible operation, and yet the motive of fear is preserved in all its undiminished strength. In one word, God appears as the God of love; but he appears, at the same time, holy and inflexible, a God of vengeance: "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have embraced each other."]

CHAPTER IX.

CONFESSION.

1. Doctrine of Protestants concerning confession: 2. Auricular confession of the Church of Rome. Council of Lateran quoted. Council of Trent cited. Roman Catechism. The confiteor: 3. Proofs for it considered. James v. 16. Confession of the Jews to John the Baptist. "Whose sins ye remit." It is said to be necessary in order to ascertain the disposition of the sinner. Is without Scripture authority: 4. Scripture against it: 5. The argument from antiquity. The confession in use different from that of the Church of Rome. First, Private confession was not practised till nine hundred years after Christ; Secondly, It was only considered advisable, not necessary; Thirdly, The Fathers taught contrary thereto: 6. It perplexes the consciences of the pious: 7. The secrecy of confession. The Roman Catechism cited. Dens quoted: 8. It gives men licence to commit sin. It is put as a substitute for reformation. Specimens of questions asked: 9. It corrupts the Clergy. Bull against solicitants quoted: 10. The arguments in favour of it considered.

1. The Scripture declares, that "whoso confesseth and forsaketh his sins shall have mercy." (Prov. xxviii. 13.) All the sins that can be confessed are of the follow ing kinds; namely,—Those whereby the law of God is violated; those whereby some particular person is offended, as well as God; and those whereby scandal is brought upon the public society of Christians where we live, though no one be individually injured.

In reference to those sins whereby God is offended, we judge it to be proper and agreeable to his word, that men should confess, even privately, to good men; and especially to a pious Minister. Such a confession is commendable to a sinner who needs direction that he may overcome some particular temptation; or, when so overwhelmed with the burden and guilt of his transgression, that he requires some well-informed Christian to explain to him the terms on which the blessings of the Gospel are vouchsafed.

With regard to sins of the second class, namely, whereby the offender may have injured particular persons, he is not only bound to confess them to God, but also to the offended individual; and, as far as lies in his power, make restitution. This he is compelled to do by the natural laws of justice and equity, as well as by the requirements of the Gospel, Matt. v. 23, 24; in which case we see that it is not sufficient, when we have offended any one, to ask forgiveness of God only, we must also make reconciliation with our brother; otherwise we are incapable of offering up acceptable prayers to Almighty God.

In reference to those sins which injure the society of Christians, although no particular person is injured, the offender must confess such transgressions as publicly as they have been committed. Such confession is necessary, that the offending person may, as far as in him lies, remove the mischief which his bad example has produced. This was the practice of the primitive Church. When a man became immoral, if, upon admonition, he did not reform, he was immediately cast out from the communion of the faithful; and there was no other way to obtain re-admission into the Church, but by a confession and repentance as open and undisguised as his crime was public.

Such is the doctrine of Protestants concerning confession, and such may be justified before the world. But the Popish doctrine is different from this, and answers totally opposite purposes. After having stated their doctrine, we shall consider the arguments and Scripture passages which are advanced to support it, and then bring forward our reasons for having rejected the practice.

2. By confession they mean, not a confession to God, nor to an injured person, nor confession to the Church in cases of public offence or scandal; but private confession to a Priest, which they term auricular confession, because it is whispered in his ear. The penitent is bound to confess all his sins, especially mortal sins, as they are called, as far as he can remember them, together with all the circumstances connected therewith. This confession is with them a necessary part of repentance, and, indeed, indispensable in order to obtain pardon and salvation. We adduce the doctrine on confession, as established by two of their General Councils; the decisions of which they hold to be infallible and unalterable. The Council of Lateran decrees: "That every man and woman, after they come to years of discretion, should privately confess their sins to their own Priest, at least once a year, and endeavour faithfully to perform the penance enjoined on them; and after this they should come to the sacrament at least at Easter, unless the Priest, for some reasonable cause, judges it fit for them to abstain at that time. And whoever does not perform this is to be excommunicated from the Church; and if he die, he is not to be allowed Christian burial."*

[The doctrine of auricular confession to a Priest, was placed by the individual authority of Pope Innocent III., "among the duties prescribed by the divine laws; a confession that implied not only a general acknowledgment, but also a particular enumeration of the sins and follies of the penitent. Before this period, several Doctors indeed looked upon this kind of confession as a duty inculcated by divine authority; but this opinion was not publicly received as the doctrine of the Church. For though the confession of sins was justly looked upon as an essential duty, yet it was left to every Christian's choice to make this confession mentally to the Supreme Being, or to express it in words to a spiritual confidant and director. These two laws, which, by the authority of Innocent, were received as laws of God, and adopted, of consequence, as laws of the Church, occasioned a multitude of new injunctions and rites, of which not even the smallest traces are to be found in the sacred writings, or in the apostolic and primitive ages; and which were much more adapted to establish and extend the reign of superstition than to open the eyes of the blinded multitude upon the enormous abuses of which it had been the source."†]

The Council of Trent decrees:—

"Canon 6. Whoever shall deny that sacramental confession was instituted by divine command, or that it is necessary to salvation; or shall affirm that the practice of secretly confessing to the Priest alone, as it has been ever observed from the beginning by the Catholic Church, and is still observed, is foreign to the institution and command of Christ, and is a human invention; let him be accursed.

"Canon 7. Whoever shall affirm that, in order to obtain forgiveness of sins in the sacrament of penance, it is not by divine command necessary to confess all and every mortal sin which occurs to the memory after due and diligent premeditation—including secret offences, and those which have been committed against the two last precepts of the Decalogue, and those circumstances which change the species of sin; but that such confession is only useful for the instruction and consolation of the penitent, and was formerly observed merely as a canonical satisfaction imposed upon him; or shall affirm that those who labour to confess all their sins wish to leave nothing to be pardoned by the divine mercy; or, finally, that it is not lawful to confess venial sins; let him be accursed.

"Canon 8. Whoever shall affirm that the confession of every sin, according to the custom of the Church, is impossible, and merely a human tradition, which the pious should reject; or that all Christians, of both sexes, are not bound to observe the same once a year, according to the constitution of the great Council of Lateran; and therefore that the faithful in Christ are to be persuaded not to confess in Lent; let him be accursed."‡

[* "Omnis utriusque sexus fidelis, postquam ad annos discretionis pervenerit, omnia sua solus peccata confiteatur fideliter, saltem semel in anno, proprio Sacerdoti, et injunctam sibi pœnitentiam studeat pro viribus adimplere, suscipiens reverenter ad minus in Pascha eucharistiæ sacramentum; nisi forte de consilio proprii Sacerdotis, ob aliquam rationabilem causam ad tempus ab ejus perceptione duxerit abstinendum: alioquin et vivens ab ingressu Ecclesiæ arceatur, et moriens Christiana careat sepultura."—Conc. Labb., tom. xi., pars i., Conc. Lat. iv., decret. xxi. De confessione facienda, et non revelanda a Sacerdote, et saltem in Pascha communicando, pp. 171, 173. Fol. Lutet. Paris, 1671.]

[† Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., Cent. xiii., chap. iii., part ii., sect. 2.]

[‡ "Can. 6. Si quis negaverit, confessionem sacramentalem vel institutam, vel ad salutem necessariam esse jure divino; aut dixerit,

From the Catechism of the Council of Trent we take the following :—"Mortal sins, as we have already said, although buried in the darkest secrecy, and also sins of desire only, such as are forbidden by the ninth and tenth commandments, are all and each of them to be made matter of confession."....."With the bare enumeration of our mortal sins we should not be satisfied ; that enumeration we should accompany with the relation of such circumstances as considerably aggravate or extenuate their malice." ["Some circumstances are such as of themselves to constitute mortal guilt : on no account or occasion whatever, therefore, are such circumstances to be omitted. Has any one imbrued his hands in the blood of his fellow-man ? he must state whether his victim was a layman or an Ecclesiastic. Has he had criminal intercourse with any one ? he must state whether the female was married or unmarried, a relative or a person consecrated to God by vow. These are circumstances which alter the species of the sins : the first is called 'simple fornication;' the second, 'adultery;' the third, 'incest;' and the fourth, 'sacrilege.' Again : theft is numbered in the catalogue of sins ; but if a person has stolen a guinea, his sin is less grievous than if he had stolen one or two hundred guineas, or a considerable sum ; and if the stolen money were sacred, the sin would be still aggravated. To time and place the same observation equally applies ; but the instances in which these circumstances alter the complexion of an act are so familiar, and are enumerated by so many writers, as to supersede the necessity of a lengthened detail. Circumstances such as these are, therefore, to be mentioned ; but those which do not considerably aggravate may be lawfully omitted."] After censuring those who justify or extenuate their sins, the Catechism declares : "Still more pernicious is the conduct of those who, yielding to a foolish bashfulness, cannot induce themselves to confess their sins. Such persons are to be encouraged by exhortation, and to be reminded that there is no reason whatever why they should yield to such false delicacy ; that to no one can it appear surprising if persons fall into sin, the common malady of the human race, and the natural appendage of human infirmity."* If this quotation be not an apology for the commission of sin, and also for the repetition thereof, it will be difficult to say what an apology for sin is.

This is the avowed doctrine of the Church of Rome, given from her infallible standards. We proceed to notice her practice by a quotation from the Garden of the Soul.

modum secrete confitendi soli Sacerdoti, quem Ecclesia Catholica ab initio semper observavit et observat, alienum esse ab institutione et mandato Christi, et inventum esse humanum ; anathema sit.

["Can. 7. Si quis dixerit, in sacramento pœnitentiæ ad remissionem peccatorum necessarium non esse jure divino, confiteri omnia et singula peccata mortalia, quorum memoria cum debita et diligenti præmeditatione habeatur, etiam occulta, et quæ sunt contra duo ultima Decalogi præcepta, et circumstantias, quæ peccati speciem mutant ; sed eam confessionem tantum esse utilem ad erudiendum, et consolandum pœnitentem, et olim observatam fuisse tantum ad satisfactionem canonicam imponendam ; aut dixerit, eos qui omnia peccata confiteri student, nihil relinquere velle divinæ misericordiæ ignoscendum ; aut demum, non licere confiteri peccata venialia ; anathema sit.

["Can. 8. Si quis dixerit, confessionem omnium peccatorum, qualem Ecclesia servat, esse impossibilem, et traditionem humanam, a piis abolendam ; aut ad eam non teneri omnes et singulos utriusque sexus Christi fideles, juxta magni Concilii Lateranensis constitutionem, semel in anno ; et ob id suadendum esse Christi fidelibus, ut non confiteantur tempore Quadragesimæ ; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid., Canon. et Decret., sess. xiv. ; De Pœnit. Sacr., can. 6—8.]

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 277, 278, 283, 284.

["INSTRUCTIONS AND DEVOTIONS FOR CONFESSION.

["IN order to prepare yourself to make a good confession, endeavour, in the first place, to recommend the matter earnestly to God ; and for some days beforehand frequently and fervently beg his divine grace and assistance ; and this more especially, if you have for a long time lived in a habit of sin : in which case it is most proper to prepare yourself by a spiritual retreat of some days ; during which time you may seriously enter into yourself, and perform the ten meditations, (which we have transcribed from St. Francis de Sales,) or such like devotions, by which you may be sufficiently disposed for so great a work ; which otherwise, it is to be feared, might be ill done, by being done too hastily.

["Examine your conscience with care and diligence, yet without too much anxiety and scrupulosity. Consult the table of sins to assist your memory ; and reflect in particular on the evil inclinations you are most subject to, on the places and companies you have been in, on your usual employments, on the duties of your calling, and how you have discharged them, &c. And in every sin, whether of commission or omission, strive to call to your remembrance the number of times you have been guilty.

["When you have duly examined your conscience, do not think this is all you have to do to be rightly prepared for confession : the greatest part of the work remains still to be done ; and that is to take proper time and care to procure a hearty sorrow and detestation of all your sins, by which you have offended so good a God, with a full determination, by his grace, to avoid the like sins for the future, and to fly the occasions that usually bring you to sin ; and to take proper measures to begin a new life.

["In order to obtain this hearty sorrow for your sins, and this firm purpose of amendment, you must earnestly beg it of God, whose gift it is ; and you must make use of such prayers, considerations, and meditations, as may be most proper to move you to it. Particularly reflect on the four last things ; on the enormity of sin ; on the goodness of God, and his benefits to you ; on the death and passion of Christ, &c. And when you have obtained this hearty sorrow and resolution, then you may hope that you are sufficiently prepared for confession, and not till then.

["If you have any thing upon your conscience, which you have a particular difficulty of confessing, cease not with prayers and tears to importune your heavenly Father to assist you, till he gives you the grace to overcome that difficulty : and be sure never to go to confession with a design of telling a lie to the Holy Ghost. Ah ! what a comfort it will be to you to ease your conscience of its load ! and what a rack and torture sacrilegiously to conceal it !

["Let your confession be humble, without seeking excuses for your sins, or flinging the fault on others : let it be entire as to the kind and number of your sins, and such circumstances as quite change the nature of the sin, or greatly increase its guilt. Be modest in your expressions, and take care not to name any third person.

["AN EXAMINATION OF CONSCIENCE UPON THE TEN COMMANDMENTS.

["I. HAVE you been guilty of heresy or disbelief, or wilful doubting of any article of faith ? How often ? and for how long a time ? Or have you rashly exposed yourself to the danger of infidelity, by reading bad books, or keeping wicked company? How often?

["Have you by word or deed denied your religion, or gone to the churches or meetings of heretics, so as to join any way with them in the worship, or to give scandal? How often?

["Have you been ignorant of the articles of your Creed, of the Commandments, or of any of those things which Christians in your station are bound to know? For how long a time?

["Have you been negligent in the worship of God? seldom or never adoring and praising him, or giving him thanks; praying but little or with little attention; and neglecting to make acts of faith, hope, or love of God? How long has this negligence continued?

["Have you despaired of salvation or of the forgiveness of your sins? Or have you rashly presumed upon finding mercy: going on in your sins without any thoughts of amendment; or depending upon a death-bed repentance? How long have you been in this way?

["Have you been guilty of idolatry, or of giving divine honours to any thing created? or used any witchcraft, or charms, or spells, or such like other diabolical inventions? How often? And with what scandal or ill example to others?

["Have you employed prayers, or sacred names, to superstitious uses? How often?

["Have you consulted fortune-tellers, or made use of any superstitious practices, to find out things to come, recover things lost, &c.? How often?

["Have you given credit to dreams, taken notice of omens, or made any other superstitious observations? How often?

["Have you blasphemed God or his saints? How often?

["Have you abused the holy Scriptures, or scoffed at holy things? How often?

["II. Have you sworn falsely, or what you did not certainly know, whether it was true or false? Or have you sworn to do any thing that was wicked or unlawful? Or broken your lawful oaths? How often?

["Have you had a custom of swearing rashly and inconsiderately by the name of God, by your soul, or by the way of imprecation upon yourself? How long have you had this custom? How many times a day have you sworn in this manner? Have you sworn by the blood or wounds of God, or any other blasphemous oath? How often?

["Have you cursed yourself or others; and if so, was it from your heart? How often?

["Have you been accessary to others swearing, cursing, or blaspheming? How often?

["III. Have you neglected to hear mass upon Sundays and holydays of obligation? Or have you heard it with wilful distractions? Or not taken care that your children and servants should hear it? How often? Have you spent those days in idleness, or in sin? Or been the occasion of others spending them so? How often?

["Have you done any servile work without necessity upon those days; or set others on doing so? How often?

["Have you broken the days of abstinence commanded by the Church, or eaten more than one meal on fasting-days? Or been accessary to others so doing? How often?

["Have you neglected to confess your sins once a year? Or to receive the blessed sacrament at Easter?

["Have you made a sacrilegious confession or communion, by concealing some mortal sin in confession, or what you doubted might be mortal; or for want of a hearty sorrow for your sins, and a firm purpose of amendment; or by being grossly negligent in the examination of your conscience? How often?

["Have you received any other sacrament, for example, confirmation, or matrimony, in mortal sin?

["Have you neglected to perform the penance enjoined in confession? Or said it with wilful distractions? How often?

["Have you presumed to receive the blessed sacrament after having broken your fast?

["Have you, after falling into mortal sin, neglected for a long time to return to God by repentance? And for how long a time?

["IV. Have you been wanting in your duty to your parents, by not loving them, or not showing them due respect; or by disobeying them? and was it in any matter of moment? Or have you been disobedient to any other lawful superiors? How often?

["Have you desired your parents' death? Or cursed them? Or given them injurious language? Or lifted up your hand against them? Or threatened them? Or provoked them to swear, or otherwise to offend God? Or caused them any considerable trouble or uneasiness? How often?

["Have you stolen from your parents, or otherwise wronged them? Or squandered away their substance? How much, and how often?

["Have you neglected to succour your parents in their necessities, either corporal or spiritual?

["If God has blessed you with children, have you been negligent in procuring that they should be speedily baptized? Or that they should be timely instructed in their prayers and the Christian doctrine? Or have you been wanting in giving them early impressions of the fear and love of God? Or in taking care of their discharging their duty with regard to the sacraments?

["Have you neglected to correct them; or been excessive in your correction?

["Have you neglected to remove from them the occasions of sin, such as wicked companions, bad books, romances, &c., or suffered them to lie in the same bed with one another, with danger to their chastity?

["Have you flattered them in their passions or indulged them in their evil inclinations? Have you given them bad example? How often, and in what kind?

["V. Have you desired any one's death through hatred or malice? Or for your temporal interests? How often?

["Have you revenged yourself of any one by word or action; or desired revenge, or taken pleasure in the thoughts of it? How often?

["Have you provoked, challenged, or struck others, or been guilty of quarrelling or fighting with them? How often? And what mischief have you done them?

["Have you borne malice to others, or refused to be reconciled to them? For how long a time? And what sort of evil had you in your heart against them?

["Have you procured, or thought to procure, a miscarriage? Or given any counsel, aid, or assistance thereunto? How often?

["Have you done any thing to shorten your own or any other's life, or to hasten death? Or rashly exposed yourself or others to danger? How often?

["Have you desired your own death, through passion or impatience? Or entertained any thoughts of making away with yourself; or attempted or designed any such thing? How often?

["Have you neglected to give alms according to your condition and ability? Or to reclaim sinners when it lay in your power? How often?

["Have you been guilty of any spiritual murder, by drawing others into mortal sin? Or have you been accessary to the sins of others, by counsel or command, or any other way? How often? And what sins?

["Have you given scandal, or occasion of sin to others, by lewd or irreligious discourse; by drunkenness or swearing; by immodesty of dress or behaviour, &c.? Where note, that the circumstance of scandal is generally found in all sins that are known to others by reason of the force of ill example, which encourages others to sin?

["Have you committed any thing that you judged or doubted to be a mortal sin, though perhaps it was not so? How often? Or have you exposed yourself to the evident danger of mortal sin? How often? And what sin?"*]

[The interrogatories connected with the seventh Commandment (the sixth of the Roman Catholics) are so indecent that we purposely omit them. Their publication, by Bishop Chaloner, gives fearful indication what a cage of unclean thoughts his heart must have been, when such sentiments were indited and circulated among a people professing to be the followers of Christ, and the members of a pure and holy Church. Nevertheless, the obscene pages of Dr. Chaloner are purity unsullied when compared with those of Peter Dens. We cannot enter the confessional with him as our guide. The instructions with which he furnishes the Priests, treat of subjects which we dare not name. How agonizing must be the feelings of a husband or a father, when hearing those principles of polluting obscenity with which the mind of the Priest is replete, for the examination of his wife and daughters in the dark and secret confessional, where the poor, unprotected female, bound under terror, and constrained of necessity to eternal silence, can have no refuge or escape, no husband or father at hand, to hear and to drag from his den the monster who, under the cloak of religion, can put every feeling of the heart upon the rack, and, in proportion to her delicacy, her sensibility, her very reverence for what she unhappily believes to be an ordinance of God, instead of an invention of Satanic guilt and tyranny, can bow her spirit into his power, humble her into the very dust beneath his feet, if she be virtuous; or drag her, if it be possible, and he be so inclined, into the paths of profligate seduction! No Popish Priest can translate certain portions of the instructions for the confessional, then look a Roman Catholic husband or father in the face, and tell him of the purity and divinity of the auricular service, when he sees the questions which the Priest dares to put to his wife or daughter, but which she is compelled to bury within that bosom which has been so cruelly wrung and tortured during the diabolical investigation. Let any parent become acquainted with the unpronounceable abominations of Dens's Theology on this topic, and he would with pleasure exchange the horrors of the confessional for the persecutions of heresy, and prefer the stake for his wife or daughter to the racks of that moral inquisition to which she is there compelled to submit. No mother who regards her offspring with a parent's love, could undertake to prepare her child to answer the infernal catechism which is thrown open to the tyranny, the licentiousness, or the curiosity of a Priest in the confessional of Dens's Theology. No husband that was not the betrayer instead of the guardian of his wife, could whisper in her ear what she is compelled to listen to in the dark demoniacal confessional of Dens's Theology. If that bond of Satanic secrecy which they call the seal, and which is their principal engine for extorting the thoughts of the heart, were to be broken, no female could ever dare to utter to sister, mother, husband, or any human ear, what she has been forced to hear and speak, when stretched on the rack of the confessional of Dens's Theology. Here is the mighty secret of this inquisitorial cell of iniquity and of death; it is not the system of licentiousness, awful as this is, but the universal and illimitable tyranny which it upholds. It is not its effect upon the female mind or feelings, but the awful subjection into which, necessarily and unconsciously, it brings the minds of men, and prostrates the heart of a nation into abject submission to a wicked priesthood. No man of common intellect could dive into the secrets of this prison-house, could read the iniquity of that confessional, and doubt for a moment the awful state of bondage and horrible subjection into which it must subdue the female mind; and in proportion to the virtue, the delicacy, the religious feelings of that mind, so must be the aggravated awe with which it contemplates a power that has burst all the barriers with which heaven has encompassed it, broken into all its inmost thoughts, and which it has blindly learned to consider as the power of God. But we forbear.*]

["VII. Have you been guilty of stealing, or cheating, or any way wronging your neighbour in buying or selling, or any other bargains or contracts? Or have you been accessary to another's committing any such injustice? How often? and to what value?

["Have you unjustly retained what belonged to another? How long? And to what prejudice?

["Have you caused any damage to your neighbour in his house, cattle, or other goods? How often?

["Have you contracted debts without design of paying them; or without any prospect of being able to pay them? Or have you delayed or refused to pay your just debts when you were able? Or have you by prodigal expenses rendered yourself unable, and so wronged your creditors, or your own family? How often?

["Have you been guilty of usury, in the loan of money? How often?

["Have you put off false money? How much? How often?

["Have you professed any art, or undertaken any business without sufficient skill or knowledge? And what prejudice has your neighbour suffered from it?

["Have you bought or received stolen goods? Or taken of those who could not give? How often?

["Have you neglected your work or business to which you were hired, or by contract obliged? How often? And to what prejudice? Or have you broken your promises in matters of consequence?

["N. B. That in all sins of injustice whereby one has done wrong to one's neighbour, either in his person, or in his goods, or in his character, honour, or good name, one is strictly obliged to make full satisfaction and restitution, if it be in one's power, otherwise the sin will not be forgiven.

[* Garden of the Soul, pp. 217, 218, 222—226.]

[* See Romanism as it rules in Ireland, vol. ii., p. 136, et seq.

["Have you, then, neglected or delayed without just cause to make satisfaction and restitution, when it was in your power? How long?

["VIII. Have you been guilty of lies? And whether of consequence, or to the prejudice of any one? How often?

["Have you been guilty of hypocrisy or dissimulation? How often?

["Have you entertained a bad opinion of your neighbour without grounds, or judged rashly of his actions or intentions? How often?

["Have you been guilty of the sin of detraction, which consists in taking away or lessening your neighbour's reputation, either by saying of him what is false or uncertain, or by publishing what is secret? How often have you done so? Before how many? You are obliged to make restitution.

["Have you willingly given ear to detraction? Have you taken pleasure in it? Or any way encouraged it? Or not hindered it when you might? How often?

["Have you injured your neighbour's honour by prejudices and affronts, or robbed him of his peace of mind by scoffs and derision? How often?

["Have you, by carrying stories backwards and forwards, or any other way, caused misunderstanding or quarrels betwixt neighbours? How often? And to what prejudice?

["Here also Judges, Lawyers, Solicitors, &c., ought to examine themselves what injustice they may have been guilty of in managing causes, &c., as well as accusers, witnesses, &c.

["X. Have you desired your neighbour's loss or misfortune, or any public calamity, that you might be the gainer by it? How often?

["Have you desired your neighbour's goods, not caring whether you had them right or wrong? Or been in a disposition of stealing or otherwise wronging him if it lay in your power? How often?

["As to the capital or deadly sins. Have you been guilty of pride, or complacency in yourself, or contempt of others? Or of vain-glory, by doing good actions to procure esteem? Or of avarice, in affecting too much the things of this world? How often?

["Have you been guilty of eating and drinking to excess, so far as considerably to endanger your health or reason? How often? And with what scandal?

["Have you made others drunk? Or sought to make them so? Or gloried in having made them so? How often?

["Have you gloried in any other sin whatsoever? How often? And before what company? And what sin?

["Have you envied or repined at your neighbour's good? Or rejoiced at his harm? How often?

["The rest of the capital sins have been examined before. Here also masters and servants, husbands and wives, Lawyers and Physicians, Ecclesiastics and Magistrates, &c., ought to examine into the sins which are peculiar to their states, and how far they may have neglected the duties of their respective callings.

["THE METHOD OF CONFESSION.

["1. KNEELING down at the side of your ghostly father, make the sign of the cross, saying,

["'In name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.'

["Then ask his blessing in these words:—

["'Pray, Father, give me your blessing, for I have sinned.'

["Then say the first part of the Confiteor as follows:—

["'I confess to Almighty God, to the blessed Virgin Mary, to blessed Michael the archangel, to blessed John Baptist, to the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, to all the saints, and to you, father, that I have sinned exceedingly, in thought, word, and deed, through my fault, through my fault, through my most grievous fault.'

["2. After this accuse yourself of your sins, either according to the order of God's commandments, or such other order as you find most helpful to your memory; adding after each sin, the number of times that you have been guilty of it, and such circumstances as may very considerably aggravate the guilt; but carefully abstaining from such as are impertinent or unnecessary, and from excuses and long narrations.

["3. After you have confessed all that you can remember, conclude with this or the like form:—

["'For these and all other my sins, which I cannot at this present call to my remembrance, I am heartily sorry; purpose amendment for the future; and most humbly ask pardon of God, and penance and absolution of you my ghostly father.

["'Therefore I beseech the blessed Mary ever Virgin, blessed Michael the archangel, blessed John Baptist, the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, all the saints, and you, father, to pray to our Lord God for me.'

["Then give attentive ear to the instructions and advice of your Confessor, and humbly accept of the penance enjoined by him.

["4. Whilst the Priest gives you absolution, bow down your head, and with great humility call upon God for mercy; and beg of him that he would be pleased to pronounce the sentence of absolution in heaven, whilst his Minister absolves you upon earth.

["5. After confession, return to your prayers; and after having heartily given God thanks for having admitted you, by the means of this sacrament, to the grace of reconciliation, and received you, like the prodigal child, returning home, make an offering of your confession to Jesus Christ, begging pardon for whatever defects you may have been guilty of in it: offering up your resolutions to your Saviour, and begging grace that you may fulfil them.

["6. Be careful to perform your penance in due time, and in a penitential spirit."*]

3. We object to auricular confession, because the Papists make it to be Christ's institution, and necessary to salvation, although it has no foundation in the word of God. Several portions of Scripture have been adduced by those who teach this doctrine.

The principal passage, and that on which they chiefly rely, is the following:—"Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another." (James v. 16.) The plain import of this passage undoubtedly is, that all Christians should mutually confess their faults to one another. (1.) It is not said, "Confess your faults to the Elders;" but "to one another." (2.) It requires the Priest to confess to the people, as much as the people to the Priest. (3.) In it there is no mention made of absolution by a Priest, or by any other individual. For these reasons, auricular confession to a Priest derives no support from it.

[* Garden of the Soul, pp. 227—230, 240, 241.]

The confession of the Jews, on the occasion of John the Baptist's preaching, though occasionally quoted for the purpose, does not establish the practice. Their confession was widely different from that practised by the Church of Rome. It was an acknowledgment of sins, not to John, but to God; it was not a particular but a general confession, which was frequent in the Old Testament, (Ezra ix.; Neh. ix.; Dan. ix.,) and similar to that which the High Priest made on the day of "atonement of all the iniquities of the children of Israel;" it was not required by the Baptist, but one voluntarily made by themselves: in all these circumstances, therefore, it differs widely from the auricular confession inculcated by the Popish hierarchy.

The Council of Trent endeavours to make this new doctrine depend on the words of Christ recited by St. John: "Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted," &c. Let it, however, be observed, (1.) That the class of Doctors called "the Canonists," as Aquinas, Bonaventure, Cajetan, and Jansenius, do not allow that confession was instituted by Christ, and assert, that from the words of Christ confession to a Priest cannot be inferred. (2.) That among those who derive the doctrine from these words, there is great discrepancy in the manner in which they arrive at the conclusion, showing great confusion of sentiment. Therefore, since so many learned men of the Roman Catholic Church maintain that this doctrine is not to be found in quotations from St. John; and even those who allow it to be found there, are endlessly divided about the mode of exposition; we conclude that this passage affords no sure ground on which to build auricular confession.

It is said that this practice is necessary to ascertain the disposition of sinners, for the purpose of properly administering absolution. This argument is confuted, by overturning that on which the doctrine of absolution is founded; which has, we think, already been done. As far as the administration of the absolution spoken of in the Gospel is concerned, namely, declaring the terms of salvation, the dispositions of a penitent may as truly be ascertained without as with a particular confession. A man may fully confess all the sins he can recollect, and express the greatest sorrow for them, with apparent purposes of amendment, yet in the real dispositions of his heart he may be truly a hypocrite. On the other hand, the penitent may manifest sincere sorrow for sin, without entering into detail.

In a word, the Romanists cannot produce one text of Scripture wherein auricular sacramental confession of sins to a Priest is recommended either by our Lord or his Apostles; or wherein it does appear that it was practised by any Christian, either of the Clergy or laity, in any instance; or one text in which it is so much as mentioned. Therefore, to impose private confession, as a necessary condition of repentance, on the Christian world, under pain of damnation, is a most unwarrantable assumption of priestly influence and spiritual authority.

4. As there is no command, no practice, no mention of this sacramental private confession in Scripture, so there is much against it.

According to the sacred writings, we find that the confession which the penitent sinner makes to God alone has the promise of forgiveness annexed to it; which no Priest on earth hath power to render void. "I acknowledged my sin unto THEE, and mine iniquity have I not hid: I said, I will confess my transgressions unto THE LORD; and THOU forgavest the iniquity of my sin." (Psalm xxxii. 5.) And lest any should imagine that this was some special privilege vouchsafed to himself, the Psalmist draws this general conclusion in the following verse:—"For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee, in a time when thou mayest be found." Solomon, in his supplication for the people at the dedication of the temple, follows the example of his father David. "If they turn and pray unto thee in the land of their captivity, saying, We have sinned, we have done amiss, and have dealt wickedly; if they return to thee with all their heart, and with all their soul, in the land of their captivity, whither they have carried them captives, and pray toward their land which thou gavest unto their fathers, and toward the city which thou hast chosen, and toward the house which I have built for thy name: then hear thou from the heavens, even from thy dwelling-place, their prayer and their supplications, and maintain their cause, and forgive thy people, which have sinned against thee." (2 Chron. vi. 37—39.) The publican cried, "God be merciful to me a sinner," and went down to his house justified. St. John assures us, "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." (1 John i. 9.) Examining, with ordinary attention, the instructions given to the first Christian churches in the Acts of the Apostles, and in the Epistles of St. Paul, St. James, St. Peter, and St. John, we find that, on the condition of repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ, remission of sins was imparted; not only of those committed before, but also of sins subsequent to baptism.

It will appear from what has been said, how little evidence there is for the assertion that sacramental confession was instituted by Christ and by him made necessary to salvation. The strength, however, of the Romanists, on this point, as well as on several others, does not lie in Scripture, but in the proof which they profess to bring from antiquity. They without hesitation affirm that this was the doctrine of the Fathers, and the practice of the primitive church.

5. Before we enter on the discussion of the argument from antiquity, we allow that public confession of sins in the face of the Church, especially of notorious, scandalous sins, was much in use in the ancient times; and that private confession to a discreet Minister, in order to obtain direction and comfort, was both frequently recommended and practised, especially after public acknowledgment fell into desuetude. But having conceded this, we assert that it proves nothing in favour of auricular confession.

It must also be observed, that the dispute is not concerning the existence or lawfulness of confession, whether general or particular, but respecting the religious obligation of it on the conscience, and whether it be, as they maintain, necessary to pardon and salvation. Having premised these things, we assert that private confession of sin to a Priest is not supported by early ecclesiastical history.

First. Private confession in all cases was never thought of as a command of God until nine hundred years after Christ; nor was it decided as such till the Council of Lateran in 1215, which was the same Synod that mooted the doctrine of transubstantiation, and justified the deposition of Princes in case they were heretical, or did not extirpate heretics. By this Council it was only enjoined as an ecclesiastical constitution. But that of Trent, in the year 1545, decreed private confession to a Priest to be an ordinance of Christ, and absolutely necessary to salvation. So that whatever may be said of auricular confession as it now stands, it was never considered to be a law of the Church, or necessary to the eternal welfare of the penitent, until modern times.

Secondly. It cannot be proved by any testimony of antiquity, that private confession to a Priest was viewed any further than as a prudential and useful regulation.

Thirdly. The Fathers taught a doctrine quite the contrary to that held by the Papists. "What have I to do with men," says Augustine, "that they should hear my confession, as though they could heal my disease?" Chrysostom says: "It is not necessary that thou shouldest confess in the presence of witnesses: let the iniquity of thy offences be made in thy thoughts; let this judgment be made without a witness; let God only see thee confessing. Therefore I entreat and beseech you, that you would continually make your confession to God; for I do not bring thee to the theatre of thy fellow-servants, neither do I constrain thee to discover thy sins to men. Unclasp thy conscience before God, and show thy wounds to him, and from him ask a medicine." This testimony is so far from favouring the Romish doctrine, that it directly contradicts it; for the Council of Trent decreed, that "whosoever shall affirm that confession of all our sins to a Priest is not necessary to our obtaining forgiveness of them, shall be accursed." St. Augustine and Chrysostom affirm that this confession is not necessary, and that forgiveness may be had without it. Either the Roman anathemas are pointless, or these Fathers are as deeply involved in them as ourselves.

6. The doctrine of auricular confession perplexes the consciences of the pious and sincere.

As they bind every man to confess all his mortal sins, even the most secret, after a heart-searching examination; and as it is difficult to know what sins are mortal and what are not, and when a person has made a sufficiently diligent investigation; what a multitude of scruples and perplexities is he led into by such a doctrine! So true is this, that according to the cases, conclusions, and inquiries into which casuists have entered, and to which they have arrived, it seems impossible for any one to make a right confession. We descend to particulars.

There are no certain distinctions declared between mortal and venial sins; and no catalogue of the one and of the other has been authoritatively published, except that they usually reckon seven as being deadly sins; but even then there are many devices by which they may be removed from the list of mortal to that of venial sin. The consequence is, that they are either led to slight iniquity altogether, or to be troubled with perpetual disputes concerning every thing pertaining to the soul.

[The low state of morality in the Church of Rome is abundantly displayed in the distinction which she makes between mortal and venial sin; especially in the manner that this distinction is taught in the theology of Peter Dens, in which nothing is found but the genuine, though revolting, doctrines of that Church; so that if ever there were a system framed with the deliberate intention of training up men in the way they ought not to go, such an one may be seen in the doctrine which distinguishes between mortal and venial sin. In the following extract, the terms vitium and peccatum are employed to signify two kinds of sin; the former expressing not what we call vice, but an habitual inclination to sin; and the latter referring to the individual act.

["What is vitium? Vitium properly and theologically is defined 'a habit inclining ad peccatum;' whence vitium is distinguished from peccatum, as the habit from the act. Vitium and peccatum, however, are often taken for the same."

[With no little propriety we may ask, Which is worse, peccatum or vitium? (the act or the habit.) If this question were proposed to any who were governed by the principles of holy writ, the answer would be, "The habit," the evil fount within, the source from whence all evil comes. Our Saviour declared that "out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies: these are the things which defile a man: but to eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man." (Matt. xv. 19, 20.) Not so, says the morality of the Church of Rome. Upon the authority of Thomas Aquinas, who, with the Papists, is a Pope that never dies, they say, "Peccatum is worse than vitium, because it is worse to act badly than to have a propension or habitual inclination to acting badly. In a certain respect, however, vitium is worse than peccatum, because the habit lasts longer than the act, and may be the cause plurium peccatorum, of many sins."*

["What is mortal sin? It is that which of itself brings spiritual death to the soul, inasmuch as, of itself, it deprives the soul of sanctifying grace and charity, in which the spiritual life of the soul consists." This definition would be given by the Protestant of all manner of sin whatsoever; for, continues Dens, "the aforesaid definition of mortal sin is a posteriori, or from the effect; it may be defined, a priori, a sin grievously repugnant to the order of right reason, and eternal law; likewise, a sin turning away from its ultimate end, or from God."†

["What is venial sin? That which does not bring spiritual death to the soul; or that which does not turn away from its ultimate end; or which is only slightly repugnant to the order of right reason. It is, moreover, certain, not only from the divine compassion, but from the nature of the thing, that there are venial sins, or so slight ones as in just men may consist with a state of grace and friendship with God;" implying that there is a certain kind of sin of which a man may be guilty without offending God! Peter Dens, however, proceeds: "It is proved from sacred Scripture, where it is said, 'The righteous man falls seven times;' (Prov. xxiv. 16;) 'In many things we offend all;' which sentences are understood of just men. Again: some sins are compared to a mote, (Matt. vii. 3—5,) and to 'wood, hay, and stubble;' (1 Cor. iii. 12;) therefore they are of their own nature slight or venial. See other places of Scripture and of the holy Fathers on this matter in Estius in secund. dist. xlii., sect. 4. It is proved also [* "Quid est vitium?

["R. Vitium proprie et theologice definitur: 'habitus inclinans ad peccatum;' unde vitium distinguitur a peccato, sicuti habitus ab actu: sæpe tamen vitium et peccatum sumuntur pro eodem.

["Utrum pejus est peccatum an vitium?

["R. Cum S. Thom., quæst. lxxi., art. 3, peccatum esse pejus vitio; quia pejus est male agere, quam habere propensionem seu inclinationem habitualem ad male agendum. Secundum quid tamen vitium pejus est peccato; quia nempe habitus diutius durat quam actus, et esse potest causa plurium peccatorum."—Dens Theologia, tom. i., De Vitiis et Peccatis, No. 86.

[† "Quid est peccatum mortale?

["R. Est illud, quod de se infert mortem spiritualem animæ: quatenus scilicet privat de se animam gratia sanctificante et charitate, in qua spiritualis vita animæ consistit.

["Prædicta definitio peccati mortalis est a posteriori, seu ab effectu. A priori definiri potest; peccatum graviter repugnans ordini rectæ rationis, et legi æternæ: item peccatum avertens a fine ultimo, seu Deo."—Idem, No. 153.

from reason. In every society some slight offences occur which do not dissolve friendship; therefore, such exist in the society and friendship which man has with God. Again: every sin does not take away the order or means to the ultimate end; therefore, every sin is not mortal." *

[As if to show the increasing evil of this fearful system, it is asserted: "Although mortal sin differs much from venial, yet, by the testimony of St. Augustine, book 21, De Civitate Dei, cap. 37, it is very difficult to discover, and most dangerous to define, what is mortal sin, and what venial; so that, as Encheiridion, cap. lxxviii., says, 'They are to be weighed, not by human, but by divine judgment.' And these remarks are especially true, when we would determine particularly what is mortal, or what is venial, sin. However, some rules are everywhere assigned by theologians by which it can generally be discovered what sins are in their own nature mortal or venial. Steyaert assigns these four:—

["When Scripture speaks of any sin in severe terms, that is to be considered mortal. For example: if it calls it scelus, nequitia, iniquitas, abominatio, or says that it is worthy of death, hated by God, that it excludes from the kingdom of God, that it cries to heaven, if there be prefixed, 'Alas!' &c. On the contrary, that sin is considered to be venial, when Scripture uses milder expressions, as if it employs the word 'mote,' 'stubble,' 'hay,' &c., or but slightly blames it; as, 'In the multitude of words there wanteth not sin;' (Prov. x. 19;) and, 'Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an account thereof in the day of judgment.'† (Matt. vii. 36.)" Further:—

["What sin is said to be venial in its own nature? That which, on its own account, cannot be mortal, unless the malice of some other account be added. Thus an idle word is, of its own nature, a venial sin; also a jocose or officious lie, excess in laughter, in joy, or sorrow, vain curiosity, &c., are of their own nature venial sins, because, unless the circumstances of some other account be added, they cannot be mortal." *

["What sin is called venial on account of imperfect deliberation, or imperfection of the will, or, as St. Thomas says, on account of imperfection of act? That which of its own nature is mortal; but, in this act, here and now is only venial through defect of sufficient free-will. Those that are venial in this way are the early motions of luxury, hatred, &c.; also through slight negligence in curtailing the reading of the Canonical Hours; a violation of fasting through ignorance or inadvertence, which might have been overcome; thoughts concerning an object mortally bad without full consent, &c.; such also are motions of hatred, affections of homicide, &c., in those half asleep.

["In every matter or in every kind of sin, can sin be venial from the imperfect deliberation of the act? In this state of fallen nature it seems to be affirmed so; however, some except hatred of God: but although that cannot be excused from mortal sin by ignorance, which must be very great, yet it may be so from other causes; for example, by vehement passion imperfectly considered, by inadvertence, &c.

["From what causes can any mortal sin happen to become venial on account of imperfection of act? From those which can diminish free-will, as inadvertence, ignorance, passions, fear, or any other defect of conduct. The rules given, No. 116, in dubiis consensus, may be applied here." †

["What sin is called venial from the smallness of the matter? That which of its own nature is mortal sin, but in this act here and now is venial on account of the smallness or lightness of the matter about which it is concerned; thus the theft of one penny is venial from the smallness of the matter; also, in relating a defect slightly blameworthy to withhold part of the fault, a trifling excess in drinking, a voluntary distraction in a small part of a divine office, &c.

["Is not an idle word venial from the smallness of the matter? No; for though its matter be small, yet it [* "Quid est peccatum veniale?

["R. Illud, quod non infert mortem spiritualem animæ, seu quod non avertit a fine ultimo, sive quod leviter tantum repugnat ordini rectæ rationis.

["Certum proinde est, non tantum ex divina misericordia, sed ex natura rei, dari peccata venialia, seu adeo levia, ut in hominibus justis cum statu gratiæ et amicitiæ Dei simul consistant. Probatur ex Scriptura sacra: Proverb. cap. xxiv., v. 16, dicitur, 'Septies cadit justus:' et Epist. Jac. cap. iii., v. 2, 'In multis offendimus omnes,' quæ sententiæ de hominibus justis intelliguntur. Deinde Matth. cap. vii., peccata quædam comparantur festucæ, et 1 ad Cor. cap. iii., v. 10, ligno, fœno et stipulæ; ergo illa sunt ex natura sua levia seu venialia. Alia Scripturæ et SS. Patrum loca in hanc rem vide apud Estium in secund. dist. xlii., sect. 4. Probatur etiam a ratione: in omni societate interveniunt leves quædam offensæ quæ amicitiam non dissolvunt; ergo et tales dantur in societate et amicitia, quam homo habet cum Deo. Deinde non omne peccatum tollit ordinem ad finem ultimum; ergo non omne peccatum est mortale."—Dens Theologia, tom. i., De Peccatis, No. 154.

[† "Quamquam peccatum mortale multum a veniali distet, teste tamen S. Aug., lib. 21, 'De Civitate Dei,' cap. xxxvii., quodnam sit mortale quodnam veniale, difficillimum est invenire, periculosissimum definire; adeo ut Enchiridii cap. lxxviii., dicat, Illa non humano, sed divino esse pensanda judicio.

["Atque hæc præcipue veritatem habent, dum in particulari determinari debet, quodnam mortale aut veniale sit peccatum.

["Verumtamen regulæ aliquæ a theologis passim assignari solent, ex quibus plerumque dignosci potest, qualia sint peccata ex genere suo mortalia an venialia. Steyaert assignat has quatuor.

["Prima desumitur ex Scriptura sacra: dum Scriptura peccatum aliquod gravibus afficit appellationibus, judicandum est mortale; v. g., si illud vocet scelus, nequitiam, iniquitatem, abominationem, vel dicat esse dignum morte, exosum Deo, excludere a regno cœlorum, clamare in cœlum, si ei apponatur 'Væ,' &c. E contra, peccatum tantum reputatur veniale, dum Scriptura mitioribus verbis utitur, ut si utatur nomine festucæ, stipulæ, fœni, &c., vel leviori correptione perstringat, ut Prov. cap. x., v. 19, 'In multiloquio non deerit peccatum;' et Matth. cap. xii., v. 36, 'Omne verbum otiosum, quod locuti fuerint homines, reddent rationem de eo in die judicii.'"—Idem, No. 156.

[* "Quodnam peccatum dicitur veniale ex genere suo?

["R. Illud quod in propria ratione seu specie non potest esse mortale, nisi malitia alterius rationis seu speciei accedat: ita verbum otiosum est ex genere suo peccatum veniale; item mendacium jocosum vel officiosum, superfluitas in risu, in lætitia vel tristitia, vana curiositas, &c., sunt ex genere suo peccata venialia, quia, nisi alterius speciei circumstantiæ accedant, nequeunt esse mortalia."—Idem, No. 158.

[† "Quodnam peccatum dicitur veniale ob imperfectam deliberationem seu imperfectionem voluntatis, sive, ut loquitur S. Thom., ob imperfectionem actus?

["R. Illud quod quidem ex genere suo est mortale, sed in hoc actu hic et nunc est tantum veniale ob defectum sufficientis voluntarii liberi. Hujusmodi venialia sunt motus secundo-primi luxuriæ, odii, &c., item detractio in lectione Horarum Canonicarum ex levi negligentia, violatio jejunii ex ignorantia vel inadvertentia stricte vincibili, cogitationes de objecto mortaliter malo sine pleno consensu, &c.; talia etiam sunt motus odii, affectus homicidii, &c., in semidormientibus.

["An in omni materia, sive in omni genere peccati, potest dari veniale ex imperfecta deliberatione actus?

["R. In hoc statu naturæ lapsæ videtur affirmandum: aliqui tamen excipiunt odium Dei; sed licet ex ignorantia, quæ in eo semper futura est crassa, excusari non possit a mortali, equidem id fieri potest ex aliis causis, v. g., ex passione vehementi imperfecte deliberata, ex inadvertentia, &c.

["Ex quibus causis contingit aliquod peccatum mortale fieri veniale ob imperfectionem actus?

["R. Ex illis quæ voluntarium liberum minuere possunt, ut inadvertentia, ignorantia, passio, metus, aut quivis alius defectus consensus. Regulæ traditæ Num. 116, in dubiis consensus, hic applicari possunt."—Idem, No. 159.

is not called venial from the smallness of the matter, but of its own nature, that the division of the three kinds of venial sins may be observed." *

["From whence can it be collected that many matters of sin coalesce? The thing is explained by examples: many small matters of theft being taken, coalesce in order to constitute a great sin of unjust detention, or injury of a neighbour. Likewise on the same fast-day often to eat some small thing; on the same feast-day often to perform light servile works; often, in divine office of the same day, to be a little distracted voluntarily, or to omit some small part,—all coalesce respectively into one great matter.

["Are the single acts by which it is thus come to a great matter so many mortal sins? To distinguish: if any one from the beginning, by many small or minute things, means to come to a great matter, he sins in each act mortally from the beginning according to the greatness of the intended matter; because every small thing proceeds from the will or affection towards a great matter, as the act commanded from the act commanding. Meanwhile it may be remarked that although he who, for example, from the beginning intends by small thefts to arrive at a notable sum, in each act of theft sins mortally, yet there does not lie upon him the obligation of restitution under mortal sin until he arrives at a notable quantity.

["But if any one does not intend to arrive at a great matter, he then only shall sin mortally when he perceives, or can and ought to perceive, that he has arrived at a great matter: whence his former acts shall be venial sins from the smallness of the matter; but the act by which the great matter is completed is a mortal sin, because that last act is accounted to be about a great matter, inasmuch as the former matters coalesce with the last, and so, by willing the last, he interpretatively at the same time wills the former matters. Hence, also, all following acts will be mortally bad.

["Do, therefore, the matters of small thefts or injuries, committed during the time of a whole life, coalesce? More probably so, except meanwhile some injuries be repaired, pardoned, or made amends for, according to the intention of the owners, by alms; for men are not accustomed to require so exact a restitution of small injuries, but are considered to pardon in turn those very small things after the fact, or, at least, to agree that according to their intention they may be given to the poor; and therefore pious men often give to the poor some alms even from this intention, that they may make satisfaction, if by chance they owe any thing to any one. Observe, then, that injuries repaired, pardoned, or made amends for, do not coalesce, because they no longer in any way exist.

["Others say, that in order that small injuries or thefts may coalesce, it is required that they be morally continued, so that if they be separated by a long interval of time, they cannot constitute one whole." †

["When do small matters not coalesce? When they do not pertain to the same numerical precept, or the transgression of a precept morally one. Thus, if one every day in Lent takes some small additional refreshment, if any one on different feast-days perform a small quantity of servile labour, or on different days neglects some small part in the canonical hours, in these, or like cases, small matters do not coalesce, because they do not pertain to the same numerical precept, but to one virtually multiplied; similar precepts affect singular days in particular, and expire together with the day.

["Much less do matters coalesce when the precepts are altogether different; as if when a fast-day coincides with a feast-day, one may perform some small servile work, may take some small quantity of food beyond what refreshment required, and may omit a small part from the mass and canonical hours; because those precepts, though they concur together, are not, however, more connected with one another than if they successively obliged; and so such an one only sins venially.

["If any one often slightly exceeds in drinking, those slight excesses do not coalesce in reason of the sin of drunkenness; because, although they oppose the same precept of temperance, they have not respect, however, to a transgression morally one; the reason of which seems to be, because they do not consist in a permanent thing, and cannot coalesce into one matter. Those slight excesses can, however, coalesce in reference to loss of health or family, because in relation to loss they are something permanent. The lives and characters of distinct men do not coalesce, according to No. 96; and hence slight inju-

[* "Quodnam peccatum dicitur veniale ex parvitate materiæ?

["R. Illud, quod ex genere suo est peccatum mortale, sed in hoc actu hic et nunc est veniale propter parvitatem seu levitatem materiæ, circa quam versatur: ita furtum unius assis est veniale ex parvitate materiæ, item detractio narrando defectum leviter probrosum, excessus exiguus in potu, distractio voluntaria in parva parte officii divini, &c.

["An verbum otiosum non est veniale ex parvitate materiæ?

["R. Neg. quamvis enim materia ejus sit parva, tamen non vocatur veniale ex parvitate materiæ, sed ex genere suo: ut divisio trium generum peccatorum venialium observetur."—Dens Theologia, tom. i., De Peccatis, No. 160.

[† "Undenam colligi potest, quod plures materiæ coalescant?

["R. Exemplis res declaratur: plures parvæ materiæ furti ablatæ coalescunt in ordine ad constituendum peccatum grave injustæ detentionis, vel damnificationis proximi. Similiter eodem die jejunii pluries parvum quid comedere, eodem die festo pluries levia opera servilia facere, pluries in officio divino ejusdem diei parum distrahi voluntarie, aut parvum quid omittere, coalescunt omnia respective in unam materiam gravem.

["An singuli actus quibus sic pervenitur ad materiam gravem, sunt totidem peccata mortalia?

["R. Dist. Si quis ab initio per plura parva seu minuta intendat pervenire ad materiam gravem, peccat in singulis actibus mortaliter ab initio secundum gravitatem materiæ intentæ: quia quodlibet minutum procedit a voluntate seu affectu erga materiam gravem, tanquam actus imperatus ab actu imperante. Circa praxim hujus, vide schema 7.

["Notari interim potest, quod, etsi ille, qui, v. g., ab initio intendit per minuta furta ad summam notabilem pervenire, in singulis actibus furti peccet mortaliter, tamen ipsum non urgeat obligatio restitutionis sub mortali, nisi dum ad notabilem quantitatem pervenit.

["Si quis autem non intendat pervenire ad materiam gravem, tunc tantum peccabit mortaliter, quando advertit seu advertere potest et debet se pervenire ad materiam gravem; unde actus priores erunt peccata venialia ex parvitate materiæ; sed actus, quo completur materia gravis, est peccatum mortale; quia ille ultimus actus censetur esse circa materiam gravem, eo quod priores materiæ coalescant cum ultima, et ita volendo ultimam, interpretative simul vult priores materias. Hinc etiam omnes actus sequentes erunt mortaliter mali.

["An igitur materiæ parvorum furtorum seu damnorum, tempore totius vitæ commissorum, coalescunt?

["R. Probabilius affirmative; nisi interea damna aliqua sint restituta, condonata, vel per eleemosynas secundum intentionem dominorum compensata; non enim solent homines modicorum damnorum tam exactam exigere restitutionem, sed censentur ista minima post factum invicem condonare, vel saltem consentire ut ad intentionem eorum dentur pauperibus; et propterea homines pii sæpe pauperibus largiuntur eleemosynas quasdam etiam ex intentione illa, ut satisfaciant, si forte quid alicui debeant. Nota proinde, quod damna restituta, condonata vel compensata non coalescant; quia nullo modo amplius existunt.

["Alii dicunt, quod ut minuta damna vel furta coalescant, requiratur ut sint moraliter continuata, ut adeo, si sint amplo temporis spatio sejuncta, non possint unum totum constituere."—Idem, No. 161.

ries or acts of detraction against different men do not constitute mortal sin, but many venial sins. Nevertheless many slight injuries of the character of the same man, community, or family, seem to coalesce; and so if those small injuries, taken together, constitute a very heavy loss, a mortal sin has been committed. The same may be said of many slight blows by which any one at length much injures the body of another." *

[Such is that "deceivableness of unrighteousness" that distinguishes the apostate Church of Rome, and by which the word of God is rendered of none effect. The declaration of the inspired Apostle is, "The wages of sin"—sin in general, of whatever amounts to sin, to transgression of the law of God—"is death." "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things written in the book of the law to do them."]

There is also no definite rule given concerning the examination of conscience. It is difficult to tell when it is done sufficiently; and yet if it be not sufficient, then the sins which are forgotten through carelessness and infirmity, and are not suitably called to mind, are not pardoned. There are some confessions which are imperfect, but valid; some invalid on account of their imperfection; some perfect, and yet invalid. Hence arise scruples beyond the power of remedy; because there is no certain principle from whence the penitent may derive peace.

There are also what are termed reserved cases, which an ordinary Priest cannot pardon. Some are reserved for the Bishop, some for the Archbishop, and some for the Pope. Yet any Priest can absolve from these, provided the penitent be at the point of death. The weighty causes and cases reserved are such as the following; namely, heresy, simony, assault on an Ecclesiastic, robbery of a church, attempts to tax the Clergy, and generally all offences against that privileged order. If the person apply to an inferior Priest for absolution in any of these cases, he is referred to the higher tribunal; because the first absolution, in such a case, would be of no value. Among these reserved cases there is also great difference; some are reserved by reason of ecclesiastical censures, and others on account of the enormity of the sin. These things may be hidden from the penitent; and though he may suppose himself to be forgiven, he is deceived, for he will find himself but half absolved. The cases of uncertainty and doubt on such points as these are endless.

There are difficulties in the confession of things in which the offender had associates. If he confess so as to accuse another, he commits sin; if he do not, in many cases he cannot reveal those peculiar circumstances which may alter the nature of the offence. Some may tell him that he may conceal such till a more fit opportunity; others advise him to omit them altogether; and others, recommend him to obtain another Confessor. Then a scruple arises, whether he may do this without leave; and if leave be denied him, whether he may do it on his own responsibility. Other questions arise respecting the iteration of his first confession; for if the first be considered invalid, it must be repeated. In this case, however, the penitent must be certain that his former confession was invalid; for if it were, he cannot be absolved unless he renew it; and if valid, then he must beware not to confess the same thing twice, and be twice forgiven, for that would be unlawful.

There are cases in which confession is to be repeated; and though done before, it must again be made, as if there had been no contrition. There are many cases of this character. Though imperfect, contrition is not to be repeated. But what is and what is not contrition, what is perfect and what imperfect, together with what is the first degree and which makes the confession valid, can never be told. Sometimes the church is satisfied when God is not, as in the case of the informal confession, (informis confessio,) and then the man may be absolved, but his sin is not forgiven.

These are but the beginning of scruples. For suppose the penitent hath done his duty, examined himself strictly, repented thoroughly, confessed fully, and is formally absolved; yet this may avail nothing, because of some invalidity in the ordination of the Priest, either on account of crime, or irregularity, or palpable deficiency in the ordination or succession of the Priest; or he may have no jurisdiction, which should be carefully inquired into, especially in those places which abound with Friars and unbeneficed Clerics. Or if the Confessor is in full orders and possesses jurisdiction, the use of these powers may be for a time suspended, and then his absolution is worth nothing. By the constitution of the Council of Constance, it is declared that confession is not to be repeated, although the Priest be excommunicated. Here, then, is a new source of trouble to a pious mind. But we might as well attempt to number the sands of the sea, as to specify the variety of questionable cases, which would inevitably occur in the practical operation of the theology of Rome.

7. The secrecy observed in the confessional will require a brief survey, as it will prepare, in part, for the exhibition of its evils. In the primitive Church there was no such custom as that of private confession, now practised in the Church of Rome. On this point, the Catechism of the Council of Trent declares: "Secrecy should be strictly observed, as well by penitent as Priest; and hence, because in such circumstances secrecy must be insecure, no one can, on any account, confess by messenger or letter." Again: "But as all are anxious that their sins should be buried in eternal secrecy, the faithful are to be admonished, that there is no reason whatever to apprehend that what is made known in confession will ever be revealed by any ["* Quandonam materiæ parvæ non coalescunt?

["R. Quando illæ non pertinent ad idem numero præceptum, vel ad unam moraliter transgressionem præcepti.

["Ita, si quis quotidie in Quadragesima leve quid extra refectionem sumat, si quis diversis diebus festivis modicum laboris servilis faciat, aut distinctis diebus parvum quid in Horis Canonicis negligat, in his aut similibus casibus materiæ parvæ non coalescunt; quia non pertinent ad idem numero præceptum, sed ad unum virtualiter multiplicatum; præcepta similia singulos dies in particulari afficiunt et simul cum die expirant.

["Multo minus materiæ coalescunt, dum præcepta toto genere differunt; ut si die jejunii concurrente cum die festo, quis modicum serviliter operetur, modicum cibi extra refectionem capiat, et modicum ex missa vel Horis Canonicis omittat; quia illa præcepta, licet simul concurrant, non sunt tamen magis inter se connexa, quam si successive obligarent: adeoque talis tantum venialiter peccat.

["Si quis pluries leviter excedat in potu, excessus illi leves non coalescunt in ratione peccati ebrietatis: quia licet repugnent eidem præcepto temperantiæ, non spectant tamen ad unam moraliter transgressionem; cujus ratio esse videtur, quod non consistant in re permanenti, sicque non possint in unam coalescere materiam. Possunt tamen illi leves excessus coalescere in ratione damni sanitatis vel familiæ; quia in ratione damni sunt aliquid permanens.

["Vitæ et famæ distinctorum hominum non coalescunt juxta N. 96; et hinc leves læsiones aut detractiones diversorum hominum non constituunt peccatum mortale, sed plura venialia.

["Verumtamen plures leves læsiones famæ ejusdem hominis, communitatis, aut familiæ videntur coalescere; adeoque si illæ parvæ læsiones simul sumptæ constituant defectum graviter probrosum, peccatur mortaliter. Idem est de pluribus levibus percussionibus, quibus quis tandem graviter lædit corpus alterius."—Dens Theologia, tom. i., De Peccatis, No. 162.]

Priest, or that by it the penitent can, at any time, be brought into danger or difficulty of any sort. All laws, human and divine, guard the inviolability of the seal of confession, and against its sacrilegious infraction the Church denounces her heaviest chastisements. 'Let the Priest,' says the great Council of Lateran, 'take especial care, neither by word, nor sign, nor by any other means whatever, to betray, in the least degree, the sacred trust confided to him by the sinner.'"*

The instructions on this topic given to the Roman Catholic priesthood in their seminaries, train them to a system of falsehood; nay, more, their very theology countenances perjury, and demands it of the Confessors. This is, we grant, a heavy charge; but the proof shall be adduced before it is called for. Here it is: Peter Dens, in his Theology, which is the class-book in the Maynooth College, generally used in Roman Catholic theological schools, and is approved by the dignitaries of the Church of Rome, teaches what the duty of Confessors is, in reference to what may be communicated to them in the confessional, as follows:—

["What is the seal of sacramental confession?—It is the obligation or debt of concealing those things which are known from sacramental confession.†

["Can a case be stated in which it is lawful to break the sacramental seal?—It cannot be stated, although the life or safety of a man, or even the ruin of the state, should depend upon it; nor can the supreme Pontiff dispense with it; so that, on that account, this secret of the seal is more binding than the obligation of an oath, a vow, or natural secret, &c., and that by the positive will of God.

["What therefore ought a Confessor to answer, being interrogated concerning truth, which he has known through sacramental confession alone?—He ought to answer that HE DOES NOT KNOW IT; AND, IF NECESSARY, CONFIRM THE SAME BY AN OATH.

["It is objected,—It is in no case lawful to tell a falsehood; but the Confessor would tell a falsehood, because he knows the truth; therefore, &c.

["Answer. I deny the minor, that is, that the Confessor would lie, because such Confessor is interrogated as a man, and replies as a man; but now he does not know that truth as a man, though he knows it as God, (says St. Thomas, quest. xi., art. 1,) and that sense is naturally inherent in the reply, for when he is interrogated or replies, out of confession, (extra confessionem,) he is considered as a man.

["What if it be directly inquired of the Confessor, whether he knows a particular thing by sacramental confession?—It is replied, in this case he ought to answer nothing; so think Steyaert and Sylvius. But the interrogation is to be rejected as impious; or he can say absolutely, not in relation to the question, 'I know nothing,' because the word 'I' restricts to knowledge acquired by him as man (ad scientiam humanam). In like manner, if a Confessor be cited in judgment, that he may give a reason for having refused absolution, he ought to make a protestation, that in this matter he does not acknowledge a superior but God."‡]

From the above quotation it appears that the Church of Rome teaches and practises, (1.) That what a Priest may know in confession, he knows it not as man, but as God. (2.) That if a Priest hear of any subject in confession, and, on being asked and sworn respecting it, he should say he never heard such a thing, he is guilty neither of lying nor perjury. (3.) That it is not lawful to reveal any thing that is told in confession, though it be to avoid the greatest evil, such as the death of a man, his eternal damnation, or the destruction of the commonwealth, &c. (4.) Hence we infer, that should the life of our gracious Sovereign the Queen be in danger, or should our glorious constitution be threatened with annihilation, a Priest dares not reveal any secret obtained through the medium of confession, should the discovery save the life of Her Majesty, or preserve the country from ruin.

Indeed, it would be difficult to find, in so many words, such total disregard for truth, and so many blasphemous assumptions, as are contained in this quotation from Dens. Here blasphemy is unblushingly taught; for the Priest affects to act as God, thereby making himself equal with him, and manifesting the distinguishing character of Antichrist, who, "as God, sitteth in the temple of God." A known and deliberate lie, according to this Popish Divine, may be innocently told, even by a Minister of religion, in connexion with the administration of a sacrament. To this crime is to be added that of perjury, in order to make a deliberate lie pass for truth. The life of a man, or even his salvation, or the destruction, interitus reipublicæ, the overthrow of our government, (to use the very words of Dens,) are considered small matters, when necessary to maintain the authority of the Roman Catholic priesthood! It is useless to inquire what kind of subjects these Priests make, when such horrible principles are inculcated by them.

Numerous quotations from standard Roman Catholic authors, if necessary, might be given, who teach doctrines on the seal of confession similar to those of Dens. They who have not the opportunity of consulting them, may see several illustrations in Bishop Taylor,* who refers to and quotes from Bellarmine, Binet, and others. It is not marvellous that some Papists suppose their Church to be grossly misrepresented by these remarks, especially those who live among Protestants; nevertheless, no consistent member of the Church of Rome can deny that inviolable secrecy is enjoined on the Clergy and laity, at the expense of truth and the sacred obligation of an oath.

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 280, 282.

[† "Quid est sigillum confessionis sacramentalis?—R. Est obligatio seu debitum celandi ea quæ ex sacramentali confessione cognoscuntur."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi., No. 159; De Sigillo Confessionis.

[‡ "An potest dari casus, in quo licet frangere sigillum sacramentale?

["R. Non potest dari; quamvis ab eo penderet vita aut salus hominis, aut etiam interitus reipublicæ: neque summus Pontifex in eo dispensare potest: ut proinde hoc sigilli arcanum magis liget, quam obligatio juramenti, voti, secreti naturalis, &c., idque ex voluntate Dei positiva.

["Quid igitur respondere debet Confessarius interrogatus super veritate, quam per solam confessionem sacramentalem novit?

["R. Debet respondere, se nescire eam; et, si opus est, idem juramento confirmare.

["Obj. Nullo casu licet mentiri; atqui Confessarius ille mentiretur, quia scit veritatem; ergo, &c.

["R. Nego minorem; quia talis Confessarius interrogatur ut homo, et respondet ut homo; jam autem non scit ut homo illam veritatem, quamvis sciat ut Deus, ait S. Th., quæst. xi., art. 1; et iste sensus sponte inest responsioni, nam quando extra confessionem interrogatur vel respondet, consideratur ut homo.

["Quid si directe a Confessario quæratur, utrum illud sciat per confessionem sacramentalem?

["R. Hoc casu nihil oportet respondere; ita Stey. cum Sylvio; sed interrogatio rejicienda est tanquam impia: vel etiam posset absolute, non relative ad petitionem dicere, Ego nihil scio; quia vox ego restringit ad scientiam humanam.

["Similiter si Confessarius citetur in judicio, ut reddat rationem negatæ absolutionis, contestari debet, se in hac re superiorem non agnoscere, nisi Deum."—Dens Theol., tom. vi., De Fractione Sigilli Sacramentalis, No. 160.]

* Taylor's Works, vol. xi., Dissuasive, &c., book i., sect. x., p. 3, et seq.

8. As the confessional is managed by the Romish hierarchy, it is so far from being a check upon men in the repetition of iniquity, which is the greatest utility it professes to claim, that, on the contrary, it gives great encouragement to sinners to continue therein. It is readily admitted, that in some instances the effect of confession has been beneficial to society; sinful dispositions have been repressed, and crimes have been prevented; but as a system of morality, this periodical absolution connected with confession, has corrupted, in a most alarming degree, the very heart of society.

According to this doctrine, it is not he who most truly repents, and endeavours to forsake sin, that is best prepared to receive the desired pardon, but he that most accurately reveals his transgressions to a Confessor, and enumerates the peculiar circumstances under which they were committed. No matter how sorry a man may be on account of his sins, and how sincerely he may promise to forsake them, yet, if he do not perform this part of the sacrament of penance, he is not in so safe a condition as he who is less sorry for them and less careful to renounce them, but who confesses well to the Priest, and receives his absolution.

Again: when a man confesses his sins, is sorry for them, and receives absolution on the promise of performing a certain penance enjoined, he at that moment obtains remission as far as the eternal punishment of them is concerned, and is placed in a state of favour with God. The consequence is, that a man may, without scruple of conscience, recur to his old course of life. For if he repeat his confession, and receive fresh absolution, he is as safe as though he had never offended. This is one of the natural consequences of this doctrine; and that the great majority of the Roman community labour under the delusion, is too evident to be denied by themselves, or to require further proof from us.

In the confessional, the interrogatories proposed by the Priest are all formed on the supposition that the penitent is a great and habitual transgressor; one who has been accustomed to swear rashly by the name of God, or by his soul, or by way of imprecation on himself; of which offences he has been guilty many times in the course of the day. In order to make a good confession, it is not necessary that he should wholly forsake his wicked habit; it is sufficient that he confess his fault, and resolve to abandon it, or make a firm resolution so to do; when the Priest, on such confession, resolution, and promise, grants him absolution. In this ceremony the Church of Rome is fearfully opposed to the Bible. Christianity recognises no good resolutions which are unconnected with good practice. There is not in the Bible a promise of pardon to him who only resolves to forsake sin. This, however, in ordinary cases, is all that the Priest exacts from the penitent. When an individual appears before the Confessor, and makes profession of amendment, he must grant him absolution, though both he and the penitent be unconscious of any change in the character of the latter, and though both are morally certain he will immediately return to the practice of his former wickedness, trusting to the efficacy of this recent confession and absolution; though he have confessed fifty times in the course of as many years, his exercise in the fiftieth year of his confession embraces only a purpose of amendment,—a purpose that is never expected to be reduced to practice. It is true he resolves henceforward to flee the occasions of sin. He resolves to perform such devotions as may be necessary for obtaining this grace; and he resolves to flee idleness, and to pursue some regular method and order of life for the time to come; but his reformation generally terminates with this periodical resolution of doing better, without any real amendment. Indeed there seems to be some provision in that Church for a continual postponement of this reformation, as they seem to calculate on a return to sin, by the provision which is made in absolution for the constant pardon of sins oft repeated and contumaciously continued. This repetition and perseverance in iniquity are merely excused, and for which provision is actually made, as appears from the following declaration of the Trent Catechism:—"To no one can it appear surprising if persons fall into sin, the common malady of the human race, and the natural appendage of human infirmity." *

Confession does not merely not act as a restraint upon sin, as is maintained by the Church of Rome; but it proves a licence for the committal of almost every species of it. It is true, young people, before they become habituated to sin and hardened in its practice, may have fears respecting going to a confession, which, for a time, may act as a restraint. But when they become acquainted with the fact, that going to confession and receiving absolution embolden them to commit even greater crimes, and to repeat former grievances, rather than being a restraint, it will act as an encouragement. This is the true and practical effect, whatever may be the plausible theories invented to give a different view of the confession. Although persons may live in the practice of every vice, by confessing once a year they receive an absolution, which is understood to be as effectual, and to satisfy the deluded Roman Catholic, as though he were favoured with an audible voice from heaven, which assured him of his acceptance into the family of God.

Seldom have we seen so much misrepresentation and positive untruth as is discovered in the following passage from the Roman Catechism:—"Confession contributes powerfully to the preservation of social order. Abolish sacramental confession, and that moment you deluge society with all sorts of secret crimes,—crimes too, and others of still greater enormity, which men, once that they have been depraved by vicious habits, will not dread to commit in open day. The salutary shame that attends confession restrains licentiousness, bridles desire, and coerces the evil propensities of corrupt nature." † The very reverse is the fact, as might be shown by a comparative view of the state of morals in Popish and Protestant countries. History justifies the assertion, that priestly absolution, as practised in the Romish Church, offers a large bounty to crime, and that the confessional is the flourishing school of vice. This will appear when we take into consideration the following:—

9. Auricular confession is not only useless or corrupting to him who makes it, but is extremely pernicious to him who hears it.

The heart of the Priest becomes the common receptacle of all the filth in his parish. There is, as the word of God declares, a desperate wickedness in the heart of man. God only knows the depth of this depravity. The wickedness of the heart cannot be safely made known to any but to God alone, who, being infinitely holy, is incapable of pollution. To reveal all the evil that is in a human heart to a fellow-creature would corrupt the most innocent, and increase the wickedness of the most depraved. This, however, is what every Priest exacts of his flock, without exception; and hence, by being made familiar with the depravity of others, the guiltiness of his own heart must be fearfully augmented. Nay, the Priest himself is often so hardened in sin as to become the corrupter of the young and comparatively innocent penitent who approaches the confessional. He insinuates poison into the heart of the inexperienced, and effects her seduction under the pretext of promoting her salvation. Gavin, in his Master-Key, says: "To the discovery of mortal sins, the father Confessor doth very much help the penitent; for he sometimes, out of pure zeal, but most commonly out of curiosity, asks them many questions, to know whether they do remember all their sins, or not. By these and the like questions the Confessors do more harm than good, especially to the ignorant people and young women." "And when they come to that tribunal, with a sincere, ignorant heart, to receive advice and instruction, they go home with light and knowledge, and an idea of sins unknown to them before."* Such is the testimony of one who was conversant with the course pursued in confession. To give a more extensive and clearer view of the corrupting influence which the hearing of confession must have upon the mind of a Priest, we might quote the words with which all, both male and female, are instructed to catechise themselves previous to confession, in reference to the seventh commandment, and which are found in one of the most popular and extensively read manuals of private devotion, entitled "The Path to Paradise."† Paradise, indeed! to that of Mahomet, rather than to that of God! But even upon this we dare not enter: suffice it to say, that after the Priest has asked a variety of sifting questions on points connected with adulterous and polluting practices, and having thoroughly examined his female penitents with other interrogations too obscene to appear in print, what will be the result? More especially when the penitent, after reciting the Confiteor, and raising herself up from her prostration, "touches with her lips either the ear or cheek of the spiritual father;" and in private too! All comment is unnecessary here. The facts brought before the public by Roman Catholics themselves in their devotional books, are sufficient to convict their sacrament of penance of most revolting and gross licentiousness.

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 284.
† Idem, p. 272.

Time would fail and modesty utterly forbids to give even a tithe of the well-attested facts which could be brought forward to prove the immoral tendency of auricular confession.

["The unmeasured immorality of the Spanish Clergy appears in the history of sacerdotal and monkish solicitation in that kingdom. These solicitants were Spanish Monks and Priests, who, abusing the privacy of sacramental confession, tempted women, married and unmarried, to a violation of chastity, and, in the language of Pope Gregory, administered poison instead of medicine (pro medicina, venenum porrigunt). This kind of solicitation became so prevalent as to demand pontifical interposition. In Spain, the Bull of Pope Paul IV. against solicitants was promulgated, in which the following language is used to describe the evil which rendered such interference necessary:—'Whereas certain Ecclesiastics, in the kingdom of Spain, and in the cities and diocesses thereof, having the cure of souls, or exercising such cure for others, or otherwise deputed to hear the confessions of penitents, have broken out into such heinous acts of iniquity, as to abuse the sacrament of penance in the very act of hearing the confessions, not fearing to injure the same sacrament, and him who instituted it, our Lord God and Saviour Jesus Christ, by enticing and provoking, or trying to entice and provoke females to lewd actions, at the very time when they were making their confessions.'

["When this Bull was first introduced into Spain, the Inquisitors published a solemn edict in all the churches belonging to the archbishopric of Seville, that any person knowing, or having heard of any Friar or Clergyman having committed the crime of abusing the sacrament of confession, or in any manner having improperly conducted himself during the confession of a female penitent, should make a discovery of what he knew within thirty days to the holy tribunal; and very heavy censures were attached to those who should neglect or despise this injunction. When this edict was first published, such a considerable number of females went to the palace of the Inquisitor, only in the city of Seville, to reveal the conduct of their infamous Confessors, that twenty Notaries and as many Inquisitors, were appointed to minute down their several informations against them; but these being found insufficient to receive the depositions of so many witnesses, and the Inquisitors being thus overwhelmed, as it were, with the pressure of such affairs, thirty days more were allowed for taking the accusations; and this lapse of time also proving inadequate to the intended purpose, a similar period was granted, not only for a third but a fourth time. The ladies of rank, character, and noble families had a difficult part to act on this occasion, as their discoveries could not be made of any particular time and place. On one side a religious fear of incurring the threatened censures goaded their consciences so much as to compel them to make the required accusation; on the other side a regard to their husbands, to whom they justly feared to give offence, by affording them any motives for suspecting their private conduct, induced them to keep at home. To obviate these difficulties, they had recourse to the measure of covering their faces with a veil, according to the fashion of Spain, and thus went to the Inquisitors in the most secret manner they could adopt. Very few, however, escaped the vigilance of their husbands, who, on being informed of the discoveries and accusations made by their wives, were filled with suspicions: and yet, notwithstanding this accumulation of proof against the Confessors, produced to the Inquisitors, this holy tribunal, contrary to the expectations of every one, put an end to the business by ordering that all crimes of this nature, proved by lawful evidence, should from thenceforth be consigned to perpetual silence and oblivion."*

[This was not the case with only one individual member of the priesthood, who was detected in these scenes of abomination and crime: the disease was general. It was not confined to the countries of Portugal and Spain, those hot-beds of priestly domination and sin: it was rife in England, France, and even in Germany, as we are informed from a German Council held A. D. 1225, in which the Priests were charged with unchastity, voluptuousness, and obscenity. "Some of whom were addicted to filthy enjoyments, and lived in open and avowed concubinage." Some of the Clergy as well as the laity committed incest with the holy nuns, and "wallowing in

[* A Master-Key to Popery, by D. Antonio Gavin, born and educated in Spain, some years secular Priest in the Church of Rome, and, since 1715, Minister of the Church of England. 3 vols., 12mo. London, 1725.]

† The Path to Paradise; or, the Catholic Christian's Manual, &c., pp. 85, 86.

[* Narrative of the Inquisition, &c., by Hippolyto Joseph Da Costa Pereira Hurtado de Mendoza, vol. i., pp. 117—119 sensuality, plunged with slackened reins into the lake of misery, and mud of filthiness."* The whole mass was corrupted; and the fact, that both husbands and wives continued in the same communion, and submitted their consciences to, and trusted their salvation in the hands of, the same ghostly guides, shows the influence of a judicial infatuation, and callosity of heart, to which they must have been most awfully abandoned.]

Gregory XV. issued a Bull on this accursed practice in 1622, bearing the title, Universi Domini, from which we make the following extract:—"Whoever shall attempt to solicit or provoke any persons, whoever they may be, to the performance of vile acts, either between themselves or any other person whatsoever, in the act of sacramental confession, either before, or immediately after, or at the time, or under the pretext of confession, though the confession should not accompany, or without the occasion of confession, in the confessional, or in any other place where sacramental confessions are heard, or a place chosen to hear confession, and pretending there to hear confessions; or if they have used unlawful or vile conversation or touching, let them be severely punished. And let their Ordinaries decree their suspension from the execution of their ministerial office, the privation of benefices, dignities, and offices of every description, and a perpetual incapacity of filling them, either actively or passively; and if they are regulars, let them be condemned to exile, and to the oars and prisons for ever, without hope of any favour.....We command to all Confessors, that they should admonish their penitents whom they know to have been solicited by others as above, respecting the obligation of reporting solicitants to the Inquisitors or the Ordinaries of the place." †

Benedict XIV. confirmed or explained the Bull of Gregory, by issuing another in June, 1741. Another Bull was also issued by the same Pontiff in 1745, repeating and enforcing former enactments. ‡

In the same Bull severe enactments were made against those penitents who solicited the Confessors to criminal acts: thus the confessional has been a scene of corruption both to Clergy and laity, otherwise these enactments were useless. Indeed, such is the privacy of confession, that no laws, however severe, can reach it; and consequently the Popes have been compelled to permit all the evil practices connected with it to remain unchecked.

The absolution of an accomplice in guilt presents us with a very curious case in Roman Catholic casuistry. It is briefly this: that a Confessor cannot absolve or pardon a female penitent who has been his accomplice in crime, except in the article of death.* But then he can pardon at this solemn hour, though till that period he may have lived in sin.

10. Notice the arguments by which they support auricular confession.

The Council of Trent, in her sixth, seventh, and eighth canons, already quoted, declares that sacramental confession was instituted by Christ, that it is necessary to obtain pardon, that it has always been observed in the Catholic Church, and is not of human invention. In accordance with these views, several arguments are mentioned to support the assumption. The Scripture proof from St. James has been sufficiently met; and all we intend now to consider is those arguments which have any appearance of probability, from which it will be seen how feebly those doctrines of the Church of Rome are supported, by which she is distinguished from primitive Christianity and from sound Protestantism.

["Bishop Hay finds an authority for auricular confession in these words: 'If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us; if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.' (1 John i. 8, 9.) Plain common sense could find nothing of auricular confession to a Priest in these words; for there is no mention of, and not the most distant allusion to, a Priest in the whole chapter, unless we shall suppose the inspired writer speaking of himself and the other Apostles under that character, when he says, 'The things we have seen and heard declare we unto you,' &c. Yet this wordy Prelate speaks of his proof from this passage in the following confident style:—'This testimony is so strong and clear, for the necessity of confessing our sins, that our adversaries have no other way to escape the force of it, but by vainly pretending that the Apostle means only the confessing our sins privately to God alone.' We do not only pretend, but firmly maintain, that the Apostle, in this passage, speaks of confessing sins to God, and to no other; though the grave Bishop should reckon this so small a matter, that he calls it only confessing to God; whereas confessing to a Priest is, in his opinion, the great and indispensable thing. The structure of the language will bear no other meaning than that the confession must be made to him who is faithful and just to forgive; that is, God, as in the version from which the Bishop quotes. It is the pronoun he in our versions; but it evidently relates to the substantive 'God,' in the fifth verse. But let us see how Bishop Hay extorts the doctrine of confession to a Priest out of this passage:—

["'But that this' (that is, confession to God alone) 'cannot be the Apostle's meaning is evident from two strong reasons: first, because the confessing our sins is here put in opposition to the saying we have no sin; these two are opposite to one another, and therefore must certainly relate to the same object.

["'Now, who is there in his senses that would seriously dare to say to God in private that he has no sin? In this part of the sentence, then, the Apostle certainly means to say, We have no sin before men; and, consequently, in

["* Obscœnis voluptatibus inhiantes, concubinas usque ad hæc tempora publice tenuerunt. Quidam relaxatis voluptatum habenis in lacum miseriæ et in lutum fœcis se immergunt."—Conc. Labb., tom. xiii., pp. 1095, 1098.]

† "Qui personas, quæcumque illæ sint, ad inhonesta, sive inter se, sive cum aliis, quomodolibet perpetranda, in actu sacramentalis confessionis, sive antea, vel post immediate, seu occasione, vel prætextu confessionis hujusmodi, etiam ipsa confessione non secuta sive extra occasionem confessionis, in confessionario, aut in loco quocumque ubi confessiones sacramentales audiantur, seu ad confessionem audiendam electo, simulantes ibidem confessiones audire, sollicitare, vel provocare tentaverint, aut cum eis illicitos et inhonestos sermones, sive tractatus habuerint....severissime.....puniantur. Ordinarii decernant in eos suspensionem ab executione ordinis,....privationis beneficiorum, dignitatum, et officiorum quorumcumque, ac perpetuæ inhabilitatis ad illa, necnon vocis activæ et passivæ; si regulares fuerint, exilii, damnationis ad triremes et carceres etiam in perpetuum, absque ulla spe gratiæ....Mandamus omnibus Confessariis, ut suos pœnitentes, quos noverint fuisse ab aliis ut supra sollicitatos, moneant de obligatione denuntiandi sollicitantes Inquisitoribus seu locorum Ordinariis."—Bulla Gregor. XV., Universi Domini, anno 1622. Vide Dens Theologia, tom. vi., De Casibus Reservatis, No. 216.

‡ Bullarium Benedict. XIV., Constitut. XX., anno 1741, "Innovantur pœnæ adversus Confessarios, qui pœnitentes ad turpia sollicitant," &c.; and, in 1745, "Decretum sanctæ universalis inquisitionis super perpetua inhabilitatione Sacerdotum ad turpia sollicitantium, vel sacrificio missæ abutentium ad sortilegia," tom. i., p. 101; iii., p. 416. Also Dens Theolog., tom. vi., De Casibus Reservatis, No. 216.

* Dens Theolog., tom. vi., De Casibus Reservatis, No. 215.

the opposite part of it, when he says, If we confess our sins, he necessarily means the doing so before men also.' This is doubtless a most precious piece of Popish logic. The whole weight of the argument, if argument it can be called, rests upon the words, 'If we say we have no sin;' and even these conclude nothing in the Bishop's favour, unless they necessarily mean, saying aloud before men. Now so far from necessarily meaning this, it is not even implied. They refer to what a man thinks or says in his heart. 'If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves.' It is by what a man thinks, or says to himself, that he deceives himself; but by what he says aloud before men, he deceives not himself but others. Besides, Bishop Hay ought to have known that some men are guilty of doing every day what he says no man in his senses will do; that is, saying to God that they have no sin. Christ described a class of men under the character of the Pharisee, who not only said to God he had no sin, at least such as other men had, but boasted of a great deal of merit. And this must be the case with every Papist when he has received the absolution of his Priest, and performed his penance.

["'Again,' proceeds Bishop Hay, 'St. James says, Confess your sins one to another, and pray for one another, that you may be saved. Here we see, in express terms, the confessing our sins to man laid down as a condition of our salvation.' His Reverence admits that there is a difficulty in the words 'one another,' which he attempts to remove; but he only smothers it with a great heap of words. So far as the words of the Apostle go, they make it as much the duty of the Priests to confess to their people, as of the people to confess to the Priests.

["In the following, the reader will see how the meaning of the plainest passages of Scripture is perverted by such writers as Bishop Hay, and, indeed, by all Popish writers. 'St. Paul,' says he, 'speaking of the reconciliation of sinners to God, says, God hath reconciled us to himself by Christ; and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation. For God, indeed, was in Christ reconciling the world to himself; and he hath placed in us the word of reconciliation; for Christ we are therefore ambassadors. (2 Cor. v. 18.) In these words the Apostle declares, that whereas God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, reconciled the world to himself, he was pleased to appoint the Apostles, and their successors in office, to be the ministers of this reconciliation; that is, to be his substitutes on earth for applying to the souls of the people the means obtained by him for communicating the grace of reconciliation; and for this purpose, says the Apostle, he placed in us the word of reconciliation, by which means we are made the ambassadors of Christ. Hence, then, it manifestly follows, that if the Pastors of the Church be the ministers of our reconciliation with God, if the word of reconciliation, the power of pronouncing sentence of absolution upon us, be placed in them, it is, of course, by their ministry alone that we can obtain this reconciliation. Christ instituted no other way; therefore, it is our strict obligation to have recourse to them for this benefit, by laying open before them the state of our souls in the sacrament of confession, that they may apply to us the means of our reconciliation in the way that Christ requires of them to do.' *

["The Apostle's doctrine in the above-cited passage is, that when Christ died upon the cross, 'God was in him reconciling the world to himself;' that is, taking away the grounds of difference which stood between him and sinners of the human race, 'not imputing to them their trespasses,' but imputing them to Christ, who voluntarily took them upon himself, that he might make atonement for them: thus it is said, 'He bore our sins in his own body on the tree.' 'For God made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.' It was thus that God reconciled us to himself; and we are said to be reconciled to God by the death of his Son. 'Now,' says the Apostle, 'he hath given to us the word of reconciliation.' This was not to effect the reconciliation; for Christ himself effected it. It was not even to apply the means of reconciliation, as Bishop Hay calls it; for it is the Holy Ghost alone that can apply the benefit of Christ's death to the souls of men. It was, as the Apostle himself plainly declares, the Gospel with which he was put in trust, and which he calls 'the word of reconciliation,' because it shows the way by which we become reconciled to God. The Apostles received a commission from Christ himself to preach this Gospel to all the world. Thus they became his ambassadors; and as such they besought men in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God; that is, to believe in Christ, and acquiesce in the plan of salvation, which is called submitting to the righteousness of God.

["The Apostles never professed, like this arrogant Priest, to put themselves forward as Christ's substitutes. They did not even call themselves ministers of reconciliation, as the Popish Priests do. They were only Ministers of the word of reconciliation, which is an expression of precisely the same import as the modern phrase 'Preachers of the Gospel.' They were, indeed, ambassadors of Christ. They received their commission directly from himself. They were endowed with extraordinary and miraculous powers for the exercise of their functions; and so guided by the Holy Spirit in all their ministrations, as to declare the mind of their Master with infallible certainty. In these respects they had no successors; and there is no need of any; for they are to us in their writings as much the ambassadors of Christ as they were to those who were subjects of their personal preaching. By their word they are still beseeching men in the name of Christ to be reconciled to God.

["Let no one imagine that by these remarks I mean to undervalue a standing ministry in the churches of Christ: I know this to be as really of divine appointment as the apostolic office itself. I know that he who gave Apostles and Prophets for laying the foundation of the church, gave also Pastors and Teachers for its edifying or building up. But the latter have no right to put themselves in the place of the former, much less to exalt themselves above them, as the silliest Popish Priest does, when he requires persons to confess their secret sins to him, and when he gives himself out as a Minister of reconciliation, as one who is able to grant pardon of sin by means of his sacraments, and to restore sinners to the favour and friendship of their offended Creator."*]

(1.) We are told, that "the antiquity of confession proves it to be a divine institution, seeing that it was used from the commencement of the Christian era." To this we answer, (i.) That auricular confession is but of recent origin in the Christian church. Papists can adduce no institution of Christ in favour of this practice, nor an example from him or his Apostles, nor any early usage of the primitive times. (ii.) And we know of no public constitution for auricular confession before the twelfth General Council, which was the fourth Lateran, held in the year 1215, under Innocent III., from which period it dates its rise.

["* Sincere Christian instructed, &c., vol. ii., p. 82.

[* M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. ii., p. 341, et seq.]

(2.) It is again affirmed, that "the duty of auricular confession is so difficult to be performed, and so opposed to the feelings of the people, that they would never submit to it were it not of divine appointment." We acknowledge that it is a burden grievous to be borne: nevertheless, this is no proof that it is divinely instituted, or even useful. It was hard for the idolatrous Israelites to sacrifice their children to idols; and that Baal's Priests should cut their flesh with knives. The Pharisees laid burdens heavy and grievous to be borne, upon the people. But none of these things were of God. There are, indeed, many requirements in Popery difficult of performance, such as the following:—that the Pope should have power to tread on the necks of Kings and make them his vassals; and that he should, with his annates, Peterpence, and other taxes, burden the Church. All these were hard things; and yet the people calmly submitted to them; but not by divine authority.

["Auricular confession, however, is not so humiliating an ordeal to the Popish laity as some may be led to imagine, who did more easily submit, that they might be freed from the shame of open penance; and they knew how to deal with their Priests, when the penance was secret; none knew either the heinousness of their sins, or the nature of the penance. So it was more safe for the Priest to enjoin what he listed, and give absolution on what terms he pleased. And, then, because it was painful to have the absolution delayed till the penance was fulfilled, which was the rule of the primitive church, absolution was granted immediately upon confession without more ado." *]

(3.) It is said also that auricular confession produces good effects. To this we reply, that we have proved that its tendency is to corrupt both the Clergy and people.

["Sufficient has been advanced on this topic to prove that the practice of confession, as it obtains in the Church of Rome, has, in innumerable cases, been the source of immense evil to the individuals making such confession, by the re-action of the details of sinful indulgence on their imagination and passions; to the Confessor himself, by the facts and circumstances which are disclosed; and to the general habits of thinking on the subject, by which the official exercise of priestly functions in this way, has had the effect of tranquillizing the conscience on most unscriptural principles; and the minds of men have been set at rest, not because of the right application of Christian truth, but by the external administration of the rites and observances which the pretended sacrament of penance imposes. It is much easier to confess, and to make compensation by occasional bodily privations, than actually to 'crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts.' It is much easier to alter the mode of living, to exchange one kind of animal food for another, to pursue for a time a course of abstinence, or even to inflict positive sufferings on the body, than it is to mortify an ambitious and sensual temper, to suppress the feelings of malevolence and resentment, or to abandon the habits of irregular and vicious indulgence. We might observe further, that the political influence obtained by the knowledge of confession in high and exalted stations, has often been employed for the most iniquitous purposes, and has rendered the possession of this power a prerogative of dangerous operation to the civil interests of society. The history of Jesuitism has furnished abundant illustrations of the truth of this remark." *]

[* Gibson's Preservative, &c., vol. i., tit. i., chap. iv., p. 229. Folio.]

CHAPTER X.

CONTRITION AND ATTRITION.

1. The doctrine stated. Council of Trent quoted. Explanation of the Roman Catechism. Forsaking sin is overlooked: 2. The doctrine contradicts Scripture: 3. It produces immorality: 4. Attrition considered. Roman Catechism cited. Bishop Hay's opinion. Two determinations of Trent on this. Dens cited. This doctrine is taught by the greatest Divines of Popery. The imperfect sorrow of attrition considered sufficient for pardon: 5. Objections against attrition; (1.) The attrite person may retain his love of sin; (2.) It is an insufficient condition of pardon; (3.) Proceeds on a false principle; (4.) Renders pardon unnecessary; (5.) Cannot do more than contrition; (6.) Absolution cannot render it perfect; (7.) Absolution cannot change the disposition: 6 It is grossly absurd to substitute this for reformation of life: 7. One error is, that men are not bound to repent presently. Council of Lateran cited. The Roman Catechism. Dens. Bishop Jeremy Taylor. Obj. "The Church requires men to repent at least once a year:" 8. They err concerning the kind of sins which call for repentance. Distinction into mortal and venial sin. Hence men are careless about repenting: 9. True repentance is of itself sufficient in order to obtain pardon. The error in affirming that absolution must be added to repentance; and that attrition with absolution will answer.

I. The Council of Trent, in its fourteenth session, chap. iv., thus defines contrition: "Contrition is the sorrow and detestation which the mind feels for past sin, with a purpose of sinning no more." † In the same chapter the Council declares, that "this contrition contains not only the cessation from sin, and a purpose and commencement of a new life, but also hatred of the old one." ‡ The Council, in the same chapter, farther teaches, that "although it may sometimes happen that this contrition is perfect in charity, and reconciles a man to God before the sacrament of penance is actually received; nevertheless the reconciliation is not to be ascribed to contrition without the desire of the sacrament, which was, in fact, included in it. But that imperfect contrition, which is called attrition, commonly arising from a consideration of the turpitude of sin, and a fear of hell and punishment, (if it excludes the desire of committing sin, with the hope of pardon,) not only does not make a man a hypocrite and a greater sinner, but is really a gift of God, and an impulse of the Holy Spirit; not that the Spirit does as yet dwell in the soul, but merely excites the penitent, who, thus aided, prepares his way to righteousness." §

[* Fletcher's Lectures, &c., p. 176.]

† "Contritio animi dolor ac detestatio est de peccato commisso, cum proposito non peccandi de cætero."—Concil. Trident., sess. xiv., cap. 4.

‡ "Hanc contritionem, non solum cessationem a peccato, et vitæ novæ propositum et inchoationem, sed veteris etiam odium continere."—Idem.

§ "Etsi contritionem hanc aliquando charitate perfectam esse contingat, hominemque Deo reconciliare priusquam hoc sacramentum actu suscipiatur; ipsam nihilominus reconciliationem ipsi contritioni, sine sacramenti voto, quod in illa includitur, non esse adscribendam. Illam vero contritionem imperfectam quæ attritio dicitur, quoniam vel ex turpitudinis peccati consideratione, vel ex gehennæ et pœnarum metu communiter concipitur, si voluntatem peccandi excludat, cum spe veniæ; declarat, non solum non facere hominem hypocritam, et magis peccatorem, verum etiam donum Dei esse, et Spiritus Sancti impulsum, non adhuc quidem inhabitantis, sed tantum moventis, quo pœnitens adjutus viam sibi ad justitiam parat."—Idem.

The Council of Trent has also passed the following canon on contrition :—"Whoever shall affirm that that contrition which is produced by examination, enumeration, and hatred of sins, and in the exercise of which the penitent ruminates on his past years in the bitterness of his soul, pondering the weight, multitude, and baseness of his offences, the loss of eternal happiness, and the incurring of eternal condemnation, with a resolution to lead a better life,—that such contrition is not sincere and useful sorrow, and does not prepare for grace, but makes a man a hypocrite and a greater sinner, and that it is, in fact, a forced sorrow, and not free or voluntary; let him be accursed." *

The following explanation of contrition is given by the Trent Catechism :—"Penance is, as it were, A COMPENSATION FOR OFFENCES which proceed from the free-will of the person offending, and is appointed by the will of God, to whom the offence has been offered. On the part of the penitent, therefore, a willingness to make this compensation is required, and in this willingness chiefly consists contrition. The penitent must also submit himself to the judgment of the Priest, who is the Vicegerent of God, to enable him to award a punishment proportioned to his guilt." "It (contrition) supposes, first of all, a hatred of sin, and a desire of atoning for past transgression." On the qualities of true contrition the Catechism says: "(1.) We must, in the first place, detest and deplore all our sins: if our sorrow and detestation extend only to some, our repentance cannot be sincere or salutary. (2.) In the next place, our contrition must be accompanied with a desire of confessing and satisfying for our sins. (3.) The penitent must form a fixed and firm purpose of amendment of life. (4.) True contrition must be accompanied with forgiveness of the injuries which we may have sustained from others." On the efficacy of contrition the Catechism says: "Other pious exercises, such as alms, fasting, prayer, and the like, in themselves holy and commendable, are sometimes, through human infirmity, rejected by Almighty God; but contrition can never be rejected by him, never prove unacceptable to him: 'A contrite and humbled heart, O God,' exclaims the Prophet, 'thou wilt not despise.' Nay, more; the same Prophet declares, that as soon as we have conceived this contrition in our hearts our sins are forgiven: 'I said, I will confess my injustice to the Lord, and thou hast forgiven the wickedness of my sin.'" † Here an inquiry naturally arises: If sin is forgiven as soon as contrition is experienced, what becomes of the assertion, that the sacrament of penance is necessary to salvation?

It will be observed from the preceding quotations that the Church of Rome teaches that we are to be truly grieved or sorry on account of our sins; that we are to hate them; and that we must purpose or resolve to forsake them. All this is excellent as far as it goes. But one essential element or mark of true repentance is entirely omitted, or so slightly referred to, that this sorrow and hatred of sin, together with all good purposes of amendment, are counteracted, or may be substituted by additional resolutions to do better in future, by priestly absolution, by penances, and by the doctrine of attrition or imperfect contrition. The deficiency to which reference is made is forsaking sin. This practical part is overlooked, counteracted, or rendered unnecessary, by the resolutions of amendment, absolution, penances, and whatever may pertain to them. All that we have to say on this doctrine of contrition will refer chiefly to the practical use to which it is applied.

2. In the first place, we affirm that this doctrine of contrition contradicts the Scripture notion of repentance, which includes not only a sorrow on account of sin, a hatred to it, and a strong resolution against it, but also renouncing it. It is only "he that confesseth and FORSAKETH his sins that shall find mercy." No matter how much a person may be grieved on account of sin, and purpose to forsake it, yet, if he continue in the same vicious course, he is not a true penitent. The word μετανοια, by which true evangelical repentance is expressed, signifies not a transient passion for having offended God, or a sudden purpose to alter our conduct, but an actual change of the mind and will, a transformation of the soul from bad principles to good. Wherever this change is produced, there will of necessity follow a new life, and the performance of such actions as are agreeable to the laws of God. Godly sorrow for sin, which is that which Roman Catholics mean by contrition, is not repentance, and therefore cannot procure pardon; it is only a good disposition, or right preparation for, or an expression of, true repentance. This the Apostle informs us: "Godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of." (2 Cor. vii. 10.) If this godly sorrow worketh or produceth repentance, it cannot be repentance itself.

3. The doctrine, that contrition, with confession and absolution, place a man in a state of salvation, is not only against Scripture, but it is also productive of gross immorality in conduct; inasmuch as it gives a person who believes it encouragement to continue in sin during his life, because it prevents him from thinking there is any necessity for reformation of life. According to this notion, if a man be sorry for sin when he comes to confession, and resolves to do so no more, then, on the Priest pronouncing a few words, he is absolved from the guilt of sin, and placed in the favour of God, so that if he die that moment, he will be saved. But what if he do not perform those resolutions, and return again to sin? It is only to repeat the same medicine, be sorry again, resolve again, obtain absolution again, and then he is again as righteous as he was before; and so often as he thus repents, so often may his sins be forgiven. And lastly, though the individual may have continued all his life in a career of sin, he is informed, that this repentance and absolution shall as certainly bring him to heaven as though he had lived a holy and innocent life; except the punishments of purgatory, which he must of necessity endure, unless he is exonerated from them by satisfactions and indulgences. Upon these principles, how can a sinner who is in love with his sins ever think himself obliged to reform? What man can be persuaded to break off his sins by righteousness, when he can obtain pardon and salvation on such easy terms?

4. We have given on this subject the most favourable representation of the doctrine of contrition, as maintained by the greatest casuists of Rome. It is, however, generally thought to be too strict and severe for sinners such as the Papacy have to deal with: they have therefore less onerous conditions for penitents than those above mentioned. Contrition is too heavy a burden; therefore they have found an easier way, (still supposing that the penitent confesses and receives absolution,) and that is by means of ATTRITION, or imperfect contrition, as the Council of Trent calls it, which, with the sacrament of penance, is said to procure pardon.

* "Si quis dixerit, eam contritionem, quæ paratur per discussionem, collectionem, et detestationem peccatorum, qua quis recogitat annos suos in amaritudine animæ suæ, ponderando peccatorum suorum gravitatem, multitudinem, fœditatem, amissionem æternæ beatitudinis, et æternæ damnationis incursum, cum proposito melioris vitæ, non esse verum et utilem dolorem, nec preparare ad gratiam, sed facere hominem hypocritam, et magis peccatorem; demum illam esse dolorem coactum, et non liberum, ac voluntarium; anathema sit."—Idem, can. 5.

† Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 263—269.

Let the Church of Rome here speak her own sentiments:—"Contrition, it is true," says the Roman Catechism, "blots out sin; but who is ignorant that, to effect this, it must be so intense, so ardent, so vehement, as to bear a proportion to the magnitude of the crimes which it effaces? This is a degree of contrition which few reach; and hence, through perfect contrition alone, very few indeed could hope to obtain the pardon of their sins. It therefore became necessary that the Almighty, in his mercy, should afford a less precarious and less difficult means of reconciliation and of salvation; and this he has done in his admirable wisdom, by giving to his Church the keys of the kingdom of heaven. According to the doctrine of the Catholic Church, a doctrine firmly to be believed and professed by all her children, if the sinner have recourse to the tribunal of penance, with a sincere sorrow for his sins, and a firm resolution of avoiding them in future, although he bring not with him that contrition which may be sufficient of itself to obtain the pardon of sin, his sins are forgiven by the Minister of religion, through the power of the keys."* Though the authors of the Catechism obviously refer to attrition, they appear studious to avoid the use of the term itself.

Bishop Hay, in his Sincere Christian, says: "A sorrow for sin which arises from these motives (fear of hell, loss of heaven, &c.) is therefore called 'imperfect contrition' and 'attrition.' How do contrition and attrition differ in their effects? Perfect contrition, as it arises from a perfect love of God for himself alone, is so pleasing in his sight, that the moment a person has it God is reconciled to him and forgives his sins. Attrition, on the other hand, in no case obtains, of itself, the remission of sin, but only disposes the soul for receiving that grace by means of the sacrament of penance."† We say nothing of the gross heresy which is contained in this quotation, in ascribing the remission of sins to the perfect contrition of sinful man, in the place of the atonement of Jesus Christ. It will not fail to be observed that, in the quotation from the Catechism, as well as that from Bishop Hay, attrition, with confession and absolution, is plainly introduced as a substitute for genuine repentance.

We learn the meaning of the word "attrition" from that of the word "contrition;" for if contrition be a hatred of, and a resolution against, sin, then attrition, or deficient contrition, must be an imperfect resolution against it. So that whosoever shall affirm that attrition, with the Priest's absolution, shall be available before God to procure justification, declares that though a man be not so sorry for his sins as he ought, nor does so perfectly resolve against them as he might, but only manifests some imperfect purposes to forsake them, such a man shall, upon this slight repentance, have his sins remitted.

Whatever Roman Catholics may mean when they say, that this is not a doctrine of their Church, but only that of some private individuals, to all who understand a consequence it will be proved to be a professed and established doctrine of that Church, by the decrees and canons of the Council of Trent. In evidence of this, we compare the following two determinations of this Synod:—"That attrition, or imperfect contrition, though it cannot bring a man to justification without the sacrament of penance, yet it disposes men for obtaining the grace of God by the sacrament of penance."* But in another place it is decreed, "that all the sacraments confer grace on all who rightly receive them."† On comparing these two conclusions, let any one judge whether it does not legitimately follow that all those who have but imperfect contrition, or bare attrition for sin, are by this sacrament of penance put in a state of salvation, according to the doctrines of the Council of Trent. They decree that all sacraments confer the grace for which they are ordained, to all that are rightly disposed; but bare attrition, or imperfect sorrow for sin, and imperfect purposes against it, dispose a man to receive grace by the sacrament of penance. Both these propositions are laid down by the Council of Trent. Therefore we necessarily conclude, according to that Assembly, "that attrition, with the sacrament of penance, will place a man in a state of salvation." Dens asks: "What contrition is required for the proper reception of the sacrament of penance?" and the answer given is: "Imperfect contrition is required, and it is sufficient. Perfect contrition, though best, is not absolutely required, because this justifies without the sacrament."‡

This anti-scriptural doctrine is taught by the most distinguished Divines of the Papacy; it is disseminated not only by Jesuitical casuists, but by others; and numerous books have been published to show that this is the prevailing doctrine among them. When they have been reproached with holding such an outrageous dogma, they usually reply, that such is the judgment of particular individuals, but that the whole Church ought not to be charged with embracing it, as it has not been established by any General Council. This is a frivolous pretence, because persons of their communion do not strictly examine the decrees of Councils, but rather surrender themselves entirely to their spiritual guides. The Confessors manage the penitents, and instil into their minds such notions; and avow to the world, in their publications, that they are true. But it is utterly false to say that no Synod has so taught; for we have proved that the Council of Trent inculcated this doctrine, and that the principal Divines of Romanism have disseminated it on the authority of that Council. It belongs to the Papists to show that this doctrine has been disallowed by any such assembly: this they cannot; for although the Jansenists have vigorously opposed it, no reigning Pope has condemned it, or marked it as being unscriptural or immoral. §

["Contrition, according to the sentiment of the Church of Rome, imports a sorrow for our having offended God, not only because he can damn sinners, but also because

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 271.

† Sincere Christian instructed, vol. i., pp. 287, 288.

[* "Et quamvis sine sacramento pœnitentiæ per se ad justificationem perducere peccatorem nequeat; tamen eum ad Dei gratiam in sacramento pœnitentiæ impetrandam disponit."—Conc. Trid., sess. xiv., cap. 4.]

[† "Si quis dixerit, non dari gratiam per hujusmodi sacramenta semper, et omnibus, quantum est ex parte Dei, etiam si rite ea suscipiant, sed aliquando, et aliquibus; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid., sess. vii.; De Sacramentis, can. 7.]

[‡ "Qualis contritio requiritur pro suscipiendo sacramento pœnitentiæ?—R. Requiritur et sufficit contritio imperfecta. Contritio perfecta, licet optima, non requiritur necessario, quia hæc justificat sine sacramento."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi.; De Contritione, No. 51.]

§ Those who wish to see the conflicting opinions in the Roman Catholic Church on this topic, may consult Dens's Theology, in his tract on the Sacrament of Penance, on the article Contrition, Nos. 43 to 62, inclusive.

he is infinitely worthy of our obedience and love. Contrition, therefore, supposeth not only the fear of hell, but also the love of God, which retakes its place in the sinner's soul, and which leads him again to the obedience of so good a God, whom he hath been so unhappy as to offend. Attrition, on the contrary, according to their opinion, doth not import any thing of the love of God in the sinner, but only a fear of hell, which makes him condemn his sin: it is the fruit only of a slavish fear, arising from the prospect of the punishments designed for sinners. This being so, I desire the reader to judge, whether the Church of Rome have not taken away the essential part of repentance, in receiving for one of her maxims, that attrition, in conjunction with the sacrament, is sufficient to reinstate man in the grace and favour of God. And what though she exhorts sinners to contrition; is it not evident that the greatest part of sinners, finding great trouble in doing that which they declare sufficient, will find much more difficulty to do what their Confessors judge not to be necessary? though without doubt it be the better and surer way.

["To set this dangerous overthrow of repentance in a clear light, it will be sufficient to do two things: the first is to prove, that attrition imports no more than what we have declared just now to be the opinion of the Church of Rome; the other is, that this attrition, with the sacrament of penance, is sufficient to put a man in a state of grace.

["If we prove both these points, it will be as clear as the day, that man may be restored to favour with God, without any act of the love of God; which is a doctrine as far estranged and remote from the nature of true repentance, as any thing the spirit of man is capable of conceiving.

["Now we need not consult some singular casuist to prove that the definition of attrition, such as we have set it down, is the common opinion of the Romish Church. Since first she distinguished between attrition and contrition, this has been the common notion amongst her Divines; for they look upon infused charity as an effect of the sacrament of penance, whose essence, they say, consists in these words of the Priest, when he saith to the penitent, 'I absolve thee;' for so Father Amolet declares himself, in his abridgment of Divinity in French, book ix., ch. iii., p. 689; and the famous Mendicant, Peter à St. Joseph, speaks to the same purpose in his idea of Divinity concerning the Sacrament, lib. iii., cap. 2. The Canonists themselves are of the same opinion. Abbot Fagnani, the greatest Canonist of his time, declares, in his work upon the Decretals, dedicated to Pope Alexander VII., that the Priests of the Greek Church ought, conditionally, to be re-ordained; for that the greatest part of them being ordained only with the imposition of hands, charity persuades us to re-ordain them conditionally, because of the danger of souls, especially in the case of the sacrament of penance, which would be of no avail to those who are attrite, should they be absolved by one that wants the character of priesthood; which he proves by the fourth and seventh chapters of the fourteenth session of the Council of Trent. The casuists make no doubt of the point. This is the doctrine of Escobar, in his famous Synopsis of Moral Divinity, of the thirty-seventh edition, tract 7, cap. iv., as also of the famous Benedict Rhemy Noydens, in his Practice of Curates, the fourteenth edition, printed at Madrid with all manner of approbations in 1674, tract 5, cap. v., No. 5. The same doctrine we find in the Catechisms for the children of that communion: the Christian Instruction, or Catechism, printed in 1665 at Paris, and ordered to be alone taught throughout that diocess, declares itself thus, p. 65, lesson vi., concerning contrition:—'Q. What is imperfect contrition?—A. It is a sorrow for having offended God, because of his justice, which is not sufficient for the pardon of our sins, if it be not joined with confession.' That which is considerable in this point is, that with one accord they give us a reason, which, according to their hypothesis, is decisive in this matter; namely, if charity were found in the sinner, he would already be in a state of grace; but the sinner is not in a state of grace before he has received the sacrament; therefore attrition is an imperfect state, which leaves something for the sacrament to do; and on this account differs from contrition, which reinstates a man in grace, as being accompanied with charity. And in case we should not be convinced with the force of this reason, they endeavour the same by two other much more irresistible arguments; the first whereof is, because the point had been thus determined by the Council of Trent, sess. xiv., cap. 4, as may be seen in Amolet and à St. Joseph, at the places before cited. The second is, that they give to the words of the Priest, 'I absolve thee,' a sense that necessarily imports this notion: 'I absolve thee,' saith Escobar, that is to say, 'I confer the grace which is expulsive of sin.' See the sense of this form of words in P. à St. Joseph, in Thes. Univers. Theolog. de Pœnit., p. 110: 'I confer upon thee the sanctifying grace, which of itself forgives sins.'

["The second article, which imports that attrition is sufficient, being joined with the sacrament of penance, is altogether conformable to the notions of the Council of Trent, from whence the Roman Divines draw their definition. In effect, we are to observe three things here, which clearly decide the point: the first is, that since the Council of Trent, we find few Divines that defend the ancient opinion of the necessity of contrition, the contrary opinion having gained so much ground, as well speculatively as practically, that nothing is more generally believed and taught. Benedict, in his Summa de Peccat., lib. v., cap. i., p. 842, makes the difference between repentance considered as a virtue, and as a sacrament; namely, that all those of old that died before the ascension of Christ, without perfect contrition, are lost; the case not being so with us, who may be saved by attrition alone, through the sacrament of penance, which confers grace and remission of sins, ex opere operato, which the virtue of penance cannot do. The second is, that it is so certain a thing with them, that attrition is sufficient, that the Directors are content and satisfied, in case their penitents have but felt the motion of attrition at the time when they made reflection on their sins in order to confess them, though they feel no such motion whilst they are confessing. The third is, that a Father of the Oratory having declared in his Remarks upon a Treatise of St. Augustine, that repentance cannot be true, entire, or assured, if it want the conditions of true contrition, and that without it the grace of the sacrament of penance cannot be obtained, the Divinity Faculty of Paris condemned the said proposition as contrary to the peace and quiet of souls, and to the confirmed practice of the Church, capable to diminish the efficacy of the sacrament of penance, rash and erroneous. This decree was made the 1st of July, 1638; whence it sufficiently appears, that some Divines, favouring the doctrine of St. Austin, for endeavouring to oppose themselves to the torrent that threatened to overthrow the ancient opinion, have been most solemnly condemned by that Faculty.

[" I acknowledge there have always been some Divines, who, though they teach that simple attrition is sufficient with the sacrament, yet endeavour to sweeten that opinion, which, in all appearance, was not very pleasing to them: these, by attrition, understand an imperfect contrition, which supposeth some degree of the love of God. But, at the same time, it is true, 1. That these very Divines acknowledge charity to be the fruit of absolution, and believe that this imperfect contrition would not be sufficient without the sacrament, to restore a sinner to the state of grace. This they express in conformity to the Council of Trent, which doth consider these motions only as dispositions to that grace, which is conferred in the sacrament; and grace and charity, according to them, differ only in notion. 2. It is true that the opposite opinion, which holds that attrition imports nothing of the love of God, but only a sorrow produced by the fear of hell, doth generally obtain amongst those of the Roman communion. It is hard to conceive how a belief so contrary to the notion of repentance, could ever enter into the seat of confession; and yet most sure it is, that it both is, and bears sway, there.

[" Some authors of the Roman Church ingenuously acknowledge, that the opinion which supposeth that contrition is not necessary to a penitent, but that attrition becomes contrition by means of the sacrament, is of no long standing: Soto in 4 dist. 18, q. 3, art. 2. Yea, it seems as if Melchior Canus, Bishop of the Canaries, who assisted at the Council of Trent, was the first that broached this doctrine, that attrition, joined with the sacrament of penance, sufficeth, dist. 13, de Pœnit., art. 7, Nos. 5, 6. But, withal, he says, that the surest way is to exert an extra act of contrition, when danger of death obliges a sinner to confess.

[" In the mean time, let us consider how far this doctrine pleased the Divines of Rome. Many of the most famous of them have highly maintained this opinion of Melchior Canus, and positively deny that a sinner is obliged to produce any act of contrition, or of the love of God, in order to be reconciled with him, provided he makes use of confession. 'These Doctors maintain,' says the famous P. Morinus, 'that the power only of loving God, produced by the sacrament in the souls of the ungodly, who are struck with the terror of hell, doth justify them, and reconcile them to God; and, furthermore, that it is not needful to love God sometimes, or so much as once during one's life, or to conceive the least sorrow for having so grievously offended him; yea, though a sinner should have hated God to his last breath.' Lastly, that the faculty of loving God, produced by the sacrament, is far more excellent than the very act of love and contrition itself.

[" It is hard to conceive there should be any arguments to defend so prodigious an opinion; but these authors are not at all to seek for them, and those very solid too, if we will believe them: they maintain that the excellence and prerogative of the sacraments of the Gospel, above those of the old law, appears chiefly in this, that the sacraments of the Gospel have delivered Christians from the heavy yoke of contrition, and the love of God. They pronounce, with a master-like authority, that when Jesus Christ established the necessity of confession, he took away the necessity of the love of God, being appeased by the habit of loving God, for fear of overcharging the ungodly, and those that hate God, with too heavy a burden. These are the reasons alleged by Henriquez, lib. iv., sum. c. vi., n. 5. The same is also the doctrine of Vasquez in 4 part, q. 86, art. 2, dub. 6; of Becanus, cap. 25, de Pœnit., q. 7, n. 3; of Laymannus, in his Moral Divinity, lib. v., tr. 6, cap. 2; of Lopez, in his Instruct. Conscientiæ, cap. xii., q. 3; of Pesantius, in his Additions to St. Thomas, q. 5, disp. 4; of Puteanus, in 3 p., q. 90, 1 part, dub. ultim; of the famous Nicholas Isambert, Professor of the Faculty of Paris, disp. 14, de Pœnit., art. 11, n. 6, and disp. 13, art. 6, 7, and many others; especially of the modern Doctors."*]

Attrition, which is a low and imperfect sorrow for sin, or a sorrow arising from hope, fear, desire, or the like, is, with the Romanists, a sufficient disposition for a penitent, in the sacrament of penance, to receive pardon, and to be justified before God, by taking away the guilt of his sins, and his obligation to eternal pains. This sorrow, if such it may be called, is sufficient for pardon, provided the sins be confessed, and the person absolved by the Priest. Attrition, however, being a word of the schools, not of Scripture or antiquity, means variously, as their theologians see fit to interpret. But though they differ in assigning to it a precise definition, yet, it being the least and lowest part of repentance, every act of a man who may be said to repent, no matter on what consideration, cannot be denied to have attrition. The following observations are presented on this subject for the reader's consideration.

5. Objections against attrition.

(1.) An individual, being attrite, as above described, coming to confess his sins, is allowed to retain his love of sin; for nothing but love to God can take away the love to sin; and if there be any spiritual love in it, it is contrition, and not attrition. From these premisses it will inevitably follow, that if the Priest can absolve him that is attrite, he may pardon him who has affections to sin still remaining. If it be said that absolution changes fear into love, attrition into contrition, a Saul into a David, a Judas into a John, a Simon Magus into a Simon Peter; then stupendous conversions and miracles may be wrought by an ordinary ministry.

(2.) It is confessed that the Priest cannot pardon on any other terms than those upon which God pardons: if he do, then he is not the Minister of God, but the supreme Lord, and must vouchsafe the boon on his own terms, if he do it not according to God's prescription. But God never pardons him that is merely attrite: this is what the Papists confess when they require the man to go to the Priest that he may be made contrite; which is as if he were sent to the Priest to be made chaste, or temperate, or humble in an instant. If it be said, that "although God does not pardon him that is attrite, unless it be together with the keys, that is, unless the Priest absolves him; and as this is all that God requires, the Priest does no more than God warrants; the attrition or imperfect repentance, and the keys of the Church, are all that God requires:" if this could be proved, it were something; but there is no support for it in Scripture or antiquity, it being nowhere said that attrition and absolution are alone sufficient. This is a dream of yesterday.

(3.) If attrition be good of itself, and a sufficient disposition to receive pardon from the Church, then it is sufficient to receive pardon from God independent of the Church, in cases of necessity. For unless, in such emergency, it be sufficient to desire absolution, then the outward act does more than the inward, and the ceremony were more than the grace, and the Priest greater than

[* Gibson's Preservative, vol. ii., tit. viii., pp. 36—38, folio.]

God; for the Priest could pardon him whom God refused to pardon independent of the Priest; the will would not be accepted for the deed, when the deed were impossible to be done; and a man should live or die, not by himself, but should be judged by the actions of others: all of which is absurd, and therefore must proceed from a false principle.

(4.) Attrition renders contrition, or true repentance, unnecessary. For if attrition in some cases, without the sacrament, were good, it is as good to all intents and purposes of pardon as contrition: for contrition, they affirm, is not sufficient without the keys; that is, unless contrition contain in it a resolution to confess and beg absolution. Now this resolution is worthless, unless it be reduced to practice as soon as possible. It is to be excused in no case but in that of necessity. So is it also in attrition. It is vain, therefore, to persuade the penitent to make his repentance more efficacious, and be contrite; for he may obtain pardon at a much cheaper rate; and as for contrition, to him it is wholly unnecessary.

(5.) It appears strange that attrition, which of itself is insufficient, shall yet do the work of pardon with the Priest's absolution; and yet that contrition, which is pronounced sufficient by the Synod of Trent, shall not do it without absolution in act or desire; that is, in act always, unless it be impossible.

["The Council also declares, that that imperfect contrition which is called attrition, commonly arising from a consideration of the turpitude of sin, and a fear of hell and punishment, (the intention of continuing in sin with the hope of receiving pardon at last, being disavowed,) not only does not make a man a hypocrite, and a greater sinner, but is really a gift of God, and an impulse of the Holy Spirit; not that the Spirit does as yet dwell in the soul, but merely excites the penitent, who, thus aided, prepares his way to righteousness. And although it cannot of itself conduct the sinner to justification, without the sacrament of penance, yet it disposes him to seek the grace of God in the sacrament of penance. For the Ninevites, being salutarily impressed with this fear by the terror-inspiring preaching of Jonah, did penance and sought mercy of the Lord. Therefore, have certain persons basely calumniated Catholic writers, as if they affirmed that the sacrament of penance confers grace on those who receive it, without good dispositions; which sentiment the church of God hath never taught nor held. Some also falsely teach that contrition is extorted and forced, not free and voluntary."*]

(6.) Can the Priest refuse to absolve a person who is attrite? If he can, then it is because absolution will not complete that which is imperfect; for if it could, it would be uncharitable to withhold it. If he cannot refuse to absolve him, it must be because such a penitent is sufficiently disposed; the Priest's absolution will do nothing to increase this disposition; it is sufficient already. The result therefore is: if this imperfect repentance, which is called "attrition,' be a proper disposition to absolution, then the ministry of the Priest is of no value.

(7.) It is also certain that the words of absolution can effect no more than that which they signify. If they pardon sin, they cannot change the disposition of the sinner. Has the Church of Rome power to use the following form of absolution?—"I do, by the power committed to me, change thy attrition into contrition." No answer can possibly be given to this question but one, and that will confound the Romanist. These words were never used or authorized by Christ, or by his Apostles; nor did the primitive church adopt them. Then, if this new doctrine of Rome respecting attrition be at variance with those of Christianity, it must be destructive of a holy life. It is an artful device to advance the Priest's office, and to render unnecessary holy dispositions. It presents the graces of God's Holy Spirit as articles of merchandise, so that a man may, for a certain price, become holy in an instant. It is a scheme to make righteous dispositions by the policy of man; and in effect requires nothing of duty to God, so that the Priest receive due honour and veneration.

6. The doctrine of attrition is mischievous, inasmuch as it substitutes for true repentance a little grief of mind, proceeding not from the love of God, but from a fear of punishment; unaccompanied with any firm and steadfast resolution to forsake sin, but only with some slight purposes to live better in future. This, it is said, after a vicious life, crowded with repeated acts of sin, and many inveterate habits deeply rooted, by the Priest's pronouncing a few words, will cancel all past sin, and so reconcile the individual to God, that if he die that moment he is certain of everlasting happiness! It attempts to reconcile things the most difficult,—the love of God and the love of sin; a habit of vice and a title to happiness! All that the Church of Rome requires of the aged, hardened sinner, in the article of death, when he can sin no longer, is to feel sorrow, however slight, arising from the fear of hell, manifest a desire to obtain pardon, and then the Priest will absolve him. It is true, he must be greatly disposed and prepared to receive absolution; greatly, according to the sense of the Church of Rome; for he must be attrite, although it were better if he were contrite;—one act of grief, no matter how small, and that not for one sin more than another, at the end of a long wicked life, and at the time of his death! What wonder is it that so many dissolute persons are to be found in this communion, when pardon and reconciliation may be had on terms so easy? Nay, is it not surprising that all wicked, licentious men in the world are not Roman Catholics?

In addition to these doctrines already mentioned, there are other points relative to repentance which are frequently taught in that Church, without any check whatever from those whom they recognise as the Head. It is necessary that we show what these are, together with their tendency.

7. Many of the Popish casuists and Confessors maintain, that a man is not bound immediately to repent of the sins of which he is guilty, unless it be per accidens, "by accident," or in respect to any other obligation. At a future time, they acknowledge, he is bound to repent; but to do it at once, upon the commission of the sin, there is no obligation laid upon him by the divine command. If he so manage his affairs, that repentance at some indefinite period be performed, it is enough, and no more is required. We refer to their own expositors of the law on this point.

[* "Illam vero contritionem imperfectam quæ attritio dicitur, quoniam vel ex turpitudinis peccati consideratione, vel ex gehennæ et pœnarum metu communiter concipitur, si voluntatem peccandi excludat, cum spe veniæ; declarat non solum non facere hominem hypocritam, et magis peccatorem, verum etiam donum Dei esse, et Spiritus Sancti impulsum, non adhuc quidem inhabitantis sed tantum moventis, quo pœnitens adjutus, viam sibi ad justitiam parat. Et quamvis sine sacramento pœnitentiæ per se ad justificationem perducere peccatorem nequeat; tamen eum ad Dei gratiam in sacramento pœnitentiæ impetrandam disponit. Hoc enim timore utiliter concussi Ninevitæ, ad Jonæ prædicationem plenam terroribus, pœnitentiam egerunt, et misericordiam a Domino impetrarunt. Quamobrem falso quidam calumniantur Catholicos scriptores, quasi tradiderint sacramentum pœnitentiæ, absque bono motu suscipientium, gratiam conferre; quod nunquam ecclesia Dei docuit, neque sensit. Sed et falso docent, contritionem esse extortam et coactam, non liberam et voluntariam."—Conc. Trid., sess. xiv., cap. 4.]

The Council of Lateran, which first established auricular confession, obliges all persons to repent once a year at least, and go to confession: the period specified is the solemn time of Easter.* This, however, the casuists say, is only a rule and law of the Church, to which we are not strictly bound by that of God. All that the law of God obliges is, to repent in articulo mortis, "in the article of death;" and as for the injunction of the Church, sufficient regard is paid to it by performing the outward ceremony of repentance, which consists in confession and approaching the sacrament. A distinguished Divine vouches this to be the doctrine of Pope Adrian and Cardinal Cajetan, and indeed to be that which was held by most men. The Roman Catechism, referring to this canon of the Lateran Council, says: "It commands all the faithful to confess their sins at least once a year. If, however, we consult our eternal interests, we shall certainly not neglect to have recourse to confession as often, at least, as we are in danger of death, or undertake to perform any act incompatible with the state of sin, such as to administer or receive the sacraments."† The time specified here is once a year, at the hour of death, or when about to engage in special religious exercises. But this by many is considered too strict, and therefore farther delays are allowable.

Peter Dens proposes the following question:—"How long may a person defer contrition after the commission of mortal sin, having given up the desire of committing sin?—Answer. It is very difficult to determine the time, as it happens in other precepts of faith, hope, charity, &c., in which no time is expressed; and thus even similar precepts may be considered as sometimes more binding than at others, as saith Steyaert. We would say, however, with Wiggers, from Tanner, that a delay of one week or one month may be sufficiently long, that the obligation of beginning to repent may be manifest, when God, on the seventh day, enjoined a rest from all work."‡ Repentance immediately subsequent to the commission of crime is not insisted on, either by the Catechism or by Dens; and as it regards forsaking and being delivered from sin, Romish Divines appear to have no conception of their necessity. Indeed, the whole of the sacrament of penance, as embracing absolution, contrition, confession, and penance, is but a periodical remedy to provide for habitual and obstinate sinners, who pursue various acts of iniquity until death, an entrance into the kingdom of heaven.

Bishop Taylor, who collected with care the views of Popish theologians on this topic, gives the following evidence from their writings:—"Scotus and his disciples say, that a sinner is bound, namely, by the precept of the Church, to repent on holy days, especially the great ones. But this is thought too severe by Soto and Medina, who teach that a sinner is bound to repent but once a year, that is, against Easter. These Doctors, indeed, do differ concerning the Church sense, which, according to the best of them, is bad enough, full as bad as it is stated in the charge: but they agree in the worst part of it; namely, that though the Church calls upon sinners to repent on holy days, or at Easter, yet that by the law of God they are not tied to do so much, but only to repent in the danger or article of death. This is the express doctrine taught in the Church of Rome by their famous Navar; and for this he quotes Pope Adrian and Cardinal Cajetan, and finally affirms it to be 'the sense of all men.' The same also is taught by Reginaldus, saying, 'It is true, and the opinion of all men, that the time in which a sinner is bound, by the commandment of God, to be contrite for his sins, is the imminent article of natural or violent death.' We shall not need to aggravate this sad story by the addition of other words to the same purpose in a worse degree, such as those of the same Reginaldus: 'There is no precept that a sinner should not persevere in enmity against God. There is no negative precept forbidding such perseverance.' These are the words of this man, and the proper and necessary consequent of that which they all teach, and to which they must consent. For since it is certain that he who hath sinned against God and his conscience, is in a state of enmity, we say he, therefore, ought to repent presently; because, until he hath repented, he is an enemy to God. This they confess, but they suppose it concludes nothing; for though they consider and confess this, yet they still say a man is not bound by God's law to repent till the article of death, and consequently say the same thing that Reginaldus does, and that a man is not bound to come out of that state of enmity till he be in those circumstances that it is very probable, if he does not then come out, he must stay in it for ever. It is something worse than this yet that Sotus says: 'Even to resolve to defer our repentance, and to refuse to repent for a certain time, is but a venial sin.' But Medina says, 'It is none at all.'

"If it be replied, that 'though God hath left it to sinners themselves to repent when they please, yet the Church hath been more severe than God hath been, and ties a sinner to repent, by collateral positive laws; for having bound every one to confess at Easter, consequently she hath tied every one to repent at Easter, and so, by her laws, he can lie in the sin without interruption but twelve months, or thereabouts:' but there is a secret in this, which they themselves have been pleased to discover for the relief of tender consciences; namely, that the Church ordains but the means, the exterior solemnity of it, and is satisfied if sinners obey her laws by a ritual repentance; but the holiness and the inward repentance, which in charity we would have supposed to have been designed by the law of festivals, non est id quod per præceptum de observatione festorum injungitur, 'is not that [* "De confessione facienda et non revelanda a Sacerdote, et saltem in Pascha communicando.

["Omnis utriusque sexus fidelis, postquam ad annos discretionis pervenerit, omnia sua solus peccata confiteatur fideliter, saltem semel in anno, proprio Sacerdoti, et injunctam sibi pœnitentiam studeat pro viribus adimplere, suscipiens reverenter ad minus in Pascha eucharistiæ sacramentum; nisi forte de consilio proprii Sacerdotis, ob aliquam rationabilem causam ad tempus ab ejus perceptione duxerit abstinendum: alioquin et vivens ab ingressu Ecclesiæ arceatur, et moriens Christiana careat sepultura. Unde hoc salutare statutum frequenter in ecclesiis publicetur, ne quisquam ignorantiæ cœcitate velamen excusationis assumat. Si quis autem alieno Sacerdoti voluerit justa de causa sua confiteri peccata, licentiam prius postulet et obtineat a proprio Sacerdote, cum aliter ille ipsum non possit solvere, vel ligare."—Concilia Labb., tom. xi., par. i.; Conc. Lateran., cap. xxi. Fol. Paris, 1671. Vide p. 199, ut supra.]

† Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 276.

[‡ "Ad quantum tempus differre licet contritionem post peccatum mortale commissum, affectu deposito?—R. Illud tempus determinare perdifficile est, prout accidit in aliis præceptis fidei, spei, charitatis, &c., in quibus non exprimitur tempus: et ideo similia præcepta censenda sunt eo frequentius obligare, ait Steyaertius. Dicimus interim cum Wiggers ex Tannero quod dilatio unius hebdomadæ aut unius mensis sit tempus satis diuturnum, ut obligatio exurgat assumendi initium pœnitentiæ cum Deus die septimo requiem ab omnibus operibus mandaverit."—Dens Theolog., tom. vi., De Dilatione Contritionis, No. 61.]

which is enjoined by the Church in her law of holy-days.' So that, still sinners are left to the liberty which they say God gave them, that they might continue in sin during life, except to attend to the ritual observance of the sacrament of penance, provided they are sure to repent at last."* What doctrine can give greater encouragement to continue in sin than this? The sinner may exclaim, "Though I am now at enmity with God, there is no law that binds me immediately to be reconciled to him, provided this reconciliation be effected before death." What can place a more effectual bar against a man's conversion than this dogma, if it be received?

We shall not trouble our readers with any confutation of this impious doctrine, inasmuch as it carries along with it its own condemnation. "If," continues Bishop Taylor, "it be answered, that this is not the doctrine of their Church, but of some private Doctors, we inform them, that if by the doctrine of the Church of Rome is meant such things as are decreed in their Councils, it is to be considered, that but few things are determined in their Councils, nothing but articles of belief, and the practice of sacraments relating to public order. And if they will not be reproved for any thing but what we prove to be false in the articles of their simple belief, they take a liberty to say and do what they list, and to corrupt all the world by their rules of conscience. But that this is also the doctrine of their Church, their own men tell us: Communis omnium, &c. 'It is the doctrine of all their men, &c., so they affirm,' who undertake to tell us in what sense their Church intends to tie sinners to actual repentance; not as soon as the sin is committed, but at certain seasons, and then also to no more of it than the external and ritual part. So that if their Church be injuriously charged, themselves have done it, not we. Besides, it is hard to suppose or expect that the innumerable cases of conscience which a whole trade of Lawyers and Divines amongst them have made, can be entered into the records of Councils and public decrees. In these cases we are to consider who teaches them? Their gravest Doctors, in the face of the sun, under the tuition of authority, in the public conduct of souls, in their allowed sermons, in their books licensed by a curious and inquisitive authority, not passing from them, but by warranty from several hands intrusted to examine them; ne fides Ecclesiæ aliquid detrimenti patiatur: 'that nothing be published but what is consonant with the Catholic faith.' These things cannot therefore be esteemed private opinions; especially since, if they be, yet they are the private opinions of them all, and that we understand to be public enough; and so are their doctrine, as what the scribes and Pharisees taught their disciples, though the whole church of the Jews had not passed it into a law. So this is the Roman doctrine, though not the Roman law;"† and, what is still worse, it is their general practice, though there may be some among them who follow Scripture and conscience, instead of the false doctrines and the unholy practices of the Church of Rome. These remarks are made, not merely in reference to the point in hand, but to many other topics which have to be considered.

8. What Popery teaches concerning the time of repentance is not more hurtful than what it inculcates with regard to the kind of offences which call for it. The distinction of sins into mortal and venial is sufficiently known, and, according to the manner in which they legislate thereupon, it is productive of ruinous consequences. If by venial sins they mean nothing more than those daily frailties and infirmities that the good and virtuous are alike subject to, and against which they continually strive, we should have nothing serious to object. But what they mean by venial sins is different. The Church of Rome teaches that there is a class of sins which may claim pardon from God as of right; and that if all of that kind were put together, they would not equal in turpitude one mortal sin. She teaches, that if we were ever so guilty of venial offences, they could not remove us from the favour of God; and that it is impossible for any man, on account of them, to perish eternally.

The consequences arising from this distinction of sins into mortal and venial, are to render men careless of repentance on account of those sins which we are apt to fall into every day, and against which we ought particularly to watch and fortify ourselves. By this doctrine conscience is set perfectly at ease; though in a little time these venial sins, as they call them, may grow to a vast number, and become habitual; so that what was a sin of infirmity at first, for want of repentance and striving against it, becomes as wilful and customary as any of which the individual can be guilty.

9. We remark further concerning contrition, when it is genuine and sincere; that is, a true, cordial sorrow for sin which proceeds from real conviction, and is attended with its proper fruits; namely, forsaking in act, as well as in desire, every transgression. The Old and New Testaments, Christ and his Apostles, together with the Greek and Latin Fathers, have taught that such repentance is sufficient to obtain forgiveness through faith in Jesus Christ. Now, in the first place, the Church of Rome does not allow this repentance or contrition to be acceptable, or of any value whatever, unless it be attended with a desire, or determination, to confess their sins to a Priest; asserting, that a man, by contrition, is not reconciled to God without a sacramental or ritual penance, in act or design. This is decreed by the Council of Trent, in the following contradictory and heretical declaration:— "The Council further teaches, that although it may sometimes happen that this contrition is perfect in charity, and reconciles a man to God before the sacrament of penance is actually received, nevertheless the reconciliation is not to be ascribed to contrition without the desire of the sacrament, which was in fact always included in it:"* this decree the Catechism of Trent endeavours to establish.† The pardon of sin is first attributed to contrition, and then it is transferred to the sacrament of penance, or, in other words, to the power of the keys, or the absolution of the Priest, who is God's Vicegerent on earth. This decision of the Council is purely heretical; because it inculcates a doctrine which is contrary to Scripture and the promises of the Gospel. It teaches for doctrines the commandments of men. It discourages the exercise of true repentance, and prefers that which is toward men to that which the Scripture calls "repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ."

In the second place, the malignity of this doctrine, and its influence in producing depravity of life, are very conspicuous. For though contrition without sacramental confession will not reconcile us to God, yet attrition, or imperfect contrition, with the sacrament, we are told,

* Bishop Taylor's Works, vol. x., pp. 187, 188. 8vo. edit.
† Idem, p. 189.

* Conc. Trid. Can. et Decret., sess. xiv., cap. iv.
† Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 263. Vide supra.

will reconcile the sinner. Contrition without it will not, attrition with it will. Therefore, by this doctrine, which was expressly decreed at Trent, there is no necessity for contrition at all. Attrition is as good, to all intents and purposes, for pardon; and a little repentance will prevail as well as the greatest,—the imperfect as well as the perfect. The consequence is, that although God, by his Holy Spirit, worketh contrition in a penitent, this work is not complete without the Priest's absolution, in desire at least; but if the Priest do his part, he has accomplished the work for the penitent, although God may not have wrought in him the excellent grace of contrition.

["In conclusion, we observe, that this dogma proceeds from utterly erroneous views of the nature of sin. We have already seen, from the decrees of the Council of Trent, that confession, in order to be valid, must include all mortal sins, even the most hidden; and, in the fifth chapter of the decrees on penance, the decision of the Council of Lateran, held in 1215, is repeated and confirmed, which renders it obligatory on all to confess once a year. The rite may be observed, and is by many observed, much more frequently; but confession once a year is all that is positively required. Now only combine these two facts,—confession of all mortal sins, not only of the outward life, but of the mind and heart, and yet made once a year, and you may hence judge what ideas respecting the nature of sin must be involved in a system which supposes such a thing for a moment possible.

["It will avail nothing to remind us of the distinction between mortal and venial sins,—sins which expose to eternal punishment, and sins which do not,—and that it is not all sins, but only all mortal sins, which are required to be confessed. I am aware that by means of this distinction, the process of confession is rendered amazingly simple and easy. But how monstrous is the notion, that any act of disobedience to the law of God is venial in its nature! If ever any sin, any act of disobedience, could be pronounced to be venial, it was the sin of our first parents. All that they were guilty of was the eating of an apple they were commanded not to eat; but this much is involved in every sin, however venial it may be deemed, that it is contrary to the command of God.

["What could be more simple, more harmless, (judging by appearances,) than their crime? and yet did it not draw forth the terrible indignation of heaven? and has it not proved the occasion of temporal and eternal misery to the world?

["But admitting that there were such a thing as venial transgression, what shall we think of a system which teaches that even all mortal sins of which we have been guilty in the course of a year, may be confessed to the Priest in a few minutes? How opposite is this to all the representations that are given in the Bible of the views and the feelings of the good in all ages, respecting the amount and the desert of their sins! 'Who can understand his errors?' says the Psalmist. And again: 'Mine iniquities are gone over my head: as an heavy burden. they are too heavy for me.' And again: 'Mine iniquities have taken hold on me, so that I am not able to look up; they are more than the hairs of my head, therefore my heart faileth me.'

["Defective and unscriptural views of the nature of sin lie at the foundation of the doctrine of auricular confession. Did we once discover the true character of 'that abominable thing which God hates,'—did we perceive the awful holiness of the divine Being, and his unutterable abhorrence of sin,—did we know the extent and the spirituality of the divine law, and what perfect love to God, and perfect love to men, what perfect holiness in mind, and in heart, and in life, every moment, it demands,—did we but understand the deep and inveterate depravity of our own hearts, what depths of corruption they contain, and by what forgetfulness of God, and what ingratitude, and what aversion to all that is good, and what proneness to evil, they are distinguished,—we should then be convinced that to number the sins even of one day, not to speak of a whole year, were absolutely impossible.

["This dogma bestows a dangerous power on the priesthood. Every Priest has access to the heart of each individual who is under his religious jurisdiction; and all are positively obliged to confess to him their most secret sins, those of which they are most deeply ashamed, and which, if known, might ruin their prospects and their character, and might endanger their lives. We may be told that the danger of exposure is completely guarded against, by the Priest being bound, by a solemn oath, never on any account to divulge what is revealed to him in confession. But the oath of secrecy is by no means so inviolable as it is given out to be. The following are the words of one who was himself a Popish Priest for some time. Referring to another Priest, with whom he occasionally met, he says:—

["'All our conversation ran upon the different stories he heard in confession.....But he is not the only person who is free in revealing what he has heard; for it is the ordinary discourse of the Priests when they meet, to inform one another of what they have heard in confession, and how dexterously they behaved on these occasions. This I can assert, because I was often present at such conferences, where the conversation was so indecent, that even an honest Pagan would have blushed.'*

["But even in the absence of any such proof as has just been given, we might have pronounced, merely from a knowledge of what human nature is, that if the secrets of a man's character were made known by him to his Priest, they might, in the face of any oath of secrecy, be divulged.

["It is not difficult to see that, with a view to promote his own interests, with a view to intimidate or overawe, or to gain a purpose, or under the impulse of revenge, or some other base passion, the Priest might betray the confidence that had been reposed in him. At all events, no man can assert that such treachery is impossible; and none, therefore, could be perfectly secure, but that, in his instance, it might be perpetrated. I do not deny that, in some cases, and those, too, cases in which (if ever) to divulge had been justifiable, the oath of secrecy has been faithfully kept, and the seal of the confessional has been unbroken.

["'Garnet, the Jesuits' Provincial, when it was proved that he was acquainted with the damnable powder-plot, justified his concealing it because it was told him in confession. But more pleasant was that plea of Father Aubigny, French Jesuit, who when Ravaillac, that stabbed Henry IV., acknowledged that he had in confession acquainted him with that intended murder, and showed him the knife,—being taken into examination, denied that he knew any thing of it, or could, if he had been never so willing, have discovered it, if it were communicated to him in confession; For, said he, God hath given me that peculiar grace, that as soon as any thing is revealed to me in confession, immediately I forget it! '*

["* Protestant, vol. ii., p. 331."

[" Now, not to dwell on the fact which this quotation directly brings before us, that auricular confession is capable of being perverted to purposes inimical to the safety of the State; only notice the kind of disclosures that are made to the Priests,—the very deepest and darkest secrets of the bosom. Think of any set of men having the character, the worldly prospects, the very lives of others in their hands, and absolutely at their mercy. Constituted as human nature is, such power, unlimited and irresponsible as it is, must be abused. It would belie all experience, and all history, if it were not. It is calculated to convert the Priest into a spiritual despot, and the people into slaves. Even though they were satisfied that their confidence might not be betrayed, the very idea that he knew what they had reason either to be ashamed or afraid of would degrade and humble them in their own estimation; it would make them feel that they were completely in his power; it would take from them the sense of independence; and, in a word, it would make them ready to crouch to whatever he might impose. This same rite of auricular confession we believe to be no other than a rod of iron, which every Priest wields despotically over his people, and by which he maintains absolute dominion over their consciences, and guides and commands them as he pleases." †]

CHAPTER XI.

SATISFACTION.

1. THEOLOGICAL meaning of the term "satisfaction:" 2. The doctrine stated. The Council of Trent quoted. The Roman Catechism: 3. Meaning of the word "penance" or "repentance:" 4. The doctrine is without foundation in Scripture: 5. It is contrary to Scripture: 6. Satisfaction for sin by man involves numerous absurdities; (1.) It is impossible. Dr. Clarke quoted; (2.) It is foolish and impious; (3.) Bellarmine's argument considered; (4.) Faith only is required to justification; (5.) Christ is the propitiation for sin; (6.) In the Scripture examples of pardon, human satisfaction is omitted: 7. The distinction between mortal and venial sin tends to immorality. Bishop Hay cited; (1.) Sins differ in magnitude; (2.) Yet all sin deserves condemnation; (3.) No good man can indulge in sin: 8. The distinction between mortal and venial sin leads to an unholy heart, and a wicked life: 9. It is absurd: 10. It leads to endless uncertainties in determining cases of conscience: 11. It is worse when applied to practice: 12. It removes the great evil of sin: 13. It makes repentance and amendment of life imperfect and false: 14. It fosters a disposition to commit one peculiar kind of sin: 15. Popery teaches that "one man may satisfy for another." Roman Catechism on this point. According to Scripture, no man can satisfy for himself. The mischievous results of a contrary doctrine exhibited by Bishop Taylor: 16. The notion that the opinion of one Doctor can make an opinion probable. The doctrine of probability. Bishop Taylor quoted. Pascal cited, who asserts the doctrines of the Jesuits on this topic: 17. Penances form no adequate restraints or checks on sin. The kinds of penance used prove this. The absurdity of making prayer a penance. Uselessness of most penances. Dens cited: 18. Testimony of the Fathers on this subject. The sense of Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, and Augustine, on satisfaction. The apostolic Fathers to be preferred to them. Clement, Jerome, Isidore, Augustine, quoted. Second Council of Chalons in 813. Some Roman Catholics acknowledge that penances in their Church are different from those mentioned in primitive times. Du Pin and Dens cited.

1. THE next corruption with which we have to charge the Church of Rome, in connexion with the sacrament of penance, is her doctrine of satisfaction. Both Protestants and Papists agree in believing that God, in his infinite wisdom, did not think fit to pardon the sins of mankind without a vicarious sacrifice; that our Lord Jesus Christ became that sacrifice, through the merits of which God is willing to pardon sin; and that to all true penitents the efficacy of that sacrifice is available for everlasting salvation. So far we are agreed; but here we differ: We declare that, according to the doctrines of Scripture, whenever the guilt of sin is remitted, the punishment is remitted also. Papists assert that, when the eternal punishment of sin is remitted, the penitent must satisfy the justice of God, as far as the temporal punishment is concerned, either by doing voluntary or compulsory acts of penance, by obtaining indulgences, or undergoing the penalty in purgatory. But to state their doctrines fully, we shall, as usual, refer to their own authorities.

2. The Council of Trent, on the necessity and fruit of satisfaction, declares, that "the notion that offence is never forgiven by the Lord, without a remission of the whole punishment, is altogether false, and contrary to the word of God." "It is agreeable to the divine goodness that our sins should not be forgiven without satisfaction." "These satisfactory penances tend powerfully to preserve and restrain penitents from sin." "When, in making satisfaction, we suffer for our sins, we are conformed to Christ Jesus, who has atoned for our offences, and from whom is all our sufficiency." "Our satisfaction which we make for our offences is not otherwise to be regarded than as being through Christ Jesus; so that man has nothing to glory in, but all our glorying is in Christ, in whom we live, in whom we merit, in whom we make satisfaction, bringing forth fruits worthy of penance, which from him derive their value, by him are offered to the Father, and through him are accepted by the Father." And finally, at the conclusion of the chapter, the Council says: "Nor has any Catholic ever supposed that the efficacy of the merit and satisfaction of our Lord Jesus Christ is obscured, or in the least degree diminished, by these our works of satisfaction." In the ninth chapter the Council declares: "We are able to make satisfaction to God the Father through Christ Jesus, not only by punishments voluntarily endured by us as chastisements for sin, or imposed at the pleasure of the Priest according to the degree of the offence, but also by temporal pains inflicted by God himself, and by us patiently borne."* But to present

["* History of Popery, vol. i., p. 478."

[† Young's Lectures on the chief Points of Controversy, &c., p. 57, et seq.]

[* "De satisfactionis necessitate, et fructu.—Demum quoad satisfactionem quæ ex omnibus pœnitentiæ partibus quemadmodum a patribus nostris Christiano populo fuit perpetuo tempore commendata, ita una maxime nostra ætate, summo pietatis prætextu, impugnatur ab iis qui speciem pietatis habent, virtutem autem ejus abnegarunt: sancta Synodus declarat, falsum omnino esse, et a verbo Dei alienum, culpam a Domino nunquam remitti, quin universa etiam pœna condonetur. Perspicua enim et illustria in sacris litteris exempla reperiuntur, quibus, præter divinam traditionem, hic error quam manifestissime revincitur. Sane et divinæ justitiæ ratio exigere videtur ut aliter ab eo in gratiam recipiantur, qui ante baptismum per ignorantiam deliquerint, aliter vero qui semel a peccati et dæmonis servitute liberati, et accepto Spiritus Sancti dono, scientes templum Dei violare, et Spiritum Sanctum contristare non formidaverint. Et divinam clementiam decet, ne ita nobis absque ulla satisfactione dimittantur, ut, occasione accepta peccata leviora putantes, velut injurii, et contumeliosi Spiritui Sancto, in graviora labamur, thesaurizantes nobis iram in die iræ. Proculdubio enim mag nopere a peccato revocant, et quasi fræno quodam coercent hæ satisfactioriæ pœnæ, cautioresque et vigilantiores in futurum pœnitentes efficiunt; medentur quoque peccatorum reliquiis; et vitiosos habitus, male vivendo comparatos, contrariis virtutum actionibus tollunt. Neque vero securior ulla via in Ecclesia Dei unquam existimata fuit ad amovendam imminentem a Domino pœnam, quam ut hæc pœnitentiæ opera homines cum vero animi dolore frequentent this point in a still clearer view, we give the canons ordained by the Council on this topic.

"Canon (12.) Whoever shall affirm that the entire punishment is always remitted by God, together with the fault, and therefore that penitents need no other satisfaction than faith, whereby they apprehend Christ, who has made satisfaction for them; let him be accursed.

"(13.) Whoever shall affirm that we can by no means make satisfaction to God for our sins, through the merits of Christ, as far as the temporal penalty is concerned, either by punishments inflicted on us by him, and patiently borne, or enjoined by the Priest, though not undertaken of our own accord, such as fastings, prayers, alms, or other works of piety, and therefore that the best penance is nothing more than a new life; let him be accursed.

"(14.) Whoever shall affirm that the satisfactions by which penitents redeem themselves from sins through Jesus Christ are no part of the service of God; but, on the contrary, human traditions which obscure the doctrine of grace and the true worship of God, and the benefits of the death of Christ; let him be accursed.

"(15.) Whoever shall affirm that the keys are given to the Church to loose only, and not also to bind; and that therefore, when Priests impose punishments on those who confess, they act in opposition to the design of the keys, and against the institution of Christ; and that to maintain, that, if the power of the keys be denied, both temporal and eternal punishment remain to be endured, is to advance a mere fiction; let him be accursed." *

Accedit ad hæc, quod, dum satisfaciendo patimur pro peccatis, Christo Jesu, qui pro peccatis nostris satisfecit, ex quo omnis nostra sufficientia est, conformes efficimur, certissimam quoque inde arrham habentes quod si cum eo patimur et conglorificabimur. Neque vero ita nostra est satisfactio hæc, quam pro peccatis nostris exsolvimus, ut non sit per Christum Jesum. Nam qui ex nobis, tamquam ex nobis nihil possumus, eo co-operante qui nos confortat, omnia possumus, ita non habet homo unde glorietur: sed omnis gloriatio nostra in Christo est: in quo vivimus, in quo meremur, in quo satisfacimus, facientes fructus dignos pœnitentiæ; qui ex illo vim habent; ab illo offeruntur Patri; et per illum acceptantur a Patre. Debent ergo Sacerdotes Domini, quantum Spiritus et prudentia suggesserit, pro qualitate criminum, et pœnitentium facultate, salutares et convenientes satisfactiones injungere: ne, si forte peccatis conniveant et indulgentius cum pœnitentibus agant levissima quædam opera pro gravissimis delictis injungendo, alienorum peccatorum participes efficiantur. Habeant autem præ oculis, ut satisfactio, quam imponunt, non sit tantum ad novæ vitæ custodiam, et infirmitatis medicamentum, sed etiam ad præteritorum peccatorum vindictam et castigationem: nam claves Sacerdotum non ad solvendum dumtaxat sed et ad ligandum concessas, etiam antiqui patres et credunt et docent. Nec propterea existimarunt, sacramentum pœnitentiæ esse forum iræ, vel pœnarum; sicut nemo unquam Catholicus sensit, ex hujusmodi nostris satisfactionibus vim meriti et satisfactionis Domini nostri Jesu Christi vel obscurari vel aliqua ex parte imminui; quod dum novatores intelligere volunt, ita optimam pœnitentiam novam vitam esse docent, ut omnem satisfactionis vim et usum tollant."—Conc. Trid. Can. et Decret., sess. xiv., cap. 8.]

* "Canon (12.) Si quis dixerit, totam pœnam simul cum culpa remitti semper a Deo, satisfactionemque pœnitentium non esse aliam quam fidem, qua apprehendunt Christum pro eis satisfecisse; anathema sit.

"(13.) Si quis dixerit, pro peccatis, quoad pœnam temporalem, minime Deo per Christi merita satisfieri pœnis ab eo inflictis, et patienter toleratis, vel a Sacerdote injunctis, sed neque sponte susceptis, ut jejuniis, orationibus, eleemosynis, vel aliis etiam pietatis operibus, atque ideo optimam pœnitentiam esse tantum novam vitam; anathema sit.

"(14.) Si quis dixerit, satisfactiones, quibus pœnitentes per Christum Jesum peccata redimunt, non esse cultus Dei, sed traditiones hominum doctrinam de gratia, et verum Dei cultum, atque ipsum beneficium mortis Christi obscurantes; anathema sit.

"(15.) Si quis dixerit, claves Ecclesiæ esse datas tantum ad solvendum, non etiam ad ligandum; et propterea Sacerdotes, dum imponunt pœnas confitentibus, agere contra finem clavium, et contra institutionem Christi; et fictionem esse, quod virtute clavium, sublata pœna æterna, pœna temporalis plerumque exsolvenda remaneat; anathema sit."—Idem.

The following views of satisfaction are given in the Roman Catechism:—"Satisfaction is the full payment of a debt." Papists call it "the compensation made by man to God, by doing something in atonement for the sins which he has committed." Speaking of the satisfaction of Christ, the authors of the Catechism say: "The first degree of satisfaction, and that which stands pre-eminently above all the rest, is that by which whatever is due by us to God, on account of our sins, is paid abundantly. It gives to man's actions merit before God; without it they could avail him nothing to eternal life." Treating on the grace of Christ, the Catechism says: "This grace always precedes, accompanies, and follows our good works; without it we can have no merit, nor can we at all satisfy God." Of penance performed by an offender, the Catechism says, that "it makes satisfaction to God for the sins which he has committed, and this is an act of justice toward God." They call penance "a compensation for offences;" they call contrition "a desire of atoning for past transgressions;" they declare contrition must be accompanied with "a desire of confessing and satisfying for our sins." Of afflictions they say: "Afflictions coming from the hand of God, if borne with patience, are an abundant source of satisfaction and of merit." The Catechism also says: "His (Christ's) passion imparts to our good actions the twofold quality of meriting the rewards of eternal life, so that a cup of cold water given in his name shall not be without its reward, and also of satisfying for our sins."*

Thus, by voluntary suffering, or by the temporal punishments which God in his providence may send, satisfaction is said to be made by us for the temporal punishment which is due to our sins. They seem, however, to have found out a much easier way than this; for, according to the Papists, there is left to the Church a treasury of merit, composed not only of such of the actions of Jesus Christ as were more than sufficient to satisfy for the eternal punishment of the sins of men, but of those merits of the saints which were more than sufficient to satisfy for themselves individually. This stock of merit, we are told, may be dispensed to particular persons, as the Governor of the Church, the Vicar of Christ, with the assistance of the inferior Clergy, shall think best. There are two ways by which the benefits of these merits may be conferred; namely, by indulgences, and procuring masses after the individuals are dead; and in proportion to the number of masses and indulgences purchased, the punishment is either taken away or mitigated.† As the doctrines of purgatory and indulgences will require distinct consideration, for the present, that part of penance called "satisfaction" shall occupy our attention.

3, The first topic to which the attention of the reader is directed, is on the use of the word "penance," or "do penance," as being translations of the Greek word μετανοια, "repentance," and μετανοιετε, "repent." Romanists consider the Latin word pœnitentia, coming from pœna, "punishment," as under all circumstances conveying the idea of "penal" or "satisfactory" punishments. This term, however, is not an exact rendering of the Greek word, which is derived from μετα, implying "change," and νους, "the mind;" and therefore it must signify a mental or a spiritual change. Consequently this can have little to do with bodily austerities. There were, however, two Greek words employed to designate repentance; the one, μεταμελεια, signifying grief, sorrow, repentance; and the other, the word mentioned above. These terms are frequently used promiscuously; but when a difference was made, μετανοια was more appropriate to express true repentance. The Latins had also two words, pœnitentia and resipiscentia; the latter being derived from re, "again," and sapere, "to be wise." It is indifferent which is employed, provided they are taken in a sober sense. Pœnitentia is used in the old Latin translation, and is tenaciously retained by those who make the life of repentance to consist in corporeal austerities, which, by way of eminence, they call "penances." *

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 285, 286, 291, 255, 263, 268, 292, 290.

† See Sincere Christian, vol. ii., pp. 104—106.

Again, the Latin, Agite pœnitentiam, is not so correctly translated, "Do penance," as it would be by simply reading it, "Repent." To render the Greek word μετανοια by "penance" is a perversion of the true meaning. John the Baptist preached, "Repent," &c.; not, as the Rhemists have it, "Do penance;" because the people practised according to what he preached; as in the following exhortation, "Bring forth fruit worthy," or "meet, for repentance." Outward penal acts are but the fruits of repentance, not repentance itself. Again: "Repent, and be baptized," (Acts ii. 38,) not, "Do penance, and be baptized:" for, (1.) They were baptized the same day, and what time was there for doing penance? (2.) Romanists make penance a sacrament, to be received after baptism: how, therefore, could they do penance before they had received that ordinance, which is with the Romanists the first sacrament? In short, no translation can be more absurd and unhappy than that which has been adopted by the Roman Catholics; nothing but a false doctrine, and a total disregard for Scripture, could ever induce them to have recourse to such an unphilological reading. We have more serious objections to their doctrine of satisfaction than mere mistranslation, though this is one of the grossest departures from sober criticism which the errors of men have ever produced.

4. This doctrine of satisfaction is, according to the reason of things, absurd and without foundation in Scripture. Forgiveness of the guilt of sin implies, in the very nature of it, exemption from the punishment: otherwise it cannot be forgiveness. We allow that even good men, after they have truly repented of their sins, and God has graciously forgiven them, may, notwithstanding, be severely visited by afflictive dispensations of divine Providence. They may fall into many afflictions and calamities; but these must not be considered punishments for sins already pardoned, but as sent for other purposes. They are the result of the constitution of things here below, and God often makes use of them as chastisements or as tests applied to our professions and principles. They are inflicted, not as punishments, but as mercies and gracious correctives; not the effects of divine justice, but rather of kindness. By them it is intended that something amiss may be reformed, and that faith, patience, and other virtues, should be exercised, to their own benefit and comfort, and to the welfare of those who are around them. These are the disciplinary visitations with which God corrects his children, and not punishments, properly so called. This distinction will not fail to solve many of those texts of Scripture which are adduced by the Romanists in favour of the doctrine of satisfaction or meritorious suffering.

5. The doctrine of human satisfaction is destitute of foundation in Scripture, and is expressly against it.

Our Saviour taught us to pray, "Forgive us our debts," (that is, sins,) "as we forgive our debtors." But can any man be said to forgive a debt to another, and at the same time require the payment of it, either in whole or in part? There is, therefore, no punishment inflicted after forgiveness, or our Saviour commands us to pray for that which God will never grant.

Forgiveness is represented in Scripture as of grace, free and gratuitous, and as a pure effect of God's undeserved favour and goodness. "Being freely justified by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." (Rom. iii. 24.) This justification by grace is incompatible with pardon by works; for "if it be of works, it is no more grace." (Rom. xi. 6.) But how can this accord with the Popish doctrine of forgiveness, which supposes that we cannot be absolved from the punishment of our sins, till we shall have paid, hereafter, the uttermost farthing for which we are accountable?

So far is God from exacting punishment after forgiveness, that he expressly declares the contrary. "I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more." (Jer. xxxi. 34.) "If the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, and keep all my statutes, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live, he shall not die. All his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him." (Ezek. xviii. 21, 22.) Now if God do not mention or remember sins after they have been forgiven, there is no fear that he will still punish them: that the sinner, therefore, in order to prevent punishment, must make a complete satisfaction to the divine justice, either by himself or others, is a doctrine directly opposed to the letter and spirit of divine truth.

The Prophet Isaiah declares: "The chastisement of our peace was upon him." (Isai. liii. 5.) "He hath reconciled us in the body of his flesh through death, to present us holy and unblamable and unreprovable in his sight." (Col. i. 21, 22.) Again: "He hath borne our griefs." (Isai. liii. 4.) "He hath delivered us from the curse of the law." (Gal. iii. 13.) Here Christ is represented as taking our "infirmities," (Matt. viii. 17,) which certainly refers to temporal sufferings.

The Popish distinction between temporal and eternal punishments is unscriptural: we can therefore have no

[* "Matt. iii. 2, 'Repent.' Μετανοειτε. This was the matter of John's preaching. The verb, μετανοεω, is either compounded of μετα, 'after,' and νοειν, 'to understand,' which signifies, that, after hearing such preaching, the sinner is led to understand that the way in which he has been walking, was the way of misery, death, and hell. Or, the word may be derived from μετα, 'after,' and ανοια, 'madness,' which intimates that the whole life of a sinner is no other than a continued course of madness and folly: and if to live in a constant opposition to all the dictates of true wisdom; to wage war with his own best interests in time and eternity; to provoke and insult the living God; and, by habitual sin, to prepare himself only for a state of misery, be evidences of insanity, every sinner exhibits them plentifully. It was from this notion of the word, that the Latins termed repentance, resipiscentia, 'a growing wise again,' from re and sapere; or, according to Tertullian, resipiscentia, quasi receptio mentis ad se, 'restoring the mind to itself.'—Contra Marcion, lib. ii. Repentance, then, implies, that a measure of divine wisdom is communicated to the sinner, and that he thereby becomes wise unto salvation: that his mind, purposes, opinions, and inclinations are changed; and that, in consequence, there is a total change in his conduct. It needs scarcely be remarked that, in this state, a man feels deep anguish of soul, because he has sinned against God, unfitted himself for heaven, and exposed his soul to hell. Hence a true penitent has that sorrow whereby he forsakes sin, not only because it has been ruinous to his own soul, but because it has been offensive to God."—Adam Clarke's Commentary in loc.] authority to make such difference; for, on this unwarranted division, a variety of doctrines, duties, and ceremonies have been introduced into the Church by the Romanists, which tend to subvert the Gospel of Christ.

To prove, however, the utter fallacy of the idea that human merit and satisfaction can appease divine justice, the satisfaction made by Jesus Christ, through his sufferings and death, has been declared by the Holy Spirit to be absolutely so perfect and complete, that it is able to effect the full salvation of all who believe and obey the Gospel. "By him all that believe are justified from all things, from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses." (Acts xiii. 39.) "And you, that were sometime alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled." (Col. i. 21.) Such is the high privilege of those who are reconciled to God through Christ, that nothing stands against them. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus." (Rom. viii. 1.)

No individual who understands the nature and design of Christ's sufferings can believe that God still requires something in the way of penal endurance from sinners themselves, to satisfy the divine claims of his justice. Such a doctrine belongs to Heathenism, and not to the Christian system. It originated in false notions of the character of the Most High, which prevail among all the Heathen, and that have corrupted true religion itself. This notion, heathenish as it undoubtedly is, is interwoven with the very essence of Popery. Without her sacrament of confession, and the doctrine of making satisfaction to divine justice, by stripes or by money, the Church of Rome would be in as deplorable a plight as the poor idolater Micah, who exclaimed, "You have taken away my gods, and what have I more?"

6. Satisfaction for sin being made by mankind, presents various inconsistencies and absurdities, some of which we must lay before our readers.

(1.) Satisfaction to the justice of God by the merit of good works, or penal sufferings, is absurd in the highest degree. On this subject we quote what Dr. Adam Clarke says on human merit and pain in his sermon on "salvation by faith." After stating that the law of man, under which he was created, was the law of love, and which he was to observe as the rule of life; that it admitted of no deviation, but required a full, perfect, and universal obedience, performed with all the powers of soul and body; our author proceeds as follows:—

"Let it be observed, that no being is capable of fulfilling such a law, unless its nature be entirely pure and holy: the slightest degree of moral imperfection, the smallest irregularity of passions or appetites, would taint the required sacrifice, and mar and ruin the service. As man came pure and perfect out of the hands of his Creator, he was capable of observing this law; to him, in this state, there was nothing difficult, nothing grievous. He was made under this law; and he was made equal to it in all its requisitions and demands. Obedience to this was his duty; and we may add, it must have been his delight, and that in which his happiness consisted; for no superior state of blessedness can be conceived; for he who loves God with all his powers, and serves him with all his energies, must be unutterably happy.

"But does it follow that man, in this pure and perfect state, fulfilling at all times the sublime duty required by this law, could merit an eternal glory by his obedience? No. For he is the creature of God, his powers belong to his Maker: he owes him all the services he can perform; and, when he has acted up to the utmost limits of his exalted nature, in obedience to this most pure and holy law, it will appear that he can make no demand on divine justice for remuneration; he is, as it respects God, an unprofitable servant; he has only done his duty, and he has nothing to claim. In these circumstances was not only man in paradise, but also every angel and archangel of God. Throughout eternity, no created being, however pure, holy, submissive, and obedient, can have any demands on its Creator. From him its being was originally derived, and by him that being is sustained; to him, therefore, by right it belongs; and whatever he has made it capable of, he has a right to demand. As well might the cause be supposed to be a debtor to the effect produced by it, as the Creator, in any circumstances, be a debtor to the creature.

"To merit salvation, is to give an equivalent for eternal glory; for if a man can be saved by his works, his claim is on divine justice; and if justice make a commutation of eternal glory for obedience, then this obedience must be in merit equal to that glory. Justice demands what is due; it can require no more; it will take no less. Man's obedience, therefore, performed in time, which, however long, is only a moment when compared to eternity, must be considered, on this doctrine, equal in worth to the endless and utmost beatification which God can confer on an intelligent being: which is absurd. Therefore, no being by obedience in time can merit an eternal glory.

"Again: to merit any thing from God, we must act as beings independent of him, and give him that on which he has no legal claim; for as we cannot purchase one part of a man's property by giving him another part of his own property, so we cannot purchase from God any thing that is his own, by that to which he has an equal claim. To merit glory, therefore, a man must not only act independently of God, but also with powers and energies of which God is neither author nor supporter; for the powers which he has created, and which he upholds, are already his own; and to their utmost use and service he has an indefeasible right. Now man is a derived and dependent creature; has nothing but what he has received; cannot even live without the supporting energy of God; and can return him nothing that is not his own; and therefore can merit nothing. On this ground, also, the doctrine of salvation by the merit of works is demonstrably both impossible and absurd.

"Once more: to perform acts infinitely meritorious, man must have powers commensurate to such acts: to merit infinitely, requires infinite merit in the acts; and infinite merit in the acts requires unlimited powers in the agent; for no being of limited and finite powers can perform acts of infinite worth: but man, in his best estate, is a being of limited powers, wholly dependent, even for these, on the energy of another; consequently, cannot perform acts of infinite worth; and, therefore, can in no way whatever merit, by his obedience or his works, that infinite and eternal weight of glory of which the Scriptures speak. On the ground, therefore, of the dependent and limited powers of man, the doctrine of final glorification by the merit of works is self-contradictory, impossible, and absurd.

"All the preceding reasoning is founded on the supposition that man is in a state of purity; having never fallen from original righteousness, and never sinned against his Creator: and even in those circumstances we find that his pure and spotless obedience cannot purchase an endless glory.

"But we must now consider him in his present circumstances; fallen from God; destitute of that image of God, righteousness and true holiness, in which he was created; and deeply guilty through innumerable transgressions. To him, in this state, the question, 'What must I do to be saved?' is of infinite importance: as through his sinfulness he is unfit for heaven; and, through his guilt, he is exposed to the bitter pains of an eternal death.

"In his mouth the question resolves itself into several: (1.) How shall I be delivered from the power of sin, that it may no longer have dominion over me? (2.) How shall I be delivered from the guilt of sin, that it may no longer oppress my tortured conscience? (3.) How shall I be delivered from the pollution of sin, and be prepared for, and entitled to, everlasting glory?

"Will any man say to this alarmed and despairing sinner?—'Thou must purchase thy pardon, and the kingdom of heaven, by a life of righteousness: God requires obedience to his law; and that, joined to sincere repentance, will induce him to forgive thy iniquities, and admit thee at last to his eternal glory.' Of what avail are such sayings? Can this satisfy his soul, or quiet the clamours of his tormenting conscience? He feels himself incapable of any good: his inward parts are very wickedness; and though he can will that which is right, yet how to perform it he finds not. Can even fond hope lay comfortable hold on such directions as these? But, as this question is too important to admit of hasty and unauthorized conclusions, we must examine the ground of the hope which is held out on these terms.

"Though man's state has changed, his duty is not changed; he is still under the same law; it is as much his duty now to 'love God with all his heart, soul, mind, and strength,' as it was the first moment he came out of the hands of his Creator. What was his duty then must be his duty through the whole course of his being. To fulfil this original law required a pure and holy soul, untainted by sin, and unbiassed by iniquity. But, instead of a heart filled with holiness and love, he has now that carnal mind which is enmity to God; a mind that is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. To him, therefore, this obedience is utterly impossible; he cannot cleanse his own infected nature; and he cannot undo the criminal acts which he has already committed; and having broken the divine law, the wrath of God abideth on him. We have already proved that the most pure and perfect obedience cannot purchase glory; and the same arguments will prove that the most perfect obedience cannot purchase pardon. Man owes every moment of his existence, and the full and constant exercise of all his powers, unto God. Could he even now live as pure and as perfect as an archangel, this would be no more than his duty; and, in point of duty, it would only be available for the time in which it was done; for, as every creature owes to its Creator the utmost service it can possibly perform through every moment of its being, therefore this obedience does not merit any thing in reference to the future; and if it have sinned, cannot atone for the past: the time in which it has sinned must stand as an eternal blank, in which all its obedience was due, and in which none was performed. The non-performance of its duty is such a high degree of criminality as to obliterate its title to the divine protection, support, and happiness; and the sins which it has committed, instead of obedience, have exposed it to all the penalties of the laws which it has broken.

"It appears, therefore, that even granting this fallen creature could live, from the present, a life of unspotted holiness; yet this could be considered in no other light than merely the obedience due to the Creator, and could have no tendency to blot out past transgressions. There is, therefore, no hope to any sinner from the doctrine of justification or salvation by works. And, taken in any point of view, it is demonstrable that no obedience to God, even from the most perfect creature, can merit any thing; and that works of merit, and works of supererogation, are equally impossible and absurd: none can do more than he ought; and none, by doing his duty, can have claims upon his Maker."*

On the merit of sufferings, and their assumed capability to atone for sin, and to purify the soul, the same author observes as follows:—

"I presume it will be taken for granted that there was no suffering in the world previously to the introduction of sin: suffering is an imperfection in nature; and a creature in a state of suffering is imperfect, because a miserable creature. If an intelligent creature be found in a state of suffering, and of suffering evidently proceeding from the abuse of its powers, it necessarily supposes that such creature has offended God, and that its sufferings are the consequence of its offence, whether springing immediately from the crime itself, or whether inflicted by divine justice, as a punishment for that crime. As sufferings in the animal being are the consequence of derangement or disease in the bodily organs, they argue a state of mortality; and experience shows that they are the predisposing causes of death and dissolution. Derangement and disease, by which the regular performance of natural functions is prevented, and the destruction of those functions ultimately effected, never could have existed in animal beings, as they proceeded from the hand of an all-perfect and intelligent Creator. They are, therefore, something that has taken place since creation; and are demonstrably contrary to the order, perfection, and harmony of that creation; and consequently did not spring from God. As it would be unkind, if not unjust, to bring innumerable multitudes of innocent beings into a state of suffering or wretchedness; hence the sufferings that are in the world must have arisen from the offences of the sufferers. Now, if sin have produced suffering, is it possible that suffering can destroy sin? We may answer this question by asking another: Is it possible that the stream produced from a fountain can destroy the fountain from which it springs? Or is it possible that any effect can destroy the cause of which it is an effect? Reason has already decided these questions in the negative. Ergo, suffering, which is the effect of sin, cannot possibly destroy that sin of which it is the effect. To suppose the contrary, is to suppose the grossest absurdity that can possibly disgrace the understanding of man.

"Whether these sufferings be such as spring necessarily out of the present constitution of nature, and the morbid alterations to which the constitution of the human body is liable from morbidly increased or decreased action; or whether they spring, in part, from a voluntary assumption of a greater share of natural evil than ordinarily falls to the lot of the individual, the case is not altered: still they are the offspring and fruit of sin; and, as its effects, they cannot destroy the cause that gave them birth.

* Discourses on various Subjects, by A. Clarke, LL.D., vol. iii., pp. 248—253. 8vo. edit.

"It is essential, in the nature of all effects, to depend on their causes; they have neither being nor operation but what they derive from those causes; and, in respect to their causes, they are absolutely passive. The cause may exist without the effect; but the effect cannot subsist without the cause: to act against its cause is impossible, because it has no independent being nor operation; by it, therefore, the being or state of the cause can never be affected. Just so sufferings, whether voluntary or involuntary, cannot affect the being or nature of sin, from which they proceed. And could we for a moment entertain the absurdity, that they could atone for, correct, or destroy the cause that gave them being, then we must conceive an effect, wholly dependent on its cause for its being, rise up against that cause, destroy it, and yet still continue to be an effect, when its cause is no more! The sun, at a particular angle, by shining against a pyramid, projects a shadow according to that angle and the height of the pyramid. The shadow, therefore, is the effect of the interception of the sun's rays, by the mass of the pyramid. Can any man suppose that this shadow would continue well defined and discernible, though the pyramid were annihilated and the sun extinct? No. For the effect would necessarily perish with its cause. So sin and suffering: the latter springs from the former; sin cannot destroy suffering, which is its necessary effect; and suffering cannot destroy sin, which is its producing cause: ergo, salvation by suffering is absurd, contradictory, and impossible."*

From the preceding remarks it will appear that works of supererogation, or works done beyond what God requires, are impossible. Nevertheless Romanists strongly maintain the existence of such; and assert, that a person may not only have in reserve a store of merit, so as to have enough for himself, but also to spare for others; and this superabundant merit, collected from all quarters and in every age, the Church of Rome professes to have laid up as in a treasury, from which to dispense to those who have little or none. The following article, adopted substantially by Protestants universally, presents this in a proper light, and justly pronounces such claims to be arrogant and impious:—

"Voluntary works, besides, over and above, God's commandments, which are called works of supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety. For by them men do declare that they not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for his sake than of bounden duty is required: whereas Christ saith plainly, 'When ye have done all that is commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants.'"†

(2.) There is the utmost folly and impiety in the supposition that a human being who is himself sinful and of limited powers, can satisfy the claims of divine justice for sin. The unsullied perfect holiness of Christ was absolutely necessary to his making satisfaction for the sins of the world. Had he any sin of his own, all that he suffered would have been due to divine justice on his own account. "Such a High-Priest became" (was necessary for) "us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens; who needeth not daily, as those High-Priests," (under the law,) "to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's." (Heb. vii. 26, 27.) The sacrifice which he offered was in all points satisfactory, because it was without spot. How preposterous is it to claim merit for the doings or sufferings of sinful though regenerated men, who still require the atoning blood of the Redeemer to purge the conscience and to preserve from sin!

They say, that "their merits are derived from those of Christ, and obtain all their efficacy and value from his." They say so; nevertheless, according to the Romish system, something meritorious is done by the sinner. If they believe that the merits of Christ have rescued them from eternal punishment, they receive and hold with equal tenacity the dogma, that by their own merits the guilt of sin is effaced, and satisfaction is made for temporal punishment. To assert that the efficacy of human works is derived from Christ, is nothing at all to the purpose: it is maintained that they are meritorious, and thus, according to their own plan, salvation cannot be wholly of grace, nor by Christ, nor by the sanctification of the Spirit.

Their Divines constantly refer to the chastisements and judgments which befell David and the Israelites, as instances in which temporal punishments were inflicted when those which are eternal were remitted. It is acknowledged that, to a certain extent, forgiveness of sins may be realized, although their effects and consequences are endured, even to the end of life, inasmuch as all suffering is the effect of sin. These afflictions are the chastening of the Lord, and designed for our instruction and purification through the Spirit. But this is very far different from viewing them as a compensation or satisfaction to divine justice in order to atone for our offences.

(3.) Bellarmine argues thus: "If good works may merit eternal life, much more may they avert temporal punishment. But the first is true. The kingdom of God is called 'wages,' 'reward.' (Matt. xx. 8.) So it is a reward justly given to men's deserts. Therefore good works may much more redeem temporal punishments."* We utterly deny that heaven can be merited by good works. St. Paul, having stated that "the wages of sin is death," adds, "But the gift of God is eternal life." (Rom. vi. 23.) He recognises eternal life to be a "gift," not wages.

(4.) Our Lord required nothing from the woman "which was a sinner," and "who stood at his feet behind him weeping," but faith: "Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace." (Luke vii. 50.) Therefore no satisfaction for sin, in the strict sense of that expression, is required by Scripture from the penitent, the only means by which pardon is vouchsafed being faith: "But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the Prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference: for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; to declare, I say, at this time his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." (Rom. iii. 21—26.) "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast." (Eph. ii. 8, 9.)

* Idem, pp. 254—256.

† Articles agreed upon by the Archbishops and Bishops, &c., in the Convocation holden at London, A. D. 1562, art. xiv., Of Works of Supererogation.

* Bellarm. Opera, tom. iii.; De Pœnitent. lib. iv., c. viii. Colon., 1628.

(5.) Christ alone is the propitiation or satisfaction for the sins of the whole world: "And he is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." (1 John ii. 2.) "The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." (John i. 29.) "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness: by whose stripes ye were healed." (1 Peter ii. 24.) Christ, therefore, having by his sacrifice redeemed us from the curse of the law, no other satisfaction is required.

(6.) The examples of pardon recorded in Scripture do not mention satisfaction from man as a condition of pardon. The publican, upon his repentance, was pardoned, and no such satisfaction was required. Peter was forgiven without a consideration of that nature: in like manner the person sick of the palsy. The same uniform course is to be seen in other instances furnished in the sacred writings.

7. The distinction which Roman Catholics make respecting sins, by calling some mortal, and others venial, tends to immorality and laxity of life, when connected with the doctrine of satisfaction.

The following view of mortal and venial sins we select from Bishop Hay:—"What is mortal sin? Ans. Mortal sin is a grievous transgression of the law.—What are the effects of mortal sin? Ans. It banishes the grace of God from our souls, renders us hateful and abominable in the sight of God, and worthy of eternal punishment. For this reason it is called 'mortal,' because it kills the soul in this life, by depriving it of the sanctifying grace of God which is the spiritual life of the soul, and condemns us to eternal death in the life to come."..... "What is venial sin? Ans. It is a smaller transgression of the law, a more pardonable offence, which, though it does not kill the soul, as mortal sin does, nor deserve eternal punishment, yet it obscures the beauty of the soul before God, and displeases him, and deserves a temporal chastisement. The malignity of mortal sin is such, that it banishes the grace of God entirely from the soul, and makes it positively ugly and loathsome in his sight; whereas venial sin does not banish the grace of God away from the soul, but it obscures its lustre, diminishes its splendour, and stains its brightness. It does not make the soul positively hateful to God, but it makes her less pure, less holy, less beautiful, and, consequently, less agreeable in his sight."....."Venial sins in general are divided into two kinds: (1.) Such as arise from human frailty, surprise, or inadvertency, and from objects to which the person has no inordinate attachment. (2.) Such as a person commits willingly or deliberately, or out of an ill custom, which he is at no pains to amend, or with affection to a sinful object."* By this Episcopal authority petty theft is denominated a venial sin.†

(1.) Although no sin can be so venial or trivial, as the Romanists teach, so as neither to offend God nor deserve punishment on its own account, by subjecting the offender to some temporal visitation; nevertheless, Protestants disallow a stoical parity or equality of sins, and hold that some sins are of greater and others of less turpitude, though the least sin is offensive to God and deserves eternal condemnation.

That sins differ in magnitude is clear from Scripture. Our Lord declared that of Judas to be greater than that of Pilate. This appears also in the case of the servant who knew the will of his master and did it not. This difference is conspicuous in the judgment of the degrees and expressions of anger in calling men Raca, "vain," or μωρε, "fool;" and also in our Lord comparing some sins to gnats and others to camels; in his mentioning the "many stripes;" and in the "greater condemnation" spoken of by James. Thus, to rob a church is considered a greater sin than to rob a thief; to strike a father is an act of more flagrant impiety than to resist a tutor. As every lie is a sin against truth, so every sin is a disobedience and departure from the rule; some lies are more against charity, or justice, or religion, than others are, and in this respect are greater; but to truth they are all equally opposed, and so are all lies contrary to the commandment of God.

(2.) In opposition to the Roman Catholic view of venial sins, we maintain that, instead of being trivial, all sins are punishable as God may determine, even with everlasting destruction from the presence of God and the glory of his power, as will appear from the following considerations:—

(i.) Every sin is an offence against God's law, and therefore is deadly and damnable on account of the claims of divine justice. For though sins may be divided into greater and less, yet their proportion to punishment is not varied by their temporal or eternal consequences, but by greater and less punishments.

(ii.) The law of God never threatens nor does the justice of God inflict punishment on any, except the transgressors of his law: but the smallest offences are not only threatened, but may be punished, with death; therefore they are transgressions of the divine law.

(iii.) Every sin, even that apparently insignificant, is against charity, which is the end of the commandment.

(iv.) When God appointed expiatory sacrifices for sin, though there was sufficient to show that there existed a difference in the degree of it, yet because "without shedding of blood is no remission," all manner of sin has rendered the offender guilty and liable to punishment. For "cursed is every one that continueth not in all things written in the book of the law to do them." No sin was recognised as venial in the covenant which God entered into with our first parents; for there was no remission; and without the death of Christ there could be none afterward; therefore, if any sin be venial or pardonable, it is only through the death of Christ and the grace of God; and as God pardons all upon the condition of faith and repentance, and none otherwise, it must follow that, although sins differ in degree, they vary not in their essential character. The man that commits sin at all must die, if he repent not; and he who repents timely and effectually will be saved. "The wages of sin is death;" of sin indefinitely, and consequently of all sin.

(3.) No good man can indulge in transgression, however small. All such acts are estimated according to the affections; and if any love sin, it becomes destructive to the soul. None can love iniquity and God at the same time. If a man about to commit an act inquire whether it be venial or not, then it cannot be trivial; for what is done by choice and affection cannot be of small moment where transgression or obedience is concerned. Besides, such an individual, in this inquiry, virtually asks permission to sin against God, and by this conduct shows that he would sin more and more could he do it with impunity.

* Sincere Christian, vol. i., pp. 258, 272, 275.
† Ibid., p. 261.

8. The distinction between mortal and venial sins, as taught by the Church of Rome, is the cause of much unholiness of heart and wickedness of life.

Although we do, with many ancient Divines, admit of a difference in turpitude in sin, as graviora et leviora, "heavier and lighter;" yet we assert, that in their own nature, and in the rigour of divine justice, every sin is damnable and deserves condemnation, and that in the unregenerate they are so accounted by the divine law; yet, through the mercy of God, smaller sins, which come by surprise, and which are the result of invincible ignorance, inadvertency, or unavoidable infirmity, shall not be imputed to those who love God, who do not delight in sin, and who watch and pray against it.

The Church of Rome teaches that there are many sins which are venial or pardonable in their own nature; so much so, that if all could be put together, they would not equal in criminality one mortal sin, or destroy charity, or deprive man of the favour of God;* for which no man can perish, and for which the atonement of Christ is not needed; and yet, we are told, they may be committed deliberately, with affection for the sin, from an unresisted evil custom, &c., which prepares for and leads to mortal sin. And although Christ declared, "Of every idle word a man shall speak he shall give account at the day of judgment;" and, "By your words ye shall be justified, and by your words ye shall be condemned;" Bellarmine expressly affirms, "It is not intelligible how an idle word should, in its own nature, be worthy of the eternal wrath of God and everlasting flames."† Many similar rash and unscriptural declarations are made by the Popish Divines on this question, which we do not desire to aggravate, the main question being acknowledged by all.

We appeal to the reason and conscience of all men, whether this doctrine, that sins are venial or pardonable in their own nature, be not greatly injurious to a holy life, when it is plain that it administers peace to the soul, when God has not spoken it. These sins are of frequent occurrence, to which men are most prone and liable, for which, too, they are the least excusable, which are left undefined by their best theologians, and are constantly changing from venial to mortal sins. Such distinction must inevitably prevent the Christian from growing in grace, and hinder the destruction of what St. Paul terms "the body of sin." In short, "despising little things, they perish by little."

9. The definition of venial sins is absurd. It represents one class as being committed "willingly and deliberately, out of an ill custom which he is at no pains to amend, or with affection to a sinful object;" that "they are very great and pernicious evils;"‡ and yet such sins do not deprive the offender of the love and grace of God, or render him liable to eternal punishment! There is palpable contradiction in the definition of venial sins. Most of the Popish authorities make sins venial, (1.) On account of the imperfection of the agent; as when a thing is done ignorantly, or by surprise, or inadvertently: (2.) Or by the smallness of the matter; as if a man steal a penny, or eat a little too greedily at his meal, or lie in bed too long in the morning: (3.) Or a sin is venial in its whole kind; such as idle words, or the like: (4.) Or they are venial as mentioned above. The last three kinds of sins will be very difficult to reconcile with veniality.

10. The distinction of sins into mortal and venial leads to perpetual uncertainty in determining cases of conscience. For supposing that this distinction is recognised, it would be impossible to assign proper limits and measures to the several kinds of offences which would come under consideration. Between the least mortal and the greatest venial sins no person would be able to distinguish with certainty, and therefore men call what they please venial. For in innumerable cases of conscience, it is more often inquired whether a thing be venial or mortal, than whether it be lawful or unlawful. There is the utmost uncertainty in what their casuists and learned Divines say respecting mortal and venial sins. The fact is, they have no certain rule or standard by which they are guided in pronouncing what is mortal and what is not. Of this no greater proof is required than to read their little summaries of religion drawn up by their leading guides; where one says such a thing is mortal, and two say it is not. Now, as purgatory is to hell, so venial is to sin. Men fear not hell, because the main thing is secured at last. They prefer purgatory rather than to suffer a small penance, or perform some paltry service which they imagine may save them from it. They choose venial sins, and enjoy the pleasures of trifles; which they love so well, that rather than relinquish them they will suffer the pains of a temporary hell. If men will allow themselves liberty so long as they live to commit one whole class of sins, with the hope of satisfying divine justice by the operation of benevolent legacies which they may bequeath to purposes of charity, &c., they must either pronounce the words of Christ heretical, or find themselves awfully deceived.

11. The evil is still worse when the distinction between mortal and venial sins is reduced to practice. To an inquiry respecting the turpitude of an offence the reply of many would be, "It is a venial sin;" that is, though it be a sin, there is no danger of losing the favour of God by committing it; that it may be repeated a thousand times with impunity; for, according to Bellarmine, "all the venial sins in the world cannot do what one mortal sin can, that is, make God your enemy." As these authorities differ endlessly in their decisions, the laity and the common Clergy, who believe the assertions of Confessors and authors whose advice they profess to follow, must be in infinite danger, because the whole body of practical divinity is perverted by the uncertain and varied distinctions made in the Church of Rome respecting sins as they are divided into mortal and venial.*

12. The distinction which represents some sins as being small, naturally prepares the way for transgression also to be considered of corresponding magnitude. This, however, is one of the most deceitful delusions by which men are led astray. The smaller the sin is, it is the less excusable, especially if it be committed presumptuously;

[* "Alterum est, sententias illas S. Augustini, in quibus docet multa peccata levia simul collecta occidere et damnare hominem, non secus atque unum grande peccatum: non sic esse accipiendas, quasi multitudo peccatorum venialium, dum venialia manent, æquari possit uni mortali. Id enim apertissimis rationibus convincitur esse falsum. Nam venialia peccata, ex consensu omnium theologorum neque tollunt, neque miniunt habitum caritatis, sed solum actum et fervorem ejus impediunt; quare etiamsi omnia peccata venialia simul colligerentur in unum, numquam efficerent id, quod facit unum lethale peccatum, quod videlicet continuo caritatem excludit."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iv.; De Amissione Gratiæ, lib. i., cap. xiii., p. 115. Fol. Colon., 1619.]

† Taylor's Works, vol. x., Dissuasive from Popery, chap. ii., sect. v., p. 210. 8vo. edit.

‡ Sincere Christian, vol. i., p. 275.

* Taylor's Works, vol. viii. Liberty of Prophesying, chap. iii., sect. i., p. 337. 8vo. edit.

for if the commandment be comparatively small, it is more easily obeyed, and the more reasonable the requirement. He that pursues iniquity in order to obtain a kingdom or an estate, has something, not indeed to warrant or render legitimate his offence, but to extenuate the offence by the greatness of the temptation. But to lose the friendship of God for comparatively small offences or paltry indulgences has no excuse, and loads the sinner with aggravated condemnation. What excuse can be made for him who will not hold his peace to please his God? What less can he do? How can it be expected that such a one should mortify his lusts, deny his ambition, part with his goods, lose an eye, cut off a hand, or lay down his life for God, when he will not relinquish the pleasure of speaking vainly, or indulging appetites or passions which might be easily overcome?

If it be said that the individual may be supposed to love God, because he only commits small sins which he thinks are not against the love of God, and which he would not do if he did not think so; this, however, rather than excusing, only aggravates the sin, for it is turning his grace into wantonness. He who thus abuses divine goodness makes his sin to abound, because grace abounds. Because God is good, he takes leave to do evil. Persons in this state possess all the dispositions of unrenewed sinners: and though their theory may teach them openly to avoid the greater sins, their dispositions will lead them to the commission of all manner of iniquity. Such is the general practice among the members of the Church of Rome, as will appear from the following observations.

13. To distinguish a whole class of sins as venial is certain to make repentance and amendment of life imperfect and false. For when men, under the terrors of God's law, are deterred from sin, they may still retain strong attachment to it, as they do not yet possess love to God. Yet by this doctrine of distinguishing sins into mortal and venial in their nature, they are led to rest in the possession of an imperfect repentance. For those who believe sins to be venial or pardonable in their own nature, if they understand a consequence, do not require repentance to make sins pardonable, nor will they seek a pardon which they are taught to believe they do not need.

As by this means repentance is rendered imperfect, so relapses are extremely easy and frequent. Where such a leaven is left in the heart, it will affect the whole man. St. Gregory said well, "If we neglect to attend to small sins, being insensibly seduced, we shall boldly perpetrate greater." *

14. The distinction of sins into mortal and venial fosters a disposition in the mind to commit one kind of sin, the pardon of which is certain, and easily obtained; there being many ways of making great sins small ones, and little sins innocuous, so that by the folly and craftiness of men, God's right and man's duty to him are, by way of compromise, left to carelessness and folly; consequently many indulge freely in the committal of sins for which they have a security that they shall never be punished. As to purgatory, it is a mere antidote or security against hell: having nothing formidable in it to deter men from sin, it rather appears to warrant their venial sins, and an imperfect repentance for sins which are mortal. And if venial sins be as the Roman Divines describe them,—namely, that they neither destroy nor diminish charity or the grace of God; that they only hinder the fervency of devotion, in the same manner as sleep, business, or any other equally innocent action may do; that they are not against the law; that they are not properly sins; that all the venial sins in the world would not amount to one mortal sin, for as time differs from eternity, and finite from infinite, so do all venial sins ever committed differ from one mortal act; that for all of them a man is nevertheless beloved, and loves God nothing the less:—if venial sins be such as Roman writers affirm they are, purgatory itself, though represented by many as being very dreadful, must possess little terror to those who are instructed according to the doctrine which the theory of venial sins inculcates; and although they terrify men with purgatory in the end, they divest it of its terrors by the easy remedies and preventives which have been discovered. Venial sins, according to their doctrine, may be pardoned at as cheap a rate as they are committed. In the mean time, to believe in purgatory answers the purposes of the Roman Clergy; and to have so much indulgence vouchsafed in committing venial sins satisfies the carnal propensities of the laity.

15. Popery teaches that one man may satisfy for another. The authors of the Roman Catechism say, "God has granted to our frailty the privilege that one may satisfy for another." * They confine it, however, to the satisfactory part of penance, as they say it does not extend to contrition or confession; since no man can be contrite or confess for another. This is the general doctrine of that Church, taught by her Divines, and practised in the exercise of her discipline. The effect of it is, that some are enriched abundantly through its provisions; and others are totally careless. It is a canonical rule, Qui non solvit in ære, luat in corpore: "He that does not pay in money must suffer in his body." Though it was spoken respecting public penance, it is nevertheless practised in satisfactions relating to the conscience. Hence the rich man becomes negligent in duty, and his purse only is the sufferer. It involves a blasphemy; for by this doctrine it cannot be said of Christ alone, that "he was wounded for our transgressions:" in the Church of Rome it often occurs that "by another man's stripes we are healed."

According to Scripture, no man can satisfy divine justice for himself, much less can he do this for others. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son." (Ezek. xviii. 20.) "Every man shall bear his own burden." (Gal. vi. 5.) "None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him." (Psalm xlix. 7.) "Therefore, thou son of man, say unto the children of thy people, The righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him in the day of his transgression: as for the wickedness of the wicked, he shall not fall thereby in the day that he turneth from his wickedness; neither shall the righteous be able to live for his righteousness in the day that he sinneth." (Ezek. xxxiii. 12.)

Papists further teach that a habit of sin is not sin, distinct from those former actions by which that habit was contracted. On this point we quote the words of Bishop Taylor, in his Dissuasive from Popery, who places the subject in a clear and interesting light, although his style is somewhat antiquated and occasionally obscure. "The secret intention," says he, "of which proposition, and the malignity of it, consist in this, that it is not necessary for a man to repent speedily; and a man is not bound by

* "Si curare parva negligimus; insensibiliter seducti, audenter etiam majora perpetramus."—Lib x., Moral., cap. 14; as quoted by Bishop Taylor, Works, vol. viii., Doctrine and Practice of Repentance, chap. iii., sect. iv., p. 364. 8vo edit.

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 229.

repentance to interrupt the procedure of his impiety, or to repent of his habit, but of the single acts that went before it. For as for those who came after, they are excused, if they be produced by a strong habit; and the greater the habit, the less is the sin: but, then, as the repentance need not, for that reason, be hasty and presently, so, because it is only to be of single acts, the repentance itself need not be habitual, but it may be done in an instant. By this and such like propositions and careless sentences, they have brought it to that pass that they reckon a single act of contrition at any time to be sufficient to take away the wickedness of a long life. Now that this is the avowed doctrine of the Roman guides of souls will sufficiently appear in the writings of their chiefest, of which no learned man can be ignorant.* The thing was of late openly and professedly disputed against us, and will not be denied. And that this doctrine is infinitely destructive of the necessity of a good life, cannot be doubted, when themselves do own the proper consequence of it, even the unnecessariness of present repentance, or before the danger of death; of which we have already given accounts. But the reason why we remark it here is that which we now mentioned, because that by the doctrine of vicious habits, having in them no malignity or sin but what is with the single preceding acts, there is an excuse made for millions of sins; for if by an evil habit the sinner is not made worse, and more hated by God, and his sinful acts made not only more, but more criminal, it will follow that the sins are very much lessened; for they being not so voluntary in their exercise and distinct emanation, are not in present so malicious; and therefore he that hath gotten a habit of drunkenness or swearing, sins less in every act of drunkenness or profane oath than he that acts them seldom, because by his habit he is more inclined, and his sins are almost natural, and less considered, less chosen, and not disputed against, but pass, by inadvertency and an untroubled consent, easily and promptly, and almost naturally, from that principle; so that by this means, and in such cases when things are come to this pass, they have gotten an imperfect warrant to sin a great deal and a great while, without any new great inconvenience; which evil state of things ought to be infinitely avoided by all Christians that would be saved by all means; and, therefore, all such teachers and all such doctrines are carefully to be declined, who give so much easiness not only to the remedies, but to the sins themselves." †

16. Roman Catholics also teach that the opinion of one grave Doctor is sufficient of itself to make a matter probable. The foundation on which their casuists rely in deciding doubtful cases of conscience is, that "if an opinion or speculation be probable, it may, in practice, be safely followed." And "the opinion of one grave Doctor is sufficient to make such matter probable." Nay, the example of those reputed good men is said to be a sufficient rule of conduct.

It is of no avail to answer that such an opinion is only the private sentiment of one or more of their Divines; in matters of faith, this would not be sufficient to ascribe a doctrine to a whole Church; but in that of practice, as far as such practice extends, it is enough to allege the sayings of their Doctors, because these are their rule of life: with them the discipline of conscience is not decreed by Councils, but by their casuists, to whom we must look for their sentiments on this topic. It is true, we do not assert this to be an article of their faith: it is only a rule of conduct. It is neither contained in a public decree, nor is it condemned by any Council. Their casuists determine all cases, with severity or indulgence, with strictness or laxity, in order to suit the wicked and the righteous, those who serve God and those who serve him not. The Jesuits have instilled a fearful laxity of morals into the Church of Rome. They were warmly opposed by the Jansenists, and those of the Clergy who were in favour of scriptural morality; but the Jesuits, though depressed and even deposed for a time, soon gained the ascendancy, and with their restoration they have re-established their favourite principles. Their system is to allow, and therefore generally to tolerate, persons of good moral character in the Church. But as the greater number are neither good, nor moral, nor pious, the Jesuits have precisely adapted their code to suit every class of sinners, so that all may indulge in those sins to which they are individually prone, and yet in the end they may be saved.

Bishop Taylor, in his Dissuasive from Popery, places this subject before the reader in a clear and powerful manner:—"Suppose one great Doctor among them (as many of them do) shall say, 'It is lawful to kill a King whom the Pope declares heretic;' by the doctrine of probability, here is his warranty. And though the Church do not declare that doctrine, that is, the Church do not make it certain in speculation, yet it may be safely done in practice. Here is enough to give peace of conscience to him that does it; nay, if the contrary be more safe, yet if the other be but probable by reason or authority, you may do the less safe and refuse what is more so. For that also is the opinion of some grave theologians:* if one say, it is safe to swear a thing, as of our knowledge, which we do not know, but believe it to be so; it is therefore probable that it is lawful to swear it, because a grave Divine says it, and then it is safe enough.

"And upon this account, who could find fault with Pope Constantine IV., who, when he was accused in the Lateran Council † for holding the see apostolic when he was not in orders, justified himself by the example of Sergius, Bishop of Ravenna, and Stephen, Bishop of Naples? Here was 'exemplum bonorum,'—honest men had done so before him, and therefore he was innocent. When it is observed by Cardinal Campegius,‡ and Albertus Pighius did teach, that a Priest lives more holily and chastely that keeps a concubine than he that hath a married wife; and then shall find in the Pope's law, that a Priest is not to be removed for fornication;§ who will not, or may not, practically conclude, that since, by the law of God, marriage is holy, and yet to some men fornication is more lawful, and does not make a Priest irregular, that therefore to keep a concubine is very lawful? especially since, abstracting from the consideration of a man's being in orders or not, fornication itself is probably no sin at all. 'For,' so says Durandus, 'simple fornication of itself is not a deadly sin, according to the

* Granat. in Materia de Peccatis, tract. viii., disput. 1, sect. 1. F. Knott against Chillingworth, in his Infidelity Unmasked, pp. 105—107, &c., quoted by Bishop Taylor.

† Taylor's Works, vol. x., Dissuasive from Popery, chap. ii., sect. v., pp. 208, 209.

* Aphorismi Confessariorum ex Doctorum sententiis collecti auctore Emman. Sa. Antw. A. D. 1599.

† Apud Nauclerum. Generat. xxi., 26.

‡ Dist. lxxxii., cap. v., Presbyter in Glossa.

§ Extrav. de Bigamis, Quia circa, in Greg. ix. Decretal., lib. i., tit. xxi., sect. vi. Glossa in Gratian., distinct. lxxxi., sect. vi. Maximianus.

natural law, and excluding all positive law;'* and Martinus de Magistris says, 'To believe simple fornication to be no deadly sin is not heretical, because the testimonies of Scripture are not express.'† These are grave Doctors; and therefore the opinion is probable, and the practice safe. When the good people of the Church of Rome hear it read that Pope Clement VIII., in the Index of prohibited books,‡ says, that 'the Bible, published in vulgar tongues, ought not to be read and retained;' no, not so much as a compend of the history of the Bible; and Bellarmine says, that 'it is not necessary to salvation to believe that there are any Scriptures at all written;' and that Cardinal Hosius saith, 'Perhaps it had been better for the Church if no Scriptures had been written;' they cannot but say that this doctrine is probable, and think themselves safe when they walk without the light of God's word, and rely wholly upon the Pope, or their Priest, in what he is pleased to tell them; and that they are no way obliged to keep that commandment of Christ, 'Search the Scriptures.' Cardinal Tolet§ says, that 'if a nobleman be set upon and may escape by going away, he is not tied to it, but may kill him that intends to strike him with a stick;'‖ that 'if a man be in a great passion, and so transported that he considers not what he says; if, in that case, he does blaspheme, he does not always sin:'¶ that 'if a man be beastly drunk, and then commit fornication, that fornication is no sin:' that 'if a man desires carnal pollution, that he may be eased of his carnal temptations, or for his health, it were no sin:'†† that 'it is lawful for a man to expose his bastards to the hospital, to conceal his own shame.'‡‡ He says it out of Soto, and he from Thomas Aquinas, that 'if the times be hard, or the judge unequal, a man that cannot sell his wine at a due price may lawfully make his measures less than is appointed, or mingle water with his wine, and sell for pure, so he do not lie; and yet if he does, it is no mortal sin, nor obliges him to restitution.' Emanuel Sa affirms, that 'if a man lie with his intended wife before marriage, it is no sin, or a light one; nay, quin etiam expedit, si multum illa differatur, it is good to do so, if the benediction or publication of marriage be much deferred.'§§ That 'infants in their cradles may be made Priests, is the common opinion of Divines and Canonists,' saith Tolet;‖‖ and that 'in their cradles they can be made Bishops,' saith the Archdeacon and the Provost;¶¶ and though some say the contrary, yet the other is more true, saith the Cardinal. Vasquez saith, 'That not only an image of God, but any creature in the world, reasonable or unreasonable, may, without danger, be worshipped together with God, as his image; that we ought to adore the relics of saints, though under the form of worms; and that it is no sin to worship a ray of light in which the devil is invested, if a man supposes him to be Christ; and in the same manner, if he supposes it to be a piece of a saint, which is not, he shall not want the merit of his devotion.' And, to conclude, Pope Celestine III., as Alphonsus a Castro reports himself to have seen a decretal of his to that purpose, affirmed, that 'if one of the married couple fall into heresy, the marriage is dissolved, and that the other may marry another;' and the marriage is nefarious, and they are irritæ nuptiæ, 'the espousals are void,'* if a Catholic and a heretic marry together, said the Fathers of the Synod in Trullo. And though all of this be not owned generally, yet if a Roman Catholic marries a wife, that is, or shall turn heretic, he may leave her, and part bed and board, according to the doctrine taught by the canon law itself,† by the Lawyers and Divines, as appears in Covaruvias,‡ Matthias Aquarius,§ and Bellarmine.‖" ¶

These opinions will appear strange to Protestants, but not to the members of the Church of Rome; for they are taught by their Divines, by Popes, by Cardinals, and the canon law, and consequently are probable, and so may be believed and practised without danger to the soul, according to the received doctrine of probability.

As this is a topic of considerable importance, and those who are unskilled in the evasions of the Church of Rome might be led to suppose that such principles could not be advocated by any man professing godliness, we will have recourse to a Roman Catholic author who has treated this subject with great clearness, ability, and success. The author is the celebrated Blaise Pascal, in his Provincial Letters, containing an exposure of the principles and morals of the Jesuits. In the fifth letter he delineates the doctrine of probability as taught by that society, whose teachings are now the standard in the Roman Catholic Church, in consequence of their restoration and reception to favour, and the deposition of the Jansenists. He quotes Father Bauny and Basil Pontius, who speak as follows:—"An opinion is called probable when it is founded upon reasons of some importance. Hence it sometimes happens that only one very grave Doctor can render an opinion probable; for a man who is particularly devoted to study would not adopt an opinion unless he were induced by a good and sufficient reason." Sanchez, one of their most celebrated casuists, says, "You may perhaps doubt whether the authority of a single good and learned Doctor be sufficient to render an opinion probable. I answer, It is; and Angelus, Sylvius, Navarre, Emanuel Sa, &c., assert the same, furnishing this proof:—A probable opinion is that which has a considerable

[* "Quæritur utrum fornicatio simplex sit peccatum mortale. NON VIDETUR."—Durandi a sancto Portiano in Sententias Theologicas Petri Lombardi Commentariorum, lib. iv., distinct. xxxiii., quæst. ii., p. 326. Fol. Lugd., 1560.]

† Lib. de Temp., quæst. ii., de Luxuria.

‡ Vide Dan. Tilen. de Verbo non Scripto, lib. iv., c. viii.

§ Francisci Toleti e Societ. Jesu, S.R.E., Presb. Card. Instructio Sacerdotum ac de Septem Peccatis Mortalibus, lib. v., cap. vi., sect. 15. 12mo. Antw., 1603.

‖ Lib. iv., cap. xiii., sect. 4. ¶ Lib. v., cap. x., sect. 3.

 Lib. v., cap. xiii., sect. 10. †† Lib. v., cap. xi., sect. 5.

‡‡ Lib. viii., cap. xlix., sect. 4.

[§§ "Copulari ante benedictionem, aut nullum, aut leve peccatum est, (etsi quidam mortale esse putant,) quin etiam expedit si multum illa differatur."—Aphor. Confessariorum, &c., auctore Emman. Sa, Art. Debitum Conjugale, p. 68. Antw., 1599.]

‖‖ Lib. i., cap. lxi. ¶¶ Ibid.

 De Adorat., lib. iii., disp. i., cap. ii. Ibid., cap. v., sec. 33.

* Ibid., disp. i., cap. ii. Ibid., cap. iii., sec. 33.

† Greg. ix. Decretal., lib. iii., tit. xxxii. De. Conv. Conjug., lib. iv., tit. xix., de Divortiis.

‡ De Matrim., part ii., cap. vii., sec. 5, n. 4.

§ In Sent. iv., d. xxxix., art. i., conclus. ult.

[‖ "Secundo sine consensu, ob crimen, idque triplex. Primum est, adulterium alterius conjugis, de quo Matt. v. Deinde si alter conjugum a fide Catholica recedat: et de hoc habemus Apostolicum præceptum ad Tit. iii., Hæreticum hominem post unam et secundam correptionem devita; ubi Apostolus de omnibus generatim loquitur, neque conjuges aut parentes excipit. Et de his etiam intelliguntur verba Domini Luc. xiv., Si quis venit ad me, et non odit patrem suum, et matrem, et uxorem, &c. Deinde si alter conjugum impellat alterum ad peccatum; ita ut non possit alter eum eo cohabitare sine periculo Deum offendendi: et de hoc loquitur Dominus cum ait, Si oculus tuus scandalizat te, erue eum; (Matt. xviii.;) in quem locum scribens Hieronymus, docet sententiam Domini esse, ut si ii qui nobis conjuncti sunt, et chari instar oculorum, ut parentes, filii, uxor, causa sint ruinarum, ab iis recedamus."—Bellarm. Oper., tom. iii., De Matrimonii Sacramento, lib. i., cap. xiii.]

¶ Taylor's Works, vol. x., Dissuasive, &c., chap. ii., sect. vii., pp. 214—217. 8vo. edit.

foundation; but the authority of a wise and pious man is not of small but of great importance; for (and pray listen to this reason) if the testimony of such a man possess sufficient weight to convince us that any occurrence took place, for example, at Rome, why should it not be equally satisfactory in deciding a doubtful point of morality? And I disapprove of the limitation prescribed by certain writers, that the authority of such a Doctor is sufficient in questions relating to human affairs, but not in those which refer to religious concerns; for it is of the greatest importance in both."

"And though the opinion of Doctors may be different, this is nothing against the doctrine of probability, as every one may render his own opinion probable. In fact, they scarcely ever agree; for very few questions can arise in which one will not say, 'Yes,' and another, 'No;' and yet each of these contrary opinions is probable, as Diana states on a certain subject: 'Pontius and Sanchez are of an opposite opinion; but inasmuch as they are both learned men, each one makes his own sentiment probable.' In such cases each is to prefer the opinion which is most agreeable to himself, though what he rejects may be the most probable and sure opinions, as Emanuel Sa declares: 'A person may do what he conceives to be permitted by one probable opinion, although the contrary be more sure; but the opinion of one grave Doctor is sufficient.' But suppose an opinion be less probable and less sure; it may be probable by rejecting that which is more probable and more sure, according to the great Jesuit Filiutius, who says, 'It is allowable to follow the opinion which is less probable, though it be also less sure. This is the concurrent sentiment of modern authors.' Answers are given by Jesuits to please those who consult them. The words of Laiman, which the twenty-four Elders have followed, are: 'When a Doctor is consulted, he may give his advice not only as probable, according to his opinion, but contrary to his opinion, if it should be deemed probable by others, when the advice which is opposed to our own is more favourable and agreeable to those who consult him; si forte et illi favorabilior seu exoptatior sit: but I say farther, that he will not act without reason if he should give those who consult him an opinion held probable by some learned individual, though he felt confident at the same time it was absolutely false."*

Such are the iniquitous sentiments of the Jesuits; and as their order has been restored by the Popes, their opinions, or rather doctrines, and code of morality, have been restored with them. Not that all Roman Catholics, nor even all Jesuits, believe them; yet these sentiments and their practical effects have so imbued the Church of Rome, in which they have gained such ascendency, that the sound and pure doctrines occasionally maintained by some, are generally counteracted by the foregoing and opposite principles, and the demoralizing examples which flow from them. The following from the pious and excellent Roman Catholic Pascal, in his fifth Provincial Letter, will explain this matter, and place it in its proper light. Speaking of the Jesuits, he says,—

"Their object is not to corrupt morals: this certainly is not their design; but neither is it their sole purpose to reform them: this would be bad policy. Their intention is this: Having the best opinion of themselves, they think it both beneficial and necessary to the interests of religion that their reputation should be extended through the world, and that they should obtain the direction of every man's conscience; and as the strict maxims of the Gospel are adapted to govern some people, they make use of them whenever the occasion favours it. But inasmuch as these maxims do not accord with the views of the generality of mankind, they dispense with them in regard to such predilections, for the sake of affording universal satisfaction. On this account, as they are connected with persons of every condition in life, and of every country and clime, it becomes necessary to employ casuists whose varieties of sentiment should suit every existing diversity of circumstance. Hence you will easily perceive, that if they had none but casuists of lax notions, they would defeat their principal purpose, which is to please every body, because the truly religious are solicitous of a more rigorous leader. But as there are not many of this description, they do not require many guides of the stricter class to direct them; a few of the one will suffice for a few of the other, while the multitude of lax casuists offer their services to the numerous classes that wish to be allowed an undisciplined remissness. It is by this obliging and accommodating conduct, as Father Petau calls it, that they open their arms to all the world; for if a person should apply to them who was resolved upon the restoration of any thing he had obtained by fraudulent means, do not imagine they would attempt to dissuade him from his purpose; on the contrary, they would applaud and confirm his determination. But if another should present himself soliciting absolution without restitution, it would be strange indeed if they did not furnish him with expedients and guarantee his success. By this means they preserve all their friends, and defend themselves against all their enemies. If they should be reproached for their extreme laxity, they instantly exhibit to the public their austere directors, with some volumes which they have composed on the strictness of the Christian law; and with these proofs they satisfy the superficial, who cannot fathom their depths.

"Thus they accommodate all descriptions of people, and are so well prepared with an answer to every question, that in countries where a crucified Jesus passes for foolishness, they suppress the scandal of the cross, and preach only Jesus Christ in his glory, and not in a state of suffering: as in India and China, where they allow their Christians to practise idolatry itself, by the ingenious device of making them conceal an image of Christ under their cloaks, to which they are instructed to address mentally the adorations rendered publicly to the idols Cachinchoam Keum-fucum. This is charged upon them by Gravina, a Dominican; and the same policy is described in a Spanish memorial presented to Philip IV., King of Spain, by the Friars of the Philippine Islands, as reported by Thomas Hurtado, in his book of Martyrology, p. 427. The Cardinals of the Society de Propaganda Fide were obliged expressly to forbid the Jesuits, upon pain of excommunication, to allow the worship of idols under any pretext whatever, and to conceal the mystery of the cross from those whom they instructed in the faith, positively commanding them to admit no one to baptism till after such instruction, and enjoining them to exhibit a crucifix in their churches; as is amply detailed in a decree of the congregation on the ninth of July, 1646, signed by Cardinal Capponi.

"In this manner they have spread over the whole world, by their doctrine of probable opinions, which is the spring and foundation of all this disorder. You must learn what it is from their own testimony; for they take no more pains to conceal it than they do the facts I am stating, with this difference only, that they veil their human and political prudence under the pretext of divine and Christian prudence, as if faith, supported by tradition, were not invariable in all times and places; as if the rule were to bend to the accommodation of the person who was to submit to it; and as if there were no other means for sinners to purify their stains of guilt than corrupting the law of God: whereas 'the law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul,' to conform to its salutary directions." *

* Provincial Letters containing an Exposure of the Reasoning and Morals of the Jesuits. By Blaise Pascal, pp. 67—70. 8vo. London, 1816.

The foregoing picture, though drawn in 1656, but too well corresponds with the present state of the Church of Rome, which has incorporated into her system the doctrines of the Jesuits; not, indeed, by formal articles of religion, but by the more effectual way of permitting the followers of Loyola to teach what they judge proper.

17. The penances and satisfactions enjoined in the Church of Rome furnish no adequate restraints or proper checks on sin. They do not tend to reform sinners; nor, indeed, do they appear to be enjoined for the purpose of turning men from sin, or of encouraging and aiding them in works of righteousness. To secure submission to the Clergy, and to complete their adherence to the Church, seem to be the principal ends for which penances are enjoined; to reform men, by turning them from sin to holiness, seems to be altogether secondary and remote in the penitential of Rome; and although they teach that penances are vindictive, medicinal or curative, and preservative,† nevertheless their doctrine of opus operatum paralyzes the effects in general of whatever sound teaching they may impart concerning amendment of life. For if we consider the crimes for which penances are enjoined, and the kind of punishment inflicted, it appears that they impose but very slight restraints on the commission of sin.

As it regards the kinds and degrees of penance enjoined, we present our readers with a list of those which Dens has enumerated in his System of Divinity, the text-book used at Maynooth. He divides satisfactory works, as he terms them, into three kinds; namely, "prayer, fasting, and alms," oratio, jejunium, et eleemosyna; and says all others may be reduced to these three. Sacred communion, with all other acts of latria or worship, may be referred to prayer; affliction of body, to fasting; and whatsoever relates to benefiting our neighbour, to alms.

"The following," says Dens, "can be enjoined under the head of prayer, once, or oftener, either for many days or weeks; namely, (1.) To say five Paternosters and five Ave Marias, in memory of the five wounds of Christ, either with bended knees or outstretched arms, or before a crucifix. (2.) To recite the Rosary, or Litanies of the blessed Virgin Mary, or of the saints, &c. (3.) To read the psalm Miserere, or the seven penitential psalms. (4.) To hear mass, or praises, or preaching. (5.) To read a chapter in Thomas à Kempis. (6.) To visit churches, to pray before the tabernacle. (7.) At stated hours, in the morning, evening, during the day, or as often as they hear the sound of the clock, to renew orally, or in the heart, ejaculatory prayers, acts of contrition or charity: such as, 'I love thee, O Lord, above all things:' 'I detest all my sins; I am resolved to sin no more:' 'O Jesus, crucified for me, have mercy on me!' &c. (8.) At an appointed day, to confess again, or, at any rate, to return to the Confessor.

"To fasting may be referred whatever pertains to the mortification of the body: so that a perfect or partial fast can be enjoined. (1.) Let him fast (feria sexta) on the sixth holyday, or oftener. (2.) Let him fast only to the middle of the day. (3.) Let him not drink before noon, or in the afternoon, unless at dinner or supper, though he may be thirsty; let him abstain from wine and from cerevisia forti. (4.) Let him eat less, and take in the evening only half the quantity. (5.) Let him rise earlier from bed; let him kneel frequently and for a long period; let him suffer cold, observe silence for a certain time, and abstain from sports and recreations, &c.

"To alms is referred whatever may be expended for the benefit of our neighbour. (1.) To give money, clothes, food, &c. (2.) To furnish personal assistance, to wait on the sick, to pray for the conversion of sinners, &c, and other works of mercy, whether corporeal or spiritual." *

Another kind of penances must be noticed; namely, voluntary austerities. This, as a technical division, is of small importance. It is proper, however, to remark, that the collection of Dens, though sufficiently ample, omits several classes of penances which are or have been very popular in the Roman Catholic Church, such as pilgrimages, whipping, bodily tortures, &c., as the following will show:—

["The use of the whip, unknown, say Du Pin and Boileau, to all antiquity, began in the end of the eleventh century. The novelty was eagerly embraced by a community which boasts of its unchangeability. The inhuman absurdity has been advocated by Baronius, Spondanus, Pullus, Gerson, and the Roman Breviary. Baronius, the great champion of Romanism, followed by Spondanus, calls flagellation 'a laudable usage!' This satisfaction, Cardinal Pullus admits, is rough; but, in proportion to its severity, is, he has discovered, 'the more acceptable to God.' Gerson, in the Council of Constance, in 1417, though he condemned the absurdity in its grosser forms, recommended the custom, when under

* Pascal's Provincial Letters, p. 59, et seq.

† See Dens's Theologia, tom. vi., No. 175; De Effectibus et Finibus Satisfactionis Sacramentalis; and Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. xiv., cap. 8.

[* "Ita in genere orationum injungi possunt, semel aut pluries aut per plures dies aut septimanas sequentia:—

["(1.) Dicere quinque Pater Noster et Ave Maria, in memoriam quinque Christi vulnerum, vel flexis genibus, vel brachiis extensis, vel ante crucifixum. (2.) Recitare Rosarium, vel Litanias B. M. V., vel sanctorum, &c. (3.) Legere psalmum Miserere, vel septem psalmos pœnitentiales. (4.) Audire missas, vel laudes, vel concionem. (5.) Legere capitulum in Thoma à Kempis. (6.) Visitare ecclesias, orare tabernaculum. (7.) Statutis temporibus, mane, vesperi vel per diem, vel quotiescumque audierint sonitum horologii, renovent ore vel corde orationes jaculatorias, actus contritionis, vel charitatis: v. g., 'Amo te, Deus, super omnia; detestor omnia peccata mea; nolo peccare amplius; Jesu crucifixe pro me, miserere mei,' &c. (8.) Præfixo die iterum confiteatur, vel saltem redeat ad Confessarium.

["Ad genus jejunii refertur quidquid ad mortificationem corporis pertinet; ita injungi potest vel jejunium perfectum, vel pars jejunii: v. g.,—

["(1.) Jejunet feria sexta, aut sæpius. (2.) Jejunet solum usque ad horam duodecimam. (3.) Non bibat ante meridiem, vel post meridiem, nisi in prandio et in cœna, quamvis sitiat. Abstineat a vino vel a cerevisia forti. (4.) Minus manducet, vesperi non nisi medietatem sumat. (5.) Citius e lecto surgat; genuflectat frequentius et diutius, patiatur frigus, certo tempore silentium observet; abstineat a lusibus et recreationibus, &c.

["Ad genus eleemosynarum reducitur quodcumque in proximi utilitatem expenditur: v. g.,—(1.) Largiri pecunias, vestes, cibum, &c. (2.) Præbere adjutoria personalia, servire ægrotis, orare pro peccatorum conversione, &c. Et alia misericordiæ opera sive corporalia sive spiritualia."—Dens Theolog., tom. vi., De Satisfac. Sacrament., No. 176.]

the control of a superior, and executed by another with moderation, and without ostentation or effusion of blood. Self-flagellation, indeed, is sanctioned by the Popish Church. The Roman Breviary, published by the authority of Pius, Clement, and Urban, has recommended the absurdity by its approbation. This publication details and eulogizes the flagellations practised by the Roman saints. These encomiums on the disciplinarian whip are read on the festivals of these canonized flagellators. The work containing these commendations is authorized by three Pontiffs, and received with the utmost unanimity by the whole communion. The usage, therefore, in all its ridiculousness, possesses the sanction of infallibility.

["The improved species of penance was adopted by the friendly Monks of the age of the Crusades, who, with a lusty arm, belaboured the luckless backs of the penitential criminals, men and women even of the highest rank in society. The nobility, gentry, and peasantry, the Emperor, the King, the lord, the lady, the servant, and the soldier, as well as the Cardinal, the Metropolitan, the Bishop, the Priest, the Monk, and the Nun, all joined in the painful and disgusting extravagance. Cardinal Damian, in 1056, brought it into fashion; and Dominic, Pardolf, Anthelm, Moria, Margaret, Hedwig, Hildegard, and Cecald, who have all, men and women, been canonized, followed Damian's example, and lacerated their backs for the good of their souls.

["The Roman Breviary, already mentioned, edited by three Popes, commends many of its saints for their happy and frequent application of the whip to their naked backs. Self-flagellation, according to pontifical authority, became, in their hands, the sanctified means of superior holiness. This roll contains the celebrated names of Xavier, Canutus, Francisca, Regulatus, Bernard, Franciscus, Teresia, and Bertrand. Xavier, the Indian Apostle, wielded against his own flesh 'an iron whip; which, at every blow, was followed with copious streams of blood.' Canutus, the Danish Sovereign, 'chastised his body with hair-cloth and flagellation.' Francisca copied the holy pattern. Her saintship 'took continual pains to reduce her body to submission by frequent self-flagellation.' Regulatus, by the skilful application of the sanguinary lash, 'subjected the flesh to the spirit.' Bernardin, Franciscus, and Bertrand, following the useful example, operated with a thong on the back for the good of the soul. Teresia merits particular and honourable mention, for applying, with laudable attention, these Christian means of holy torment. 'She often applied the bloody lash.' This, however, did not satisfy her saintship. She also, in addition, 'rolled herself on thorns;' and by this means, says the Breviary, the holy Nun (blasphemous to tell) 'was accustomed to converse with God.' Her carcass, however, it seems, enjoys, since her death, the benefit of these macerations; and, 'circumfused in a fragrant fluid, remains, till the present day, the undecayed object of religious worship!' The Church that retains such senseless and ridiculous absurdity, in a publication reviewed by Pius, Clement, and Urban, may cease to reproach Protestantism with the acts of a few mistaken fanatics, or moon-struck maniacs, who, whatever name they may assume, are disowned by every Reformed denomination in Christendom.

["Dominic, Hedwig, and Margaret, call for special notice in the annals of flagellation. Dominic of the iron cuirass, seems to have been the great patron and example of this discipline. He showed himself no mercy; and whipped, on one occasion, till his face, livid and gory, could not be recognised. This scourging was accompanied with psalm-singing. The music of the voice, and the cracking of the whip, mingled during the operation in delightful variety.

["Dominic, in the use of the whip, had the honour of making several improvements, which, in magnitude and utility, may be reckoned with those of Copernicus, Flamsteed, Newton, and La Place! He taught flagellators to lash with both hands, and, consequently, to do double execution. The skilful operator by this means could, in a given time, peel twice as much superabundant skin from his back, and discharge twice as much useless blood from his veins. He obliged the world with the invention of knotted scourges. This discovery, also, facilitated the flaying of the shoulders, and enabled a skilful hand to mangle the flesh in fine style for the good of the soul.

["Hedwig and Margaret, though of the softer sex, rivalled Dominic in this noble art. Hedwig was Duchess of Silesia and Great Poland. She often walked, during the frost and cold, till she might be traced by the blood dropping from her feet on the snow. She wore next her skin a hair-cloth that mangled her flesh, which she would not allow to be washed. Her women had, by force, to remove the clotted blood which flowed from the torn veins. The Duchess invented or adopted an effectual, but rather rough, means of sanctification. She purified her soul by the tears which she shed, and her body by the blows which she inflicted with a knotted lash.

["Margaret, daughter to the King of Hungary, wore a hair-cloth and an iron girdle. She underwent not only the usual number of stripes, but made the Nuns inflict on her an extraordinary quantity, which caused such an effusion of blood from her flesh as horror-struck the weeping executioners. Her devotion still augmenting during the holy week, she lacerated her whole body with the blows of a whip.

["Dr. Middleton, during his visit to Rome, witnessed a procession in which the wretched votaries of superstition marched with whips in their hands, and lashed their naked backs till blood streamed from the wounds. A similar exhibition is presented at the annual return of the Lent season. Men of all conditions assemble at a certain place, where whips, ready for the work, are given to the operators. The lights are extinguished. An alarm-bell announces the moment for commencement. The victims of superstition and priestcraft then ply the thong, and flay their unfortunate shoulders. Nothing is heard, during the tragedy, but the groans of the self-tormentors, mingled with the cracking of whips, and the clanking of chains, forming, if not a very harmonious, at least a very striking and noisy, concert. The comfortable operation, producing, of course, an agreeable excoriation, continues nearly an hour, accompanied with the vocal and instrumental symphony of groans, whips, and chains."*]

It would appear, in the estimation of the Church of Rome, that prayer is considered a suffering and a punishment, by which, also, they expect to make atonement for their sins. Among enlightened evangelical Christians it is considered not only an important duty, but an inestimable privilege, to have access to God, in the name of Christ, by prayer and supplication for those things of which they have need. Among Papists it is quite different; few of whom can take any interest in their prayers, being chiefly in an unknown tongue, and consisting in the constant repetition of the same words, without any distinct ideas being attached to them. It is but natural to look upon such an exercise as a punishment: the principal error is in making it an atonement for sin. A person may suffer a great deal by fasting, if carried to excess; but so far as it is a Christian duty, it is salutary both to body and mind. Alms-giving can only be considered as a punishment by those who worship their money, or who believe not the words of Christ: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." There may be suffering enough under the head of voluntary austerities; but to suppose that God is pleased with such offerings, or that he receives them as a satisfaction for sin, shows that false and degrading notions of the character of the Deity are entertained by this apostate Church. The character of Popery in this article may be compared with the cruel rites of heathen idolatry; and though the worshippers of Juggernaut may exceed in their austerities the voluntary or exacted tortures of the votaries of Rome, both act on the same principle, and are equally unscriptural and injurious.

[* Variations of Popery, by Samuel Edgar, pp. 12—16. See also the History of the Flagellants, or, the Advantages of Discipline; being a Paraphrase and Commentary on the Historia Flagellantium of the Abbé Boileau, Doctor of the Sorbonne, Canon of the Holy Chapel, &c. 4to. London.]

But as it regards the peculiar penances which are enjoined, they are reduced from those which are ancient and canonical to such as are private and arbitrary, from years to hours, from great severity to trivial observances, from fasting and public shame to repeating prayers over beads; and if some Confessors happen to be severe, there are numerous means of relief. The penitent may have permission to go to a Confessor who is more lenient, or he may have his penances commuted for money or for a milder infliction, or he may procure some one else to perform them for him, or his penances may be superseded by indulgences, of which there is so great store at Rome, that Boniface said, "No man is able to number them." An indulgence is frequently no great charge, and therefore the penances can easily be performed through that medium. A little alms to a Priest, a small oblation to a church, a pilgrimage to the image or relics of a saint, wearing St. Francis's cord, saying over the beads with a hallowed appendant, entering into a fraternity, praying at a privileged altar, leaving a legacy for masses, visiting a certain cemetery, and a hundred other devices, promise to secure the sinner from suffering here and hereafter.

For voluntary drunkenness, without scandal, Dens recommends the following penance:—"That he should read for two days the psalm Miserere, on his knees; that he should fast twice in the week; and that he should distribute to the poor twice as much as he hath spent in drink. But if he be a poor man and a labourer, he is to recite, for three successive days, on his knees, five Paters and Aves; for two days, not to drink any thing before noon, and in the evening to eat only half a meal; on the two next Sundays not to enter the church; but after midday he may go to preaching or to praises."* Our author seems to have no idea of teaching his penitent to turn from his sin and avoid the occasion of it, and to look up to God for grace to enable him to do so. He directs him to have recourse to expedients, which are nothing more, in the way in which such things are used, than charms, or spells, or incantations; because the guilty person is not pointed to the right way to get rid of drunkenness, nor to the right source for aid, but he is directed to Paters, Aves, and other things, very much like the amulets, &c., which were supplied by conjurors in the place of true remedies. The plan of reformation recommended by Dens is, therefore, more like the incantations of a magician than the true doctrines of the Gospel.

18. Let us examine the testimony of the Fathers on this subject.

It must be owned that Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, and Augustine, speak of our making satisfaction to God by the temporal pains which we endure. To this we answer, that if they use the term satisfaction in the Roman Catholic sense, we affirm that their grossly unscriptural language shows how soon and easily a specious and flattering corruption crept into the Church. But it is doubted whether this is their meaning. It is certain that in the idioms of both Greek and Latin the same phrase signifies indifferently, "to give satisfaction," and "to suffer punishment." This seems to be the true key to the phraseology employed by certain Fathers. When they speak of men's making satisfaction to God for their sins, they mean, not that their pains were meritorious, but that sin will be followed by merited punishment.

Be this as it may, if we are to be guided by the Fathers, we must prefer the authority of those of the apostolic age. The testimony, therefore, of Paul's fellow-labourer, Clement of Rome, is of far more weight than the evidence of Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, or Augustine. "All," says Clement, "are glorified and magnified, not through themselves, or through their own works, or through the righteous deeds which they have done, but through the will of God. We, therefore, being called through his will in Christ Jesus, are not justified through ourselves, or through our own wisdom, or intellect, or piety, or the works which we have wrought in holiness of heart; but through faith, by which the Almighty God hath justified all from everlasting. To him be glory and honour through all ages. What, then, shall we do, brethren? Shall we be slothful from good deeds, and shall we desert the faith? The Lord forbid such to be our case! Rather let us hasten, with all vehemence and alacrity, to accomplish every good work."* It is difficult for us to suppose that the person who wrote thus believed that meritorious satisfaction could be made to God, either by holy deeds or sufferings. In the days of Clement, such satisfactions as are taught by the Priests of Rome were unknown in the church of Christ.

St. Jerome, in his Commentary on Matthew xvi., "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth," &c., says: "Some Priests and Bishops of the new law, understanding not the sense of these words, do imitate the pride of the Pharisees, by ascribing to themselves a power to condemn the innocent and to absolve the guilty. But God doth not so much consider the sentence of the Priest as the life of the penitent. We read in Leviticus, of those who were infected with the leprosy, where it is commanded that they should show themselves to the Priests; and if they had the leprosy, then by the Priest they were declared unclean. And as the Levites did not cleanse the lepers, but only separated those that were cleansed from those that were not, by the knowledge which they had of the leprosy; even so the Bishop or the Priest doth not bind those that are innocent, and loose the guilty; but, having heard the difference of sins, he knows whom to bind and whom to loose, in the discharge of his ministry." *

[* "Quam igitur pœnitentiam convenit injungere pro peccato mortali, v. g., pro voluntaria ebrietate sine scandalo?—R. Ut legat duobus diebus psalmum Miserere flexis genibus, ut jejunet bis in hac hebdomada, et ut distribuat pauperibus duplum istius, quod consumpsit in potu.

["Quid si iste sit pauper et operarius in labore gravi?—R. Per tres dies continuos recitet quinque Pater et Ave flexis genibus; duobus diebus non bibat ante meridiem, et vesperi non nisi medietatem manducet; duobus diebus Dominicis sequentibus non ingrediatur tabernam, sed post meridiem vadat ad concionem et laudes."—Dens Theol., tom. vi.; De Quantitate Satisfactionis injungendæ, No. 179.]

* Clem. Rom. Epist. ad Corinth. i., sect. 32, 33.

Isidore defines satisfaction to be "an exclusion of the causes and occasions of sinning, and a cessation from sinning." This is nearly the same with Augustine's definition, who says: "Satisfaction is to cut off the causes of sins, and to allow no entrance to their suggestions." † St. Ambrose saith: "Of tears I read; to make satisfaction I read not." ‡ Such declarations as these do not well correspond with the doctrine of satisfaction as held by the Church of Rome.

In the second Council of Chalons, held in the year 813, the following canon was passed, which goes to prove that in the commencement of the ninth century the sacrament of penance did not exist: §—"Some say that we ought to confess our sins to God alone; others affirm that they ought to be confessed to Priests. Both are done with great benefit in the holy Church, so that we confess our sins to God, who does forgive them; and with David say, 'I acknowledge my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin:' and, according to the Apostles' institution, we confess them to each other, and pray for each other, that we may be saved. So the confession which is made to God purges from sins; and that which is made to the Priest informs us how we ought to be purged from them: for God, the Author and Giver of our health and welfare, often imparts the blessing of healing through the unseen administration of his own power, and often likewise by means of Physicians." ‖

Indeed, many enlightened and candid, with a few bigoted, Roman Catholics, have been compelled to acknowledge that the penances inflicted by the Church of Rome are very different from those which were enjoined by the primitive Church, and mentioned by several of the ancient Fathers. M. Du Pin, speaking of the age of Charlemagne, which was toward the end of the eighth century, says: "Public penance was in use yet, but not with the same rigour as in the former ages. They never denied the communion to dying people. Secret confessions were frequent." * According to this writer, secret confession was not general, and public penance was still in use; from which it appears that the sacrament of penance had not been established. The same excellent author, in his observations on the ecclesiastical affairs of the tenth century, asserts, that "public penance was still in use, but very rarely practised, and the canonical discipline was enervated by the redemption of penances, which was then introduced." † Thus the ancient canonical penance was superseded in the tenth century, in a considerable degree, by various novel and unscriptural inflictions. Indeed, auricular confession and other component parts of the sacrament of penance, so called, did not exist at all in the first ages of Christianity, and can claim no higher authority than the Lateran Council under Innocent III., anno 1215, or the Council of Trent, which is of still later date. Dens acknowledges that "the rigour of ecclesiastical discipline had" then "ceased." ‡

[The doctrine of human satisfaction is opposed to reason. "None of the conditions and qualifications of merit are found in the best works of good men. I would illustrate this matter under a few particulars. First, It seems impossible to me, that any creature, how excellent and glorious soever, should merit any thing at God's hand in a way of commutative justice; and that, because he is a creature. There may be merit between one creature and another, but there can be none between the Creator and his creatures. The angels and archangels, seraphim and cherubim received their being and all their excellencies from God, and on him they depend for the continuance of them: the greater these are, and the more glorious the works which they are capable of performing, the higher will be their obligation, honour, and happiness. They are indebted to him, and not he to them. They may be assured indeed from his wisdom, goodness, and faithfulness, that he will never put a period to their being and blessedness; but where would be the injustice if he did? He would only recall what at first he freely gave, and was at liberty to continue a longer or shorter time, as it pleased him. These holy and excellent creatures are the most humble ones, and are represented in Scripture in the lowest postures of adoration, as veiling their faces before God's throne, and casting their crowns down at his feet, ascribing blessing and honour and glory to his perfections, and not to their own merits. Now if these noble creatures, that have never sinned, have no pretences to merit, much less can such mean and sinful creatures as we are. For,

["Secondly, We are so far from meriting, that we cannot satisfy divine justice for our past and daily offences. We are sinners both by nature and practice; in many things we often offend, and are taught by our blessed

[* "Istum locum Episcopi et Presbyteri non intelligentes, aliquid sibi de Pharisæorum assumunt supercilio: ut vel damnent innocentes, vel solvere se noxios arbitrentur; quum apud Deum non sententia Sacerdotum, sed reorum vita quæratur. Legimus in Levitico de leprosis: ubi jubentur, ut ostendant se Sacerdotibus; et si lepram habuerint, tunc a Sacerdote immundi fiant: non quo Sacerdotes leprosos faciant et immundos; sed quo habeant notitiam leprosi, et non leprosi; et possint discernere qui mundus, quive immundus sit. Quomodo ergo ibi leprosum Sacerdos mundum vel immundum facit: sic et hic alligat vel solvit Episcopus et Presbyter, non eos qui insontes sunt vel noxii; sed pro officio suo quum peccatorum audierit varietates, scit qui ligandus sit, quive solvendus."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iv.; Comment. in Matt., cap. xvi., col. 75. Fol. Paris, 1706.]

[† "Pœnitentia vera est, pœnitenda non admittere et admissa deflere. Satisfactio pœnitentiæ est causas peccatorum excidere, nec earum suggestionibus aditum indulgere."—August. Opera, tom. viii., Append.; De Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus, cap. xxiv., alias liv. Fol. Paris, 1690.]

[‡ "Non invenio quid dixerit, invenio quod fleverit; lacrymas ejus lego, satisfactionem non lego."—Ambros. Opera, tom. i.; Expos. Evang. Lucam lib. x., col. 1523. Fol. Paris, 1686.]

[§ "Quidam Deo solummodo confiteri debere dicunt peccata, quidam vero Sacerdotibus confitenda esse percensent: quod utrumque non sine magno fructu intra sanctam fit Ecclesiam. Ita dumtaxat ut et Deo, qui remissor est peccatorum, confiteamur peccata nostra, et cum David dicamus, Delictum meum cognitum tibi feci, et injustitiam meam non abscondi: dixi, Confitebor adversum me injustitias meas Domino, et tu remisisti impietatem peccati mei: et secundum institutionem Apostoli, confiteamur alterutrum peccata nostra, et oremus pro invicem ut salvemur. Confessio itaque quæ Deo fit, purgat peccata; ea vero quæ Sacerdoti fit, docet qualiter ipsa purgentur peccata. Deus namque salutis et sanitatis auctor et largitor, plerumque hanc præbet suæ potentiæ invisibili administratione, plerumque medicorum operatione."—Conc. Cabilon II., can. xxxiii.; Conc. Labb., tom. vii., p. 1279.]

‖ Du Pin's Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii., p. 106. Dublin, 1724.

* Idem, p. 46. † Idem, p. 192.

[‡ "Deinde ista pœnitentia publica secundum se non erat sacramentalis, sed pertinebat ad ecclesiasticæ disciplinæ rigorem, qui jam cessat."—Dens Theol., tom. vi.; De Quantitate Satisfactionis injungendæ, No. 179.]

Saviour to pray for continual pardon. Now pardon and merit seem inconsistent. If our present and future obedience could be perfect and spotless, this would be no more than our indispensable duty, and could be no satisfaction to justice for sin; for the not increasing the number of debts is no payment of our old ones. How then can insolvent debtors pretend to merit? Nay, suppose our good works could be a satisfaction, it can be no meritorious act only to pay our just debts! But this is not the case with us. For,

["Thirdly, There are sinful defects cleaving to our best duties, which will not bear the strict eye and inspection of God's impartial justice. There is that iniquity in our holy things, for which God might condemn us, if he should enter into judgment with us. Were it not for Christ's perfect atonement, and prevalent intercession, there would be no hope of audience and acceptance. They are grossly ignorant of themselves, who reckon that their best works come up to the purity, spirituality, and extent of God's righteous law; for that reaches to the thoughts and intents of the heart, to the principles and ends as well as the matter of our actions. Who dares say, that he loves the Lord his God with all his heart, soul, and strength, or that he ever performed one religious duty without any vain thought mixing with it? How numerous are the defects of our best graces and duties? All pretences to sinless perfection are the effects of pride and ignorance. 'If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.' We have not yet felt the power of Gospel truth; that is, the religion of sinners; for it supposes us from first to last to be imperfect creatures. Integrity or uprightness of heart and life is the best perfection we can attain to; and it is our happiness that we are under such a dispensation of grace, as accepts of sincerity instead of legal perfection, as the term of life. Now since our best works cannot justify themselves at the bar of God's justice, how can they justify us before him, or merit any thing at his hand? Yet further:

["The good that is done by us is not performed by our own strength, but by strength derived from above. The sinful defect of our works is from ourselves; but the goodness of them, by which they are pleasing to God, is from him. It is by his grace we are what we are, and do what we do. We need both preventing and assisting grace to enable us to do any thing that is spiritually good. We have no sufficiency of our own, but all our sufficiency is of God. It is he that works in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure. We are also said to be his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works. Now if we have nothing but what we have received, how unreasonable is it to boast as if we had not received it! Our adversaries themselves do not deny the assistance of grace. But how that which is the effect of another's grace can be meritorious, is hard to understand; especially how it can merit of him from whom the grace itself was received. That by which we merit ought in all reason to be our own, and not another's.

["I add to this, that our best works can no way be profitable to God. Though we may rob him of his just rights by withholding that homage and obedience which is his due, and though he is pleased to accept our sincere but imperfect services, yet it is impossible to be profitable to him as one man is profitable to another, and as he who is wise is profitable to himself. 'Is it any pleasure to the Almighty that thou art righteous, or is it any gain to him that thou makest thy way perfect?' (Job xxii. 2, 3.) 'If thou sinnest, what doest thou against him? or if thy transgressions be multiplied, what doest thou unto him? If thou be righteous, what givest thou him? or what receiveth he of thine hand? Thy wickedness may hurt a man as thou art; and thy righteousness may profit the son of man.' (Job xxxv. 6—8.) Though our goodness may extend to our fellow-creatures, to the saints that are in the earth, it cannot extend to God. His blessedness is so perfect and unchangeable, that it is not capable of any addition or diminution. Now in all proper merit, there is in some sense an exchange of benefit. Benefits are given for benefits received. There is a vast difference between the obedience and sufferings of our blessed Saviour, and our best services. Such was the dignity of his person, that he both could and did make reparation for the injury done to the honour of God's law and government, and opened a way for the display of his glorious perfections in our recovery and salvation. He therefore may be said truly to merit, though we cannot; for his sufferings were a valuable consideration for the blessings bestowed upon us. But such is our meanness and poverty, and his all-sufficiency and fulness, that proper merit can have no place on our part, in any of our transactions with him.

["Once more, There is no proportion between our best works, and the rewards he has promised, either in point of excellency or duration. This there ought to be, if the former in strict justice did deserve the latter. How mean and poor are our best services! We work like ourselves, as weak and imperfect creatures; but the great God rewards like himself, as a free and noble benefactor, becoming the largeness of his bounty and liberality. Do we believe the Gospel promises concerning the greatness and excellency of the heavenly glory, that it exceeds all present thought and expression? for 'eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him!' Are we to behold his face in righteousness, and to be satisfied with his likeness upon us? to be in 'his presence, where there is fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore?' And can we be so stupidly proud and ignorant, as to think our sorry services are a valuable consideration for all this glory? How few are our good works, and of how short a continuance! If we began never so soon, and continued never so long, and suffered never so much, in the service of God, all this would take in but the compass of a few years; whereas the promised reward is eternal and unchangeable. We are 'called by the God of all grace unto his eternal glory by Jesus Christ,' and are 'begotten again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance, incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away.' 'Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' What can be more evident than that neither the services nor sufferings of the present life are worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed?

["Let me now, in the fourth place, suggest a few of the pernicious consequences that attend the doctrine of merit, and are a just prejudice against it.

["First, This tends to puff up the minds of carnal sinners with spiritual pride. Though our adversaries own in words the influence of grace, yet if we can so improve this grace, as to merit eternal life at the hand of God, this thought will naturally elate the spirit, and give ground for boasting, which in our fallen state we are very subject to. We are poor and proud, too apt to think we are something, when we are nothing. Though pride was never made for apostate man, yet there are sad remains of it in all of us.

[" How prone are ignorant sinners to trust to and depend on themselves! How gladly would they be their own saviour and happiness, and not be obliged to look out for something to recommend them to the divine favour and acceptance! The religion of Popery is too much the dictate of corrupt nature in all unrenewed men; but it is a temper abhorred of God, directly opposite to the true spirit of the Gospel and the stated method of our recovery and salvation. Man fell by pride, and the first right step towards his restoration must be in deep humiliation and poverty of spirit; for God resists the proud. The poor Publican that smote upon his breast, saying, 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' was justified before the proud Pharisee, who 'thanked God he was not as other men.'

["Secondly, This doctrine derogates from the merits of Jesus Christ. Though the Papists do not render them wholly useless and superfluous, yet, as some of them represent the matter, they were only necessary to procure the first grace for us; for after that, they tell us, we may merit for ourselves both increase of grace here, and eternal life hereafter. And is not this to set aside Christ and his merits, as of little use in the Christian life? Whereas we ought from first to last to 'live by the faith of the Son of God,' a life of constant dependence on his satisfaction and mediation. To say, as some of them do, that Christ merited that we might merit, or that by his merits our good works become meritorious, is a notion to me altogether strange and unintelligible. I can easily apprehend how it may be consistent with the perfections of God's nature and government, to accept the weak and imperfect services of such imperfect creatures as we are, for the sake of Christ's perfect righteousness and atonement; (and indeed I do not see how it would be becoming a righteous and holy God to accept of any thing but what was either perfect in itself, or for the sake of that which is so;) but how Christ's merits, which are without us, can make any intrinsic alteration in the works that are done by us, so that with them our works are meritorious, and without them are not, is what I cannot understand. They are intrinsically the same, whether we consider his merits or not. He merited for us, and is willing we should have the benefit of it; but it was never his design to make us our own saviour; we ought to abhor every doctrine that derogates from the honour of our blessed Redeemer, and would set us upon a level with him.

["Thirdly, This has a tendency to mislead men, in matters of the greatest moment and importance; for of what nature are the concerns of our eternal salvation. I fear those who conceit they have any meritorious works of their own, and trust in them, will be found to build upon the sand, and will meet with a fatal disappointment. It is true, our adversaries own, that these works must be the effect of justifying grace; but I greatly question whether any who have felt the power of divine grace, or know the grace of God in truth, can believe their works are of a meritorious nature; for true grace humbles the soul, and lays it low in the sight of God. It is evident, as I have already hinted, that the works they lay the greatest stress on, are of little account with him; they are, at best, but the dead form and image of religion. How dangerous must it be for men to build their hope upon such a foundation, to the neglect of Christ, serious, vital, and practical religion!

["Fourthly, This notion casts a damp upon, and destroys the hope of, the most humble and serious Christians. They have that deep sense of their own imperfection, weakness, and unworthiness, that if they were to have no more grace here, or glory hereafter, than what they could merit at the hand of God, they would soon lie down in sorrow and despair. Sometimes the number and aggravation of their sins are impressed with that weight upon their minds, that they find it difficult to believe there is grace enough in God, and merit enough in Christ, to pardon and save them. However, while they look upon eternal life as the gift of God and purchase of Christ, there are happy seasons when they entertain a lively prospect of it; but if it were to be their own purchase, they know so much against themselves, as would cut off all hope and expectation.

["I shall only add, that the doctrine of merit prepares the way, and lays a foundation, for several other Popish doctrines, which are of a pernicious nature; such as works of supererogation, pardons, and indulgences, and the like. If we cannot merit for ourselves, much less can we merit for others, by doing more than is necessary for our own salvation. What then will become of the stock of merit in the treasury of the Church, which, as you have heard, the Pope gives out upon several occasions to those who have no merit of their own, and can pay for it? Though the loss of these doctrines would be a manifest prejudice to His Holiness, and the whole army of Monks and Friars that have a dependence on him, yet I believe it will be no real detriment to the souls of men."*]

CHAPTER XII.

PURGATORY.

I. This Doctrine stated. 1. Introductory remark: 2. Authors cited. Creed of Pius IV. Dens. Council of Trent. The Roman Catechism. The Douay Catechism, &c. Caution of the Roman Catechism: 3. Enumeration of the points embraced in the foregoing quotations.—II. Purgatory is without foundation in Scripture. 1. Some Roman Catholics allow it is not supported by Scripture: 2. Not proved by 2 Macc. xii. 43; Isaiah xxii. 14: 3. Nor Matt. v. 25, 26: 4. Nor Matt. xii. 32: 5. Nor by Psalm lxii. 12; Matt. xvi. 27, &c.: 6. Nor 1 Cor. iii. 12—15: 7. Nor 1 Peter iii. 18—20.—III. The arguments brought to prove it considered. 1. Bishop Hay's argument answered: 2. Arguments to support it are dubious: 3. Dr. A. Clarke cited: 4. Argument from the Heathen poets considered.—IV Scripture is against the Doctrine. 1. Only two characters are mentioned: 2. The thief on the cross: 3. Case of the rich man and Lazarus: 4. Rev. xiv. 13: 5. Many texts inconsistent with it: 6. Is inconsistent with the doctrine of justification by faith: 7. Is contrary to the complete redemption procured by Christ: 8. Is derogatory to the office of the Spirit.—V. Testimony of the Fathers. 1. Some general remarks. The earlier Fathers did not teach it: (1.) None or but few of the Greek Fathers mention it; (2.) Though the Fathers often pray for the dead, they never pray for their deliverance out of purgatory; (3.) In what sense they mention fire as connected with futurity; (4.) Their sentiments subversive of the Popish notion; (5.) It was never avowed as an article of faith, or of apostolical tradition. Three reasons for this: 2. The testimony of the Fathers examined. Polycarp omits it. Ignatius. Irenæus. Justin Martyr. Cyprian. Chrysostom. Tertullian. Epiphanius. Gregory Nazianzen. Ambrose. Ephrem the Syrian. Augustine. Origen, &c.: 3. Many Romanists allow that the doctrine of purgatory was unknown in the primitive Church: 4. Sentiments of the Greek Church considered.—VI. Praying for the dead, as connected with purgatory.—VII. Its origin, progress, and establishment. 1. The Roman Catholic boast is vain concerning the antiquity of their religion:

[* John Newman's Sermon, preached at Salters'-Hall, March 20 1734, pp. 25—35.]

2. Plato's division of men into three classes: 3. Papists follow the errors of the Heathen in this point: 4. The early Christians did not receive the doctrine: 5. State of the question in the twelfth century.—VIII. ITS ABSURDITIES AND BAD CONSEQUENCES. 1. The doctrine is chiefly supported by apparitions and false miracles: 2. The place where situated, and its various departments: 3. The kind and degree of punishment: 4. Duration of the punishment. Copy of a release: 5. Roman Catholicism teaches that souls in purgatory are aided by the suffrages of the living. Suffrages defined. Popery considers this to be an article of faith. Not proved by 1 Cor. xii. 26. Nor 1 John v. 16, &c. Praying for the dead unauthorized. Absurdity of the doctrine instanced in a quotation from Dens: 6. Who they are who go to purgatory: 7. Is an article of faith: 8. Is supremely superstitious. Council of Trent cited in proof. Instances in burials. Difference between the poor and rich. Dens cited. Instance of this at Blairsville, Pennsylvania. Case of Dr. Young's daughter, in Spain: 9. The doctrine is a source of profit to the Romish Clergy. This attested by history. Gother's plea considered. Decision of Trent does not counteract this. Three reasons in proof. Purgatorian societies. Canting the corpse: 10. Purgatory makes merchandise of souls. Instance in Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania. Traffic in Spain. These are not abuses of the doctrine: 11. Is a powerful engine to work on the fears of an ignorant and superstitious people: 12. Is a gross and grievous falsehood: 13. Is pernicious to the souls of men: 14. And connects itself with the corrupt state of the Church of Rome, both in faith and morals.

I. This doctrine stated.

1. The Romish doctrine of justification being fundamentally erroneous and fatally defective, it follows of necessity that the sinner is constrained to seek for other means of salvation. To the errors on this point we may trace almost all the corruptions of Popery; especially the merit of works, intercessions of the saints, pilgrimages, penances, indulgences, masses for the dead, and purgatory. The Scriptures proclaim salvation by Christ alone, through faith which is productive of every good word and work, and a renunciation of all manner of sin. But the Romish view of justification declares this to be deficient: faith, according to them, will not suffice; while good works, penance, and suffering on the part of the sinner must make up that which is wanting, otherwise purgatory will be the lot of all whose meritorious works are found insufficient to atone for and to blot out the guilt and punishment of their venial sins, and the temporal punishment due to mortal sins which have already been pardoned by the Priest.

2. In order to exhibit this doctrine as held by the Papists, we quote from their established authorities.

The Creed of Pope Pius IV. briefly teaches: "I constantly hold that there is a purgatory, and that the souls therein detained are helped by the suffrages of the faithful."*

Dens, in his Theology, defines it thus: "It is a place in which the souls of the pious dead, obnoxious to temporal punishment, suffer enough, or make satisfaction."†

The Council of Trent, in its haste, perhaps, to finish its labours, published in its twenty-fifth session only a short decree, the former part of which is as follows:—"Since the Catholic Church, instructed by the Holy Spirit from the sacred writings and the ancient tradition of the Fathers, hath taught in holy Councils, and lastly in this œcumenical Council, that there is a purgatory; and that the souls detained there are assisted by the suffrages of the faithful, but especially by the acceptable sacrifice of the mass; this holy Council commands all Bishops diligently to endeavour that the wholesome doctrine concerning purgatory, delivered to us by venerable Fathers and sacred Councils, be believed, held, taught, and every where preached by Christ's faithful."*

In the sixth session, the thirtieth canon, then passed, reads as follows:—"If any one shall say that after the reception of the grace of justification the guilt is so remitted to the penitent sinner, and the penalty of eternal punishment destroyed, that no penalty of temporal punishment remains to be paid, either in this world, or in the future in purgatory, before the access to the kingdom of heaven can lie open; let him be accursed."†

In the twenty-second session it is declared: "Wherefore it (the sacrifice of the mass) is properly offered, according to apostolical tradition, not only for the sins, punishments, satisfactions, and other necessities of living believers, but also for the dead in Christ, who are not yet thoroughly purified."‡

In the same session it is said: "If any one shall affirm that the sacrifice of the mass is only a service of praise and thanksgiving, or a bare commemoration of the sacrifice made on the cross, and not a propitiatory offering; or that it only benefits him who receives it, and ought not to be offered for the living and the dead, for sins, punishments, satisfactions, and other necessities; let him be accursed."§

The Catechism of the Council of Trent gives the following cautious but evasive view of purgatory:—"In the fire of purgatory the souls of just men are cleansed by a temporary punishment, in order to be admitted into their eternal country, 'into which nothing defiled entereth.' The truth of this doctrine, founded, as holy Councils declare, on Scripture, and confirmed by apostolical tradition, demands diligent and frequent exposition, proportioned to the circumstances of the times in which we live, when men endure not sound doctrine."‖

[The following is from "The Grounds of the Catholic Doctrine contained in the Profession of Faith," published by Pope Pius IV., by way of question and answer:—

["Q. What is the doctrine of the Church of Rome as to this point (purgatory)?

["A. We constantly hold that there is a purgatory, and that the souls therein detained are helped by the suffrages of the faithful; that is, by the prayers and alms offered for them, and principally by the holy sacrifice of the mass.

["Q. What do you mean by purgatory?

[* "Constanter teneo purgatorium esse, animasque ibi detentas fidelium suffragiis juvari."—Bulla P. Pii IV., art. ix.]

[† "Quid est purgatorium?—R. Est locus, in quo animæ justorum defunctorum obnoxiæ pœnis temporalibus satis patiuntur."—Dens Theolog., tom. vii., Tract. de Quatuor Novissimis de Purgatorio, No. 25.]

* "Cum Catholica Ecclesia, Spiritu Sancto edocta, ex sacris literis, et antiqua patrum traditione, in sacris Conciliis, et novissime in hac œcumenica synodo docuerit, purgatorium esse; animasque ibi detentas, fidelium suffragiis, potissimum vero acceptabili altaris sacrificio juvari; præcipit sancta synodus Episcopis, ut sanam de purgatorio doctrinam a sanctis patribus, et sacris Conciliis traditam, a Christi fidelibus credi, teneri, doceri, et ubique prædicari diligenter studeant."—Conc. Trid., sess. xxv., Decretum de Purgatorio.

† "Si quis, post acceptam justificationis gratiam, cuilibet peccatori pœnitenti ita culpam remitti, et reatum æternæ pœnæ deleri, dixerit, ut nullus remaneat reatus pœnæ temporalis exsolvendæ vel in hoc seculo, vel in futuro, in purgatorio, antequam ad regna cœlorum aditus patere possit; anathema sit."—Conc. Trid., sess. vi., can. 30.

‡ "Quare non solum (sacrificium missæ) pro fidelium vivorum peccatis, pœnis, satisfactionibus, et aliis necessitatibus, sed et pro defunctis in Christo nondum ad plenum purgatis, rite, juxta apostolorum traditionem, offertur."—Idem, sess. xxii., caput ii.

§ "Si quis dixerit, missæ sacrificium tantum esse laudis et gratiarum actionis, aut nudam commemorationem sacrificii in cruce peracti, non autem propitiatorium; vel soli prodesse sumenti; neque pro vivis et defunctis, pro peccatis, pœnis, satisfactionibus et aliis necessitatibus offerri debere; anathema sit."—Idem, sess. xxii., can. 3.

‖ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 59.

[" A. A middle state of souls which depart this life in God's grace, yet not without some lesser stains or guilt of punishment, which retards them from entering heaven. But as to the particular place where these souls suffer, or the quality of the torments which they endure, the Church has decided nothing.

[" Q. What sort of Christians then go to purgatory?

[" A. (1.) Such as die guilty of lesser sins, which we commonly call venial; as many Christians do, who, either by sudden death or otherwise, are taken out of this life before they have repented for these ordinary failings. (2.) Such as having been formerly guilty of greater sins, have not made full satisfaction for them to divine justice.

[" Q. Why do you say that those who die guilty of lesser sins go to purgatory?

[" A. Because such as depart this life before they have repented of these venial frailties and imperfections, cannot be supposed to be condemned to the eternal torments of hell, since the sins of which they are guilty are but small, which even God's best servants are liable to. Nor can they go straight to heaven in this state, because the Scriptures assure us, 'There shall in no wise enter thither any thing that defileth.' (Rev. xxi. 27.) Now every sin, be it ever so small, certainly defileth the soul. Hence our Saviour assures us, 'that we are to give an account for every idle word.' (Matt. xii. 36.)"

[The above is a plain statement of the doctrine of purgatory, as laid down by authority of Pope Pius IV. There is then an attempt to prove the doctrine from "Scripture, tradition, and reason." I shall examine His Holiness's scriptural proofs by-and-by; those from tradition are scarcely worth examining; and as the argument from reason is comprehended in the answer to one question, I shall give it here, and trust to the understanding of every Protestant reader to furnish a satisfactory reply.

[" Q. How do you ground the belief of purgatory upon reason?

[" A. Because reason clearly teaches those two things: (1.) That all and every sin, how small soever, deserves punishment. (2.) That some sins are so small, either through the levity of the matter, or for want of full deliberation in the actor, as not to deserve eternal punishment; from whence it is plain, that besides the place of eternal punishment, which we call hell, there must be also a place of temporal punishment for such as die in little sins; and this we call purgatory."]

In the Douay Catechism the following exposition of purgatory is taught:—"Quest. Whither go such as die in mortal sin? Ans. To hell to all eternity.—Q. Whither go such as die in venial sin, or not having fully satisfied for the punishment due to their mortal sins? A. To purgatory, till they have made full satisfaction for them, and then to heaven."

[Alexander Natalis, one of the most distinguished casuists of Rome, writing on purgatory, and after endeavouring to describe what is of faith in this matter and what is not, resolves thus: "That it does not at all belong to faith. (1.) Concerning the place; whether it be in this world, or upon earth, or in the dark air, where the devils are; or in the hell of the damned, or in some place underneath, nearer the earth; that the souls are purged. (2.) Concerning the quality of those sensible pains which the souls held in purgatory undergo; whether it be true or corporeal fire, or whether darkness and sorrow, or any other torment and sorrow inflicted by the justice of God, punishing them after a wonderful and yet true manner. (3.) Concerning the duration of these purgatory pains; how long the souls are detained there. For though Soto thought that no soul continued in purgatory above ten years, yet it is a matter altogether uncertain how many years those pains shall last." *]

The preceding extracts will give some representation of the cardinal points of the doctrine in question. The Tridentine Council, however, both in its decisions and Catechism, has expressed itself hesitatingly on this doctrine; being doubtless aware that the scriptural and other grounds on which it was founded, were neither ample nor firm.

[The Rev. William J. Hall, in his excellent work entitled "The Doctrine of Purgatory, and the Practice of Praying for the Dead, as maintained by the Romish Church, examined," observes, "that the descriptions which have been given of this mysterious faith are remarkably loose and indefinite; but the combined declarations of many of the most approved Divines of the Romish Church, who are regarded by their brethren as little less than oracles of infallibility, will furnish the means of exhibiting a concise summary of the doctrine, as comprised under the following particulars:—

[" (i.) There is a purgatory.—Roman Catholics hold 'there is a purgatory,' that is to say, a place or state, where souls departing this life with remission of their sins, as to the guilt or eternal pain, but yet liable to some temporal punishment still remaining due, or not perfectly freed from the blemish of some defects which we call venial sins, are purged before their admittance into heaven, where nothing that is defiled can enter.†

[" (ii.) This purgatory is any third place, besides heaven and hell, whether it be Paradise, Hades, or Abraham's bosom.—'There are three places which departed souls inherit according to their different deserts; namely, hell, purgatory, heaven. In hell are the wicked, in purgatory those to be cleansed, in heaven the perfect. Those who are in hell cannot be redeemed, since in hell there is no redemption; those who are in purgatory wait for their redemption, after enduring torture, either from the heat of fire, or the intensity of cold, or severity of some pain; those who are in heaven rejoice in the vision of God. Since, therefore, the first cannot be redeemed, and the third stand in no need of redemption, the second, to whom we have been united by the bonds of humanity, become objects of our compassion.' ‡

[" 'What place,' Bishop Milner asks, 'must that be which our Saviour calls Abraham's bosom, where the soul of Lazarus reposed among the other just souls, till he by his sacred passion paid their ransom? Not heaven, otherwise Dives would have addressed himself to God instead of Abraham; but evidently a middle state. Again: Of what place is it St. Peter speaks, when he says, Christ preached to those spirits which were in prison? (1 Peter iii. 19.) It is evidently the same which is mentioned in the Apostles' Creed: He descended into hell; not the hell of

[* Gibson's Preservative against Popery, vol. ii., tit. viii., cap. vi., p. 116. Fol. London.]

[" † Berington, Faith of Catholics, p. 354. Second edition.

[" ‡ 'Tria sunt loca, quæ mortuorum animæ pro diversis meritis sortiuntur: infernus, purgatorium, cœlum. In inferno impii, in purgatorio purgandi, in cœlo perfecti. Qui in inferno sunt redimi non possunt, quia in inferno nulla est redemptio; qui in purgatorio sunt, expectant redemptionem, prius cruciandi aut calore ignis, aut rigore frigoris, aut alicujus gravitate doloris; qui in cœlo sunt, gaudio gaudent ad visionem Dei. Quia igitur primi redimi non possunt, tertii redemptione non indigent, restat ut ad medios transeamus per compassionem, quibus juncti fuimus per humanitatem.'—Bernardi Opera, tom. ii., Sermon. de Diversis, xlii., p. 234. Fol. Lugd., 1687.

the damned, to suffer their torments, but the prison above mentioned, or Abraham's bosom; in short, a middle state. The Prelate's (Porteus) diversified attempts to explain away these scriptural proofs of purgatory are really too feeble and inconsistent to merit being even mentioned.'*

["Both these Divines, (Wake and Tomline,) together with Pearson, Burnet, and numerous others, admit of an intermediate or third place for departed spirits, distinct from heaven and hell: now this place is what Catholics call purgatory.†

["With an inconsistency, for which the Protestant is not responsible, Abraham's bosom sometimes appears to have been considered as distinct from purgatory.

["'The souls of the pious,' says the Parochial Catechism, 'when they had departed this life, were, before Christ's death and resurrection, translated into Abraham's bosom, or, as still happens to those who have any thing to be cleansed and atoned, received expiation by the fire of purgatory.'‡

["(iii.) The local position of purgatory is near hell.—Cardinal Bellarmine says, 'The situation of purgatory, in which souls are cleansed, is adjacent to that in which the damned are punished.'§ And again: 'We hold that purgatory, hell, and the abodes of fathers and of children, are subterraneous places.'‖ Dens oracularly declares, that 'purgatory is situated under the earth, contiguous to hell.'¶ And Faber, the Romanist polemic, declares, that it 'is situated under the earth, near the centre, on the brink of hell.'

["(iv.) Purgatory is a PLACE, or, according to some, a STATE, for purifying departed souls between death and the resurrection.—Gregory the Great says, 'Nevertheless we must believe in the existence of a purgatorial fire, before the judgment, for certain light transgressions.'†† And Bellarmine asserted, that 'Origen erroneously extends the duration of purgatory beyond the day of resurrection.'‡‡

["(v.) That the souls confined in purgatory have left this world in a state of grace, but are subject to the punishment due to venial sins, of which the ETERNAL punishment has been REMITTED, and also to that which is due to mortal sins imperfectly expiated.—Hence the declaration of the Parochial Catechism: 'There is a purgatorial fire, in which the souls of the pious, having been tortured for a stated time, receive expiation.'§§ So also that of the Tridentine Synod: 'Whoever shall affirm, that when the grace of justification is received the offence of the penitent sinner is so forgiven, and the sentence of eternal punishment reversed, that there remains no temporal punishment to be endured before his entrance into the kingdom of heaven, either in this world, or in the future state in purgatory; let him be accursed.'* Again: 'Whoever shall affirm that the entire punishment is always remitted by God, together with the fault; and therefore that penitents need no other satisfaction than faith, whereby they apprehend Christ who has made satisfaction for them; let him be accursed.'†

["Gother, a writer of considerable repute with the Romanists, observes, that 'since the infinite goodness of God can admit nothing into heaven which is not clean and pure from all sin, both great and small; and his infinite justice can permit none to receive the reward of bliss who as yet are not out of debt, but have something in justice to suffer; there must of necessity be some place or state where souls departing this life, pardoned as to the eternal guilt or pain, yet obnoxious to some temporal penalty, or with the guilt of some venial faults, are purged and purified before their admittance into heaven.'‡

["On this subject Cardinal Bellarmine speaks explicitly: 'Purgatory is a certain place, in which, as in a dungeon, souls which have not been fully cleansed in this life are cleansed after it, to the intent that, having been so cleansed, they may have access into heaven, whither nothing defiled shall enter.'§ 'By the pains of purgatory, venial sin is expiated in respect of its guilt.'‖ 'Purgatory exists for those only who die in venial sins; .....and for those who depart this life with liability to punishment, their guilt having been already remitted.'¶

["Thomas Aquinas asserts, that 'it is inconsistent with the Catholic faith to deny a purgatory of faithful souls which have departed hence in a state of grace.' Cabbasutius declares: 'There is a certain place of purgatory, in which the souls of the faithful, departing in the favour of Christ, which have not yet made complete and adequate satisfaction for their faults by works worthy of repentance, are purified for a time by tortures.'†† And the Council of Florence, with respect to the purgatorial fire, determined, 'that the souls of the righteous receive a perfect crown in heaven, so far as they are spirits; that

["* 'Si quis, post acceptam justificationis gratiam, cuilibet peccatori pœnitenti ita culpam remitti, et reatum æternæ pœnæ deleri, dixerit, ut nullus remaneat reatus pœnæ temporalis exsolvendæ, vel in hoc seculo vel in futuro, in purgatorio, antequam ad regna cœlorum aditus patere possit; anathema sit.'—Conc. Trid., sess. vi., cap. xvi., can. 30. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

["† 'Si quis dixerit, totam pœnam simul cum culpa remitti semper a Deo, satisfactionemque pœnitentium non esse aliam, quam fidem, qua apprehendunt Christum pro eis satisfecisse; anathema sit.'—Idem, sess. xiv., cap. viii., can. 12.

["‡ A Papist Misrepresented and Represented; or, a twofold Character of Popery. By John Gother. Pp. 114, 115. Dublin, 1792.

["§ 'Purgatorium est locus quidam, in quo tanquam in carcere, post hanc vitam purgantur animæ, quæ in hac non plene purgatæ fuerunt; ut nimirum sic purgatæ in cœlum ingredi valeant, quo nihil intrabit coinquinatum.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Purgat., lib. i., cap. i. Fol. Colon., 1628.

["‖ 'Per pœnas purgatorii peccatum veniale expiatur etiam quoad culpam.'—Idem, lib. ii., cap. vi.

["¶ 'Purgatorium pro iis tantum esse, qui cum venialibus culpis moriuntur;.....et pro illis qui decedunt cum reatu pœnæ, culpis jam remissis.'—Idem, lib. ii., cap. i.

[" 'Est a fide Catholica alienum negare purgatorium fidelium animarum, quæ hinc in statu gratiæ decesserint.'—Thom. Aquinat. Summa Theol. Suppl., quæst. 100, De Purg. Duaci., 1614.

["†† 'Aliquem esse purgatorii locum, in quo fidelium in Christi gratia decedentium animæ, quæ necdum dignis pœnitentiæ operibus pro culpis de integro et ex æquo satisfecerunt, cruciatibus ad tempus expurgantur.'—Cabassutii Notit. Conc. Flor., cap. xcii., p. 64. Lugd., 1670.

["‡‡ 'Error est Origenis, qui extendit tempora purgatorii ultra diem resurrectionis.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. ix. Fol. Colon., 1628.

["§§ 'Est purgatorius ignis, quo piorum animæ ad definitum tempus cruciatæ expiantur.'—Catech. ad Paroch., p. 72. Lugd., 1579.

["* End of Controversy, Letter lv., p. 369. Eighth edition.

["† Idem, p. 377.

["‡ 'Piorum animæ, quum e vivis excessissent, vel in sinum Abrahæ deferrebantur, vel, quod etiam nunc iis contingit quibus aliquid diluendum et persolvendum est, purgatorii igne expiabantur.'—Catech. ad Paroch., p. 74. Lugd., 1579.

["§ 'Purgatorius locus, in quo animæ purgantur, est conjunctus ei, in quo damnati puniuntur.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. ii., p. 406. Fol. Colon., 1628.

["‖ 'Habemus purgatorium, infernum, ac limbos patrum et puerorum, loca subterranea esse.'—Idem, cap. vi., p. 410.

["¶ 'Ubinam est purgatorium? Ordinarius purgatorii locus, qui proprie et communiter nomine purgatorii intelligitur, est sub terra, vicinus inferno."—Dens Theol., tom. vii., De Loco Purgatorii ejusque Pœnis, No. 27.

[" 'Purgatorium est sub terra, versus centrum, ad ripam inferni.'—Faber. Disputat., tom. ii., pp. 448, 449. Paris, 1720.

["†† 'Sed tamen de quibusdam levibus culpis esse ante judicium purgatorius ignis credendus est.'—Greg. Max. Opera, tom. ii., Dialog., lib. iv., cap. xxxix., col. 441. Fol. Paris, 1705.

["‡‡ 'Error est Origenis, qui extendit tempora purgatorii ultra diem resurrectionis.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. ix. Fol. Colon., 1628.

["§§ 'Est purgatorius ignis, quo piorum animæ ad definitum tempus cruciatæ expiantur.'—Catech. ad Paroch., p. 72. Lugd., 1579.

those of sinners endure unalterable punishment; and that those between the two are in a place of torment; but whether it be fire, or storm, or any thing else, we do not dispute.'*

["(vi.) The punishment of purgatory consists in deprivation of the beatific vision of God, and in actual suffering, which is inflicted by material fire, of the same nature with our elementary fire. It is said, indeed, that the punishment by fire in purgatory differs not from that in hell, except in duration.—On this point the Romish Catechism is again referred to.† Cardinal Bellarmine informs us, that 'it is the general opinion of theologians, that the fire of purgatory is a true and proper fire, and of the same quality with our elementary fire;'‡ that 'almost all theologians teach that the damned, and the souls in purgatory, are in the same place, and tortured in the same fire;'§ that 'it is certain that one punishment of purgatory is the want of the divine vision; that, besides this punishment, there is also some other, which theologians call pain of sense; and that there is in purgatory, as in hell, a punishment of fire; whether that fire be understood literally, or metaphorically, and whether it signifies punishment of sense, or of loss, as some suppose.'‖ Gregory, on the authority of Thomas Aquinas, says, 'That as beneath the same fire gold brightens and straw smothers, so beneath the same fire the sinner is burned, and the elect cleansed;'¶ and the seraphic Doctor himself declares, that 'purgatory is a place beneath, adjacent to hell, so that it is the same fire which tortures the damned in hell, and cleanses the just in purgatory.' Delahogue, whose theological writings have long constituted a popular class-book in the College of Maynooth, asserts, that 'theologians commonly believe that souls are tortured in some kind of fire.'†† Bouvier, a celebrated Romish casuist, informs us, that 'the general opinion of the Latins is, that in purgatory there is a material fire similar to the infernal fire; and, therefore, that the Church, in praying for the souls of the faithful, asks not only for a place of light and peace, but also of refreshing; that is to say, from the heat of the fire;'‡‡ and Bellarmine certifies, that 'Cardinal Cajetan rightly explains, that the punishment which remains to be expiated after the remission of guilt, is that very same sensible punishment which the sinner ought to suffer in hell; its eternity only being removed.'*

["(vii.) The severity of the punishment of purgatory exceeds the most bitter pains that mortals can conceive.—The Catechism declares, that 'the punishment of purgatory surpasses all temporal punishment of this life.'† Bellarmine informs us, that 'the Fathers constantly teach that the punishments of purgatory are most excruciating, and that no pains of this life are to be compared with them;' and again, that 'the fire of purgatory is most bitter.'‡

["(viii.) The duration of the punishment of purgatory varies according to the number of venial sins to be expiated, or according to the plenitude of prayers, alms, and masses offered for the liberation of suffering souls.—John Peckham, Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Edward I., says, 'Let not the officiating Minister believe that by saying a single mass he is able to make satisfaction for two persons, when he has promised to celebrate one specially and separately for each. Far be it from any Catholic to believe that one mass devoutly celebrated can so essentially benefit a thousand men, for whom, perchance, it may be said, as if a thousand masses were sung for them with the like devotion.'§ Cardinal Bellarmine does not hesitate in asserting, that 'one person is liberated from the punishment of purgatory sooner than another;' and, says he, 'Catholics teach that the temporal punishments of another life, which are to be undergone in purgatory, may be bought off by fastings, prayers, almsgiving, and the other pious and laborious works of this life.'‖

["(ix.) The punishment of purgatory is endured as satisfaction to God's justice.—In an elementary, or catechetical work on Popish doctrines, it is declared: 'Such as die in venial sin, or not having fully satisfied for the temporal punishments due to their mortal sins which are forgiven them, go to purgatory till they have made full satisfaction for them, and then to heaven.'¶

["(x.) Masses are also offered as SATISFACTIONS for sins both of THE DEAD and the living, and are most efficacious.—The Council of Trent decreed: 'Whoever shall affirm that the sacrifice of the mass is only a service of praise and thanksgiving, or a bare commemoration of the ["† Catech. ad Paroch., p. 72, Lugd., 1579.

["* 'Περι δε του καθαρτηριου πυρος ελυθη ούτως· ότι αί ψυχαι των δικαιων τελεον απελαθον τον στεφανον ἐν ουρανοις, καθοσον εισι ψυχαι· και των ἁμαρτωλων την τελειαν κολασιν· αί δε μεσαι ὑπαρχουσι μεν εν βασανιστηριῳ, και ειτε πυρ εστιν, ειτε ζοφος και δυελλα, ειτε τι ἑτερον, ου διαφερομεθα.' —Conc. Florent., (A.D. 1439,) apud Labb., tom. xiii., col. 492. Paris, 1672.

["‡ 'Communis sententia theologorum est, verum et proprium esse ignem (purgatorii), et ejusdem speciei cum nostro elementari.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. xi. Colon., 1628.

["§ 'Theologi fere omnes docent eodem in loco esse, et eodem igne torqueri, damnatos et animas purgatorii.'—Idem, cap. vi.

["‖ 'Certum est etiam, unam purgatorii pœnam esse carentium divinæ visionis. Certum est præter hanc pœnam esse etiam aliquam aliam, quam theologi vocant pœnam sensus. Certum est in purgatorio, sicut etiam in inferno, esse pœnam ignis, sive iste ignis accipiatur proprie, sive metaphorice, et sive significet pœnam sensus, sive damni, ut quidam volunt.'—Ibid., cap. x.

["¶ 'Gregorius dicit quod sicut sub eodem igne aurum rutilat, et palea fumat, ita sub eodem igne peccator crematur, et electus purgatur.'—Thom. Aquin. Supplem., quæst. c., art. 2, p. 166. Duaci, 1614.

[" 'Purgatorium est locus inferior, inferno conjunctas, ita quod idem ignis sit, qui damnatos cruciat in inferno, et qui justos in purgatorio purgat.'—Idem, in Conclusione.

["†† 'Igne aliquo torquentur, ut communiter sentiunt theologi.' —Delahogue, de Pœnitentia, p. 304.

["‡‡ 'Constans Latinorum sententia est, in purgatorio esse ignem materialem similem igni infernali, et ideo Ecclesiam, pro animabus fidelium orantem, non petere tantum locum lucis et pacis sed et refrigerii, videlicet contra ignis ardorem.'—Bouvier, de Pœnitentia, p. 235.

["* 'Nam (ut recte explicat Card. Cajetan in Tract. de Contritione, quæst. 4) pœna illa quæ luenda restat post culpæ remissionem, est illa ipsa pœna sensus, quam in gehenna pati debuisset peccator, remota solum æternitate.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iii.; De Pœnitentia, lib. iv., cap. i. Colon., 1628.

["† 'Pœna purgatorii excedit omnem pœnam temporalem hujus vitæ.'—Catech. ad Paroch., p. 74. Lugd., 1579.

["‡ 'Pœnas purgatorii esse atrocissimas, et cum illis nullas pœnas hujus vitæ comparandas, constanter docent Patres.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. xiv. Colon., 1628. 'Ignem acerrimum purgatorii.'—Ibid., lib. i., cap. xi.

["§ 'Non credat celebrans se dicendo missam unam posse satisfacere pro duobus, pro quorum utroque promisit specialiter et in solidum celebrare. Absit enim ne a quocumque Catholico credatur, tantum intensive proficere missam unam devote celebratam mille hominibus, pro quibus forsan dicitur, quam si mille missæ pro eis devotione consimili canerentur.'—Constitut. Joh. Peckham, apud Wilkins Concil., vol. ii., p. 52. Edit. Lond., 1737.

["‖ 'A pœna purgatorii unus citius alio liberatur.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. ii. Colon., 1628. 'Catholici docent pœnas temporales alterius vitæ, quæ in purgatorio luendæ essent, redimi posse jejuniis, precibus, eleemosynis, aliisque piis ac laboriosis operibus hujus vitæ.'—Idem, tom. iii., lib. iv., cap. iii.

["¶ An Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine, cum permissu Superiorum, p. 110. Dublin. R. Grace, 1828.

sacrifice made on the cross, and not a propitiatory offering; or that it only benefits him who receives it, and ought not to be offered for the living and the dead for sins, punishments, satisfactions, and other necessities; let him be accursed.'* Bishop Hay declares, that 'although the souls in purgatory can do nothing of themselves to ease or shorten their sufferings, yet such is the goodness of God, that, in consideration of the union and charity which he so strictly requires among the members of his church, the body of Christ, and of that communion of saints which he himself has established among them, he is pleased to accept of the prayer, sacrifices, and good works of the faithful upon earth, when offered up by them for the souls departed; and, on that account, relieves their pains, and grants them a more speedy deliverance from them.'†

["(xi.) God has instituted purgatory as a channel for conveying his grace into the souls of men.—The Roman Catholic Church, says Dr. Rock, 'teaches that God himself has instituted certain channels for the conveyance of his grace into the souls of men, and requires certain conditions absolutely requisite, before he will allow the all-sufficient and superabundant merits of Christ Jesus to be imparted to them; such are faith, repentance, and the sacraments for the living: to which is added, purgatory for those who leave this world in God's favour, but still with some venial imperfections to be atoned.'‡

["(xii.) Souls in purgatory experience incredible consolation, and undergo their punishments willingly, in the assured hope of their final salvation, and their freedom from liability to eternal punishment.—On this point Cardinal Bellarmine has been explicit: he says, 'It is the general opinion of Divines, that all the souls which are in purgatory have assurance of their salvation.'§ 'United with the severest torments, souls in purgatory enjoy incredible consolation, on account of their certain hope of salvation.'‖ 'Souls, during purification, submit to their punishments willingly, inasmuch as they know it to be a condition that without them they shall never attain to happiness.'¶ 'The purgatorial fire liberates from liability to punishment.'

["(xiii.) Newly-baptized persons, martyrs, and those who die immediately after absolution from a Priest, go directly to heaven.—Among the records of the proceedings of the Council of Florence we meet with the following passage:—'These were the matters which came under discussion concerning purgatory, on certain days; and the Greeks agreed with the Latin Fathers on these points; namely, that if the truly penitent depart hencein the love of God, before they have made satisfaction for sins of commission and omission by fruits meet for repentance, their souls after death are cleansed by the pains of purgatory; and the suffrages of the faithful still alive, such as sacrifices of the mass, prayers, and alms, and other works of piety, which they have been accustomed to offer in accordance with the institutions of the Church, contribute to the relief of such pains: and that the souls of those who, after receiving holy baptism, have contracted no stain of sin; or, after contracting a stain of sin, have been cleansed, either in their bodies, or apart from them, are forthwith received into heaven, and clearly behold the triune God himself, as he is, although one may behold him more perfectly than another: but that the souls of those who depart in actual mortal sin, or only in original sin, immediately descend into hell, where they will be visited with different degrees of punishment.'*

["Cardinal Bellarmine, referring to the proceedings of the above-mentioned Synod, writes, that 'in the last session of the Council of Florence, it was defined that some souls are presently received into hell, some into purgatory, some into heaven. Moreover, the Church has always believed that those who die immediately after baptism cannot feel the pain of purgatory, as Augustine positively teaches; and in like manner, those who are baptized in their own blood, as Cyprian says; for he affirms that all sins are cleansed by suffering; and that, therefore, martyrs immediately attain to their reward.'†

["Dr. Goodman (see Bishop Gibson's Preservative, tit. viii., chap. i., p. 17) observes, that 'if the most lewd and habitual sinner have but the good fortune to go out of the world under the blessing of his ghostly father, that is to say, either death come so soon after his last absolution, or the Priest come so opportunely after his last sin, that he hath not begun a new score, he is sure to go to heaven without more ado.'

["On this point" Mr. Hall very justly observes, that Dr. Goodman "refers to no authority; and it should seem that, although sound reasoning would lead to such a conclusion, the Romish Church decides otherwise as to absolution generally. Thus Bellarmine writes:—

["'Before baptism satisfaction is not required, since, by the plenary application of the blood of Christ in baptism, all sins are washed away, not only with respect to the guilt, but with respect to punishment in another life, whether eternal or temporal: but after baptism, satisfaction becomes necessary; for though the guilt and eternal punishment of sin is remitted by priestly absolution, the

["* 'Si quis dixerit, missæ sacrificium tantum esse laudis et gratiarum actionis, aut nudam commemorationem sacrificii in cruce peracti, non autem propitiatorium; vel soli prodesse sumenti, neque pro vivis et defunctis, pro peccatis, pœnis, satisfactionibus, et aliis necessitatibus offerri debere; anathema sit.'—Concil. Trid., sess. xxii., can. 3.

["† Sincere Christian, vol. ii., pp. 115, 116.

["‡ Hierurgia, or, the holy Sacrifice of the Mass, by Daniel Rock, D.D., vol. ii., p. 486. Booker, London, 1833.

["§ 'Communis theologorum sententia est, omnes animas, quæ in purgatorio sunt, habere certitudinem suæ salutis.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. 4. Colon., 1628.

["‖ 'Habent admixtam cum summis cruciatibus incredibilem consolationem propter certam spem salutis.'—Idem, pp. 408, 409.

["¶ 'Animæ quæ purgantur, habent voluntatem conditionatam suarum pœnarum, quatenus sciunt sese sine illis non venturas ad beatitudinem.'—Idem, cap. ii., p. 406.

[" 'Ignis purgatorius liberat a reatu pœnæ.'—Idem.

["* 'Hæc fuere quæ de purgatorio prodita sunt, diebus certis adinvicem discussa, et Græci cum Latinis Patribus in hanc cedulam convenere:—Si vere pœnitentes in Dei caritate decesserint, antequam dignis pœnitentiæ fructibus de commissis satisfecerint, et de omissis, eorum animas pœnis purgatoriis post mortem purgari, et ad pœnas hujusmodi relevandas prodesse eis fidelium vivorum suffragia; missarum scilicet sacrificia, orationes, et eleemosynas, et alia pietatis officia, quæ a fidelibus fieri consueverunt, secundum Ecclesiæ instituta; illorumque animas, qui post sacrum baptisma susceptum, nullam omnino peccati maculam incurrerunt, illas etiam quæ post contractam peccati maculam, vel in suis corporibus, vel eisdem exutæ, prout superius dictum est, sunt purgatæ; in cœlum mox recipi, et intueri clare ipsum Deum trinum et unum, sicuti est, licet alius alio perfectius: illorum autem animas qui in mortali actuali peccato, vel solo originali decedunt, mox in infernum descendere; pœnis tam disparibus puniendas.'—Concil. Labb., tom. xiii.; Concil. Florent., col. 1135. Paris, 1672.

["‡ 'In Concilio Florentino (sess. ult.) definitum est, aliquas animas in infernum, aliquas in purgatorium, aliquas in cœlum mox recipi; deinde Ecclesia semper credidit eos, qui mox a baptismo moriuntur, nullam purgatorii pœnam sentire posse, ut constanter Augustinus docet, lib. xxi., de Civitate Dei, cap. 26: et similiter eos, qui baptizantur in sanguine suo, ut Cyp., lib. iv., cap. 2, dicit: omnia enim peccata passione purgari affirmat, et ideo martyres statim ad præmium pervenire.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. i., p. 405. Colon., 1628.

whole temporal punishment of sin in another life is not.'*

["Now absolution," continues Mr. Hall, "which imparts the merits of Christ by the ministry of the Priest, accompanies both the Romish sacraments of penance and extreme unction; and, though the Cardinal maintains that the efficacy of Christ's blood is less perfect in one sacrament than another,† it is altogether impossible to perceive any rational ground for this distinction. The true reason may possibly be found in the fact, that as extreme unction is equally administered to the Prince and the peasant, if they were thereby fully absolved from the penalty of sin, there would be no need of masses for the more speedy deliverance of the former, though probably the greater sinner of the two, from the pains of purgatory. At the same time, although Dr. Goodman has given no reference, it may be possible that he had something like the following in view:—

["'By the authority committed to me, I absolve thee from all your sins that you have committed against God, whether by human frailty, ignorance, or malice, granting you full remission and indulgence of all your sins, as well those sins you have not confessed or have forgotten, as those you have confessed. Also, by the same authority, I absolve thee from the pains of purgatory which you have deserved for your sins and transgressions committed in this world, restoring you to that state of innocence in which you were after you were baptized; and if you should not die at this time, I reserve or extend this grace to you to the last moment of your life.'‡

["The same doctrines are inculcated in the Catechism of the Council of Trent:—'The Redeemer instituted the sacrament of penance, in which we cherish a well-founded hope that our sins are forgiven us by the absolution of the Priest; and the faith which we justly have in the efficacy of the sacraments, has much influence in tranquillizing the troubled conscience and giving peace to the soul. The voice of the Priest, who is legitimately constituted a Minister for the remission of sins, is to be heard as that of Christ himself, who said to the lame man, Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee.' § 'The absolution of the Priest which is expressed in words, seals, therefore, the remission of sins which it accomplishes in the soul.' ‖ 'Unlike the authority given to the Priests of the old law, to declare the leper cleansed from his leprosy, (Lev. xiii. 9.; xiv. 2,) the power with which the Priests of the new law are invested, is not simply to declare that sins are forgiven, but, as the Ministers of God, really to absolve from sin, a power which God himself, the Author and Source of grace and justification, exercises through their ministry.' ¶

["(xiv.) Souls in purgatory can neither merit nor sin.—According to the language of Bellarmine: 'In purgatory souls can neither merit nor sin.'*

["(xv.) The doctrine of purgatory is an article of the Christian faith.†

["(xvi.) He who does not believe there is a purgatory will be damned.—Hence the language of Bellarmine: 'We again positively assert, that purgatory is an article of the faith; so much so, that he who does not believe that there is a purgatory, will never arrive at it, but will be tortured with everlasting fire in hell.'‡

["Such is purgatory" as defined by the Romanist Divines, in which representation the following points are very conspicuous, and which must be borne in mind during our investigation of the subject; namely, that "purgatory is a place, and not merely a state of suffering, as some would desire to explain it; that it is not merely a state of internal compunction or remorse, for having offended God, but a place in which is endured actual and external affliction; that it is a prison; that in it there is a real fire; that souls there detained are tortured as well as cleansed; and that the souls of the pious only—'truly penitent and justified sinners'—enter that temporary but dreadful abode." §]

3. From the above it is evident that the persons detained in purgatory, according to the theology of Rome, "are the dead in Christ," "just men," or, in other words, those who, in the Popish sense, are such: (1.) Those whose mortal sins have been pardoned, either by baptism or by priestly absolution. (2.) The sins for which they are punished in purgatory are their venial sins, which it is said deserve temporal punishment only; to which must also be added the temporal punishment due for mortal sins already pardoned, as it regards their eternal punishment, that is supposed to have been remitted by absolution or baptism. (3.) The mode of deliverance is twofold: first, by personal suffering till the very last mite of the debt due to God's justice is paid; and, secondly, by the interference of the Church, which is displayed in several ways; namely, (i.) The procuring of masses to be said for them. (ii.) Indulgences. And, (iii.) The suffrages or votes of the faithful, variously given, by prayers, offerings, purchasing masses, &c. As it regards the place, the nature of the punishment, and its duration, and other kindred topics, the principal Roman Catholic authors and decisions, as we have seen, are very careful in giving opinions. But at the confessional, in public discourses on purgatory, in the common books of devotion, and in the traditions which float among the members of this Church, all that an avaricious priesthood could desire, and all that the most credulous superstition can entertain, are taught and practised respecting this doctrine; which assertion we shall endeavour to establish by irrefragable proof.

II. The doctrine of purgatory is without foundation in Scripture.

1. The Council of Trent affirms, that it is taught by Scripture and tradition, as well as by Councils, and that ["* 'Ante baptismum non exigitur satisfactio, cum Christi sanguine, per baptismum plenissime applicato, purgentur peccata omnia, non solum quoad culpam, sed etiam quoad pœnam alterius vitæ, tum æternam, tum temporariam; post baptismum autem necessaria satisfactio est, quoniam per absolutionem sacerdotalem remittitur quidem culpa et pœna æterna, sed non tota pœna temporalis alterius vitæ.'—Idem, tom iii.; De Pœnitent., lib. iii., cap. ix., p. 304; et lib. i., cap. iii., p. 243. Colon., 1628.

["† Idem, lib. iv., cap. xiv., p. 309.

["‡ Form of general absolution in the last page of the Roman Breviary, peculiar to the Franciscan Order, quoted in Lectures on the distinguishing Doctrines of the Church of Rome, by the Rev. T. W. Dixon, formerly a Priest in the Church of Rome, educated at the Royal College of Maynooth, and now Curate of St. Peter's, Drogheda, p. 118. Dublin, 1828.

["§ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 256.

["‖ Idem, p. 257

["¶ Idem, p. 259.

["* 'In purgatorio non posse animas mereri aut peccare.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. 2. Colon., 1628.

["† Thom. Aquinat. Summa. Theol. Suppl., quæst. 100; De Purg., Duaci, 1614; Concil. Trid., sess. xxv.; Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 59.

["‡ 'Constanter iterum asserimus, dogma esse fidei purgatorium, adeo ut, qui non credit purgatorium esse ad illud nunquam sit perventurus, sed in gehenna sempiterno incendio cruciandus.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. 15. Colon., 1628."

[§ Hall on the Doctrine of Purgatory, p. 6.]

through the teaching of the Holy Spirit.* That it is not taught by the Scriptures will appear by an examination of those portions of the sacred volume which are advanced in its support. Of this several Divines of the Church of Rome were so convinced, that they did not hesitate to assert the fact in their writings. Otho Frisingensis, in the year 1146, an old historian and a Roman Catholic Bishop, who was contemporary with St. Bernard, informs us in his Chronicon: "The doctrine of purgatory was first built upon the credit of those fabulous dialogues attributed to Gregory I.,† about the year 600."‡ Bishop Fisher also saith: "Many are tempted now-a-days not to rely much on indulgences, for this consideration, that the use of them appears to be new and very lately known among Christians. To which I answer, It was not very certain who was the first author of them; the doctrine of purgatory was a long time unknown; was rarely, if at all, heard of among the ancients; and to this day the Greeks believe it not. Nor was the belief of either purgatory or indulgences so necessary in the primitive church as it is now: so long as men were unconcerned about purgatory, nobody inquired after indulgences." But as several texts of Scripture have been alleged to support the doctrine of purgatory, we shall proceed to examine them; for, however destitute of Scripture proof this doctrine is, the Romanists do not fail in this, as in other unscriptural tenets, to quote the word of God with confidence, as though by it these doctrines were established.

[In entering upon this important part of our task, we shall largely avail ourselves of the elaborate and invaluable work of the Rev. William John Hall, M. A., Rector of the united parishes of St. Benet and St. Peter, London, entitled, "The Doctrine of Purgatory and the Practice of Praying for the Dead examined," &c., in which the industrious author has displayed much patient research and great fidelity, not only in the authorities which he has adduced, but also in the conclusions at which he has arrived: on these accounts the volume will be of most essential service in the Popish controversy, and ought to be diligently studied by all who are "set for the defence of the Gospel."

["The grounds upon which the doctrine of purgatory is maintained,—were their solidity equal to the confidence with which they are laid down,—would be sufficient to establish any article of faith whatsoever: but will they stand the test of a rigid examination? and what is the validity of the arguments from Scripture, antiquity, and reason, which are adduced in their support?

[* Concil. Trid., sess. xxv.; Decret. de Purgatorio. Vide supra.]

[† "'Pope Gregory says that Germanus, Bishop of Capua, saw the soul of Paschasius, the Deacon, boiling in the hot baths of St. Angelo. St. Bernard never could decide whether the pains of purgatory were inflicted by fire, by ice, or by some other agent.'—Greg. Opera, tom. ii., Dial., lib. iv., cap. xl., lv., col. 444, 464, Paris, 1705; Bernardi Opera, tom. ii.; De quinque Negotiationibus et quinque Regionibus, p. 234, Fol. Lugd., 1687. 'One would wish, for Gregory's sake, that this work (the Dialogues) were none of his performance; but there is too good evidence of his being the author. There is in it such a mixture of fanaticism, credulity, and puerility, as would be astonishing and disgraceful in any man of any age.'—Clarke's Chronological Succession of Sacred Literature, vol. ii., p. 360. 'In some things Pope Gregory the Great discovered the most shameful and superstitious weakness.'—Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., cent. vi., part ii., chap. ii., sect. ix. See also the nonsense gravely related out of Bede and Bernard by Bellarmine, De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. xiv. Additional illustrations may be found ad nauseam in J. H. Hottinger's Hist. Sac. N. T., sect. xiii., pp. 447—454, and sect. xiv., p. 818, Tigur., 1653; and in Edgar's Variations of Popery, pp. 455—458, London, 1838."—Hall on the Doctrine of Purgatory.]

‡ Taylor's Works, vol. x., p. 150, et seq. 8vo. edition.

["The main prop upon which the advocates of purgatorial punishment rely, is derived from the conduct of Judas Maccabeus,* after his victory over Gorgias, the governor of Idumea. Having put the enemy to flight, he is reported to have visited the field of battle, in order to superintend the burial of those who had fallen in the fight. 'Now, under the coats of every one that was slain, they found things consecrated to the idols of the Jamnites, which is forbidden the Jews by the law. Then every man saw that this was the cause wherefore they were slain. All men therefore praising the Lord, the righteous Judge, who had opened the things that were hid, betook themselves unto prayer, and besought him that the sin committed might wholly be put out of remembrance. Besides that, noble Judas exhorted the people to keep themselves from sin, forsomuch as they saw before their eyes the things that came to pass for the sins of those that were slain. And when he had made a gathering throughout the company, to the sum of two thousand drachms of silver, he sent it to Jerusalem to offer a sin-offering, doing therein very well and honestly, in that he was mindful of the resurrection; (for if he had not hoped that they that were slain should have risen again, it had been superfluous and vain to pray for the dead;) and also, in that he perceived that there was great favour laid up for those that died godly. It was an holy and good thought. Whereupon he made a reconciliation for the dead, that they might be delivered from sin.'† (2 Macc. xii. 32—46.)

["Admitting for a moment the inference deduced from this favourite passage thus given at length, it might be reasonably expected, that when an article of faith is proposed for reception, upon the belief of which salvation is stated to depend,‡ that the book alleging scriptural authority for such belief should, in point of inspiration, be unexceptionable. Instead of this, a reference is made to one of those apocryphal writings, which were never admitted into the Jewish canon;§ were never appealed to by Christ or his Apostles, as doctrinal or prophetical; the contradictions and inconsistencies of which deprive them of all claim to a divine original. The particular book, in which the passage is found, commends self-murder; (xiv. 42;) and the entire series exhibit certain decisive marks, which justify their rejection from the canon of Scripture by Eusebius, || by Athanasius, by Cyril of

["* Dr. Milner's End of religious Controversy, letter lv., p. 368. London, Andrews.

["Dr. Wiseman's Lectures, vol. ii., lect. xi., p. 54. London, Booker, 1836.

["Dr. Butler's Truths of the Catholic Religion proved from Scripture alone, vol. ii., p. 266. London, Booker, 1838.

["The Poor Man's Catechism, p. 244. Dublin, Coyne, 1838.

["A Papist Misrepresented and Represented. By the Rev. J. Gother. Republished by the late Dr. Challoner. P. 51. London, Keating, 1832.

["Husenbeth's Faberism Exposed, p. 538. Norwich, 1836.

["† See also Josephus, Antiq., lib. xii., cap. 12.

["‡ See Article xvi., p. 246, ut supra.

["§ Popery, or Mystical Jericho: a Sermon by W. J. Hall, pp. 20—22. London, Wix, 1840. See also the History of Popery, vol. i., pp. 201—217, London, 1735; Usher's Body of Divinity, p. 14, A. D. 1649; Horne's Introd., vol. i., p. 457; (edit. 1839;) and the word 'Apocrypha' in Brown's Dictionary of the Bible.

["Bellarmin. de Verbo Dei, lib. i., cap. x., tom. i., p. 10, E. De Purg., lib. i., cap. iii., tom. ii., p. 391, F.

["‖ Euseb. lib. iii., cap. x. Athanas. Epist. ad Ruffin. xxxix. Oper. tom. ii., p. 39, D. Paris, 1627, et Synopsis Sacræ Scripturæ, tom. ii., p. 58, D. Cyril. Hier. Catech. iv., pp. 37, 38, Paris, 1631. Hilar. Prolog. ad Psalmos, cap. xv., col. 9, Paris, 1693. Epiph. Lib. de Pond. et Mens., tom. ii., cap. iv., p. 162, C. Paris, 1622. Greg. Naz. Carm. 33, tom. ii., p. 98, D. Paris, 1630. See Paul's Hist. of the Council of Trent, p. 143, edit. 1676, by Brent.

Jerusalem, by Hilary, by Epiphanius, by Gregory, by St. Jerome,* by Augustine,† by Ruffinus of Aquileia,‡ by Gregory the Great; § and, in later times, by Cardinal Ximenes,‖ Cajetan,¶ and Erasmus, by the Council of Carthage A.D. 252, and by that of Laodicea in the year 364.* But let us examine the story as it stands.

["* 'Maccabæorum libros legit quidem Ecclesia, sed eos inter canonicas Scripturas non recipit.'—Hieron. in Prol. Proverb. 'The Church reads the books of the Maccabees, but does not receive them among the canonical Scriptures.' Nor, indeed, is it likely that a mere abridger of Jason's five books should be an inspired writer. (Chap. ii. 19.) See Bishop Cosin's Scholastic History of the Canon of Scripture, nn. lxx., lxxi., &c. London, 1657.

["'We have in this century (A.D. 451) the General Council of CHALCEDON, under Martianus the Emperor, and in the time of Pope Leo I., consisting of one hundred and thirty Bishops, which received the Code of the Church universally in use before them, and by their first canon confirmed it. In that Code, often mentioned in this Council, were contained among others the canons of Laodicea, wherein we had the catalogue of the canonical books of Scripture; but the canons of the Council of CARTHAGE had yet no place in it. Therefore we may safely conclude, that neither Pope Leo, whose Legates subscribed the Council of Chalcedon for him, all but the 27th canon, nor any of the Bishops there gathered together, acknowledged any other books of Canonical Scripture than those which the Council of Laodicea (which left out all the apocryphal, or the ecclesiastical books of the Old Testament) had declared to be received and read for such in the Church before their time.'—Bishop Cosin's Scholast. Hist. of the Canon, n. lxxxv. London, 1657.

["† 'Ab hoc tempore, apud Judæos restituto templo usque ad Aristobulum, supputatio temporum non in Scripturis sanctis, quæ canonicæ appellantur, sed in aliis invenitur, in quibus sunt et Maccabæorum libri, quos Ecclesia pro canonicis habet, propter quorundam martyrum passiones vehementes atque mirabiles, qui, antequam Christus venisset in carnem, usque ad mortem pro Dei lege certaverunt, et mala gravissima atque horribilia pertulerunt.'—August. de Civit. Dei, lib. xviii., cap. xxxvi., tom. vii., col. 519, Paris, 1685. See also De Doctr. Christ., lib. ii., cap. viii., sec. xiii., tom. iii., col. 23, Paris, 1689.

["'Of the things which took place from the time of the rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem to that of Aristobulus, we have no account in the holy Scriptures, which are called canonical, but in others, amongst which are the books of the Maccabees, which the Church receives as canonical, on account of the severe and wonderful sufferings of certain martyrs, who, before the coming of Christ in the flesh, contended even unto death for the law of God, and endured the most extreme and horrible torments.'

["'The reason why the Church called these books canonical,' says Bishop Cosin, 'was, not because the authors of them were Prophets, or men inspired by God to write and give us the rules of our faith, but in regard of the many pious directions and examples of zeal and constancy in religion that are there to be found: for which cause the Church received them into the lower canon of ecclesiastical books, but not into the supreme canon of absolute and divine Scriptures. According to which distinction, also, the Hellenist Jews held them to be as canonical as any Christian church did; for from the Hellenistic Jews only the Christians received them, and not from the Hebrews.'—A Scholastical Hist. of the Canon of holy Scripture, by Bishop Cosin, n. lxxxi., p. 111. London, 1657.

["'Although the book of Wisdom was held in veneration by the church,' says the same writer, num. lxxxi., p. 106, 'yet, together with others of that class, it was given to the readers, or the inferior officers of the church, to be read there by them in a lower place than those of the higher class, which the Priests and Bishops read themselves in a more eminent or conspicuous manner.' See August. de Prædest., lib. i., cap. xiv., tom. vii., 1249, B. Basil, 1569. Contra secundam Epistolam Gaudentii, lib. ii., cap. xxiii., tom. vii., col. 353. Also Bishop Cosin's Schol. Hist. of the Can. of Scripture, n. lxxxi., pp. 108, 109.

["Notwithstanding this weight of evidence, in addition to what is given above, against the canonicity of apocryphal writings, including the Second Book of the Maccabees, the veracious and enlightened Turlat has the confidence to write,—'Nihil quod enim est impiis placet.....tota ab initio Christi Ecclesia librum hunc pro canonico habuit.'—Thesaur. Paroch. i., cap. x., p. 229.

["‡ Ruffin. Expos. in Symbol. Apost., p. 26, in fine Oper. Cyprian. Oxon. 1682.

["§ Greg. Mor., lib. xix., in cap. xxix., ver. 34, beati Jobi, tom. i., col. 622, A. Paris, 1705.

["‖ Complut. Polyg. Prolog. ad Lectorem.

["¶ Comment. in omnes authenticos Veteris Testamenti Libros, pp. 481, 482, in fine Ester. Paris, 1546.

[" It is true that the Maccabees will be found in the Latin copies of this Council, having been doubtless inserted for special purposes; but in the Greek copies, printed at Paris, under Romish authority, by Conrad Neobarius, A.D. 1540, they are not mentioned.

["* Sacros. Concil. stud. Labb. et Cossart. Can. lx., tom. i., pp. 1507, 1508. Paris, 1671.

["See Pope's Roman Misquotations, p. 315, for lists of canonical books as given by early Christian writers, in all which the Apocrypha is omitted. Examine likewise pp. 299—326.

["† Douay Version.

[‡ Vide, pp. 244, 245, ut supra.

["§ Dr. Milner's End of Religious Controversy, let. lvi., p. 376.

["] "It appears that on the day after the battle, when Judas and his men were collecting the dead bodies, in order to bury them in the graves of their fathers, they found, under the coats of every one that was slain, things that had been consecrated to the idols of the Jamnites; and this circumstance is expressly stated to have been the cause of their death. Hereupon Judas and his men besought God by prayer that the sin might not be remembered; most probably lest they should be included in the punishment, as were the Israelites under Joshua (chap. vii.) in the matter of Achan. Judas also exhorted the people to abstain from any repetition of the offence: and, having made a collection of money, sent it to Jerusalem to offer 'a sin-offering' before the Lord. The Romanist asserts that the expression here rendered (both by the Septuagint, and in our translation) 'a sin-offering,' indicates 'a sacrifice for the sins of the dead.'† It is fatal, however, to this interpretation, that the Jewish law commanded idolatry to be punished with death, (Num. xv. 30, 31,) without any sacrificial expiation. What, therefore, was denied to these men while living, would surely be of no avail to them when dead; and as the Scriptures make no mention whatever of any sacrifice for the dead, it is obvious that the offering made by Judas had respect to the living, who had not diligently sought out and corrected the wicked and idolatrous propensities of the host. This, indeed, was precisely the course pointed out by God, in the case of bloodshed, when the murderer remained undiscovered; (Deut. xxi. 1—10; see also Lev. iv. 13, 14;) and, therefore, would naturally suggest itself under circumstances of a like nature.

["] "Again: the Romish Church teaches that those who die in mortal sin go inevitably to hell; and that those only who die with venial sins upon their heads endure the temporary torture of purgatory.‡ But these Israelites had been guilty of idolatry, which is a mortal sin; (Deut. vii. 25, 26;) and respecting which 'every man saw that it was the cause for which they were slain;'—not, as has been asserted,§ merely because they had taken these idols as 'spoils of war.' For whence can it be shown that such an act would, in this particular case, have merited death? And how, on the other hand, could the offering of Judas be of any avail in delivering them from hell, whither those go, who, for the sake of idols, have cast off the true God?

["] "We arrive now at the important observation, that the act of Judas 'was a holy and good thought, whereupon he made a reconciliation for the dead, that they might be delivered from sin.' Here it is necessary to remark, that these are not the words of Judas himself, but an assertion of the compiler; not a continuation of the history, but a gloss or conjecture of the historian; intimating that the design of Judas, in making the offering, was, that the sinners might be forgiven, and obtain a happy resurrection. The words 'for the sins of the dead,' in verse 43, which have been introduced into the Douay version, are not in the Greek of the original writer. It is there simply, as in our translation, 'a sin-offering.'* Had Judas himself, who was, doubtless, conversant with the law of God, considered it 'a holy and good thought,' he would surely have given 'holy and good' authority for the practice of 'making reconciliation for the dead, that they might be delivered from sin.' But none is given, for the simple reason, that none could be found. Judas, moreover, would not defend the law with his sword, and destroy it with an unlawful sacrifice.† At all events, there is nothing in the expression about mitigating present misery, or shortening purgatorial sorrows. Deliverance from sin only is contemplated in the offering, not deliverance from purgatory; a resurrection to future happiness, not an escape from present punishment. In whatever view, therefore, the passage is considered, it contains nothing in favour of the existence of the Popish purgatory.

["But even if Judas had made an offering for the dead, and prayed for their deliverance from punishment,—as this is the only example of such a practice which can be produced, and that not from the Old or New Testament, which are undoubtedly inspired,—it will no more avail to establish a doctrine, upon the belief of which our salvation is made to depend, than the act of Zipporah can authorize women to administer the sacraments, or than that of Razis can sanction suicide. (Exod. iv. 25; 2 Macc. xiv. 41.)

["The above being the only passage, in any writing anterior to the Christian era, which is now commonly adduced in proof of the tenets under examination, it may reasonably be inferred that the Old-Testament writers knew nothing of their existence. Did they afford any indication of them, the passages formerly alleged would not have been so generally given up; but we should still have been referred to them, as we are to the Scriptures of the New Testament, in which certain allusions and expressions are presumed to establish their truth." ‡]

2. It is true that the Romanists sometimes allege Isaiah xxii. 14, "Surely this iniquity shall not be purged from ye till you die;" from which they infer, that after death it should be forgiven. But an impartial expositor would certainly interpret this passage to mean, that their sin would never be forgiven; or, what is still more proper, that they, as a people, should be visited for that particular sin during the existence of that generation; rather than advance it in proof of purgatory.

["With reference to authorities adduced from the New Testament, our attention is called, in the first place, to a precept in our Lord's sermon on the Mount: 'Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing.' (Matt. v. 25, 26; Luke xii. 58, 59.) According to Papal interpretation, the farthings are 'venial sins,' the payment is 'human satisfaction,' and the prison is 'purgatory.'§ To such lamentable straits are the supporters of this doctrine reduced, that almost every text of Scripture which contains the word 'fire,' or that speaks of, or even alludes to, any kind of 'prison,' is seized upon with the utmost avidity, for the sake of upholding their visionary views; like the servants of Benhadad, with ropes about their necks, who eagerly watched the lips of the King of Israel, to catch a word that might be favourable to their pitiable condition. (1 Kings xx. 31—33.)

["The plain meaning of the precept is readily determined by the context to apply solely to this life. It simply enjoins that if any difference exist between a man and his neighbour, it is the duty and interest of each to do all in his power to promote immediate reconciliation and peace, and not needlessly suffer an appeal to be made to the judge, where the loser may meet with painful, though just, severity. Now, what can this have to do with purgatory?

["But take another view, and consider the spiritual application of the injunction. It may be paraphrased to the effect, that man is a sinner; that God has a controversy with him; that the present life only is the accepted, the proper time for reconciliation; that he is invited to return to God through Christ; that if he neglect the invitation and die in his sins, he has only to expect the righteous sentence of his Judge, and that doom from which he will not escape 'until he has paid the uttermost farthing.' This is a method of expressing continuity or eternity, of which similar examples are not wanting in the Scriptures. Thus in Psalm cx. 1, 'Sit thou on my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool;' (see also Isai. xxii. 14;) from which text it cannot be supposed that Christ will be removed from his high dignity as soon as all his enemies have been subdued unto him. Surely, then, nothing but a most perverted judgment can ever extract from the text under consideration any thing like a proof of purgatorial durance.*

["Suppose, for a moment, that a man could pay the uttermost farthing, in such case he would liquidate the debt, and his venial sins would stand in no need of that ["* 'Περι αμαρτιας θυσιαν.'

["† Josephus is perfectly silent as to any act of this kind on the part of Judas. Antiquit., lib. xii., cap. 12."

[‡ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 29—36.]

["§ Bellarm., tom. ii., de Purg., lib. i., cap. vii., p. 397, E. Coloniæ, 1623.

["Dr. Milner's End of Religious Controversy, letter lv., p. 369.

["The Grounds of Catholic Doctrine, &c., p. 29. Edit. 1731.

["Dr. Rock's Hierurgia, vol. ii., p. 432. London, 1833.

["An Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine, Permissu Superiorum, p. 110. Dublin, Grace, 1838.

["* If the word 'until' (ἑως) is always to be understood as terminating at a certain period, how will the Romanist, who constantly insists upon the perpetual virginity of the mother of our Lord, get over the saying of St. Matthew, (i. 25,) 'And he knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born Son?' According to the Papistical interpretation of the word in this place, the Virgin Mary had children after the birth of our Saviour, which is known to be universally denied by the Romish Church. The note, however, upon Matt. i. 25, in the Douay Bible, shall supply a comment upon the text under review, and also exhibit a specimen of Romish consistency of interpretation.

["'Till she had brought forth her first-born Son—From these words Helvidius and other heretics most impiously inferred that the blessed Virgin Mary had other children besides Christ. But St. Jerome shows, by divers examples, that this expression of the Evangelist was a manner of speaking usual among the Hebrews, to denote by the word until only what is done, without any regard to the future. Thus it is said, That Noah sent forth a raven, which went forth, and did not return TILL the waters were dried up on the earth; (Gen. viii. 6, 7;) that is, did not return any more. Also God says, I am TILL you grow old. (Isai. xlvi. 4.) Who dares infer that God should then cease to be? Also in 1 Mac. v. 54, They went up to Mount Sion with joy and gladness, and offered holocausts, because not one of them was slain TILL they had returned in peace; that is, not one was slain, before or after they had returned. God saith to his divine Son, Sit on my right hand TILL I make thy enemies thy footstool. Shall he sit no longer, after his enemies are subdued? Yea, and for all eternity.'—See Hieron. advers. Helvid. de Perpet. Virg. B. M., tom. iv., col. 133. Paris, 1706.

remission or forgiveness for which the Papist contends, when arguing upon Matt. xii. 32.* Where payment is made, pardon is not required. Besides, if no one who enters purgatory is to come out 'until he has paid the uttermost farthing,' of what avail are prayers and masses for the sufferer while there? Yet we are told that by these means the dead are daily supposed to come forth discharged from all payments to be made by themselves. To be sure, it is not said by the Romish Church where the debt is to be paid: so that a mortuary fee, or the donation of some wealthy relative into the hands of a sordid priesthood, may probably solve the difficulty. But it is said in the text, by whom it is to be paid;—'till thou,' that is, the sinner himself, not his friends and relatives,—'till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing.' The debt, therefore, admits of no commutation; and, consequently, all the masses and prayers in Christendom are superfluous and nugatory.

["In the interpretation which has been given above, it will be found that we are borne out by the authority of the Fathers, and even by the Romanists themselves. Thus, St. Ambrose remarks, that the reconciliation must take place 'while we are in this body.'†

["'He is never released from prison,' says Jerome, 'who does not pay the last farthing before the end of life.' ‡

["It is also observed, in a commentary wrongly attributed to this Father, that the sinner 'will never come out' of the prison in question, 'inasmuch as he is always paying the last farthing, while he is suffering the everlasting punishment of his earthly sins.'§

["The comment of Chrysostom runs thus:—'Agree with thine adversary whiles thou art in the way with him, that is, in this life; for, when the way is finished, there is no longer time for repentance. Beware lest the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge to the avenging powers, and thou be cast into prison, that is, into outer darkness, being condemned, not only for thy deeds, but even for thy thoughts. Let us implore the all-merciful God, that we be not delivered up to the devils.'‖

["Augustine has the following exhortation:—'Induced, therefore, by these salutary reflections, beloved brethren, let us agree with our adversary while we are in the way with him: that is, let us conform to the word of God while yet we are in this life; for afterwards, when we shall have departed hence, there will be neither room for contrition nor satisfaction. Nothing will then remain except the judge, the officer, and the prison.'*

["Again: speaking of the parable of Dives and Lazarus, he observes:—'With reference to his [Abraham's] declaration, that the good cannot, even if they wished, pass over to those places in which the wicked are punished; what else does it mean, except that no merciful assistance can be rendered by the just, even if they wished to render it, to those who, by the immutability of the divine sentence, are so fast in prison, that they cannot go out thence until they have paid the uttermost farthing?'†

["That neither Hilary himself, nor those whose opinion he rejects, knew any thing of the Romish interpretation, appears from the following exposition:—'Since Christ permits us at no time to be influenced by an unforgiving spirit, he enjoins us to agree with the adversary quickly, during the whole course of our life. Of the opinion maintained by many on this head, I have not thought it necessary to treat. They have referred the precept of being reconciled to an enemy by good-will, to the concord effected between body and spirit when at war with each other.'‡

["Theophylact writes thus:—'Some suppose that the adversary is the devil and the way, life; and that our Lord's exhortation is to this effect:—While thou art in this life be reconciled to the devil, that he may not hereafter be able to convict thee of sin, and thereby of having what belongs to him. But rather understand, that Christ says this of adversaries in this world, exhorting us not to be litigious, and thereby be distracted from religious actions.'§

["To the above may be added the interpretation of Fulgentius, a writer of the sixth century. 'A man makes the word of God his adversary, when he does those things which holy writ forbids. To such an one it is said in the psalm, Thou hatest to be reformed, and hast cast my words behind thee. If any one in the way, that is, if any one in this life, agreeth not quickly with this divine word, he is thrown into the prison of eternal fire, and will have no rest beyond it. He is a friendly adver-

["* See p. 251. 'In purgatory only is remission of sin, and not in hell, nor in heaven.'—Abstract of the Douay Catechism, p. 95. London: Andrews, 1839.

["'Assuredly we have a right to conclude that there is some remission of sin in purgatory.'—Dr. Wiseman, Lect. xi., p. 57.

["† 'Redde promissum, dum in hoc corpore es, &c. Ambros. lib. ix., in Luc. cap. xix. 25, tom. i., col. 1503. Paris, 1686.

["‡ 'Nunquam solvitur ■ carcere, qui quadrantem verbi novissimum non solveret ante finem vitæ.'—Hieron. Comment. in Marc. iii., tom. v., p. 895. See also Pseudo-Jerom. Comment. in Matt. v. 25. Ibid. col. 856. Paris, 1706.

["§ 'Semper non exiturum esse, quia semper solvat novissimum quadrantem, dum sempiternas pœnas terrenorum peccatorum luit.'—Pseudo-Jerom. Comment. in Lament. Jerem. lib. i., cap. i., tom. v., col. 807. Paris, 1706. Augustine has the very same words, de Sermone Dom. in Monte ad locum, lib. i., cap. xi., sect. xxx., tom. iii., pt. ii., col. 177, E. Paris, 1689.

["‖ 'Οὕτως ευνοει τῳ αντιδικῳ σου, ἑως ὁτου ει εν τῃ ὁδῳ μετ' αυτου, τουτεστιν εν τῳδε τῳ βιῳ· ἐαν γαρ ἡ ὁδος τελεσθῃ, ουκ εστι σοι μετανοιας καιρος. Βλεπε μη σε παραδῳ ὁ αντιδικος τῳ κριτῃ, και ὁ κριτης ταις τιμωρουσαις δυναμεσι, και βληθῃς εις την φυλακην, εις το σκοτος το εξωτερον, ἑως οὐ αποδως τον εσχατον κοδραντην, ου μονον περι των πραξεων, αλλα και περι των ενθυμησεων κρινομενος. Παρακαλεσωμεν τον ελεημονα Θεον, μη παραδοθηναι τοις δαιμοσι.'—Chrysostom. Hom. lxxvii., de Panitentia, tom. i., p. 824, B. C. Ed. Paris, 1636. See also Hom. xvi. in Matt. r. 25, 26, tom. i., p. 204, seqq.

["* 'Hæc ergo, fratres charissimi, salubriter cogitantes, faciamus amicitias cum adversario nostro, dum sumus in via cum illo: hoc est, consentiamus verbo Dei, dum adhuc sumus in hac vita: quia postea, cum de hoc seculo transierimus, nulla compunctio vel satisfactio remanebit. Judex restat, minister et carcer.'—Augustin. Hom. v. in 1 Tim. iv., tom. x., col. 420, D. Basil, 1569.

["† 'Quod autem dicit, ad ea loca in quibus torquentur impii, justos, etiam si velint, non posse transire, quid aliud significat, nisi post hanc vitam ita receptis in carcere, ut non inde exeant donec reddant novissimum quadrantem, per incommutabilitatem divinæ sententiæ, nullum auxilium misericordiæ posse præberi a justis, etiam si eam velint præbere?'—August. Quæstionum Evangeliorum, lib. ii., sect. iii., col. 265, tom. iii. Paris, 1689.

["‡ 'Quia nullum tempus vacuum affectu placabilitatis esse permittit, cito in omni vitæ nostræ via reconciliari nos adversario benignitate præcipit. Quid autem a pluribus in hoc capite sensum sit, non putavi esse tractandum. Hoc enim, quod adversario reconciliari benevolentia jubemur, ad corporis et spiritus adversantium sibi concordiam retulerunt.'—Hilar. Comment. in Matt. v. 25, 26, col. 626. Paris, 1693.

["§ 'Τινες νομιζουσιν αντιδικον λεγεσθαι τον διαβολον, ὁδον δε, τον βιον· παραινειν δε τον Κυριον ουτως· ἑως ὁτου ει εν τῳ βιῳ τουτῳ, διαλυθητι προς τον διαβολον, ἱνα μη εχῃ ὑστερον ελεγχειν σε περι ἁμαρτιας, ὡς εχοντα τι των εκεινου. Συ δε νοει ὁτι και περι των ενταυθα αντιδικων λεγει τουτο, παραινων μη δικαζεσθαι, και απο των θειων εργων περισπασθαι.'—Theophylact. Comment. in Matt. v., p. 30, E. Paris, 1635.

sary who urges us with a salutary opposition, in order that he may deliver us from the opposition of our deadly sins.'*

["Thus also Bede:—'Until thou payest is put for infinity, just as in another place, Until I place thine enemies,' &c.†

["And Maldonatus:—'The way is the time of this life, the prison is hell. He will never come out, because those who are in hell never pay.'‡

["Alexander also:—'It does not mean that we shall come out afterwards, but that we shall never come out. Because when the condemned suffer infinite punishments for any mortal sin, they never thoroughly discharge them. Those of whom this is said will never come out of the prison of hell.' §

["It appears, then, that the interpretation given above fully accords with that of the primitive Fathers, and is entirely at variance with the sense which is forced upon the text by the Romanists of modern days."‖]

No foundation for the doctrine of purgatory can therefore be discovered in this passage; for, (1.) To the person who is in danger of being thrust into prison, it is said, "THOU shalt by NO MEANS come out, till THOU hast paid the uttermost farthing." This is an expression which admits of no commutation of punishment. The sinner must pay the whole debt in his own person. The Priests of Rome promise deliverance by means of masses and money; but, according to the text, the offender shall by no means come out except by paying the uttermost farthing. (2.) As the crime here spoken of is uncharitableness, and therefore a mortal sin, it cannot be said with any consistency, that purgatory is the prison; because, according to their teaching, mortal sins send persons to hell. (3.) If the text refer to the other world, it may be expounded by that parable, (Matt. xviii.,) where the unkind servant is cast into prison till he shall pay all that is due from him; that is, he should lie there for ever; inasmuch as the debt was ten thousand talents, too much for a Prince, much less for a servant who had nothing to pay, and therefore his master forgave him his debt. Our debt, as sinners, is not paid unto God by us, but forgiven; therefore, when it is not pardoned, it can never be paid. Uncharitable and malicious men, who will not forgive others, will be sent to hell; for he that hateth his brother is a murderer, and no murderer hath eternal life. Maldonat, the Jesuit, also acknowledges that "purgatory cannot be proved from Matt. v. 25, as the prison there spoken of is hell, and not purgatory."

["The next passage to which we are referred as demonstrative of the existence of purgatory, is taken from our Lord's declaration concerning 'blasphemy against the Holy Ghost;' (Matt. xii. 32;) that this sin 'shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, neither in the world to come.' Hence the Papist infers that some sins are forgiven in the world to come; and, consequently, that there must be a purgatory.* So ready is he to appropriate to himself any passage of Scripture which he fancies to be favourable to his views, though even a babe in scriptural knowledge may see at a glance the weakness of his claims, that we are reminded of the Athenian maniac,† whose frenzied imagination made every vessel that came into port his own, and assumed the disposal of the whole city; while, at the same time, he was naked, and wretched, and famishing.

["The text simply means, that the sin in question shall never be forgiven. St. Mark himself says that it 'hath never forgiveness;' (Mark iii. 29;) and St. Luke, that 'it shall not be forgiven.' (Luke xii. 10.) By what process of reasoning, then, can the Romish Church convert this passage to her purpose, while she asserts, at the same time, that purgatory is set apart for those whose sins have already been forgiven; and that the object of enduring its misery is not pardon, but satisfaction? Sins are not there remitted, but punished: punished after they are remitted. Nay, more, 'they are punished because they are remitted; for if the guilt were not remitted, the sinner would go to hell, and not to purgatory.' Cardinal Bellarmine expressly says that 'purgatory is only for those who die in venial sins, and for those who depart this life with liability to punishment, their guilt having been already remitted.'‡ Again: in a Romish book, entitled Abridgment of Christian Doctrine, (p. 17,) in reply to the question, 'Do any other souls go to purgatory?' (that is, beside those guilty of venial sins,) this answer is given: 'Yes, such souls as leave this world before they have fully discharged the debt of temporal punishment due for their mortal sins, the guilt and eternal punishment of which have been remitted.'

["Besides, inasmuch as 'the world to come,' in which Papists say venial sins are to be forgiven, cannot begin until 'time shall be no more;' (Mark x. 30; Luke xx. 35; Eph. i. 21; Heb. vi. 5;) and, by their own confession, purgatory will not then exist; it must of necessity follow, that this passage can have nothing to do with their ideal fire, which is admitted, on all hands, to precede the day of judgment. Indeed, it is clear that our Saviour, in this passage of Scripture, must allude to the forgiveness either of the temporal or of the eternal punishment, due to sins in 'the world to come.' If he refers to the eternal punishment, this will be contrary to their own doctrines, which declare that the eternal punishment due to sin, if forgiven at all, is forgiven in this world. If, on the other hand, the allusion is to temporal punishment, as due to sins in the next world, then they make him to say, that temporal punishment will last for ever, which is a contradiction in terms. Or, again, if the sin against the Holy Ghost be the only one to which forgive-

["* 'Adversarium sibi quippe facit homo Dei verbum, quamdiu illa facit quæ divinus sermo prohibet. Cui dicitur in Psalmo: Tu vero odisti disciplinam, et projecisti sermones meos post te. Huic sermoni divino si quis in via, hoc est, si quis in hac vita, cito consentiens non fuerit, missus in carcerem ignis æterni, ultra requiem non habebit. Bonus enim adversarius iste, qui salubri adversitate jugiter instat, ut a nobis adversitatem mortiferæ iniquitatis expellat.'—Fulgentii Rusensis Episcopi de Remissione Peccatorum, lib. ii., cap. v., p. 387. Paris, 1684.

["† 'Donec solves pro infinito ponitur, sicut alibi Donec ponam inimicos.'—Beda, lib. v., p. 12. Coloniæ, 1612.

["‡ 'Via est hujus vitæ tempus; carcer infernus. Nunquam exiturus, quia qui in inferno sunt nunquam persolvunt.'—Maldonat. Comment., p. 121. Mentz, 1596.

["§ 'Non significat nos exituros postea, sed nunquam. Quia cum pœnas infinitas pro quolibet mortali peccato diluant damnati, nunquam eas persolvunt. Nunquam ex inferni carcere exituri sunt de quibus hoc dictum est.'—Alexand. Histor., lib. ix., p. 385. Paris, 1683."

[‖ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and the Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 36—42.]

["* Dr. Wiseman, vol. ii., lect. xi., p. 57.

["Dr. Milner's End of Religious Controversy, letter lv., p. 369.

["Abstract of the Douay Catechism, recommended by Authority, p. 95, London, Andrews, 1839.

["An Abridgment of Christian Doctrine, Permissu Superiorum, p. 111. Dublin, Grace, 1838.

["A Papist Represented. Selected from the Original of 1683, by the Rev. J. Gother. Republished by the late Venerable and Right Rev. Richard Challoner, D. D., p. 52. London, Keating, 832.

["The Poor Man's Catechism, p. 244. Dublin, Coyne, 1838.

["† Thrasyllus. See Ælian. V. H., lib. iv., cap. 25.

["‡ See sect. v., p. 243, ut supra.

ness shall not be extended in the next life; then, upon the Papist's reasoning, all other sins in general may hereafter receive pardon, and consequently mortal sin; but mortal sin, they constantly assert, can only be remitted in this life: therefore mortal sin can be both forgiven and not forgiven in the world to come, which is an absurdity. The truth is, as stated by a learned Divine of the English Church,* that our Lord here adverts to an opinion which prevailed among the Jews, and which fully confirms the interpretation as given by St. Mark and St. Luke. According to this opinion, some sins, upon repentance, received immediate forgiveness; others were not pardoned until the day of expiation; and others were only expiated by enduring some grievous affliction; but all were blotted out at death, provided the offender was an Israelite; who, then, would necessarily have his portion in the happiness of another world. To correct the erroneous doctrine that a Jew was certain of final salvation, our Lord tells them that the sin against the Holy Ghost should not be forgiven to any, whether Jew or Gentile; but that whosoever should be guilty of that sin should be miserable for ever. The text, therefore, cannot be wrested to serve the Romish cause. It must be evident, to an impartial mind, that the words 'nor in the world to come,' as given by St. Matthew, are merely added to strengthen the impossibility of forgiveness, and not to teach that some sins, by consequence, could be forgiven after death, from whence the absurd inference of the existence of a purgatory is fondly derived.

["By a reference to the opinions of the early Fathers, antecedent to Augustine, their silence on the point will prove to demonstration, that they were entirely ignorant of the Romish interpretation of the passage.†

["Thus Hilary observes: 'He [Christ] condemns the perverseness of the Pharisees with marked severity, promising the pardon of all sins, and withholding indulgence from blasphemy against the Spirit. For whereas other words and deeds are freely pardoned, the denial of God in Christ is shut out from mercy.' ‡

["Ambrose remarks to the same effect, that 'whosoever shall not receive remission of sins in this world, will not be in heaven.' §

["Jerome merely adverts to the utter impossibility of forgiveness: 'Whosoever shall ascribe the works of the Saviour to Beelzebub the Prince of the devils, and shall say that the Son of God hath an unclean spirit, his blasphemy shall at no time be forgiven.' ‖

["Augustine also himself says, that this sin 'has no forgiveness for ever.' 'This sense,' he adds, 'is merely expressed in other words, and in another form of speech.'¶

["* Archbishop Sharp, vol. vii., serm. 8. Ed. 1754; see also Lightfoot, vol. ii., p. 1095. Ed. 1684.

["† It is a legal axiom, that 'de non apparentibus, et non existentibus, eadem est ratio.'

["‡ 'Pharisæorum perversitatem severissima definitione condemnat, peccatorum omnium veniam promittens, et blasphemiæ Spiritus indulgentiam abnegans. Nam cum cætera dicta gestaque liberali venia relaxentur, caret misericordia, si Deus negetur in Christo.'—Hilar. Pictav. Comment. in Matt. xii. 31, col. 671. Paris, 1693.

["§ 'Qui hic non acceperit remissionem peccatorum, illic non erit.'—Ambros. de Bono Mortis, cap. ii., sect. v., tom. i., col. 391, D. Paris, 1686.

["‖ 'Quicumque opera salvatoris Beelzebub principi dæmoniorum deputarit, et dixerit Filium Dei habere spiritum immundum, huic nullo tempore blasphemia remittetur.'—Jerom. Comment. in Matt. xii. 32, lib. ii., tom. iv., pt. i., col. 49, 50. Paris, 1706.

["¶ 'Non habet remissionem in æternam. Aliis quippe verbis et alio loquendi modo eadem ipsa est expressa sententia.'—Augustin. Serm. 71 de Matt. xii. 32, cap. viii., sect. xiii., tom. v., col. 390, F. Paris, 1665.

Again, he observes that the sin in question 'cannot be remitted at all,' without the remotest allusion to any other exposition.* It is true that he seems, in one place,† to sanction the Romish view of this text; but with so little confidence in his interpretation, that elsewhere he remarks, 'Concerning this point, since it is a most intricate question, no hasty opinion must be formed.'‡ He also writes: 'Indeed, no sins are remitted in the kingdom [of heaven]. But if none are to be remitted in that last judgment, I suppose that the Lord would not have said of a certain sin, that it shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor in the world to come.'§ It is clear, however, that he cannot here be thinking of purgatory, since he is speaking expressly of the last judgment.

["To conclude with the interpretation of Chrysostom: 'Your blasphemy will be unpardonable, and ye will suffer punishment, both here and hereafter. Many, indeed, are punished here only; as, for instance, the incestuous person, and those who received the sacrament unworthily among the Corinthians; but you will suffer both in this world and in the next.' ‖

["The fact is, that the great authority for this non sequitur interpretation is Pope Gregory himself, the founder of the doctrine, who says, 'As every one departs out of this world, such is he presented at the judgment; nevertheless we must believe in a purgatorial fire for certain lighter failings before the judgment: for the Gospel says, Whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, &c. From this declaration it is given us to understand, that some sins may be pardoned in this life, others in the next. For, that which is denied respecting one sin, is by a manifest consequence granted respecting others.'¶

["Such is the Pope's reasoning, which it is only necessary to carry out to its results, in order to prove its fallacy. For example: The competency of Pope Gregory XVI. to carry a conclave of Cardinals upon his shoulders during an Italian carnival 'is denied;' ergo, it is 'by a manifest consequence granted' that Pope Gregory XVII. will hereafter be able to accomplish the onerous task. Or, to be serious, the crime of murder can be approved neither in this world, nor in the world to come; therefore, upon the principles of Papal interpretation, some other crimes may be approved in heaven. Indeed so inconclusive is the reasoning upon this text to prove forgiveness of sin in ["* 'Cum remitti nobis hoc peccatum omnino non possit.'—Augustin. ad Bonifacium Epist. 185, cap. xi., sect. xlviii., tom. ii., col. 662, C. Paris, 1688.

["† De Civit., lib. xxi., c. 24, referred to by Bellarm. de Purg., lib. i., cap. iv., tom. ii., p. 392, H. Coloniæ, 1628.

["‡ 'De qua re, quoniam profundissima quæstio est, non est modo præcipitanda sententia.'—August. contr. Julian. Pelag., lib. vi., cap. v., tom. vii., col. 1120, A. Basil, 1569.

["§ 'Et peccata quidem nulla remittuntur in regno. Sed si nulla remitterentur in judicio illo novissimo, puto quod Dominus non dixisset de quodam peccato, non remittetur neque in hoc sæculo, neque in futuro.'—August. adv. Julian. Pelag., lib. vi., cap. v., tom. vii., col. 1119, D. Basil, 1569.

["‖ 'Δια δη τουτο ασυγνωστος ὑμιν εσται ἡ βλασφημια, και ενταυθα και εκει δωσετε δικην. Πολλοι (μεν) γαρ ενταυθα εκολασθησαν μονον, ὡς ὁ πεπορνευκως, ὡς οι αναξιως μετασχοντες μυστηριων παρα Κορινθιοις· ὑμεις δε, και ενταυθα και εκει.'—Chrysost. Hom. xli. in Matt. xii. 32, tom. i., p. 475. Paris, 1636.

["¶ 'Ex quibus nimirum sententiis constat, quia qualis hinc quisque egreditur, talis in judicio præsentatur. Sed tamen de quibusdam levibus culpis esse ante judicium purgatorius ignis credendus est, pro eo quod Veritas dicit, quia si quis in Sancto Spiritu blasphemiam dixerit, neque in hoc sæculo remittetur ei, neque in futuro In qua sententia datur intelligi, quasdam culpas in hoc sæculo, quasdam vero in futuro posse laxari. Quod enim de uno negatur, consequens intellectus patet, quia de quibusdam conceditur.'—Greg. Magn. Dial., lib. iv., cap. xxxix., tom. ii., col. 441. Paris, 1705.

the world to come, that although Bellarmine adduces it to establish the existence of a purgatory, yet, in summing up, he candidly confesses that the inference does not follow from the premisses, and therefore that any reasoning upon the passage for this purpose is altogether illogical." *] †

4. Hence, therefore, (1.) The Scripture recognises but two periods for the remission of sins: one upon earth, (Matt. ix. 6,) to the believer and penitent individual; and the other on that great day, when the Judge shall declare the sentence of absolution to all his faithful servants. Christ therefore says, this blasphemy shall have no remission either now, or at the day of judgment; that is, it shall never be forgiven. (2.) The phrase, "neither in this world, nor the world to come," may be rendered, "neither in this dispensation," that is, the Jewish, "nor in that which is to come," namely, the Christian. The Messiah's kingdom, age, or dispensation, is clearly distinguished from the Jewish, which then was. (Heb. ii. 5; vi. 5; xii. 27, 28.) This interpretation is strengthened by the consideration, that the phrase is a Hebraism, then current among the Jews; and as Matthew wrote in Hebrew, it is to be interpreted according to the idiom of that language, which implies, that such sin shall never be forgiven. (3.) This interpretation is also proved by other Evangelists, who give the same passage in somewhat different phraseology, and divested of its Jewish form. St. Mark says, that the blasphemer "hath never forgiveness." (Mark iii. 29.) And St. Luke declares, that this blasphemy "shall not be forgiven him." (Luke xii. 10.) (4.) Sins which are forgiven are not punished; and sins which are punished are not forgiven. But purgatory, as Roman Catholics teach, is a place, not where sins are remitted, but where they are punished with the greatest severity; nay, more, they are punished after they are remitted; and, what is still more extraordinary, punished because they are remitted! For, if the guilt were not remitted, the sinner would not be allowed to go to purgatory, nor have the privilege of being punished there; consequently, it is utterly impertinent from the remission of some sins in the world to come, to conclude, that there is a place where satisfaction for all sins, even the least, is exacted; and so rigidly, that there is no escaping, till, either by themselves or their friends, they have paid the very uttermost farthing.

5. In the grounds of the Roman Catholic doctrine, which are contained in the profession of faith, published by Pope Pius IV., we have what is intended to be an argument in favour of purgatory: it is as follows:—"The Scripture in many places assures us, that 'God will render to every man according to his works.' (Psalm lxii. 12; Matt. xvi. 27; Rom. ii. 6; Rev. xxii. 12.) Now this would not be true if there were no such place as purgatory; for how could God render to every one according to his works, if such as die in the guilt of any, even of the least, sin, which they have not taken care to blot out by repentance, go straight to heaven?" That God will render to every man according to his works is certain; and the Church of Rome gives proof of her gross perversion of Scripture, by asserting that this would not be true but for purgatory. These declarations of Scripture have nothing to do with that "prison-house." If men "die in the guilt of any, even the least, sin," the Bible tells us they go to hell. But those who die in Christ do not "die in the guilt of any, even the least, sin," because the guilt of all their sins is washed away through the blood of atonement. It is also true, that God will render to man according to his works. The judgment of the great day will proceed according to evidence. The works of man will be the evidence of his state before God. Those who have done wickedly, will find that their evil deeds are produced as evidence against them, which will receive the condemnation they righteously deserve. Those who believe in Christ are created anew to good works; they serve God, and their persons and services are accepted for Christ's sake. Not that there is merit in their works, so as to deserve a reward; for there is a broad and very clear distinction between according to works, and on account of works.

But what have these passages to do with purgatory? They speak indeed of God giving to men according to their works; but the avowed language of the Church of Rome is, that the rendering to men in purgatory is not according to their works, but rather according to the merit of their works; or, what is still more unscriptural, according to the merit of the works of others; or, what is even more preposterous, according to their wealth, or their submission to the Clergy, or the suffrages of good or wicked men on earth. They speak with great solemnity, when they choose to be serious, of God requiring punishment for the guilt of the least transgression; and yet they most blasphemously represent him as relaxing such punishment, or remitting it altogether, on the condition of certain sums of money being paid to the Priests for saying masses. The more influential of their Divines represent the punishment of purgatory as salutary and necessary, to qualify persons for the kingdom of heaven; who nevertheless may be exempt from that salutary and necessary process on the payment of money by their friends. It is declared by Romish theologians that men, without passing through the fire of purgatory, cannot go to heaven; and yet that money can purchase exemption from this fire, and a mitigation of its pains. What is this but to teach that money can open the gate of heaven, and even procure admittance into that holy place to persons who have not undergone the necessary purgation, and who are still in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity?

["In further confirmation of the existence of this imaginary fire, reference is made to St. Paul's reproof of the Corinthians (1 Cor. iii. 10—15) for their envyings and strifes, and his denunciations of the false teachers, whose conflicting doctrines had caused divisions in the church. These teachers he compares to certain builders, who were erecting the superstructure of the Church upon the true foundation laid by the Apostle, namely, upon Jesus Christ; but were employing different materials in the work. Thus some had raised a building of 'gold, silver, and precious stones;' others of 'wood, hay, and stubble.' But in either case, says the Apostle, 'Every man's work shall be made manifest, for the day shall declare it; because it shall be revealed by fire: and the fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is. If any man's work abide, which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's works shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire.'

["According to the Romanist, these combustible materials are the venial sins of mankind, and the consuming

["* 'Non sequi secundum regulas dialecticorum.'—De Purg., lib. i., cap. iv., tom ii., p. 393, B. Coloniæ, 1628."]

[† Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 43—49.]

fire is that of purgatory.* It should seem, however, from the more obvious interpretation of the passage, that some of the Apostle's coadjutors were building up the church of God with pure and costly materials, that is, with sound doctrines; while others, though building on a right foundation, were incorporating with pure Christianity a mixture of Jewish and Gentile opinions; or perhaps substituting their own fancies and inventions for the doctrines of truth. With reference to these several structures, the Apostle affirms that a day will arrive,—either the day of the fiery trial of persecution, or more probably, according to others, of the final judgment of God, whose 'day shall burn like an oven,' (Mal. iv. 1,)—when their durability shall be tried, and those builders, whose principles and practices were right, shall 'receive a reward;' whereas those who were puffed up with foolish conceits, and who had built up erroneous doctrines upon the fundamentals of Christianity, shall suffer loss, and obtain no profit from their labours. They might, indeed, be saved themselves, but with great danger and difficulty, as one who escapes 'by fire.' The expression is proverbial, and the mode of speaking is by no means uncommon, either in the Scriptures, or in classical writers.† Thus in the exhortation of St. Jude, 'Some save with fear, pulling them out of the fire.' (Verse 23.) Again: the Prophet Amos says of the Israelites, 'Ye were as a firebrand plucked out of the burning.' (Amos iv. 11: see also Psalm lxvi. 12; Isai. xliii. 2; lxvi. 16; Ezek. xxxvi. 5; Zech. iii. 2; xiii. 9; 1 Peter i. 7.) The words, therefore, of the Apostle, 'saved so as by fire,' are merely figurative, and expressive of a narrow escape from impending destruction; even as the merchant who suffers the loss of his wares by casting them into the sea, in order to provide for his own deliverance.‡

["A concise analysis of the passage will show how little it agrees with the doctrine of purgatory, and the uses to which it is applied by the Papists.

["In the first place, the Apostle speaks of a fire which is to try the works of men: but the flames of purgatory will take effect upon the men themselves; and that, not by way of trial, but of punishment.§ Again: the fire to which St. Paul alludes will make every man's work manifest; and can, therefore, have nothing to do with a state which, so far from being evident, is disputed by a large proportion of the Christian world. Moreover, every man's work is to be tried; so that impenitent sinners, as well as the Apostles and the martyrs, must pass the ordeal; but thither the ungodly can never come, because they go directly to hell; and to which, by an express exception in the Romish creed, the latter are never exposed.* In the trial announced to the Corinthians, the rejected builder will 'suffer loss;' whereas the very object of purgatory is to make a gain of souls which would otherwise be lost: for if these pious souls with 'any thing which defileth' upon them did not go to purgatory, they would go to hell. 'The day' which is to declare the nature of every man's work is to be revealed by fire; which, in Scripture phraseology, always denotes the day of judgment:† but purgatory is said to purify men's souls before that awful day. Lastly: of whatever the 'wood, hay, and stubble' are emblematic, Romanists very generally explain them either of false doctrines, or of unexpiated sins; which, not being personal, cannot surely be touched by the fire of purgatory.

["Admitting, however, for a moment, that the Romish interpretation is not contradictory in itself, a strong objection still arises, on the ground that any uninspired man, or body of men, should attempt to establish an article of faith, upon which our salvation is said to depend, by means of an allegory. The allegories used by St. Paul, (see particularly Gal. iv.,) be it remembered, were the suggestions of inspiration; and it is only upon a like inspiration that their true application can rest. 'Parables and enigmas of ambiguous meaning are altogether insufficient to settle the authority of doctrines;'‡ and consequently, until the Romanists have something like scriptural evidence for their bold application of scriptural figures, their anathemas will be hurled in vain against those who rely in matters of faith upon the Bible, and the Bible alone.

["It is, moreover, observable, that the words of St. Paul are delivered in the form of a simile, or comparison:—'He shall be saved, yet so as by fire.'§ In like manner St. Matthew speaks of the Holy Spirit of God descending like a dove upon our Saviour.‖ He does not intend to say, that a dove actually appeared;¶ but that the descent of the Holy Spirit was like the hovering or undulating motion of a dove, when approaching the earth. It appears, therefore, that the Apostle, from first to last, has inculcated an important truth in tropical language, and never intended that his words should be literally applied.

["Before leaving this passage of Scripture it is obvious to remark, that it cannot but be matter of surprise that Roman Catholics should ever have produced it in favour of this or of any other doctrine of their Church. The members of her communion are bound 'never to receive or interpret the Scriptures otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers.' This they swear 'upon the holy Gospels of God.' It is therefore ["* Faith of Catholics, p. 356. London, 1830.

["Dr. Wiseman, vol. ii., lect. xi., p. 64.

["Dr. Milner's End of Religious Controversy, letter lv., p. 369.

["An Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine, Permissu Superiorum, p. 110. Dublin, Grace, 1838.

["Husenbeth, Faberism exposed and refuted, cap. vi., sec. i., p. 551. Norwich, 1836.

["† 'Θαττον γαρ, και, ὡς ειπειν, εκ πυρος ἁρπαζουσι τα σκελη.'—Artemid. Oncirocrit., lib. i., cap. l., p. 43.

["'Εκ μεσου, φασι, πυρος τον ανδρα σωζειν.'—Aristides in Apellan., p. 126.

["'Δια πυρος εμολον.'—Eurip. Elect. 1182.

"'Καν με χρη, δια του πυρος
Εθελω βαδιζειν.'—Arist. Lysist., 133.

"'Periculosæ plenum opus aleæ
Tractas, et incedis per ignes
Suppositos cineri doloso.'—Hor. Od. II. i. 6.

["'Prope ambustus evaserat.'—Liv. xxii., 35.

["'Se populare incendium semiustum evasisse.'—Ibid. xxii. 40.

["‡ 'Quomodo mercator damnum patitur suarum mercium, dum eas in mare projicit, ut ipse evadat.'—Estius in 1 Cor. iii. 15, p. 222. Coloniæ, 1631.

["§ 'Ignis purgatorii, qui verus et realis est ignis, non potest opera comburere, quæ sunt actiones transeuntes et jam transierunt.'—Bellarm de Purg., lib. i., cap. v., tom. ii., p. 394, H. Coloniæ, 1628.

["* See sec. xiii., p. 245.

["† 'All the Fathers understand this day to be the day of judgment.' 'Omnes Doctores [Patres] intelligunt hanc diem esse diem judicii.'—Bellarm. de Purg., lib. i., cap. v., tom. ii., p. 394, D.

["‡ 'Nunquam parabolæ et dubia ænigmatum intelligentia potest ad autoritatem dogmatum proficere.'—Hieron. in Matt. xiii. 33, lib. ii., tom. iv., col. 57. Paris, 1706.

["§ 'Ως δια πυρος.'

["‖ 'Ωσει περιστεραν.' (Matt. iii. 16.)

["¶ That would have been ὡσει περιστερας. See Trollope's Analecta Theologica in loco.

[" 'Nec eam [sacram Scripturam] unquam nisi juxta unanimem consensum Patrum accipiam, et interpretabor.'—Symb. P. Pii IV. apud Bullas ad Concil. Trident. additas, p. 313. Romæ, 1564.

["'Ego idem N. spondeo, voveo, ac juro: Sic me Deus adjuvet, et hæc sancta Dei Evangelia.'—Ibid., p. 314.

natural to look for some degree of unanimity among the Fathers in their interpretation of this scripture; requiring, as they do, our belief in a doctrine grounded thereon: and especially when such doctrine is stated to be of eternal importance. What, then, if we discover that their unanimity is composed of the very elements of discord!

["Of those Fathers who have touched upon the passage, Origen, St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, and St. Augustine, tell us, rightly enough, that 'the foundation is Christ;' Clement of Alexandria says that it is faith and hope in Christ; Chrysostom and Theophylact, that it is 'a true but a weak faith.'

["Tertullian, Ambrose, Jerome, and after them Anselm, and Aquinas, agree that 'the builders' are 'Doctors and Preachers:' Augustine, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Theophylact, refer the term to 'all Christians.'

["Clement of Alexandria, Ambrose, and Jerome, declare that the 'gold, silver, and precious stones,' signify 'Catholic interpretations;' and that the 'wood, hay, and stubble,' signify 'heresies.' Augustine says, that the 'wood, hay, and stubble,' signify 'over-attachment to the things of this life.' Theophylact and Chrysostom affirm that they are 'mortal sins;' and that the 'gold, silver, and precious stones,' represent 'good works.'*

["Origen, Jerome, Augustine, together with Bernard, and Bede, regard the 'fire' as the emblem of 'temporal tribulation before death:'† Lactantius, Basil, and Ambrose, apply it to the general conflagration at the day of judgment: while Gregory Nazianzen, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Theophylact, affirm it to be hell itself.‡

Bellarmine, Ward, and Challoner, however, contend that it signifies purgatory; while Alexander has rejected the passage altogether, as totally inadequate to the establishment of the Papal fire.

["This, then, is the unity of interpretation, this the 'unanimous consent of the Fathers,' upon which every Papist, from the time of Pope Pius IV. to the present hour, is bound to admit the interpretation of a passage, which is invariably produced in favour of the gainful doctrine of purgatory. Well might the Cardinal* say that this is one of the most obscure, as well as the most useful passages in holy writ: obscure, indeed, as we have seen, from the many contradictory interpretations heaped upon it; and useful, no doubt, from the Jesuitical latitude which it affords for bending it to purposes the most profitable."+]

6. It is therefore evident that the Apostle is not speaking of the supposed fire of purgatory: (1.) Because he speaks of fire, as Origen observes, not properly, but metaphorically so called.‡ This appears from the particles of similitude, "so as," which show that St. Paul did not mean a literal escape out of fire, but such an escape as men make out of a place on fire. (2.) The word "day," whether it may be considered as referring to the destruction of Jerusalem, or the day of judgment, or to the time of a man's death, or any public and severe calamity, is totally inapplicable to purgatory, which presents a constant succession of periods, and not one fixed point of time, as is implied by the use of the word "day." (3.) This fire is to try every man's work, that of Paul and that of Apollos, as well as those who built on the foundation "hay, wood, and stubble;" and it cannot be said that Paul and Apollos went through the fire of purgatory. (4.) This fire shall try men's works of what sort they are.

["* Cardinal Bellarmine, the oracle of the Romish Church, declares the opinion of these two Fathers, Theophylact and Chrysostom, both as to the foundation and the superstructure, to be totally indefensible, 'quia sequerentur verum esse hæresim Origenis quod omnes salvarentur.'—Bellarm. de Purg., lib. i., cap. v., tom. ii., p. 393, H. Origen, it may be as well to remember, was another of the Fathers.

["† Even Gregory himself, though he understands the fire to mean purgatory, admits that 'de igne tribulationis in hac nobis vita adhibito possit intelligi.'—Greg. Mag. Dial., lib. iv., cap. xxxix., col. 442. Paris, 1705.

["‡ Clem. Alexand. Strom., lib. v., tom. ii., pp. 660, 683. Oxon., 1715.

["Tertul. contra Marcion., lib. v., cap. vi., p. 468, D. Paris. 1664.

["Chrysostom., Hom. ix. in 1 Cor. iii., tom. v., p. 93. Hom. lvi. de Pœnit., tom. i., p. 616, C. Paris, 1636.

["Greg. Dial., lib. iv., cap. xxxix., tom. ii., col. 441. Paris, 1705.

["August. in Ps. vi., tom. iv., p. 24, C. Paris, 1691.

["De Civit. Dei, lib. xxi., cap. xxvi., sect. 2.

["De Fide et Oper., cap. xvi., sect. xxvii., tom. vi., col. 181, C. Enchirid., cap. 69. Paris, 1685.

["Origen., Hom. vi. in Exod. Hom. xvi. in Jerem. xv. 16, tom. iii., p. 221. Paris, 1740.

["Jerom., lib. ii., advers. Jovinian., tom. iv. Paris, 1706.

["Theodoret. in 1 Cor. iii. 12, 13, tom. iii., p. 134. Paris, 1642.

["Theophylact. in 1 Cor. iii. 13, p. 186. London, 1636.

["Bede in 1 Cor. iii., tom. vi., Oper., col. 373. Basil, 1563.

["Bernard. Serm. in 1 Cor. iii., p. 411. Coloniæ, 1620.

["Ambrose in 1 Cor. iii. 15, tom. ii., pt. ii., col. 122. Paris, 1690.

["As an appendage to this list of the Fathers, it may not be amiss to subjoin the observations of Estius, (A.D. 1613,) one of the most approved Romish commentators, in further illustration of the marvellous unanimity exemplified on the text:—

["'Major expositionum varietas de igne. Quidam, ut Augustinus et Gregorius, tribulationes intelligunt hujus vitæ. Alii ignem intelligunt gehennæ. Verum ignis ille non probat opus uniuscujusque, nec per eum salvus quisquam evadit. Plerique exponunt de purgatorio, pro qua sententia adducuntur etiam Patres Latini, qui in Concilio Florentino cum Græcis de purgatorio disputarunt. At vero nec id dici posse videtur: tum propter ea quæ demonstrant eum non particularis judicii, sed universalis intelligi; tum quia purgatorius ignis tantum punit mala opera bonorum. Multo probabilior est eorum expositio, qui ignem interpretantur instrumentum illius judicii quem theologi vocamus ignem conflagrationis, de quo aliæ Scripturæ diem Domini describentes loquuntur. Nec obstat ut ignis, de quo Paulus agit, talis intelligi debeat, ut ambo per eum transeant, et qui preciosa super fundamentum ædicaverit; et qui vilia; videlicet probaturus opus uniuscujusque. Quod etiam diserte testatur Augustinus, Enchirid. 68.'—Estii Comment. in 1 Cor. iii. 10—15, p. 220, et seq. Colon., 1631.

["* 'Unum ex difficillimis et utilissimis totius Scripturæ.'—Bellarm., lib. i., cap. v., tom. ii., p. 393, D. Coloniæ, 1628.

["'Locus obscurissimus est, cujus sensum vix assequi liceat.' 'It is a most obscure passage, the sense of which it is scarcely possible to ascertain.'—Alexand. Nat., lib. ix., p. 378. Paris, 1685. See also Dissert., xlv. in Hist. iv. Seculi.

["Augustine also remarks: 'Illa sententia Pauli Apostoli ad intelligendum difficilis.' 'This opinion of St. Paul is very difficult to understand.'—Augustin. de Octo Dulcit. Quæst., sect. vi., tom. vi., col. 124, C. Paris, 1685. See also Bede ad 1 Cor. iii. 10, tom. v., col. 363. Basil, 1563.

["Hence Faber, a Romish writer, observes:—'Hæc auctoritas est certe valde obscura, et variæ explicationes offeruntur, non solum a diversis Patribus et Doctoribus, sed ab eodem Doctore. Augustinus hunc locum variis modis interpretatur.' 'This authority is certainly very obscure; and various explanations are offered, not only from different Fathers and Doctors, but even from the same Doctor. Augustine interprets this place in various ways.'—Faber, lib. ii., p. 444. Paris, 1720."

[† Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 49—56.]

‡ "Ergo quandoquidem ignis consumens dicitur esse, quæramus, quid potissimum a Deo consumi deceat? Equidem malitiam dixerim, et quæcunque ejus opera, quæ figurate nominantur ligna, fœnum, stipula, a Deo consumi tanquam ab igne: certe de malo dicitur superstruere eum jacto fundamento rationali, ligna, fœnum, stipulam. Quæ si quis docere potest aliter a Paulo accipi, et corporaliter intelligendum esse, malos superstruere ligna, fœnum, stipulam: apparebit etiam ignem materialem intelligendum et sensibilem: quod si evidenter figurata est locutio, dum mali hominis opera significantur lignorum, fœni stipularumque nomine, qui fit, ut non statim succurrat quomodo ignis accipiendus sit, qui consumat ligna hujusmodi? Nam unius cujusque opus (inquit Scriptura) probabit ignis quale sit, si cujus opus superædificatum permanserit, mercedem is accipiet: si cujus opus exuretur, is jacturam faciet."—Origenes contra Celsum, lib. iv., p. 168. 4to., Cantab., 1677.]

But that of purgatory, according to the Church of Rome, does not try, test, or determine the character of every man's works, it punishes them on account of them. The ordeal of trial passes on all men's works, whether good or bad: purgatory refers only to sins, and these not mortal, but venial. (5) To be saved as δια πυρος, "by" or "through fire," is a proverbial mode of expression concerning those who escape with difficulty and hazard out of great danger. It is so used in the Old Testament. "We went through fire and through water;" (Psalm lxvi. 12;) that is, we were in the greatest danger. "When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned;" (Isai. xliii. 2;) "I have plucked them as a firebrand out of the fire;" (Amos iv. 11;) "Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?" (Zech. iii. 2.) It is also used in the New Testament: "Others save with fear, plucking them out of the fire." (Jude 23.) So L. Æmilius saith, that "he escaped the popular flame, half burned." "Se populare incendium priore consulatu semiustum effugisse."*

This passage of Scripture, so far from supporting the opinion of the Church of Rome, gives awful warning not to build on the true foundation of Christianity "hay and stubble;" as the day of trial will utterly ruin all such works, although the builders may, because they are sincere, be saved; yet even this will not take place without great difficulty and hazard.

Peter de Soto, a distinguished Romanist, confesses that purgatory cannot be proved from this text. His words are, "It is not persons, but vain doctrines, called 'wood, hay, stubble,' which some well-meaning but mistaken teachers added to the true, that shall, in the day of judgment, be tried by fire, and be burned, and themselves shall hardly escape, even as one escapeth out of the fire."

["Another argument is founded upon the following passage in St. Peter:—'For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit: by which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; which sometime were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water.' (1 Peter iii. 18—20.)

["According to the usual tenor of Romish interpretation,† the prison here mentioned is purgatory; and the mere word is of itself sufficient to determine the question. Now, there are many considerations which lead to the conclusion, that the preaching, of which the Apostle speaks, did not take place between the death of Christ upon the cross and his resurrection from the tomb. In the first place, it is said that the souls, to whom Christ, by his Spirit, preached, were such as had been 'disobedient;' and that the time of their disobedience was before the flood, 'while the ark was preparing;' so that the 'long-suffering of God' must denote his patience and forbearance in calling them by his Spirit to repentance, through the preaching of Noah. (Gen. vi.) Moreover, since those to whom Christ preached were disobedient, it is clear, that they were not confined in that receptacle for the souls of the Patriarchs, which is known to Romanists, and to Romanists only, as the Limbus Patrum; for themselves acknowledge that Noah and the Patriarchs were obedient Preachers of righteousness. Neither could it be to souls in purgatory that Christ went to preach, inasmuch as the souls there detained had already received full remission of all their sins; and were only suffering, in order to satisfy God's demands previously to their entrance into heaven.* To what purpose, then, would be his preaching, if no repentance or change could be effected by it? The text does not say he delivered them. If, indeed, these disobedient people died in mortal sin, they went to hell, whence there is no deliverance; and if in a state of grace, they went to Limbus, where there was no torment requiring deliverance,† and where the 'preaching' of Christ would have been no less superfluous than in purgatory.

["By attending to the scope of the Apostle's argument, as it is carried on uninterruptedly from the eighteenth verse of the third, to the seventh of the following chapter,‡ it will be seen that he is drawing a parallel between the antediluvians in the days of Noah, and the Jews of his own time; and showing, from the cases of those respectively who obeyed or disobeyed the preaching of Christ by Noah, that a like distinction would be made between those Jews who received or rejected the offer of salvation, which Jesus had died to purchase for them. In the former part of the third chapter, he had been exhorting his converts to the cultivation of a spirit of unity and brotherly love, and to the maintenance of a Christian life and conversation; entreating them not to be discouraged in the discharge of their duty by the fear of persecution, for that God was ever mindful of his servants; urging the example of Christ, who, being without sin, underwent the most cruel tortures and death; and calling upon them rather to glory, that in any way they were deemed worthy to endure suffering for his sake. He proceeds to assure them, that conformity to the will of Christ, in renouncing sin, in cultivating holy dispositions, in firmly adhering to the truth, was essentially necessary to their eternal peace; and this assurance he confirms by a reference to the punishment inflicted upon those who lived before the flood. To those rebellious spirits, who are reserved in prison unto the judgment of the great day, Christ had preached by his Spirit in

* Titi Livii Historiæ, quod extat, tom. iii., lib. xxii., cap. 40. Amstelædami, 1720.

["† The Faith of Catholics, p. 356. London, 1830.

["Husenbeth, Faberism exposed and refuted, cap. vi., sect. i., p. 553. Norwich, 1836.

["Dr. Milner's End of Religious Controversy, letter lv., p. 369.

["An Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine, Permissu Superiorum, p. 110. Dublin, Grace, 1838

["* Before the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, the gates of heaven were opened to none; and the departed souls of good men were detained in a certain place, called in Scripture, 'Abraham's bosom,' and by the schools, 'Limbus Patrum,' which is the uppermost part of hell; the lowest being the place of the damned; the next above that, purgatory; and then the Limbus Infantum.—Bellarm. de Christ., lib. iv., cap. xi., tom. i., p. 113, A; De Purg., lib. ii., cap. vi., tom. ii., p. 410, C. Coloniæ, 1628; Catech. ad Parochos, p. 74. Lugd., 1579.

["† We are told that those who were detained in Limbo until the descent of Christ into hell, only suffered the pœna damni, or deprivation of the vision of God; and, being sustained by the blessed hope of redemption, enjoyed a quiet habitation. They are said to have been delivered by Christ, and the place has since remained empty.—Bellarm. de Purg., lib. ii., cap. vi., xiv., tom. ii., p. 410, A. Colon., 1628; Catech. ad Parochos, p. 73. Lugd., 1579. See sec. vi., p. 244, ut supra.

["‡ It should be remembered that our Bibles were not originally divided into chapters and verses, but each book, gospel, or epistle was written as in one unbroken letter, so that the close connexion in the argument, when the chain of reasoning was uninterrupted by the commencement of a new chapter, would then be more clearly seen than it is at present. According to Michaëlis, the Bible was divided into chapters in the twelfth century, by Cardinal Hugo de S. Caro; and into verses by Robert Stephens, a celebrated printer in France, about 1551.

Noah; but they, being disobedient, perished; while the eight souls who obeyed God's righteous laws were saved. And in like manner, those who, under the Gospel dispensation, believe and obey the truth, will receive eternal salvation; but those who abuse the invitations and long-suffering of the Saviour, will be condemned for ever to the prison of hell.

[" God himself has declared that his Spirit did 'strive with man' before the flood; (Gen. vi. 3;) which doubtless was the Spirit in Noah by which he became a preacher of righteousness, and 'condemned the world of the ungodly.' (2 Peter ii. 5; Heb. xi. 7.) It is therefore reasonable to conclude with two of the greatest Divines of our Church,* that the Spirit by which Christ is said to have preached in Noah to the wicked spirits now in hades, was that very Spirit by which he was raised from the dead. None other could it be than the Spirit of his Divinity,—his Divine Spirit, and not his human soul,—inasmuch as he could not be raised from the grave by virtue of any other spirit; and consequently this preaching has no relation whatever to souls in a separate state. To say, as Bellarmine at first did, that Christ preached in his soul only,† is directly to contradict the statement of the Apostle, who manifestly teaches that his going forth to preach was in the Spirit of his Divinity, and before his appearance in the flesh. It cannot, therefore, be understood of his preaching the Gospel, between his death and his resurrection, to departed spirits in purgatory.

[" With respect to the Patristical interpretation of the passage, Jerome observes, 'that Christ preached to the spirits in prison, when the patience of God waited in the days of Noah, bringing the flood upon the wicked.'‡

[" 'It may be,' suggests Augustine, 'that the whole of St. Peter's statement concerning the spirits in prison, who believed not in the days of Noah, has no reference whatever to hell, but rather to those times of which he has transferred the example to our own.' 'For before Christ came once in the flesh to die for us, he came often in the Spirit to those whom he would, giving them by visions such spiritual intimations as he wished; by which Spirit he was also quickened, when, during his passion, he was mortified in the flesh.'§ With this interpretation of Augustine, Thomas Aquinas agrees. ‖

[" The venerable Bede also remarks, 'He who, in our times, coming in the flesh, preached the way of life to the world, preached also before the flood, by his Spirit, to those who were then unbelieving and carnally minded. For he was by his Holy Spirit in Noah, and in the other holy men, who lived at that time, and, by their good conversation, preached to the wicked men of that age, that they might be converted to better things."*

[" Lastly, Calmet observes, that 'Christ preached by his Spirit, with which he filled Noah, to the unbelievers of that time. He preached therefore to those unbelievers, not in person, or visibly, but by his Spirit communicated to Noah.'†

[" From the opinion of these writers, it appears that they interpret the passage precisely as we have done, referring the preaching to the Holy Spirit in Noah, and making not the slightest allusion to the preaching of Christ to suffering souls in the unknown Papal region, after his death upon the cross. His soul doubtless went where the souls of other men go when separated from the body, or the perfection of his human character would have been incomplete: but as to the notion that his soul was then employed in preaching to the dead, not only does there appear wanting a solid reason for his so doing, but also a deficiency of the same gift in those who seek for one."‡] §

7. We conclude that the doctrine of purgatory cannot be legitimately derived from this text, especially if the following considerations are taken into view:—(1.) The soul of Christ did not, in the interval between his death and resurrection, go to purgatory; for it is stated plainly that it went to paradise, that is, one department of hades, or the invisible world, the place where the spirits of just men are, to which, also, went the penitent thief. This will be farther confirmed by the two following considerations:—(2.) The persons to whom this preaching was sent were the antediluvians, who were ποτε, "formerly," at that time, disobedient. The time was the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing. (3.) The prison was the earth on which they then lived, in which they were preserved one hundred and twenty years, that the long-suffering of God might be manifest. Indeed, a state of sin is frequently in Scripture represented under the figure of a prison. (Isai. xlii. 7; xlix. 9; lxi. 1, 2.) Now the antediluvians, who lived about the time of Noah, were in prison, upon a double account. First, by reason [" * Archbishop Tillotson and Bishop Pearson.

[" † Bellarm. de Christi Anima, lib. iv., cap. 13—16. For his change of opinion see his Recognitio Librorum, tom. i., p. 1, H.

[" Bishop Gibson's Preservative. Title viii., ch. vi., p. 145; ix., p. 330.

[" Bishop Pearson on the Creed, p. 228. Fol. edit., 1715.

[" Fulke's Annotations upon the Rhemish Testament, 1 Peter iii. 19.

[" ‡ 'Prædicavit spiritibus in carcere constitutis, quando Dei patientia exspectabatur in diebus Noe, diluvium impiis inferens.'—Hieron., lib. xv. Comment. in Isai., cap. liv., tom. iii., col. 395. Paris, 1704.

[" § 'Considera tamen ne forte totum illud, quod de conclusis in carcere spiritibus, qui in diebus Noe non crediderant, Petrus Apostolus dicit, omnino ad inferos non pertineat, sed ad illa potius tempora, quorum formam ad hæc tempora transtulit.....Quoniam priusquam veniret in carne pro nobis moriturus, quod semel fecit, sæpe antea veniebat in Spiritu ad quos volebat, visis eos admonens sicut volebat utique in Spiritu; quo Spiritu et vivificatus est, cum in passione esset carne mortificatus.'—Augustin., Epist. clxiv., ad Evotium, c. vi., sec. xviii., tom. ii., col. 578, G; 580, C.

[" ‖ T. Aquin. Summ. Theol., pars iii., quæst. lii., art. xi., p. 145. Lyons, 1567.

[" * 'Qui nostris temporibus in carne veniens iter vitæ mundo prædicavit, ipse etiam ante diluvium eis, qui tunc incredeli erant et carnaliter vivebant, Spiritu veniens prædicavit. Ipse enim per Spiritum Sanctum erat in Noe, cæterisque qui tunc fuere sanctis; et, per eorum bonam conversationem, pravis illius ævi hominibus, ut ad meliora converterentur, prædicavit.'—Beda, in 1 Pet. iii. 19, tom. v., col. 980. Basil, 1563.

[" † 'Christ, par son Esprit dont il remplit Noë, prêcha aux hommes incrédules de ce tems-là. Christ prêcha, donc, à les incrédules, non en personne ni visiblement, mais par son Esprit, qu'il avoit communiqué à Noë.'—Calmet. Comment., Liv. xxiv., 159.

[" ‡ One of the modern advocates of Popery observes, with reference to 1 Peter iii. 19: 'It is necessary to state, that the note upon this text in the Douay Bible does not pretend even to urge it as a proof of purgatory; it merely says, it is a proof of a third place.' But Messrs. Berington and Kirk, and likewise Mr. Husenbeth, certainly believe that the passage proves purgatory: as did also Mr. Gother, Dr. Chaloner, Dr. Milner, and the Superiores, by whose permission the 'Abridgment of Christian Doctrine' is scattered among the Roman Catholic population. To the note, then, in the Douay version, and the comment of Dr. T. Butler, we will apply the words of Clemens Alexandrinus: Ενιοτε δε και τα εαυτων διελεγχομενοι αρνουνται δογματα, αντικρυς ὁμολογειν αιδουμενοι ἁ κατ' ιδιαν αυχουσι διδασκοντες οὑτως.—Clement. Alex. Strom., lib. vii., c. xvi., tom. ii., p. 892. Oxon., 1715. 'Sometimes when they are convicted, they deny their principles; being ashamed openly to confess those doctrines of which in private they make their boast.' "] of their bondage to sin, for then all flesh had corrupted their ways, their wickedness being great upon the earth, and every imagination of their heart only evil continually. Secondly, they were in prison, having received from God the sentence of destruction, if they repented not within a hundred and twenty years. (Gen. vi. 3.) Thus "the long-suffering of God waited for them in the days of Noah," expecting their repentance, and keeping them as it were in prison against the day of slaughter, if they repented not. (4.) Christ is said to have preached to the Jews and Gentiles. (Eph. ii. 17.) Now it is certain that our Lord did not personally preach to the Gentiles, but only by his Apostles; and if Christ is said, by St. Paul, to do what he did by his Apostles, he may be said, with equal propriety, by St. Peter, to go and do what he did by his Prophets. The words πορευθεις εκηρυξεν, "having gone he preached," or, he went and preached, are a pleonasm for "he preached." So the Syraic version, et predicavit, "and preached." So also Eph. ii. 17: Και ελθων ευαγγελιζατο, "and came and preached;" or simply preached. Again, Christ is said not to have gone personally to the antediluvians, but by his Spirit; the Spirit which quickened him, as is clear from the construction, εν ῳ, "by which," referring to Spirit as its antecedent. His Spirit inspired Noah to preach to them, as is proved from Gen. vi. 3: "My Spirit shall not always strive with man." Hence Noah is called "a preacher of righteousness." (2 Peter ii. 5.) Enoch also preached to the antediluvians. (Jude 14.) Accordingly, the Spirit which was in the ancient Prophets, is declared to be the Spirit of Christ. (1 Peter i. 11.) Christ, therefore, did not descend to purgatory to preach. The preaching to which reference is made was to the antediluvians, by his Spirit, through his Prophet Noah, a preacher of righteousness. Christ vouchsafed to the old world the assistance of his Spirit, warned them by Noah, and waited long for their repentance. (5.) Although the persons spoken of are called spirits, they were not disembodied spirits, because, (i.) The time when this preaching took place was "in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing." (ii.) This kind of phraseology, however, frequently obtains in Scripture. In the expression, "The spirits of just men made perfect," (Heb. xii. 23,) allusion is made to righteous men in the militant church. "Father of spirits," (Heb. xii. 9,) that is, of men still in the body. "God of the spirits of all flesh," (Num. xvi. 22,) of men not in a disembodied state. (6.) It is certain also that the spirits in prison, to whom Christ, by his Spirit, in Noah, preached, were the persons who were ποτε, "formerly," at that time, namely, in the days of Noah; they were disobedient, that is, unpersuadable, unbelieving, and rebellious, as the word strictly means. St. Peter also calls them ungodly. (2 Peter ii. 5.) Besides, their sins were aggravated on account of the patience and long-suffering of God, which απαξ, "once," waited on them for one hundred and twenty years together, while Noah was preparing the ark. They were, therefore, sinners of the most inveterate character. Now, according to Romanists, souls in a state of grace and obedience only are sent to purgatory; but these who are designated "unbelievers and ungodly," must be in a state of mortal sin, and consequently could not go to purgatory, but to hell, according to the doctrine of their Church. (7.) The Papists also affirm, that Christ, after his death, went to deliver all the souls of the just from Limbo, there detained from the beginning of the world; but the word in the passage under consideration is properly rendered "preached," and not "delivered;" which preaching they disobeyed. (8.) Finally, their bodies were drowned, and their spirits cast into hell, which is called a prison; (Matt. v. 25; 2 Peter iv. 5;) but Noah and his family were saved.

[§ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and the Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 56—62.

["There is yet one more text of Scripture (Rev. xxi. 27) which is thought to be insuperable by Protestant objection, inasmuch as it asserts that 'nothing that defileth shall enter the heavenly Jerusalem.'* Hence the Romanist concludes, that,—as, with the exception of Apostles, Martyrs, and those who die immediately after baptism or absolution, no man can leave this world without some venial sin, some slight unrepented transgression,—none can enter heaven with these defilements upon him, and consequently there must be some place in which the soul will be purged from sin, and qualified to enter into glory. Of course this place must be purgatory.†

["That any unclean thing can enter into the kingdom of heaven, we, with the Papist, most readily disavow; but that purgatory is established to burn out the defilements of the soul caused by sin, is what we at the same time most strenuously deny.

["In arguments, however, with Romanists, it is always as well to examine carefully every passage, whether of the sacred Scriptures, or of the Fathers, which they may bring forward to support the doctrine for which they are contending. So great is their love of brevity, that sometimes, no doubt unintentionally, they omit the very part of the sentence which might possibly overturn the argument which it is intended to establish.‡

["In a work, entitled 'Travels of an Irish Gentleman in search of a Religion,' written by a popular author, and published in 1833, an attack is made upon the Lectures of a late learned Norrisian Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, as 'containing all but an avowal of the worst principles of Socinianism.' Now, upon examination, it appears that the passage is most shamelessly garbled; that it applies not to Socinians in particular, but to Dissenters in general; and merely suggests, that as 'we actually agree with many Dissenters in fundamentals, we might unite and worship together, if they were properly disposed and directed, but that they would more easily come over to us than we to them.'§

["When again the same author ‖ would support picture-worship by the practice of the ancients, the authority of Nilus, Archbishop of Thessalonica, A. D. 440, is quoted; and these are his words: 'Let the sacred temple be filled with pictures, well executed by the most celebrated artists, and representing the most remarkable events of the Old and New Testaments.' But, unfortunately, the sentence is curtailed of its fair proportions. Unquestionably the sacred temple was to be filled with pictures: but why? 'That the unlettered, and those who were incapable of reading the divine Scriptures, might'—not fall down and worship, but—'be reminded, by the sight

["* Dr. Wiseman, vol. ii., Lect. xi., p. 57.

["† Husenbeth, Faberism exposed and refuted, c. vi., sec. i., p. 554. Norwich, 1836.

["An Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine, Permissu Superiorum, p. 110. Dublin: Grace, 1838.

["Dr. Milner's End of Religious Controversy, Letter lv., p. 373.

["‡ Bishop Cosin remarks a slight mistake on the part of the Romanists, when they quote St. Augustine's 'Treatise concerning Christian Doctrine,' as maintaining the same number of books in the sacred canon with their own Church: whereas, by consulting the words previous to the quotation made, the assertion is entirely refuted. —Bp. Cosin's Scholast. Hist., n. lxxxi., p. 101. London, 1657.

["§ Travels of an Irish Gentleman, by Thomas Moore, vol ii., pp. 308, 309. Dr. Hey's Lectures, book iv., art. i., chap. xv., tom. i., pp. 517, 518. See also p. 590. Camb., 1841.

["‖ Travels of an Irish Gentleman, vol. i., p. 63.

of the painting, of the virtuous deeds of those who have served the true God, and be excited thereby to the imitation of their laudable actions.' *

["There is also a tract put forth by Episcopal authority, and entitled 'An Abridgment of Christian Doctrine,' in which the honouring (worship) of angels is supported by the authority of St. John: 'And I fell down to adore before the feet of the angel who showed me these things.' (Rev. xix. 10; xxii. 8.)† Thus ends the quotation. Sine permissu superiorum, we will take leave to proceed with it: 'And he said unto me, See thou do it not: I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus: worship God.'‡

["Thus also it is in the text before us. It is only necessary to complete the verse, in order to ascertain the amount of testimony which it bears to the doctrine of purgatory:—'And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life.' Hence it appears that they who are impure, who work abomination, or who make a lie, shall be excluded from the heavenly Jerusalem; and that those who are written in the Lamb's book of life, shall be admitted into the number of its glorified citizens. The ground of admission is, 'the registration of their names in the Lamb's book of life,' not the endurance of purgatorial fire.

["We have now passed in review the leading passages of Scripture which the modern advocates of purgatory have adduced in support of their dogma;—passages which have been cruelly tortured to uphold what Romish writers are pleased to call an article of faith, in which implicit belief is demanded under the penalty of a Papal anathema. In former times the alleged authorities were far more numerous;§ but, for obvious reasons, the more cautious writers of the present day confine themselves to those which we have now examined. 'So illustriously manifest is her cause in the Scriptures, that its highest advantages are the deepest obscurities, and its clearest ["* 'Ιστοριων παλαιας και νεας διαθηκης πληρωσαι ενθεν και ενθεν χειρι καλλιστου ζωγραφου τον ναον ἁγιον, ὁπως αν οἱ μη ειδοτες γραμματα, μηδε δυναμενοι τας θειας αναγινωσκειν γραφας, τῃ θεωριᾳ της ζωγραφιας μνημην τε λαμβανωσιν της των γνησιως τῳ αληθινῳ Θεῳ δεδουλευκοτων ανδραγαθιας, και πως αμιλλαν διεγειρωνται των ευκλεων και αοιδιμων αριστευματων, κ.τ.λ.'—Nilus, lib. iv., Ep. 61, ad Olymp. Eparch., tom. i., p. 491. Romæ, 1668.

["† See An Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine, p. 49. Permissu Superiorum. Dublin, 1838.

["‡ See a learned note in Dr. Fulke on the Rhemish Testament, Rev. xix. 10, in which he ably exposes the subterfuges to which Papists resort for removing the serious difficulty presented to them by this text.

["§ It may not be amiss, for the information of Protestants, to subjoin a list of those texts which have been brought forward by Bellarmine and others in defence of the doctrine of purgatory. Dr. Wiseman has omitted them as 'superabundant;' and some of the more judicious writers of the Roman Catholic communion, as insufficient and untenable. At all events, they are now very generally abandoned; and it is scarcely necessary to do more than produce them, in order to show that they have most prudently been given up.

["'And he placed at the east of the garden of Eden cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life.' (Gen. iii. 24.)

["According to the Romanists, the 'flaming sword' was a witness to sinners that they must pass through purgatory into paradise: whereas Scripture makes it an impediment against all access to the tree of life, until there be no more curse, and it blooms afresh in the New Jerusalem. (Rev. xxii. 2, 3.)

["'And they took their bones, and buried them under a tree at Jabesh, and fasted seven days.' (1 Sam. xxxi. 13.)

["'And they mourned, and wept, and fasted until even, for Saul, and for Jonathan his son, and for the people of the Lord, and for the house of Israel; because they were fallen by the sword.' (2 Sam. i. 12.)

["Why these expressions of sorrow, more than any other case of ordinary mourning, should benefit the souls of the departed, it is not easy to understand.

["'For wickedness burneth as the fire: it shall devour the briers and thorns, and shall kindle in the thickets of the forest, and they shall mount up like the lifting up of smoke. Through the wrath of the Lord of hosts is the land darkened, and the people shall be as the fuel of the fire: no man shall spare his brother.' (Isai. ix. 18, 19.)

["By a reference to the context, it will appear that these 'briers and thorns' are emblematic of sinners doomed to the devouring fire of hell, not to the temporary flames of purgatory.

["'We went through fire and through water: but thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place.' (Psalm lxvi. 12.)

["Bellarmine acknowledges that this passage may have various senses, though he prefers that which refers the water to baptism, and the fire to purgatory. The common proverb of 'going through fire and water' does not seem to require any very learned disquisition to explain it.

["'I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against him, until he plead my cause, and execute judgment for me: he will bring me forth to the light, and I shall behold his righteousness.' (Micah vii. 9.)

["There is not a shadow of reason for connecting the 'indignation of the Lord' with purgatory. The sorrows and afflictions of this life are manifestly the effects which are here attributed to it.

["'As for thee also, by the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water.' (Zech. ix. 11.)

["The Romanists, according to Bellarmine, doubted whether the pit is Limbus Patrum, or purgatory. The meaning is, that as God had delivered the Jewish captives from the woes and wretchedness of Babylon, where there was no hope of refreshment: so would he afterwards rescue his Church from all her spiritual miseries by the precious blood of the Messiah.

["'And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness.' (Mal. iii. 3.)

["A manifest prediction of the influence of the Holy Ghost under the Gospel dispensation, by which the hearts of men are to be purified, so that 'they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness'

["'But I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.' (Matt. v. 22.)

["The Romanist maintained that the three degrees of punishment here specified will all be inflicted after this life; and that the last being eternal, the two former are temporal or purgatorial. Any of our commentators will give an interpretation far more satisfactory.

["'Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations.' (Luke xvi. 9.)

["The friends were said to be the saints, by whose services the dead are benefited. Surely such a perversion of a scriptural text was never before hazarded!

["'And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom.' (Luke xxiii. 42.)

["This was interpreted into a prayer for remission of sin after death: but the pardon was pronounced on the cross, and the happiness promised was to be immediate.

["'Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death.' (Acts ii. 24.)

["These 'pains of death,' by which the merest babe will understand the power or the bands of death, were by Romanists supposed to be those of purgatory. It was impossible that he who had life in himself, (John v. 26,) and the promise of a speedy resurrection (verse 25,) should be holden of them.

["'Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why are they then baptized for the dead?' (1 Cor. xv. 29.)

["The expression 'baptized for the dead,' sets forth the efficacy of baptism, whereby we are made partakers of Christ's death, and assured of the certainty of a resurrection. (See Rom. vi. 4, and the arguments grounded by the Apostle thereon.) It required some ingenuity to extract from the term both fire and water, and connect the latter with purgatory.

["'That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth.' (Phil. ii. 10.)

["'Things under the earth,' were said to be souls in purgatory light is treasured up in the profoundest darkness!' Wise had she been in yielding to the sober views of her more reflecting children, who have had the candour to confess that purgatory cannot be maintained from Scripture; and that since Christ has not thought fit to communicate any revelation on the subject, it is only upon conjectures, more or less probable, that the doctrine can be maintained."*]+

From the foregoing it will appear, to every candid individual, that the text from 1 Peter iii. 18, &c., gives no support whatever to the doctrine of purgatory. Many Roman Catholics are of the same opinion. Calmet, in reference to this text having been alleged to prove the doctrine of purgatory, observes: Mais on peut douter que ce soit le sens de Saint Pierre en cet endroit. "But we may doubt whether this be the meaning of St. Peter in this place." The opinion of Bede, who lived more than a thousand years ago, and which was given on the occasion of his citing the judgment of Athanasius on the text in question, was as follows:—"He who, in our times, coming in the flesh, preached the way of life to the world, even he himself came before the flood, and preached to them who then were unbelievers, and lived carnally. For even he, by his Holy Spirit, was in Noah, and in the rest of the holy men which were at that time, and by their good conversation preached to the wicked men of that age, that they might be converted to better manners."‡

III. On account of the utter destitution of Scripture passages on which to substantiate the doctrine of purgatory, the following arguments have been adduced in its support.

1. The author of the "Sincere Christian" has advanced the following:—"The justice of God," he says, "demands from sinners a reparation of the injury done to him by sin, by means of temporal punishments, to be endured after the guilt of their mortal sins, and the eternal punishment due to such has been remitted: hence, it follows, that there must be a state of temporal punishment after death, where all those must go, who, dying in a state of grace, have not paid this debt before they die, and where they must remain in a state of suffering until it has been fully paid."* The ground of this argument is, that an expiatory sacrifice to divine justice must be made through the medium either of good works or penal sufferings. Now, as the doctrine of merit and satisfaction is beyond contradiction false, the conclusion drawn from it must also be fallacious. The argument is itself a proof of the unscriptural views which Roman Catholics entertain respecting their good deeds and the value of sufferings; the absurdities of which having already been exposed, the reader is referred to the preceding chapter.

2. The grounds upon which the Papists defend the doctrine of purgatory are dubious and disputable, most of them being false and unscriptural. We allude to the following:—(1.) Their distinction of sins into mortal and venial, in their own nature. (2.) The notion that the taking away the guilt of sin does not imply the taking away the entire punishment of it. (3.) That God requires from the offender a full exchange of satisfactions or penances, which must regularly be performed, here or hereafter, even by those who are professedly pardoned. (4.) That the death of Christ, his merit and the satisfaction which he made, do not procure for us a full remission of our sins before we die, and sometimes not until a long time after death. These propositions, novel and uncertain, and at variance with the word of God, were invented by the Schoolmen, and are the product of consummate ignorance concerning the remission of sins by grace, the righteousness of faith, and the infinite value of Christ's atonement and intercession.

3. On the topic now under consideration, we lay before our readers the following extract from Dr. A. Clarke's sermon on "Salvation by Faith." After having confuted the doctrine of the merit of works, he proceeds: "Penal sufferings, in a future state, are supposed by many to be sufficiently efficacious to purge the soul from the moral stains contracted in this life; and to make an atonement for the offences committed in time. This system is liable to all the objections urged against the preceding, and to several others peculiar to itself; for, if there had not been sin, there had not been punishment. Penal sufferings, inflicted by divine justice, are the desert of the crimes which require justice to inflict such punishments. If the sufferings inflicted by this divine justice be supposed to be capable of annihilating the cause for which they are inflicted;—if they annihilate the cause, they must be greater than that cause, and consequently unjust; because, in that case, the punishment would be greater than the offence. Such penal inflictions could not proceed from a righteous God.

"But the ground of this system is absurd: we have no evidence from Scripture or reason that there are any emendatory punishments in the eternal world.

* Sincere Christian, vol. ii., p. 109.

and the same meaning was affixed to Rev. v. 3. The two latter terms simply divide men into the quick and the dead.

["'The spirits of the just made perfect.' (Heb. xii. 23.)

["Since there are spirits of just men made perfect in heaven, there must be spirits of just men not yet made perfect somewhere else; and where, if not in purgatory? A palpable non sequitur. Because there is a Pope at Rome, it does not follow that there must be an antipope at Avignon.

["'If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?' (1 Peter iv. 18.)

["The righteous are scarcely saved, that is, only by passing through the fire. An inference most logical, philological, and conclusive! By such a method of interpreting Scripture, it would be easy to build up any text whatsoever into a proof of purgatory. Take, for instance, Gen. v. 32: 'Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japheth.' Now on the hypothesis that Shem went to heaven, and Ham to hell, there must be some third place for Japheth; ergo, there is a purgatory.

["As the authority of Matt. v. 25 is now omitted by the Romish controvertists, Berington, Husenbeth, and Wiseman, and in 'The Protestant's Trial by the Written Word;' we may fairly hope that this text will shortly be added to the number of the rejected; and that ere long all claim to scriptural authority for the existence of a purgatory will be universally, as it is already very generally, given up as untenable ground."

["* Petrus a Soto in Sacerd. Instruct., Lect. I., de Purg. Dr. Fisher, formerly Bishop of Rochester, Contra Lutherum, art. xviii. Father Barnes, Catholico-Rom. Pacif., sect. ix., lit. D, ad fin. Paralip., p. 130. Oxon., 1680. Courayer, in Paol., tom. ii., p. 644. London, 1736.

["'Dr. Trevern, Bishop of Strasburg, after observing that much remains for us to expiate in the other world, produces no proof of purgatory from the New Testament, and freely confesses that nothing is known respecting either its locality, or the manner of its operations.'—Discuss. Amic., Lett. xiii., vol. ii., p. 242.

["'Dr. Wiseman himself confesses that the texts he quotes in proof of purgatory lead to 'no certain results,' but only 'guide us to some striking probabilities.'—Vol. ii., p. 58. Why then, without scriptural authority, make salvation to depend upon the baseless fabric of uncertainty?"]

[† Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 64—67.]

‡ Fulke on the Text of the New Testament of Jesus Christ, translated out of the Vulgar Latin, by the Papists of the traitorous Seminary of Rheims, in loco.

"The state of probation certainly extends only to the ultimate term of human life. We have no evidence, either from Scripture or reason, that it extends to another state. There is not only a deep silence on this in the divine records, but there are the most positive declarations against it. In time and life the great business relative to eternity is to be transacted. On passing the limits of time we enter into eternity: this is the unchangeable state. In that awful and indescribable infinitude of incomprehensible duration we read of but two places or states; heaven and hell, glory and misery, endless suffering and endless enjoyment. In these two places, or states, we read of but two descriptions of human beings: the saved and the lost; between whom there is that immeasurable gulf over which neither can pass. In the one state we read of no sin, no imperfection, no curse; there 'all tears are for ever wiped away from off all faces; and the righteous shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.' In the other we read of nothing but 'weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth;'—of 'the worm that dieth not;' and of 'the fire which is not quenched.' There the effects of sin appear in all their colourings, and in all their consequences. There no dispensation of grace is published; no offers of mercy made; the unholy are unholy still; nor can the circumstances of their case afford any means by which their state can be meliorated; and we have already seen that it is impossible that sufferings, whether penal or incidental, can destroy that cause (sin) by which they were produced.

"Besides, could it be even supposed that moral purgation could be effected by penal sufferings, which is already proved to be absurd, we have no evidence of any such place as purgatory, in which this purgation can be effected: it is a mere fable, either collected from spurious and apocryphal writings, canonized by superstition and ignorance, or it is the offspring of the deliriums of pious visionaries, early converts from Heathenism, from which they imported this part of their Creed; there is not one text of Scripture, legitimately interpreted, that gives the least countenance to a doctrine, as dangerous to the souls of men, as it has been gainful to its inventors: so that, if such purgation were possible, the place where it is to be effected cannot be proved to exist. Before, therefore, any dependence can be placed on the doctrine raised on this supposition, the existence of the place must be proved; and the possibility of purgation in that place demonstrated. The opinion of our own Church on this, and its kindred doctrines, should be heard with respect:—'The Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardons, worshipping and adoration, as well of images as of relics, and also invocation of saints, is a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture; but rather repugnant to the word of God.'—Article xxii."*

4. The heathen poets and philosophers have often been quoted in support of purgatory. We do not hesitate to assert, that the Romanists have antiquity to plead on this point; but it is not the antiquity of Scripture, nor that of primitive Christianity, but of Heathenism. When they ask us captiously, and with an air of triumph, "Where was your religion before Luther?" we usually say, "In the New Testament." But when we ask them, "Where was your doctrine of purgatory before Gregory the Great?" they may with much propriety reply, "In the writings of heathen poets and philosophers."

[* Discourses on various Subjects, &c., by Adam Clarke, LL.D., vol. iii., pp. 256—258. 8vo. edition.]

Plato was accustomed to divide men into three classes, in the future world. The first embraced the good, who, after death, possessed the Elysian Fields. The second included the incurably wicked, who were cast into hell, never to be delivered. The third comprehended the middle class, who, though they had sinned, nevertheless were in a curable condition; and went to hell to be punished for and purged from their sins, and afterwards were removed to the joys of paradise. The Heathen believed that those in this middle state might receive help from the prayers and sacrifices of the living, which is proved from the complaints of the ghost of Elpenor, as related by Homer, and of Palinurus, by Virgil. The ceremonies which were used for their deliverance, and described by these poets, strongly resemble those of the Church of Rome, which are employed in reference to souls supposed to be in purgatory; so that were these poems recognised as canonical, the most obstinate heretic would contend with them in vain.

[The idea entertained by the ancients, that individuals departing this life under some peculiar circumstances, were exposed to suffering in another world, and that these sufferings were assuaged, and ultimately removed by the suffrages and prayers of the living, receives abundant illustration, by the interview which is supposed to have taken place between Ulysses and the shade of Elpenor in the regions of the dead. Ulysses thus addresses the ghost:—

["' Τον μεν εγω δακρυσα ιδων, ελεησα τε θυμῳ, Και μιν φωνησας επεα πτεροεντα προσηυδων·
Ελπηνορ, πως ηλθες ὑπο ζοφον ηεροεντα;
Εφθης πεζος εων, η εγω συν νηϊ μελαινῃ.
Ὡς εφαμην· ὁ δε μ' οιμωξας ημειβετο μυθῳ·
Διογενες Λαερτιαδη, πολυμηχαν' Οδυσσευ,
Ασε με δαιμονος αισα κακη, και αθεσφατος οινος.
Κιρκης δ' εν μεγαρῳ καταλεγμενος ουκ ενοησα
Αψορρον καταβηναι, ιων ες κλιμακα μακρην,
Αλλα καταντικρυ τεγεος πεσον, εκ δε μοι αυχην
Αστραγαλων εαγη, ψυχη δ' αϊδοσδε κατηλθε.
Νυν δε σε των οπιθεν γουναζομαι, ου παρεοντων,
Προς τ' αλοχου και πατρος, ὁ σ' ετρεφε τυτθον εοντα,
Τηλεμαχου θ', ὁν μουνον ενι μεγαροισιν ελειπες·
Οιδα γαρ, ὡς ενθενδε κιων δομου εξ Αϊδαο,
Νησον ες Αιαιην σχησεις ευεργεα νηα·
Ενθα σ' επειτα, αναξ, κελομαι μνησασθαι εμειο,
Μη μ' ακλαυστον, αθαπτον, ιων οπιθεν καταλειπειν,
Νοσφισθεις, μη τοι τι θεων μηνιμα γενωμαι·
Αλλα με κακκηαι συν τευχεσιν, ὁσσα μοι εστιν,
Σημα τε μοι χεναι, πολιης επι δινι θαλασσης,
Ανδρος δυστηνοιο, και εσσομενοισι πυθεσθαι·
Ταυτα τε μοι τελεσαι, πηξαι τ' επι τυμβῳ ερετμον,
Τῳ και ζωος ερεσσον, εων μετ' εμοις εταροισιν.'
Hom. Odyss., lib. xi., v. 55—78.

["' Elpenor! how camest thou into the realms
Of darkness? Hast thou, though on foot, so far Outstripp'd my speed, who in my barque arrived?
So I; to whom with tears he thus replied:
Laertes' noble son, for wiles renown'd!
Fool'd by some demon and the' intemperate bowl,
I perish'd in the house of Circe; there,
Forgetful of the deep-descending steps,
I fell precipitated from the roof.
That shock my neck-bone, parting at the joint,
Sustain'd not, and my spirit sought the shades.
But now, by those whom thou hast left at home,
By thy Penelope, and by thy sire,
The gentle guardian of thine infant years,
And by thy only son, Telemachus,
I now adjure thee; for full well I know,
That, from the house of Pluto safe return'd,
Thou shalt ere long thy gallant vessel moor
At the Ææan isle. Ah! there arrived,
Remember me, nor leave me undeplored
